PREFACE.

The objects and scope of this work are explained in the Introductory Remarks which follow the Preface. Here it is desired to say a few words as to its history.

The book originated in a correspondence between the present writer, who was living at Palermo, and the late lamented Arthur Burnell, of the Madras Civil Service, one of the most eminent of modern Indian scholars, who during the course of our communications was filling judicial offices in Southern and Western India, chiefly at Tanjore. We had then met only once—at the India Library; but he took a kindly interest in work that engaged me, and this led to an exchange of letters, which went on after his return to India. About 1872—I cannot find his earliest reference to the subject—he mentioned that he was contemplating a vocabulary of Anglo-Indian words, and had made some collections with that view. In reply it was stated that I likewise had long been taking note of such words, and that a notion similar to his own had also been at various times floating in my mind. And I proposed that we should combine our labours.

I had not, in fact, the linguistic acquirements needful for carrying through such an undertaking alone; but I had gone through an amount of reading that would largely help in instances and illustrations, and had also a strong natural taste for the kind of work.

This was the beginning of the portly double-columned edifice which now presents itself, the completion of which my friend has not lived to see. It was built up from our joint contributions till his untimely death in 1882, and since then almost daily additions have continued to be made to the material and to the structure. The subject, indeed, had taken so comprehensive a shape, that it was becoming difficult to say where its limits lay, or why it should... ever end, except for the old reason which had received such poignant illustration: Ars longa, vita brevis. And so it has been wound up at last.

The work has been so long the companion of my horae subsi-civae, a thread running through the joys and sorrows of so many years, in the search for material first, and then in their handling and adjustment to the edifice—for their careful building up has been part of my duty from the beginning, and the whole of the matter has, I suppose, been written and re-written with my own hand at least four times—and the work has been one of so much interest to dear friends, of whom not a few are no longer here to welcome its appearance in print,* that I can hardly speak of the work except as mine.

Indeed, in bulk, nearly seven-eighths of it is so. But Burnell contributed so much of value, so much of the essential; buying, in the search for illustration, numerous rare and costly books which were not otherwise accessible to him in India; setting me, by his example, on lines of research with which I should have else possibly remained unacquainted; writing letters with such fulness, frequency, and interest on the details of the work up to the summer of his death; that the measure of bulk in contribution is no gauge of his share in the result.

In the Life of Frank Buckland occur some words in relation to the church-bells of Ross, in Herefordshire, which may with some aptness illustrate our mutual relation to the book:

"It is said that the Man of Ross" (John Kyrle) "was present at the casting of the tenor, or great bell, and that he took with him an old silver tankard, which, after drinking claret and sherry, he threw in, and had cast with the bell."

John Kyrle's was the most precious part of the metal run into the mould, but the shaping of the mould and the larger part of the material came from the labour of another hand.

At an early period of our joint work Burnell sent me a fragment of an essay on the words which formed our subject, intended as the basis of an introduction. As it stands, this is too incomplete to print, but I have made use of it to some extent, and given some extracts from it in the Introduction now put forward.†

* The dedication was sent for press on 6th January; on the 13th, G. U. Y. departed to his rest.
† Three of the mottoes that face the title were also sent by him.
The alternative title (Hobson-Jobson) which has been given to this book (not without the expressed assent of my collaborator), doubtless requires explanation.

A valued friend of the present writer many years ago published a book, of great acumen and considerable originality, which he called Three Essays, with no Author’s name; and the resulting amount of circulation was such as might have been expected. It was remarked at the time by another friend that if the volume had been entitled A Book, by a Chap, it would have found a much larger body of readers. It seemed to me that A Glossary or A Vocabulary would be equally unattractive, and that it ought to have an alternative title at least a little more characteristic. If the reader will turn to Hobson-Jobson in the Glossary itself, he will find that phrase, though now rare and moribund, to be a typical and delightful example of that class of Anglo-Indian argot which consists of Oriental words highly assimilated, perhaps by vulgar lips, to the English vernacular; whilst it is the more fitted to our book, conveying, as it may, a veiled intimation of dual authorship. At any rate, there it is; and at this period my feeling has come to be that such is the book’s name, nor could it well have been anything else.

In carrying through the work I have sought to supplement my own deficiencies from the most competent sources to which friendship afforded access. Sir Joseph Hooker has most kindly examined almost every one of the proof-sheets for articles dealing with plants, correcting their errors, and enriching them with notes of his own. Another friend, Professor Robertson Smith, has done the like for words of Semitic origin, and to him I owe a variety of interesting references to the words treated of, in regard to their occurrence, under some cognate form, in the Scriptures. In the early part of the book the Rev. George Moule (now Bishop of Ningpo), then in England, was good enough to revise those articles which bore on expressions used in China (not the first time that his generous aid had been given to work of mine). Among other friends who have been ever ready with assistance I may mention Dr. Reinhold Rost, of the India Library; General Robert Maclagan, R.E.; Sir George Birdwood, C.S.I.; Major-General R. H. Keatinge, V.C., C.S.I.; Professor Terrien de la Couperie; and Mr. E. Colborne Baber, at present Consul-General in Corea. Dr. J. A. H. Murray, editor of the great English Dictionary, has also been most kind and courteous in the interchange of communications, a circumstance which will account for a few cases in which the passages cited in both works are the same.

My first endeavour in preparing this work has been to make it accurate; my next to make it—even though a Glossary—interesting. In a work intersecting so many fields, only a fool could imagine that he had not fallen into many mistakes; but these when pointed out, may be amended. If I have missed the other object of endeavour, I fear there is little to be hoped for from a second edition.

II. YULE.

5th January 1886.

The twofold hope expressed in the closing sentence of Sir Henry Yule's Preface to the original Edition of this book has been amply justified. More recent research and discoveries have, of course, brought to light a good deal of information which was not accessible to him, but the general accuracy of what he wrote has never been seriously impugned—while those who have studied the pages of Hobson-Jobson have agreed in classing it as unique among similar works of reference, a volume which combines interest and amusement with instruction, in a manner which few other Dictionaries, if any, have done.

In this edition of the Anglo-Indian Glossary the original text has been reprinted, any additions made by the Editor being marked by square brackets. No attempt has been made to extend the vocabulary, the new articles being either such as were accidentally omitted in the first edition, or a few relating to words which seemed to correspond with the general scope of the work. Some new quotations have been added, and some of those included in the original edition have been verified and new references given. An index to words occurring in the quotations has been prepared.

I have to acknowledge valuable assistance from many friends. Mr. W. W. Skeat has read the articles on Malay words, and has supplied many notes. Col. Sir R. Temple has permitted me to use several of his papers on Anglo-Indian words, and has kindly sent me advance sheets of that portion of the Analytical Index to the first edition by Mr. C. Partridge, which is being published in the Indian Antiquary. Mr. R. S. Whiteway has given me numerous extracts from Portuguese writers; Mr. W. Foster, quotations from unpublished records in the India Office; Mr. W. Irvine, notes on the later Moghul period. For valuable suggestions and information on disputed points I am indebted to Mr.
H. BEVERIDGE, Sir G. BIRDWOOD, Mr. J. BRANDT, Prof. E. G. BROWNE, Mr. M. LONGWORTH DAMES, Mr. G. R. DAMPIER, Mr. DONALD FERGUSON, Mr. C. T. GARDNER, the late Mr. E. J. W. GIBB, Prof. H. A. GILES, Dr. G. A. GRIERSON, Mr. T. M. HORSFALL, Mr. L. W. KING, Mr. J. L. MYRES, Mr. J. PLATT, jun., Prof. G. U. POPE, Mr. V. A. SMITH, Mr. C. H. TAWNEY, and Mr. J. WEIR.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

Words of Indian origin have been insinuating themselves into English ever since the end of the reign of Elizabeth and the beginning of that of King James, when such terms as calico, chintz, and gingham had already effected a lodgment in English warehouses and shops, and were lying in wait for entrance into English literature. Such outlandish guests grew more frequent 120 years ago, when, soon after the middle of last century, the numbers of Englishmen in the Indian services, civil and military, expanded with the great acquisition of dominion then made by the Company; and we meet them in vastly greater abundance now.

Vocabularies of Indian and other foreign words, in use among Europeans in the East, have not unfrequently been printed. Several of the old travellers have attached the like to their narratives; whilst the prolonged excitement created in England, a hundred years since, by the impeachment of Hastings and kindred matters, led to the publication of several glossaries as independent works; and a good many others have been published in later days. At the end of this Introduction will be found a list of those which have come under my notice, and this might no doubt be largely added to.*

Of modern Glossaries, such as have been the result of serious labour, all, or nearly all, have been of a kind purely technical, intended to facilitate the comprehension of official documents by the explanation of terms used in the Revenue department, or in other branches of Indian administration. The most notable examples are (of brief and occasional character), the Glossary appended to the famous Fifth Report of the Select Committee of 1812, which was compiled by Sir Charles Wilkins; and (of a far more vast and comprehensive sort), the late Professor Horace Hayman Wilson's Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms (4to, 1855) which leaves far behind every other attempt in that kind.†

That kind is, however, not ours, as a momentary comparison of a page or two in each Glossary would suffice to show. Our work indeed, in the long course of its compilation, has gone through some modification and enlargement of scope; but hardly such as in any degree to affect its distinctive character, in which something has been aimed at differing in form from any work known to us. In its original conception it was intended to deal with all that class of words which, not in general pertaining to the technicalities of administration, recur constantly in the daily intercourse of the English in India, either as expressing ideas really not provided for by our mother-tongue, or supposed by the speakers (often quite erroneously) to express something not capable of just denotation by any English term. A certain percentage of such words have been carried to England by the constant reflux to their native shore of Anglo-Indians, who in some degree imbue with their notions and phraseology the circles from which they had gone forth. This effect has been still more promoted by the currency of a vast mass of literature, of all qualities and for all ages, dealing with Indian subjects; as well as by the regular appearance, for many years past, of Indian correspondence in English newspapers, insomuch that a considerable number of the expressions in question have not only become familiar in sound to English ears, but have become naturalised in the English language, and are meeting with ample recognition in the great Dictionary edited by Dr. Murray at Oxford.

* See Note A. at end of Introduction.
† Professor Wilson's work may perhaps bear re-editing, but can hardly, for its purpose, be superseded. The late eminent Telugu scholar, Mr. C. P. Brown, interleaved, with criticisms and addenda, a copy of Wilson, which is now in the India Library. I have gone through it, and borrowed a few notes, with acknowledgment by the initials C. P. B. The amount of improvement does not strike me as important.
INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

Of words that seem to have been admitted to full franchise, we may give examples in curry, toddy, veranda, cheroot, loot, nabob, teapoy, sepoys, cowry; and of others familiar enough to the English ear, though hardly yet received into citizenship, compound, batra, pucka, chowry, baboo, mahout, aya, nautch,* first-chop, competition-wallah, griffin, &c. But beyond these two classes of words, received within the last century or so, and gradually, into half or whole recognition, there are a good many others, long since fully assimilated, which really originated in the adoption of an Indian word, or the modification of an Indian proper name. Such words are the three quoted at the beginning of these remarks, chintz, calico, gingham, also shawl, bamboo, pagoda, typhoon, monsoon, mandarin, palanquin,† &c., and I may mention among further examples which may perhaps surprise my readers, the names of three of the boats of a man-of-war, viz. the cutter, the jolly-boat, and the dingy, as all (probably) of Indian origin.‡ Even phrases of a different character—slang indeed, but slang generally supposed to be vernacular as well as vulgar—e.g. ‘that is the cheese’; ‡ or supposed to be vernacular and profane—e.g. ‘I don’t care a dam’; †—are in reality, however vulgar they may be, neither vernacular nor profane, but phrases turning upon innocent Hindustani vocables.

We proposed also, in our Glossary, to deal with a selection of those administrative terms, which are in such familiar and quotidian use as to form part of the common Anglo-Indian stock, and to trace all (so far as possible) to their true origin—a matter on which, in regard to many of the words, those who hourly use them are profoundly ignorant—and to follow them down by quotation from their earliest occurrence in literature.

A particular class of words are those indigenous terms which have been adopted in scientific nomenclature, botanical and zoological. On these Mr. Burnell remarks:—

“The first Indian botanical names were chiefly introduced by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, printed at Goa in 1563), C. d’Acosta (Tractado, Burgos, 1578), and Rhede van Drakenstein (Hor tus Malabaricus, Amsterdam, 1682). The Malay names were chiefly introduced by Rumphius (Herbarium Am-

* Nautch, it may be urged, is admitted to full franchise, being used by so eminent a writer as Mr. Browning. But the fact that his use is entirely misused, seems to justify the classification in the text (see Gloss, s.v.). A like remark applies to compound. See for the tremendous fiasco made in its intended use by a most intelligent lady novelist, the last quotation s.v. in GLOSS.
† Gloss, s.v. (note p. 659, col. a), contains quotations from the Vulgate of the passage in Canticles iii. 9, regarding King Solomon’s ferculum of Lebanon cedar. I have to thank an old friend for pointing out that the word palanquin has, in this passage, received solemn sanction by its introduction into the Revised Version.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

boinense, completed before 1700, but not published till 1741). The Indian zoological terms were chiefly due to Dr. F. Buchanan, at the beginning of this century. Most of the N. Indian botanical words were introduced by Roxburgh."

It has been already intimated that, as the work proceeded, its scope expanded somewhat, and its authors found it expedient to introduce and trace many words of Asiatic origin which have disappeared from colloquial use, or perhaps never entered it, but which occur in old writers on the East. We also judged that it would add to the interest of the work, were we to investigate and make out the pedigree of a variety of geographical names which are or have been in familiar use in books on the Indies; take as examples Bombay, Madras, Guardafui, Malabar, Moluccas, Zanzibar, Pegu, Sumatra, Quilon, Seychelles, Ceylon, Java, Ava, Japan, Dohab, Punjab, &c., illustrating these, like every other class of word, by quotations given in chronological series.

Other divagations still from the original project will probably present themselves to those who turn over the pages of the work, in which we have been tempted to introduce sundry subjects which may seem hardly to come within the scope of such a glossary.

The words with which we have to do, taking the most extensive view of the field, are in fact organic remains deposited under the various currents of external influence that have washed the shores of India during twenty centuries and more. Rejecting that derivation of elephant* which would connect it with the Ophir trade of Solomon, we find no existing Western term traceable to that episode of communication; but the Greek and Roman commerce of the later centuries has left its fossils on both sides, testifying to the intercourse that once subsisted. Agallochum, carbusus, camphor, sandal, musk, nard, pepper (πέπρα, from Skt. pippati, 'long pepper'), ginger (ζύγγιες, see under Ginger), lac, cossus, opal, malabathrum or folium indicum, beryl, sugar (σάκχαρον, from Skt. sarkara, Prak. sakkara), rice (δωμα, but see s.v.), were products or names, introduced from India to the Greek and Roman world, to which may be added a few terms of a different character, such as Bracchum, Sarpanas (δραπανάς, or Buddhist ascetics), γόλα σαγαλία καὶ σασαμίνα (logs of teak and shisham), the σάγγαρα (rafts) of the Periplus (see Janger in Gloss.); whilst δίνδρα, δραμμα, perhaps kastiria ('thin,' κασιτερος), kastūri ('musk,' καστόρον, properly a different, though analogous animal product), and a very few more, have remained in Indian literature as testimony to the same intercourse.†

The trade and conquests of the Arabs both brought foreign words to India and picked up and carried westward, in form more or less corrupted, words of Indian origin, some of which have in one way or other become part of the heritage of all succeeding foreigners in the East. Among terms which are familiar items in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, but which had, in some shape or other, found their way at an early date into use on the shores of the Mediterranean, we may instance bazaar, cavee, hummaw, brinjaul, gingely, sofflower, grab, maramut, dewcaum (dogana, douane, &c.). Of others which are found in medieval literature, either West-Asian or European, and which still have a place in Anglo-Indian or English vocabulary, we may mention amber-gris, chank, junk, joyy, kineob, kedgeree, fanam, calay, banksshall, mudilliar, tindal, cranny.

* See this word in Gloss.
† See A. Weber, in Indian Antiquary, ii. 143 sqq. Most of the other Greek words, which he traces in Sanskrit, are astronomical terms derived from books.
The conquests and long occupation of the Portuguese, who by the year 1540 had established themselves in all the chief ports of India and the East, have, as might have been expected, bequeathed a large number of expressions to the European nations who have followed, and in great part superseded them. We find instances of missionaries and others at an early date who had acquired a knowledge of Indian languages, but these were exceptional.* The natives in contact with the Portuguese learned a bastard variety of the language of the latter, which became the lingua franca of intercourse, not only between European and native, but occasionally between Europeans of different nationalities. This Indo-Portuguese dialect continued to serve such purposes down to a late period in the last century, and has in some localities survived down nearly to our own day.† The number of people in India claiming to be of Portuguese descent was, in the 17th century, very large. Bernier, about 1660, says:—

“For he (Sultan Shuja', Aurangzeb's brother) much courted all those Portuguese Fathers, Missionaries, that are in that Province. . . . And they were indeed capable to serve him, it being certain that in the kingdom of Bengale there are to be found not less than eight or nine thousand families of Franquis, Portuangs, and these either Natives or Mesticks.” (Bernier, E.T. of 1684, p. 27.)

A. Hamilton, whose experience belonged chiefly to the end of the same century, though his book was not published till 1727, states:—

“Along the Sea-costs the Portuguese have left a Vestige of their Language, tho' much corrupted, yet it is the Language that most Europeans learn first to qualify them for a general Converse with one another, as well as with the different inhabitants of India.” (Preface, p. xii.)

Lockyer, who published 16 years before Hamilton, also says:—

“This they (the Portuguese) may justly boast, they have established a kind of Lingua Franca in all the Sea Ports in India, of great use to other Europeans, who would find it difficult in many places to be well understood without it.” (An Account of the Trade in India, 1711, p. 286.)

The early Lutheran Missionaries in the South, who went out for the S.P.C.K., all seem to have begun by learning Portuguese, and in their diaries speak of preaching occasionally in Portuguese;‡ The foundation of this lingua franca was the Portuguese of the beginning of the 16th century; but it must have soon degenerated, for by the beginning of the last century it had lost nearly all trace of inflexion.§

It may from these remarks be easily understood how a large number of

Before the end of the 16th century, printing had been introduced at other places besides Goa, and by the beginning of the 17th, several books in Indian languages had been printed at Goa, Cochín, and Ambalakkudi.—(A. B.)

† “At Point de Galle, in 1660, I found it in common use, and also, somewhat later, at Calecut.”—(A. B.)

‡ See “Notices of Madras and Cuddalore, &c., by the earlier Missionaries.” Longman, 1858, passim. See also Manual, &c. in Book-List, infra p. xxxix. Dr Carey, writing from Serampore as late as 1800, says that the children of Europeans by native women, whether children of English, French, Dutch, or Danes, were all called Portuguese. Smith's Life of Carey, 152.

§ See Note B. at end of Introductory Remarks. “Mr. Beames remarked some time ago that most of the names of places in South India are greatly disfigured in the forms used by Europeans. This is because we have adopted the Portuguese orthography. Only in this way it can be explained how Kolladam has become Coleroon, Solamandalam, Corowandel, and Tutukkudi, Tuticorin.” (A. B.) Mr. Burnell was so impressed with the excessive corruption of S. Indian names, that he would hardly ever willingly venture any explanation of them, considering the matter all too uncertain.
our Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, even if eventually traceable to native sources (and especially to Mahratti, or Dravidian originals) have come to us through a Portuguese medium, and often bear traces of having passed through that alembic. Not a few of these are familiar all over India, but the number current in the South is larger still. Some other Portuguese words also, though they can hardly be said to be recognized elements in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, have been introduced either into Hindustani generally, or into that shade of it which is in use among natives in habitual contact with Europeans. Of words which are essentially Portuguese, among Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, persistent or obsolete, we may quote goglet, gram, plantain, muster, caste, peon, padre, mistry or maistry, almyra, aya, cobra, mosquito, pomfret, cameez, palmyra, still in general use; picotta, rolong, pial, fogass, margosa, preserved in the South; batel, brab, foras, oart, vellard in Bombay; joss, compradore, linguist in the ports of China; and among more or less obsolete terms, Moor, for a Mahommedan, still surviving under the modified form Moorman, in Madras and Ceylon; Gentoos, still partially kept up, I believe, at Madras in application to the Telugu language, mustees, castees, bandeja (‘a tray’), Kittysool (‘an umbrella,’ and this survived ten years ago in the Calcutta customs tariff), cuspadore (‘a spittoon’), and coid (‘a cubit or ell’). Words of native origin which bear the mark of having come to us from the Portuguese may be illustrated by such as palangquin, mandarin, mangelin (a small weight for pearls, &c.) monsoon, typhoon, mango, mangosteen, jack-fruit, batta, curry, chop, congee, coir, cutch, calamari, cassanor, nabob, avadavat, betel, areca, benzoin, corge, copra.* A few examples of Hindustani words borrowed from the Portuguese are chibri (‘a key’), bāola (‘a portmanteau’), bälti (‘a bucket’), mortel (‘a hammer’), tauliya (‘a towel,’ Port. toalha), sabān (‘soap’), bāson (‘plate’ from Port. bacia), lilām and nilām (‘an auction’), besides a number of terms used by Lascars on board ship.

The Dutch language has not contributed much to our store. The Dutch and the English arrived in the Indies contemporaneously, and though both inherited from the Portuguese, we have not been the heirs of the Dutch to any great extent, except in Ceylon, and even there Portuguese vocables had already occupied the colloquial ground. Petersilly, the word in general use in English families for ‘parsley,’ appears to be Dutch. An example from Ceylon that occurs to memory is burgher. The Dutch admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these were distinguished from the pure natives by this term, which survives. Burgher in Bengal means ‘a rafter,’ properly barga. A word spelt and pronounced in the same way had again a curiously different application in Madras, where it was a corruption of Vadagar, the name given to a tribe in the Nilgherry hills;—to say nothing of Scotland, where Burghers and Antiburghers were Northern tribes (veluti Gog et Magog!) which have long been condensed into elements of the United Presbyterian Church——!

Southern India has contributed to the Anglo-Indian stock words that are in hourly use also from Calcutta to Peshawur (some of them already noted under another cleavage), e.g. betel, mango, jack, cheroot, mungoose, pariah, bandicoot, teak, patcharee, chatty, catechu, tope (‘a grove’), curry, muligutawny, congee. Mamooty (a digging tool) is familiar in certain branches of the service, owing to its having long had a place in the nomenclature of the Ordnance department. It is Tamil, manvetti, 'earth-cutter.' Of some very familiar words the origin remains either dubious, or matter only for conjecture. Examples are hackery (which arose apparently in Bombay), florican, topaz.

* The nasal termination given to many Indian words, when adopted into European use, as in palangquin, mandarin, &c., must be attributed mainly to the Portuguese; but it cannot be entirely due to them. For we find the nasal termination of Achin, in Mahommedan writers (see p. 3), and that of Cochin before the Portuguese time (see p. 225), whilst the conversion of Pasei, in Sumatra, into Pasem, as the Portuguese call it, is already indicated in the Basma of Marco Polo.

As to Hindustani words adopted into the Anglo-Indian colloquial the subject is almost too wide and loose for much remark. The habit of introducing these in English conversation and writing seems to prevail more largely in the Bengal Presidency than in any other, and especially more than in Madras, where the variety of different vernaculars in use has tended to make their acquisition by the English less universal than is in the north that of Hindustani, which is so much easier to learn, and also to make the use in former days of Portuguese, and now of English, by natives in contact with foreigners, and of French about the French settlements, very much more common than it is elsewhere. It is this bad habit of interlarding English with Hindustani phrases which has so often excited the just wrath of high English officials, not accustomed to it from their youth, and which (e.g.) drew forth in orders the humorous indignation of Sir Charles Napier.

One peculiarity in this use we may notice, which doubtless exemplifies some obscure linguistic law. Hindustani verbs which are thus used are habitually adopted into the quasi-English by converting the imperative into an infinitive. Thus to bunou, to lugou, to fockilow, to puckarow, to dumbeow, to sumjow, and so on, almost ad libitum, are formed as we have indicated.*

It is curious to note that several of our most common adoptions are due to what may be most especially called the Oordoo (Urdu) or Camp language, being terms which the hosts of Chinglez brought from the steppes of North Eastern Asia—e.g., "The old Bukshee is an awful bahadur, but he keeps a first-rate bobachee." That is a sentence which might easily have passed without remark at an Anglo-Indian mess-table thirty years ago—perhaps might be heard still. Each of the outlandish terms embraced in it came from the depths of Mongolia in the thirteenth century. Chick (in the sense of a cane-blind), duroga, oordoo itself, are other examples.

With the gradual assumption of administration after the middle of last century, we adopted into partial colloquial use an immense number of terms, very many of them Persian or Arabic, belonging to technicalities of revenue and other departments, and largely borrowed from our Mahommedan predecessors. Malay has contributed some of our most familiar expressions, owing partly to the ceaseless rovings among the Eastern coasts of the Portuguese, through whom a part of these reached us, and partly doubtless to the fact that our early dealings and the sites of our early factories lay much more on the shores of the Eastern Archipelago than on those of Continental India. Paddy, godown, compound, bankshall, rattan, durian, a-muck, prow, and cadjan, junk, crease, are some of these. It is true that several of them may be traced eventually to Indian originals, but it seems not the less certain that we got them through the Malay, just as we got words already indicated through the Portuguese.

We used to have a very few words in French form, such as boutique and mort-de-chien. But these two are really distortions of Portuguese words.

A few words from China have settled on the Indian shores and been adopted by Anglo-India, but most of them are, I think, names of fruits or other products which have been imported, such as loquot, leechee, chow-chow, cumquat, ginseng, &c. and (recently) jinrickshaw. For it must be noted that a considerable proportion of words much used in Chinese ports, and often ascribed to a Chinese origin, such as mandarin, junk, chop, pagoda, and (as I believe) typhoon (though this is a word much debated) are not Chinese at all, but words of Indian languages, or of Malay, which have been precipitated in Chinese waters during the flux and reflux of foreign trade.

Within my own earliest memory Spanish dollars were current in England at a specified value if they bore a stamp from the English mint. And similarly there are certain English words, often obsolete in Europe, which have received in India currency with a special stamp of meaning; whilst in other cases our language has formed in India new compounds applicable to new objects or shades of meaning. To one or other of these classes belong outery, buggy, home, interloper, rogue (-elephant), tiffin, furlough, elk, roundel ('an umbrella,' obsolete), pish-pash, earth-oil, hog-deer, flying-fox, garden-houses, musk-rat, nor-wester, iron-wood, long-drawers, barking-deer, custard-apple, grass-cutter, &c.

Other terms again are corruptions, more or less violent, of Oriental words and phrases which have put on an English mask. Such are maund, fool's rack, beaver, cot, boy, belly-bauld, Penang-lawyer, buckshaw, goddess (in the Malay region, representing Malay gadis, a maiden), compound, college- pheasant, chopper, summer-head, eagle-wood, jackass-copal, bobbery, Upper Roger (used in a correspondence given by Dalrymple, for Yvua Raia, the 'Young King,' or Caesar, of Indo-Chinese monarchies), Isle-o'-Bats (for Allahabâd or Hâlahâbâz as the natives often call it), hobson-jobson (see Preface), St. John's. The last proper name has at least three applications. There is "St. John's" in Guzerat, viz. Sanjân, the landing-place of the Parsee immigration in the 8th century; there is another "St. John's" which is a corruption of Shang-Chuang, the name of that island off the southern coast of China whence the pure and ardent spirit of Francis Xavier fled to a better world: there is the group of "St. John's Islands" near Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo-Sikajang.

Yet again we have hybrids and corruptions of English fully accepted and adopted as Hindustani by the natives with whom we have to do, such as simkin, port-shrub, brandy-pìñâi, apil, rasid, tumlet (a tumbler), gilâs ('glass,' for drinking vessels of sorts), rail-ghârî, lumber-dâr, jail-khâna, bottle-khâna, buggy-khâna, 'et omne quod exit in' khâna, including gymkhâna, a very modern concoction (q.v.), and many more.

Taking our subject as a whole, however considerable the philological interest attaching to it, there is no disputing the truth of a remark with which Burnell's fragment of intended introduction concludes, and the application of which goes beyond the limit of those words which can be considered to have 'accrued as additions to the English language': "Considering the long intercourse with India, it is noteworthy that the additions which have thus accrued to the English language are, from the intellectual standpoint, of no intrinsic value. Nearly all the borrowed words refer to material facts, or to peculiar customs and stages of society, and, though a few of them furnish allusions to the penny-a-liner, they do not represent new ideas."

It is singular how often, in tracing to their origin words that come within the field of our research, we light upon an absolute dilemma, or bifurcation, i.e. on two or more sources of almost equal probability, and in themselves entirely diverse. In such cases it may be that, though the use of the word originated from one of the sources, the existence of the other has invigorated that use, and contributed to its eventual diffusion.

An example of this is boy, in its application to a native servant. To this application have contributed both the old English use of boy (analogous to that of puer, garçon, Knabe) for a camp-servant, or for a slave, and the Hindi-Marāṭhī bhoi, the name of a caste which has furnished palanquin and umbrella-bearers to many generations of Europeans in India. The habitual use of the word by the Portuguese, for many years before any English influence had touched the shores of India (e.g. bóy de sombrero, bóy d'água, bóy de palanquy), shows that the earliest source was the Indian one.

Cooly, in its application to a carrier of burdens, or performer of inferior labour, is another example. The most probable origin of this is from a nomen gentile, that of the Kolis, a hill-people of Guzerat and the Western Ghats (compare the origin of slave). But the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to connect with this. Thus, in S. India, there is a Tamil word kāli, in common use, signifying 'daily hire or wages,' which H. H. Wilson regards as the true origin of the word which we call cooly. Again, both in Oriental and Osmali Turkish, kol is a word for a slave, and in the latter also there is kūle, 'a male slave, a bondsman.' Khol is, in Tibetan also, a word for a slave or servant.

Tank, for a reservoir of water, we are apt to derive without hesitation, from stagnum, whence Sp. estanque, old Fr. estang, old Eng. and Lowland Scotch stank, Port. tanque, till we find that the word is regarded by the Portuguese themselves as Indian, and that there is excellent testimony to the existence of tánkā in Guzerat and Rajputana as an indigenous word, and with a plausible Sanskrit etymology.

Veranda has been confidently derived by some etymologists (among others by M. Defrémery, a distinguished scholar) from the Pers. bāramāda, 'a projection,' a balcony; an etymology which is indeed hardly a possible one, but has been treated by Mr. Beames (who was evidently unacquainted with the facts that do make it hardly possible) with inappropriate derision, he giving as the unquestionable original a Sanskrit word bavana, 'a portico.' On this Burnell has observed that the word does not belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works. Be that as it may, it need not be doubted that the word veranda, as used in England and France, was imported from India, i.e. from the usage of Europeans in India; but it is still more certain that either in the same sense, or in one closely allied, the word existed, quite independent of either Sanskrit or Persian, in Portuguese and Spanish, and the manner in which it occurs in the very earliest narrative of the Portuguese adventure to India (Roteiro do Viajemen de Vasco da Gama, written by one of the expedition of 1497), confirmed by the Hispano-Arabic vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalá, printed in 1505, preclude the possibility of its having been adopted by the Portuguese from intercourse with India.

Mangrove, John Crawfurd tells us, has been adopted from the Malay manggi—manγγi, applied to trees of the genus Rhizophora. But we learn from Oviedo, writing early in the sixteenth century, that the name mangle was applied by the natives of the Spanish Main to trees of the same, or a kindred genus, on the coast of S. America, which same mangle is undoubtedly the parent of the French manglier, and not improbably therefore of the English form mangrove.*

* Mr. Skeat's Etym. Dict. does not contain mangrove. [It will be found in his Concise Etymological Dict. ed. 1901.]
INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

The words bearer, mate, cotwal, partake of this kind of dual or doubtful ancestry, as may be seen by reference to them in the Glossary.

Before concluding, a word should be said as to the orthography used in the Glossary.

My intention has been to give the headings of the articles under the most usual of the popular, or, if you will, vulgar quasi-English spellings, whilst the Oriental words, from which the headings are derived or corrupted, are set forth under precise transliteration, the system of which is given in a following "Nota Bene." When using the words and names in the course of discursive elucidation, I fear I have not been consistent in sticking either always to the popular or always to the scientific spelling, and I can the better understand why a German critic of a book of mine, once upon a time, remarked upon the etwas schwankende yulische Orthographie. Indeed it is difficult, it never will for me be possible, in a book for popular use, to adhere to one system in this matter without the assumption of an ill-fitting and repulsive pedantry. Even in regard to Indian proper names, in which I once advocated adhesion, with a small number of exceptions, to scientific precision in transliteration, I feel much more inclined than formerly to sympathise with my friends Sir William Muir and General Maclagan, who have always favoured a large and liberal recognition of popular spelling in such names. And when I see other good and able friends following the scientific Will-o’-the-Wisp into such bogs as the use in English composition of sipāḥi and jängal, and verandah—nay, I have not only heard of bogī, but have recently seen it—instead of the good English words 'sepoy,' and 'jungle,' 'veranda,' and 'buggy,' my dread of pedantic usage becomes the greater.*

For the spelling of Mahrratta, Mahrrati, I suppose I must apologize (though something is to be said for it), Marāṭhi having established itself as orthodox.

NOTE A.—LIST OF GLOSSARIES.

1. appended to the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama (see Book-list, p. xiii.) is a Vocabulary of 138 Portuguese words with their corresponding word in the Lingua de Calicut, i.e. in Malayalam.

2. appended to the Voyages, &c., du Sieur de la Boulaye-le-Gouz (Book-list, p. xxxii.) is an Explication de plusieurs mots dont l'intelligence est nécessaire au Lector (pp. 27).

3. Fryer's New Account (Book-list, p. xxxiv.) has an Index Explanatory, including Proper Names, Names of Things, and Names of Persons (12 pages).

4. "Indian Vocabulary, to which is prefixed the Forms of Impeachment." 12mo. Stockdale, 1788 (pp. 136).

6. "A Dictionary of Mohammedan Law, Bengal Revenue Terms, Shansorit, Hindoo, and other words used in the East Indies, with full explanations, the leading word used in each article being printed in a new Nustaluk Type," &c. By S. Rousseau. London, 1802. 12mo. (pp. lxiv.-287). Also 2nd ed. 1805.

*’Buggy’ of course is not an Oriental word at all, except as adopted from us by Orientals. I call sepoy, jungle, and veranda, good English words; and so I regard them, just as good as aligator, or hurricane, or canoe, or Jerusalem artichoke, or cheroot. What would my friends think of spelling these in English books as alagarto, and huracan, and canoa, and girasole, and *shuruftu?"
7. Glossary prepared for the Fifth Report (see Book-list, p. xxxiv.), by Sir Charles Wilkins. This is dated in the preface "E. I. House, 1813." The copy used is a Parliamentary reprint, dated 1830.

8. The Folio compilation of the Bengal Regulations, published in 1828-29, contains in each volume a Glossarial Index, based chiefly upon the Glossary of Sir C. Wilkins.

9. In 1842 a preliminary "Glossary of Indian Terms," drawn up at the E. I. House by Prof. H. H. Wilson, 4to, unpublished, with a blank column on each page for Suggestions and Additions, was circulated in India, intended as a basis for a comprehensive official Glossary. In this one the words are entered in the vulgar spelling, as they occur in the documents.

10. The only important result of the circulation of No. 9, was "Supplement to the Glossary of Indian Terms, A—J." By H. M. Elliot, Esq., Bengal Civil Service. Agra, 1845. 8vo. (pp. 447).

This remarkable work has been revised, re-arranged, and re-edited, with additions from Elliot's notes and other sources, by Mr. John Beames, of the Bengal Civil Service, under the title of "Memoirs on the Folk-Lore and Distribution of the Races of the North-Western Provinces of India, being an amplified edition of" (the above). 2 vols. 8vo. Trübner, 1869.

11. To "Morley's Analytical Digest of all the Reported Cases Decided in the Supreme Courts of Judicature in India," Vol. I., 1850, there is appended a "Glossary of Native Terms used in the Text" (pp. 20).

12. In "Wanderings of a Pilgrim" (Book-list, p. xlvii.), there is a Glossary of some considerable extent (pp. 10 in double columns).

15. A useful folio Glossary published by Government at Calcutta between 1860 and 1870, has been used by me and is quoted in the present Gloss, as "Calcutta Glossary." But I have not been able to trace it again so as to give the proper title.

17. "Kachabri Technicalities, or A Glossary of Terms, Rural, Official, and General, in Daily Use in the Courts of Law, and in Illustration of the Tenures, Customs, Arts, and Manufactures of Hindustan." By Patrick Carnegy, Commissioner of Rai Bareli, Oudh, 8vo. 2nd ed. Allahabad, 1877 (pp. 361).

18. "A Glossary of Indian Terms, containing many of the most important and Useful Indian Words Designed for the Use of Officers of Revenue and Judicial Practitioners and Students." Madras, 1877. 8vo. (pp. 255).

21. "Anglo-Indian Dictionary. A Glossary of such Indian Terms used in English, and such English or other non-Indian terms as have obtained special meanings in India." By George Clifford Whitworth, Bombay Civil Service. London, 8vo, 1855 (pp. xv.—550).

Also the following minor Glossaries contained in Books of Travel or History:

22. In "Cambridge's Account of the War in India," 1761 (Book-list, p. xxxii.)

23. In "Grose's Voyage," 1772 (Book-list, p. xxxiv.)

24. In Carraccioli's "Life of Clive" (Book-list, p. xxxii.)

25. In "Bp. Heber's Narrative" (Book-list, p. xxxvi.)

26. In Herklot's "Qanoon-i-Islam" (Book-list, p. xxxvi.)

27. In "Vereist's View of Bengal," 1772.

29. "Manual of the Administration of the Madras Presidency." Vol. III. Glossary, Madras, 1893. The name of the author of this, the most valuable book of the kind recently published in India, does not appear upon the title-page. It is believed to be the work of C. D. Maclean; 30. A useful Glossary of Malayâlam words will be found in Logan, "Manual of Malabar."]
NOTE B.—THE INDO-PORTUGUESE PATOIS

(By A. C. Burnell.)

The phonetic changes of Indo-Portuguese are few. F is substituted for p; whilst the accent varies according to the race of the speaker.* The vocabulary varies, as regards the introduction of native Indian terms, from the same cause.

Grammatically, this dialect is very singular:

1. All traces of genders are lost—e.g. we find sua povo (Mat. i. 21); sua nome (Id. i. 23); sua filho (Id. i. 25); suas filhos (Id. ii. 18); suas outros (Acts, ix. 8); o dias (Mat. ii. 1); o reg (Id. ii. 2); hum voz tinha ouvido (Id. ii. 18).

2. In the plural, s is rarely added; generally, the plural is the same as the singular.

3. The genitive is expressed by de, which is not combined with the article—e.g. conforme de o tempo (Mat. ii. 16); Depois de o morte (Id. ii. 19).

4. The definite article is unchanged in the plural: como o discipulos (Acts, ix. 19).

5. The pronouns still preserve some inflexions: Eu, mi; nos, nossotros; minha, nossos, &c.; tu, ti, vossotros; tua, vosso; Elle, ella, ellos, elles, sua, suas, to, la.

6. The verb substantive is (present) tem, (past) tinha, and (subjunctive) seja.

7. Verbs are conjugated by adding, for the present, te to the only form, viz., the infinitive, which loses its final r. Thus, te falla; te faze; te vi. The past is formed by adding ja—e.g. ja falla; ja olha. The future is formed by adding ser. To express the infinitive, per is added to the Portuguese infinitive deprived of its r.

* Unfortunately, the translators of the Indo-Portuguese New Testament have, as much as possible, preserved the Portuguese orthography.
NOTA BENE
IN THE USE OF THE GLOSSARY

(A.) The dates attached to quotations are not always quite consistent. In beginning the compilation, the dates given were those of the publication quoted; but as the date of the composition, or of the use of the word in question, is often much earlier than the date of the book or the edition in which it appears, the system was changed, and, where possible, the date given is that of the actual use of the word. But obvious doubts may sometimes rise on this point.

The dates of publication of the works quoted will be found, if required, from the Book List, following this Nota bene.

(B.) The system of transliteration used is substantially the same as that modification of Sir William Jones's which is used in Shakespear's Hindustani Dictionary. But—

The first of the three Sanskrit sibilants is expressed by (ś), and, as in Wilson's Glossary, no distinction is marked between the Indian aspirated k, g, and the Arabic gutturals kh, gh. Also, in words transliterated from Arabic, the sixteenth letter of the Arabic alphabet is expressed by (ṭ). This is the same type that is used for the cerebral Indian (ṭ). Though it can hardly give rise to any confusion, it would have been better to mark them by distinct types. The fact is, that it was wished at first to make as few demands as possible for distinct types, and, having begun so, change could not be made.

The fourth letter of the Arabic alphabet is in several cases represented by (ṭh) when Arabic use is in question. In Hindustani it is pronounced as (ṣ).

Also, in some of Mr. Burnell's transliterations from S. Indian languages, he has used (r) for the peculiar Tamil hard (ṝ), elsewhere (ṛ), and (ṝ) for the Tamil and Malayālam (ḱ) when preceded and followed by a vowel.

Most of the quotations are taken from the edition in 12mo., Lisboa, 1778, issued along with Couto in 24 vols. The first Decad was originally printed in 1552, the 2nd in 1553, the 3rd in 1563, the 4th as completed by Lavannah in 1613 (Barbosa-Machado, Bibl. Lusit. ii. pp. 600-607, as corrected by Figaniere, Bibliogr. Hist. Port. p. 169). A. B.

In some of Burnell's quotations he uses the 2nd ed. of Decs. i. to iii. (1628), and the 1st ed. of Dec. iv. (1613). In these there is apparently no division into chapters, and I have transferred the references to the edition of 1778, from which all my own quotations are made, whenever I could identify the passages, having myself no convenient access to the older editions.

Castanheda was the first writer on Indian affairs (Barbara Machado, Bibli. Lusit., ii. p. 30. See also Figuired, Bibliographia Hist. Port., pp. 165-167). He went to Goa in 1528, and died in Portugal in 1559.

The translator has often altered the spelling of the Indian words, and his version is very loose, comparing it with the printed text of the Port. in the ed. of 1833. It is possible, however, that Litchfield had the first ed. of the first book (1551) before him, whereas the ed. of 1853 is a reprint of 1554. (A.B.).

Cormwallis, Correspondence of Charles, First Marquis. Edited by C. Ross. 3 vols. 1859.

Correa, Gaspar, Lendas da India por. This most valuable, interesting, and detailed chronicle of Portuguese India was not published till in our own day it was issued by the Royal Academy of Lisbon—4 vols. in 7, in 4to, 1858-1864. The author went to India apparently with Jorge de Mello in 1512, and at an early date began to make notes for his history. The latest year that he mentions as having in it written a part of his history is 1561. The date of his death is not known.

Most of the quotations from Correa, begun by Burnell and continued by me, are from this work published in Lisbon. Some are, however, taken from "The Three Voyages of Vasco da Gama and his Vicereignty, from the Lendas da India of Gaspar Correa," by the Hon. E. J. Stanley (now Lord Stanley of Alderley), H.A.K. Soc. 1869.

Coryat, T. Crudities. Reprinted from the ed. of 1611. 3 vols. 8vo. 1776.
Couto, Diogo de. The edition of the Decades da Asia quoted habitually is that of 1778 (see Barros). The 4th Decade (Couto's first) was published first in 1602, fol.; the 5th, 1612; the 6th, 1614; the 7th, 1616; the 8th, 1673; 5 books of the 12th, Paris, 1645. The 9th was first published in an edition issued in 1736; and 120 pp. of the 10th (when, is not clear). But the whole of the 10th, in ten books, is included in the publication of 1778. The 11th was lost, and a substitute by the editor is given in the ed. of 1778. Couto died 10th Dec. 1616.

Roger, Abraham. La Porte Ouverte ... ou la Vraye Representation, &c. 4to. Amsterdam, 1675.

The author was the first Chaplain at Pulicat (1631-1641), and then for some years at Batavia (see Havart, p. 132). He returned home in 1647 and died in 1649, at Gouda (Pref. p. 3). The book was brought out by his widow. Thus, at the time that the English Chaplain Lord (q.v.) was studying the religion of the Hindus at Surat, the Dutch Chaplain Roger was doing the same at Pulicat. The work of the last is in every way vastly superior to the former. It was written at Batavia (see p. 117), and, owing to its publication after his death, there are a few misprints of Indian words. The author had his information from a Brahman named Padmanaba (Padmanabha), who knew Dutch, and who gave him a Dutch translation of Bharthari's Satakas, which is printed at the end of the book. It is the first translation from Sanskrit into an European language (A.B.).

"We have also used the second edition of the original (!) Italian text (12mo. Venice, 1517). A third edition appeared at Milan in 1528 (4to.), and a fourth at Venice in 1533. This interesting Journal was translated into English by Eden in 1576 (8vo.), and Purchas (ii, pp. 1483-1494) gives an abridgement; it is thus one of the most important sources."

Neither Mr. Winter Jones nor my friend Dr. Badger, in editing Varthema, seem to have been aware of the disarrangement cast on his veracity in the famous Colloquios of Garcia de Orta (f. 29e. and f. 30). These affect his statements as to his voyages in the further East; and deny his ever having gone beyond Calicut and Cochín; a thesis which it would not be difficult to demonstrate out of his own narrative.

A GLOSSARY OF ANGLO-INDIAN COLLOQUIAL TERMS AND PHRASES OF ANALOGOUS ORIGIN.

ABADA

ABADA, s. A word used by old Spanish and Portuguese writers for a ‘rhinoceros,’ and adopted by some of the older English narrators. The origin is a little doubtful. If it were certain that the word did not occur earlier than c. 1530-40, it would most probably be an adoption from the Malay badok, ‘a rhinoceros.’ The word is not used by Barros where he would probably have used it if he knew it (see quotation under GANDA); and we have found no proof of its earlier existence in the language of the Peninsula; if this should be established we should have to seek an Arabic origin in such a word as abadat, abid, fem. abida, of which one meaning is (v. Lane) ‘a wild animal.’ The usual form abada is certainly somewhat in favour of such an origin. [Prof. Skeat believes that the q in abada and similar Malay words represents the Arabic article, which was commonly used in Spanish and Portuguese prefixed to Arabic and other native words.] It will be observed that more than one authority makes it the female rhinoceros, and in the dictionaries the word is feminine. But so Barros makes Ganda. [Mr W. W. Skeat suggests that the female was the more dangerous animal, or the one most frequently met with, as is certainly the case with the crocodile.]

1541.—“Mynes of Silver, Copper, Tin, and Lead, from whence great quantities thereof were continually drawn, which the Merchants carried away with Troops of Elephants and Rhinoceroses (em cañitas de elefantos e badas) for to transport into the Kingdoms of Sornau, by us called Siam, Passiloco, Saradu, (Sawady in orig.), Tangu, Prom, Calaminham and other Provinces . . . .”—Pinto (orig. cap. xli.) in Cogan, p. 49. The kingdoms named here are Siam (see under SARNAU); Pitchalok and Sawatti (now two provinces of Siam); Taungu and Prome in B. Burma; Calaminham, in the interior of Indo-China, more or less fabulous.

1544.—“Now the King of Tartary was fallen upon the city of Pekuin with so great an army as the like had never been seen since Adam’s time; in this army . . . were seven and twenty Kings, under whom marched 1,500,000 men . . . with four score thousand Rhinoceroses” (donde partirão com oitenta mil badas).—Ibid. (orig. cap. evii.) in Cogan, p. 149.

1585.—“It is a very fertile country, with great store of prowisoun; there are elephants in great number and abadas, which is a kind of beast so big as two great bulls, and hath upon his snout a little horse.”—Mendouza, ii. 311.

1592.—“We sent commodities to their king to barter for Amber-greese, and for the horns of Abath, whereof the King onely hath the traffique in his hands. Now this Abath is a beast that hath one horn only in her forehead, and is thought to be the female Vnicorne, and is highly esteemed of all the Moore in those parts as a most soveraigne remedie against poysyon.”—Barker in Haktl. ii. 591.

1598.—“The Abada, or Rhinoceros, is not in India,* but onely in Bengal and Patane.”—Linschoten, 88. [Hak. Soc. ii. 8.]

“Also in Bengala we found great numbers of the beasts which in Latin are called Rhinocerotes, and of the Portingalles Abadas.”—Ibid. 28. [Hak. Soc. i. 96.]

ABCÁREE, ABKÁRY. H. from P. āb-kārī, the business of distilling or selling (strong) waters, and hence elliptically the excise upon such business. This last is the sense in which it is used by Anglo-Indians. In every district of India the privilege of selling spirits is farmed to contractors, who manage the sale through retail shopkeepers. This is what is called the ‘Abkary System.’ The system has often been attacked as promoting tipping, and there are strong opinions on both sides. We subjoin an extract from a note on the subject, too long for insertion in integrity, by one of much experience in Bengal—Sir G. U. Yule.

June, 1879.—"Natives who have expressed their views are, I believe, unanimous in ascribing the increase of drinking to our Abkaree system. I don’t say that this is putting the cart before the horse, but they are certainly too forgetful of the increased means in the country, which, if not the sole cause of the increased consumption, has been at least a very large factor in that result. I myself believe that more people drink now than formerly; but I know one gentleman of very long and intimate knowledge of Bengal, who held that there was as much drinking in 1820 as in 1860.”

In any case exaggeration is abundant. All Sanskrit literature shows that tipping is no absolute novelty in India. [See the article on “Spirituous Drinks in Ancient India,” by Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 389 seqq.]

1790.—"In respect to Abkarry, or Tax on Spirituous Liquors, which is reserved for Taxation . . . it is evident that we cannot establish a general rate, since the quantity of consumption and expense of manufacture, etc., depends upon the vicinity of principal stations. For the amount leviable upon different Stills we must rely upon officers’ local knowledge. The public, indeed, cannot suffer, since, if a few stills are suppressed by over-taxation, drunkenness is diminished.”—In a Letter from Board of Revenue (Bengal) to Government, 12th July. MS. in India Office.

1797.—"The stamps are to have the words ‘Abkaree licenses’ inscribed in the Persian and Hindu languages and character."—Bengal Regulations, x. 33.

ABIHÓWA. Properly P. āb-o-hāwa, ‘water and air.’ The usual Hindustani expression for ‘climate.’

1786.—"What you write concerning the death of 500 Koorgs from small-pox is understood . . . they must be kept where the climate [āb-o-hāwā] may best agree with them."—Tippoo’s Letters, 269.

ABYSSINIA, n.p. This geographical name is a 16-century Latinisation of the Arabic Ḥabash, through the Portuguese Abex, ‘bearing much the same pronunciation, minus the aspirate. [See HUESHEE.]

1617.—"He sent mee to buy three Abassines."—Sir T. Roe, Travels, Hak. Soc. ii. 445.

A. C. (i.e. ‘after compliments’). In official versions of native letters these letters stand for the omitted formalities of native compliments.

ACHÁNOCK, n.p. H. Chānak and Achānak. The name by which the station of Barrackpore is commonly known to Sepoys and other natives. Some have connected the name with that of Job Charnock, or, as A. Hamilton calls him, Channock, the founder of Calcutta, and the quotations render this probable. Formerly the Cantonment of Secore at Benares was also known, by a transfer no doubt, as Ohhotā (or ‘Little’) Achānak. Two additional remarks may be relevantly made: (1) Job’s name was certainly Channock, and not Charnock. It is distinctly signed “Job Charnock,” in a MS. letter from the factory at “Chutta,” i.e. Chuttanuttee (or Calcutta) in the India Office records, which I have seen. (2) The map in Valentijn which shows the village of Tsjannok, though published in 1726, was apparently compiled by Van der Brooke in 1662. Hence it is not probable that it took its name from Job Charnock, who seems to have entered the Company’s service in 1658. When he went to Bengal we have not been able to ascertain. [See Diary of Hedges, edited by Sir H. Yule, ii., xcix. In some “Documentary Memoirs of Job Charnock,” which form part of vol. lxxv. (1888) of the Hakluyt Soc., Job is said to have “arrived in India in 1655 or 1656.”]

1677.—“The ship Falcone to go up the river to Hughly, or at least to Channock.”—Court’s Letter to Ft. St. Geo. of 12th December. In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871, No. 1, p. 21; see also p. 23.

1711.—“Channock Reach hath two shoals, the upper one in Channock, and the lower one on the opposite side . . . you must from below Degon as aforesaid, keep the starboard shore aboard until you come up with a Lime-Tree . . . and then steer over with Channock Trees and house between the two shoals, until you come mid-river, but no nearer the house.”—The English Pilot, 55.

1726.—“’t stedeken Tajjannock.”—Valenciennes, v. 153. In Val’s map of Bengal also, we find opposite to Ogjli (Hoogly), Tajjannock, and then Colleccute, and Calicula.

1758.—“Notwithstanding these solemn assurances from the Dutch it was judged expedient to send a detachment of troops . . . to take possession of Tanna Fort and Charnoe’s Battery opposite to it.”—Narrative of Dutch attempt in the Hoogly, in Malcolm’s Life of Clive, ii. 76.

1810.—“The old village of Aachanock stood on the ground which the post of Barrackpore now occupies.”—M. Graham, 142.

1848.—“From an oral tradition still prevalent among the natives at Barrackpore . . . we learn that Mr. Charnock built a bungalow there, and a flourishing bazar arose under his patronage, before the settlement of Calcutta had been determined on. Barrackpore is at this day best known to the natives by the name of Chanock.”—The Bengal Obituary, Calc. p. 2.

ACHAR, s. P. achar, Malay achar, adopted in nearly all the vernaculars of India for acid and salt relishes. By Europeans it is used as the equivalent of ‘pickles,’ and is applied to all the stores of Crosse and Blackwell in that kind. We have adopted the word through the Portuguese; but it is not impossible that Western Asiatics got it originally from the Latin acetaria. (See Plin. Hist. Nat. xix. 19).

1563.—“And they prepare a conserve of it (Anacardotum) with salt, and when it is green (and this they call Achar), and this is sold in the market just as olives are with us.”—Garcia, f. 17.

1596.—Linschoten in the Dutch gives the word correctly, but in the English version (Hak. Soc. ii. 28) it is printed Machar.

1612.—“Achar none to be had except one jar.”—Dunners, Letters, i. 290.

1616.—“Our Jurabasso’s (Juribasso) wife came and brought me a small jar of Achar for a present, desiring me to exskews her husband in that he abstained himselfe to take phisik.”—Cocks, i. 135.

1623.—“And all these preserved in a way that is really very good, which they call acciao.”—P. della Valle, ii. 708. [Hak. Soc. ii. 327.]

1687.—“Achar I presume signifies sauce. They make in the East Indies, especially at Siam and Pegu, several sorts of Achar, as of the young tops of Bamboos, &c. Bambo-Machar and Mango-Achar are most used.”—Dampier, i. 391.

1727.—“And the Soldiery, Fishers, Peasants, and Handicrafts (of Goa) feed on a little Rice boiled in Water, with a little bit of Salt Fish, or Achar, which is pickled Fruits or Roots.”—A. Hamilton, i. 252. [And see under KEDGEREE.]

1753.—We learn from Forrest that limes, salted for sea-use against scurvy, were used by the Chuttias (Choolia), and were called atchar (Voyage to Mergui, 40). Thus the word passed to Java, as in next quotation:

1768-71.—“When green it (the mango) is made into attjar: for this the kernel is taken out, and the space filed in with ginger, pimento, and other spicy ingredients, after which it is pickled in vinegar.”—Stuvorius, i. 237.

ACHEEN, n.p. (P. āchīn [Tam. āṭṭā], Malay Acheh, Achik) ‘a woodlcech’). The name applied by us to the State and town at the B.W. angle of Sumatra, which was long, and especially during the 16th and 17th centuries, the greatest native power on that Island. The proper Malay name of the place is Acheh. The Portuguese generally called it Achem (or frequently by the adhesion of the genitive preposition, Dachem, so that Sir F. Greville below makes two kingdoms), but our Acheen seems to have been derived from mariners of the P. Gulf or W. India, for we find the name so given (Āchēn) in the Ain-i-Abhari, and in the Geog. Tables of Sadik Isfahani. This form may have been suggested by a jingling analogy, such as Orientals love, with Māchīn (Macheen). See also under LOOTY.

ADAM'S APPLE. This name (Pomo d'Adamo) is given at Goa to the fruit of the Mimusops Elengi, Linn. (Birdwood); and in the 1635 ed. of Gerard's Herball it is applied to the Plantain. But in earlier days it was applied to a fruit of the Citron kind.—(See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., i. 101), and the following:

c. 1580.—"In his hortis (of Cairo) ex arboribus virescent mala citrina, aurantia, limonia sylvestria et domestica poma Adami vocata."—Prosp. Alpinus, i. 16.

c. 1712.—It is a kind of lime or citron tree ... it is called Pomum Adami, because it has on its rind the appearance of two bites, which the simplicity of the ancients imagined to be the vestiges of the impression which our forefather made upon the forbidden fruit. ..." Bluteau, quoted by Tr. of Abboquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 100. The fruit has nothing to do with zamboa, with which Bluteau and Mr. Birch connect it. See JAMBOO.

ADAMI, s. A kind of piece-goods exported from Bengal. We do not know the proper form or etymology. It may have been of half-width (from H. adālat, 'half'). [It may have been half the ordinary length, as the Salampore (Salempoory) was half the length of the cloth known in Madras as Punyam. (Madras Man. of Ad, iii. 799). Also see Yule's note in Hedges' Diary, ii. cxcl.]

1813.—Among piece-goods of Bengal: "Addaties, Pieces 700" (i.e. pieces to the ton).—Milburn, ii. 221.

ADAWLUT, s. Ar.—H.—"adālat, 'a Court of Justice,' from 'adāl, 'doing justice.' Under the Mohammedan government there were 3 such courts, viz., Nizāmat 'Adālat, Divāni Adālat, and Fanjārī 'Adālat, so-called from the respective titles of the officials who nominally presided over them. The first was the chief Criminal Court, the second a Civil Court, the third a kind of Police Court. In 1793 regular Courts were established under the British Government, and then the Sudder Adawlut (So'dr 'Adālat) became the chief Court of Appeal for each Presidency, and its work was done by several European (Civilian) Judges. That Court was, on the criminal side, termed Nizāmat Adawlut, and on the civil side Dewanny Ad. At Madras and Bombay, Fanjārī was the style adopted in lieu of 'Nizāmat. This system ended in 1863, on the introduction of the Penal Code, and the institution of the High Courts on their present footing. (On the original history and constitution of the Courts see Fifth Report, 1812, p. 6.)

What follows applies only to the Bengal Presidency, and to the administration of justice under the Company's Courts beyond the limits of the Presidency town. Brief particulars regarding the history of the Supreme Courts and those Courts which preceded them will be found under SUPREME COURT.

The grant, by Shâh 'Alam, in 1765, of the Dewanny of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa to the Company, transferred all power, civil and military, in those provinces, to that body. But no immediate attempt was made to undertake the direct detailed administration of either revenue or justice by the agency of the European servants of the Company. Such superintendence, indeed, of the administration was maintained in the prior acquisitions of the Company—viz., in the Zemindary of Calcutta, in the Twenty-four Pergunas, and in the Chucklas (Chucklah) or districts of Burdwan, Midnapoor, and Chittagong, which had been transferred by the Nawab, Kasim 'Ali Khân, in 1760; but in the rest of the territory it was confined to the agency of a Resident at the Moorshedabad Durbar, and of a 'Chief' at Patna. Justice was administered by the Mohammedan courts under the native officials of the Dewanny.

In 1770, European officers were appointed in the districts, under the name of Supervisors, with powers of control over the natives employed in the collection of the Revenue and the administration of justice, whilst local councils, with superior authority in all branches, were established at Moorshedabad and Patna. It was not till two years later that, under express orders from the Court of Directors, the effective administration of the provinces was undertaken by the agency of the Company's covenanted servants. At this time (1772) Courts of Civil Justice (Mofussil Dewanny Adawlut) were established in each of the Districts then recognised. There were also District Criminal Courts (Foujdary Adawlut) held by Cazee or Mufty under the superintendence, like the Civil Court, of the Collectors, as the Supervisors were now styled; whilst Superior Courts (Sudder Dewanny, Sudder Nizamut Adawlut) were established at the Presidency, to be under the superintendence of three or four members of the Council of Fort William.

In 1774 the Collectors were recalled, and native 'Amils (Aumil) appointed in their stead. Provincial Councils were set up for the divisions of Calcutta, Burdwan, Dacca, Moorshedabad, Dinagepore, and Patna, in whose hands the superintendence, both of revenue collection and of the administration of civil justice, was vested, but exercised by the members in rotation.

The state of things that existed under this system was discreditable. As Courts of Justice the provincial Councils were only "colourable imitations of courts, which had abdicated their functions in favour of their own subordinate (native) officers, and though their decisions were nominally subject to the Governor-General in Council, the Appellate Court was even a more shadowy body than the Courts of first instance. The Court never sat at all, though there are some traces of its having at one time decided appeals on the report of the head of the Khalsa, or native exchequer, just as the Provincial Council decided them on the report of the Cazis and Muftis."*

In 1770 the Government resolved that Civil Courts, independent of the Provincial Councils, should be established in the six divisions named above,† each under a civilian judge with the title of Superintendent of the Dewanny Adawlut; whilst to the Councils should still pertain the trial of causes relating to the public revenue, to the demands of zemindars upon their tenants, and to boundary questions. The appeal from the District Courts still lay to the Governor-General and his Council, as forming the Court of Sudder Dewanny; but that this might be real, a judge was appointed its head in the person of Sir Elijah Impey, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, an appointment which became famous. For it was represented as a transaction intended to compromise the acute dissions which had been going on between that Court and the Bengal Government, and in fact as a bribe to Impey. It led, by an address from the House of Commons, to the recall of Impey, and constituted one of the charges in the abortive impeachment of that personage. Hence his charge of the Sudder Dewanny ceased in November, 1782, and it was resumed in form by the Governor-General and Council.

In 1787, the first year of Lord Cornwallis's government, in consequence of instructions from the Court of Directors, it was resolved that, with an exception as to the Courts at Moorshedabad, Patna, and Dacca, which were to be maintained independently, the office of judge in the Mofussil Courts was to be attached to that of the collection of the revenue; in fact, the offices of Judge and Collector, which had been divorced since 1774, were to be reunited. The duties of Magistrate and Judge became mere appendages to that of Collector; the administration of justice became a subordinate function; and in fact all Regulations respecting that administration were passed in the Revenue Department of the Government.

Up to 1790 the criminal judiciary had remained in the hands of the native courts. But this was now altered; four Courts of Circuit were created, each to be superintended by two civil servants as judges; the Sudder Nizamut Adawluts at the Presidency being presided over by the Governor-General and the members of Council.

In 1793 the constant succession of revolutions in the judicial system came to something like a pause, with the entire reformation which was enacted by the Regulations of that year. The Collection of Revenue was now entirely separated from the administration of justice; Zillah Courts under European judges were established (Reg. iii.) in each of 23 Districts and 3 cities, in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa; whilst Provincial Courts of Appeal, each consisting of three judges (Reg. v.), were established at Moorshedabad, Patna, Dacca, and Calcutta. From these Courts, under certain conditions, further appeal lay to the Sudder Dewanny Adawluts at the Presidency.

As regarded criminal jurisdiction, the judges of the Provincial Courts were also (Reg. ix., 1793) constituted Circuit Courts, liable to review by the Sudder Nizamut. Strange to say, the impracticable idea of placing the duties of both of the higher Courts, civil and criminal, on the shoulders of the executive Government was still maintained, and the Governor-General and his Council were the constituted heads of the Sudder Dewanny and Sudder Nizamut. This of course continued as unworkable as it had been; and in Lord Wellesley's time, eight years later, the two Sudder Adawluts were reconstituted, with three regular judges to each, though it was still ruled (Reg. ii., 1801) that the chief judge in each Court was to be a member of the Supreme Council, not being either the Governor-General or the Commander-in-Chief. This rule was rescinded by Reg. x. of 1805.

The number of Provincial and Zillah Courts was augmented in after years with the extension of territory, and additional Sudder Courts, for the service of the Upper Provinces, were established at Allahabad in 1831 (Reg. vi.), a step which may be regarded as the inception of the separation of the N.W. Provinces into a distinct Lieutenant-Governorship, carried out five years later. But no change that can be considered at all organic occurred again in the judiciary system till 1862; for we can hardly consider as such the abolition of the Courts of Circuit in 1829 (Reg. i.), and that of the Provincial Courts of Appeal initiated by a section in Reg. v. of 1831, and completed in 1833.

1822.—"This refers to a traditional story which Mr. Elphinstone used to relate . . . During the progress of our conquests in the North-West many of the inhabitants were encountered flying from the newly-occupied territory. 'Is Lord Lake coming?' was the enquiry. ADIGAR, s. Properly adhikār, from Skt. adhikārin, one possessing authority; Tam. adhikārī, or -kāren. The title was formerly in use in South India, and perhaps still in the native States of Malabar, for a rural headman. [See quot, from Logan below.] It was ADJUTANT, s. A bird so called (no doubt) from its comical resemblance to a human figure in a stiff dress pacing slowly on a parade-ground. It is the H. hargilda, or gigantic crane, and popular scavenger of Bengal, the Leptoptilus argyala of Linnaeus. The H. name is by some dictionaries derived from a supposed Skt. word hādha-gīla, 'bone-swallow.' The compound, however appropriate, is not to be found in Böhtlingk and Roth's great Dictionary. The bird is very well described by Aelian, under the name of Kηαα, which is perhaps a relic of the still preserved vernacular one. It is described by another name, as one of the peculiarities of India, by Sultan Baber. See PELICAN.

"The feathers known as Marabou or Comercolly, properly Kumārkhandi, is a town in the Nadiya District, Bengal. See Balfour, Cyc. i. 1082."

c. A.D. 250.—"And I hear that there is in India a bird Kila, which is 3 times as big as a bastard; it has a mouth of a frightful size, and long legs, and it carries a huge crop which looks like a leather bag; it has a most dissonant voice, and whilst the rest of the plumage is ash-coloured, the tail-feathers are of a pale (or greenish) colour."—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 4.

c. 1530.—"One of these (fowls) is the ding, which is a large bird. Each of its wings is the length of a man; on its head and neck there is no hair. Something like a bag hangs from its neck; its back is black, its breast white; it frequently visits Kābul. One year they caught and brought me a ding, which became very tame. The flesh which they threw it, it never failed to catch in its beak, and swallowed without ceremony. On one occasion it swallowed a shoe well shod with iron; on another occasion it swallowed a good-sized fowl right down, with its wings and feathers."—Babur, 321.

1754.—"In the evening excursions . . . we had often observed an extraordinary species of birds, called by the natives Arygil or Hargill, a native of Bengal. They would majestically stalk along before us, and at first we took them for Indians naked. . . . The following are the exact marks and dimensions. . . . The wings extended 14 feet and 10 inches. From the tip of the bill to the extremity of the claw it measured 7 feet 6 inches. . . . In the crow was a Teraùn or land-tortoise, 10 inches long; and a large black male cat was found entire in its stomach."—Jee, 183-4.

1798.—"The next is the great Heron, the Arygil or Adjuntant, or Gigantic Crane of Latham. . . . It is found also in Guinea."—Pennant's View of Hindostan, ii. 156.

[1880.—Ball (Jungle Life, 89) describes the "snake-stone" said to be found in the head of the bird.]

AFGHAN, n. p. P.—H.—Afghān. The most general name of the predominant portion of the congeries of tribes beyond the N.W. frontier of India, whose country is called from them Afghānistān. In England one often hears the country called Af- gunist-an, which is a mispronunciation painful to an Anglo-Indian ear, and even Afghann, which is a still more excruciating solecism. [The common local pronunciation of the name is Aoğhān, which accounts for some of the forms below. Bellows insists on the distinction between the Afghan and the Pathan (PUTTAN). "The Afghan is a Pathan merely because he inhabits a Pathan country, and has to a great extent mixed with its people and adopted their language" (Races of Af., p. 25). The name represents Skt. asvaka in the sense of a 'cavalier,' and this reappears scarcely modified in the Assakani or Assakeni of the historians of the expedition of Alexander."

14th cent.-The Afghans are named by the continuator of Rashiduddin among the tribes in the vicinity of Herat (see N. & E. xiv. 494).

1504.-"The Afghans, when they are reduced to extremities in war, come into the presence of their enemy with grass between their teeth; being as much as to say, 'I am your ox.'"—Baber, 159.

c. 1556.-"He was afraid of the Afghans."—Sidi 'Ali, in J. As., 1st S., ix. 201.

c. 1665.-"Such are those petty Sovereigns, who are seated on the Frontiers of Persia, who almost never pay him anything, no more than they do to the King of Persia. As also the Balouchees and Augans, and other Mountaineers, of whom the greatest part pay him but a small matter, and even care but little for him: witness the Affront they did him, when they stopped his whole Army by cutting off the Water . . . when he passed from Atek on the River Indus to Caboul to lay siege to Kandahar . . . ."—Bernier, E. T. 64 [ed. Constable, 205].

1767.—"Our final sentiments are that we have no occasion to take any measures against the Afghan King if it should appear he cannot only to raised contributions but if he proceeds to the eastward of Delhi to make an attack on your allies, or threatens the peace of Bengal, you will concert such measures with Sujah Dowla as may appear best adapted for your mutual defence."—Court's Letter, Nov. 20. In Long, 486; also see ROHILLA.

1838.—"Professor Dorn . . . discusses severely the theories that have been maintained of the descent of the Afghans: 1st, from the Copts; 2nd, the Jews; 3rd, the Georgians; 4th, the Toorks; 5th, the Moguls; 6th, the Armenians; and he mentions more cursorily the opinion that they are descended from the Indo-Scythians, Medians, Sogdians, Persians, and Indians: on considering all which, he comes to the rational conclusion, that they cannot be traced to any tribe or country beyond their present seats and the adjoining mountains."—Elphinstone's Corwin, ed. 1839, i. 209.

1682.—"Here we met with ye Barbadoes Merchant . . . James Cook, Master, laden with Salt, Mules, and Africos."—Hedges, Diary, Feb. 27. [Hak. Soc. i. 16.]

[AGAM. adj. A term applied to certain cloths dyed in some particular way. It is the Ar. 'ajam (lit. "one who has an impediment or difficulty in speaking Arabic"), a foreigner, and in particular, a Persian. The adj. 'ajamí thus means "foreign" or "Persian," and is equivalent to the Greek βαγάξας and the Hind. मेलेघा. Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., p. 145) quotes from Hieronimo di Santo Stefano (1494-99), "in company with some Armenian and Azami merchants": and (ibid.) from Varthema: "It is a country of very great traffic in merchandise, and particularly with the Persians and Azami, who come so far as there."] [1614.—"Kerseys, Agam colours."—Foster, Letters, ii. 227.

AGAR-AGAR, s. The Malay name of a kind of sea-weed (Sphacelaria lichenoides). It is succulent when boiled to a jelly; and is used by the Chinese with birdsnest (q.v.) in soup. They also employ it as a glue, and apply it to silk and paper intended to be transparent. It grows on the shores of the Malay Islands, and is much exported to China.—(See Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch., and Milburn, ii. 304).

AGDAUN, s. A hybrid H. word from H. āg and P. dān, made in imitation of pık-dān, kalam-dān, shama-dān ('spittoon, pencase, candlestick'). It means a small vessel for holding fire to light a cheroot.

[AJNÁS, s. Ar. plur. of jins, 'goods, merchandise, crops,' etc. Among the Moguls it was used in the special sense of pay in kind, not in cash.]

[e. 1665.—"It (their pay) is, however, of a different kind, and not thought so honorable, but the Rouzindars are not subject, like the Mansabdars (Munsubdar) to the Agenas; that is to say, are not bound to take, at a valuation, carpets, and other pieces of furniture, that have been used in the King's palace, and on which an unreasonable value is sometimes set."—Bernier (ed. Constable), 215-6.]

AK, s. H. āk and ark, in Sindi āk: the prevalent name of the madār (Muddar) in Central and Western India. It is said to be a popular belief (of course erroneous) in Sind, that Akbar was so called after the āk, from his birth in the desert. [Ives (488) calls it Ogg.] The word appears in the following popular rhyme quoted by Tod (Rajasthan, i. 669):—

Ak-rā jhoprā,  Phok-rā bār,  Bajrā-rā rotī,  Mot'h-rā dāl:
Dekho Rājā terī Mārwār.
(For houses hurdles of madār,  For hedges heaps of withered thorn,  Millet for bread, horse-peas for pulse:  Such is thy kingdom, Raja of Mārwār!)

AKALEE, or Nihang ('the naked one'), s. A member of a body of zealots among the Sikhs, who take this name 'from being worshippers of Him who is without time, eternal' (Wilson). Skt. a privative, and kāl, 'time.' The Akālīs may be regarded as the Wahābis of Sikhism. They claim their body to have been instituted by Guru Govind himself, but this is very doubtful. Cunningham's view of the order is that it was the outcome of the struggle to reconcile warlike activity with the abandonment of the world; the founders of the Sikh doctrine rejecting the inert asceticism of the Hindu sects. The Akālīs threw off all subjectio to the earthly government, and acted as the censors of the Sikh community in every rank. Ranjeet Singh found them very difficult to control. Since the annexation of the Panjab, however, they have ceased to give trouble. The Akalee is distinguished by blue clothing and steel armlets. Many of them also used to carry several steel chakras (CHUCKER) encircling their turbans. [See Ibbetson, Panjab Ethnog., 286; Maclogan, in Panjab Census Rep., 1891, i. 166.]

1832.—"We received a message from the Acali who had set fire to the village.  ... These fanatics of the Seik creed acknowledge no superior, and the ruler of the country can only moderate their frenzy by intrigues and bribery. They go about everywhere with naked swords, and lavish their abuse on the nobles as well as the peaceable subjects. ... They have on several occasions attempted the life of Runjeet Singh."—Burnes, Travels, ii. 10-11.

1840.—"The Akalis being summoned to surrender, requested a conference with one of the attacking party. The young Khan bravely went forward, and was straightway shot through the head."—Mrs Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine, i. 115.

AKYĀB, n.p. The European name of the seat of administration of the British province of Arakan, which is also a port exporting rice largely to Europe. The name is never used by the natives of Arakan (of the Burmese race), who call the town Tsit-hwè, 'Crowd (in consequence of) War.' This indicates how the settlement came to be formed in 1825, by the fact of the British force encamping on the plain there, which was found to be healthier than the site of the ancient capital of the kingdom of Arakan, up the valley of the Arakan or Kaladyne R. The name Akyāb had been applied, probably by the Portuguese, to a neighbouring village, where there stands, about 1½ miles from the present town, a pagoda covering an alleged relique of Gautama (a piece of the lower jaw, or an induration of the throat), the name of which pagoda, taken from the description of relique, is Au-kyat-dau, and of this Akyāb was probably a corruption. The present town and cantonment occupy dry land of very recent formation, and the high ground on which the pagoda stands must have stood on the shore at no distant date, as appears from the finding of a small anchor there about 1835. The village adjoining the pagoda must then have stood at the mouth of the Arakan R., which was much frequented by the Portuguese and the Chittagong people in the 16th and 17th centuries, and thus probably became known to them by a name taken from the Pagoda.—(From a note by Sir Arthur Phayre.) [Col. Temple writes—"The only derivation which strikes me as plausible, is from the Agyatatt Phaya, near which, on the island of Sittwe, a Cantonment was formed after the first Burmese war, on the abandonment of Mrohaung or Arakan town in 1825, on account of sickness among the troops stationed there. The word Agyatatt is spelt Akhyap-taw, whence probably the modern name."]

[1826.—"It (the despatch) at length arrived this day (3rd Dec. 1826), having taken two months in all to reach us, of which forty-five days were spent in the route from Akyab in Arakan."—Crawfurd, Ava, 289.]

ALA-BLAZE PAN, s. This name is given in the Bombay Presidency to a tinned-copper stew-pan, having a cover, and staples for straps, which is carried on the march by European soldiers, for the purpose of cooking in, and eating out of. Out on picnics a larger kind is frequently used, and kept continually going, as a kind of pot-au-feu. [It has been suggested that the word may be a corr. of some French or Port. term—Fr. braiser; Port. bras-eiro, ‘a fire-pan,’ brazas, ‘hot coals.’]

ALBACORE, s. A kind of rather large sea-fish, of the Tunny genus (Thynnus albacora, Lowe, perhaps the same as Thynnus macroperus, Day); from the Port. albacor or albecora. The quotations from Ovington and Grose below refer it to albo, but the word is, from its form, almost certainly Arabic, though Dozy says he has not found the word in this sense in Arabic dictionaries, which are very defective in the names of fishes (p. 61). The word albacora in Sp. is applied to a large early kind of fig, from Ar. al-bakēr, ‘praxex’ (Dozy), Heb. bikkērā, in Micah vii. 1.—See Cobarrwias, s. v. Albacora. [The N.E.D. derives it from Ar. al-bukr, ‘a young camel, a heifer,’ whence Port. bacor, ‘a young pig.’ Also see Gray’s note on Pyrrh. i. 9.]

1579.—‘These (flying fish) have two enemies, the one in the sea, the other in the aire. In the sea the fish which is called Albacore, as big as a salmon.’—Letter from Goa, by T. Stevens, in Hakl. ii. 583.

1592.—‘In our passage over from S. Laurence to the maine, we had exceeding great store of Bonitos and Albocores.’—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 592.

1696.—"We met likewise with shoals of Albicore (so call’d from a piece of white Flesh that sticks to their Heart) and with multitudes of Bonetoes, which are named from their Goodness and Excellence for eating; so that sometimes for more than twenty Days the whole Ship’s Company have feasted on these curious fish."—Ovington, p. 48.

c. 1760.—"The Albacore is another fish of mankind, of the same kind as the Bonite, from 60 to 90 pounds weight and upwards. The name of this fish too is taken from the Portuguese, importing its white colour."—Grose, i. 5.

ALBATROSS, s. The great sea-bird (Diomedea exulans, L.), from the Port. alcatras, to which the forms used by Hawkins and Dampier, and by Flacourt (according to Marcel Devic) closely approach. [Alcatras ‘in this sense altered to alb-, albe-, albatross (perhaps with etymological reference to albus, ‘white,’ the albatross being white, while the alcatras was black.) N.E.D. s.v.] The Port. word properly means ‘a pelican.’ A reference to the latter word in our Glossary will show another curious misapplication. Devic states that alcatrus in Port. means ‘the bucket of a Persian wheel,’* representing the Ar. al-khadas, which is again from kados. He supposes that the pelican may have got this name in the same way that it is called in ordinary Ar. sakka, ‘a water-carrier.’ It has been pointed out by Dr Murray, that the alcatrus of some of the earlier voyagers, e.g., of Davis below, is not the Diomedea, but the Man-of-War (or Frigate) Bird (Fregatus aquilus). Hawkins, at p. 187 of the work quoted, describes, without naming a bird which is evidently the modern albatross. In the quotation from Mocquet again, alcatrus is applied to some smaller sea-bird. The passage from Shelvoke is that which suggested to Coleridge "The Ancient Mariner."

1664.—"The 8th December we ankered by a small Island called Alcatrasa, whereon at our going a shoare, we found nothing but sea-birds, as we call them Genets, but by the Portugals called Alcaterases, who for that cause gave the said Island the same name."—Hawkins (Hak. Soc.), 15.

* Also see Dozy, s. v. alcatuz. Alcaduz, according to Cobarrwias, is in Sp. one of the earthen pots of the ander or Persian wheel.
ALBATROSS.

1593.—"The dolphins and bonitoes are the hounds, and the alcatraces the hawks, and the flying fishes the game."—Ibid. 152.

1604.—"The other foule called Alcatrazz is a kind of Hawke that lieth by fishing. For when the Bonitos or Dolphins doe chase the flying fish under the water ... this Alcatrazz flyeth after them like a Hawke after a Partridge."—Davis (Hak. Soc.), 158.

c. 1608-10.—"Alcatraz sont petits oiseaux ainsi comme estourneaux."—Moynet, Voyages, 226.

1672.—"We met with those feathered Harbingers of the Cape ... Albatrosses ... they have great Bodies, yet not proportionate to their Wings, which make out twice their length."—Fryer, 12.

1699.—"They have several other Signs, whereby to know when they are near it, as by the Sea Fowl they meet at Sea, especially the Algratrosses, a very large long-winged Bird."—Dampier, i. 591.

1719.—"We had not had the sight of one fish of any kind, since we were come Southward of the Streights of Le Maix, nor one sea-bird, except a disconsolate black Albitross, who accompanied us for several days, hovering about as if he had lost himself, till Hatley (my second Captain) observing, in one of his melancholy fits, that this bird was always hovering near us, imagin'd from his colour, that it might be some ill omen. ... But be that as it would, he after some fruitless attempts, at length shot the Albitross, not doubting (perhaps) that we should have a fair wind after it. ..."—Shelvocke's Voyage, 72, 73.

1740.—"... a vast variety of sea-fowl, amongst which the most remarkable are the Pongois; they are in size and shape like a goose, but instead of wings they have short stumps like fins ... their bills are narrow like those of an Albitross, and they stand and walk in an erect posture. From this and their white bellies, Sir John Narborough has whimsically likened them to little children standing up in white aprons."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. (1756), p. 85.

1754.—"An albatrose, a sea-fowl, was shot off the Cape of Good Hope, which measured 17½ feet from wing to wing."—Ives, 5.

1803.—"At length did cross an Albatross; Thorough the fog it came; / As if it had been a Christian soul / We hailed it in God's name."—The Ancient Mariner.

c. 1861.—"Souvent pour s'amuser, les hommes d'équipage Prennent des albatros, vastes oiseaux des mers, Qui suivent, indolents compagnons de voyage, Le navire glissant sur les gouffres amers."—Baradilaire, L'Albatros.

ALCATIF, s. This word for 'a carpet' was much used in India in the 16th century, and is treated by some travellers as an Indian word. It is not however of Indian origin, but is an Arabic word (katif, 'a carpet with long pile') introduced into Portugal through the Moors.

c. 1540.—"There came aboard of Antonio de Faria more than 60 botes, and balloons, and maceñas (q.q.v.) with awnings and flags of silk, and rich alcatifas."—Pinto, ch. lxvii. (orig.).

1560.—"The whole tent was cut in a variety of arabesques, inlaid with coloured silk, and was carpeted with rich alcatifas."—Tenreiro, Itin., c. xvii.

1578.—"The windows of the streets by which the Viceroy passes shall be hung with carpets (alcatifadas), and the doors decorated with branches, and the whole adorned as richly as possible."—Archiv. Port. Orient., fascic. ii. 225.

[1598.—"Great store of rich Tapestris, which are called alcatifas."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 47.]

1608-10.—"Quand elles vont à l'Eglise on les porte en palanquin ... le dedans est d'un grand tapis de Perse, qu'ils appellent Alcatif ..."—Pyramid, ii. 92; [Hak. Soc. ii. 102].

1648.—"... many silk stuffs, such as satin, contenentis (Coutance) attelap (read attelas), alelie ... ornis [H. orius; 'A woman's sheet'] of gold and silk for women's wear, gold alacatijyen ..."—Van Twist, 50.

1726.—"They know nought of chairs or tables. The small folks eat on a mat, and the rich on an Alcatief, or carpet, sitting with their feet under them, like our Tailors."—Valentinus, v. Choron, 55.

ALCORNANAS, s. What word does Herbert aim at in the following? [The Stanf. Dict. regards this as quite distinct from Alcornan, the Korân, or sacred book of Mohammedans (for which see N.E.D. s.v.), and suggests Al-qorân, 'the horns,' or al-qirân, 'the verticles.'] 1665.—"Some (mosques) have their Alcornana's high, slender, round steeples or towers, most of which are terrassed near the top, like the Standard in Cheapside, but twice the height."—Herbert, Travels, 3rd ed. 164.

ALCOVE, s. This English word comes to us through the Span. alcova and Fr. alcôve (old Fr. aucube), from Ar. al-kubbah, applied first to a kind of tent (so in Hebr. Numbers xxv. 8) and then to a vaulted building or recess. An edifice of Saracen construction at Palermo is still known as La Cuba; and another, a domed tomb, as La Cubola. Whatever be the true formation of the last word, it seems to have given us, through the Italian, Cupola. [Not so in N.E.D.]

1738.—"Cubba, commonly used for the vaulted tomb of marab-butts" [Adjutant.]—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 40.

ALDEA. s. A village; also a villa. Port. from the Ar. al-da'â'a, 'a farm or villa.' Bluteau explains it as 'Povoção menor que lugar.' Lane gives among other and varied meanings of the Ar. word: 'An estate consisting of land or of land and a house, ... land yielding a revenue.' The word forms part of the name of many towns and villages in Spain and Portugal.

1547.—"The Governor (of Baçam) Dom João de Castro, has given and gives many aldeas and other grants of land to Portuguese who served and were wounded at the fortress of Dío, and to others of long service. ..."—Simão Betelho, Cartas 3.

[1609.—"Aldeas in the Country."—Dunster, Letters, i. 25.]

1673.—"Here ... in a sweet Air, stood a Magnificent Rural Church; in the way to which, and indeed all up and down this Island, are pleasant Aldeas, or villages and hamlets that ... swarm with people."—Valentijn, v. (Malabar), 11.

1780.—"The Coast between these is filled with Aldees, or villages of the Indians."—Dunstan, N. Directory, 5th ed., 110.

1782.—"Il y a aussi quelques Aldees considérables, telles que Navar et Portovenere, qui appartiennent aux Princes du pays."—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 37.

ALFANDICA. a. A custom-house and resort for foreign merchants in an oriental port. The word comes through the Port. alfandega, Span. fundado, Ital. fondaco, Fr. fondue or fondique, from Ar. al-funduk, 'the inn,' and this from Gk. πανδοχείον or πανδοχείον, 'a pilgrim's hospice.'

[c. 1610.—"The conveyance of them thence to the alfandique."—Pyrrah della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 361.]

[1615.—"The Judge of the Alfandica came to invite me."—Sir T. Roe, Embassy, Hak. Soc. i. 72.]

[1615.—"That the goods of the English may be freely landed after dispatch in the Alfandiga."—Foster, Letters, iv. 79.]

ALGUADA, n.p. The name of a reef near the entrance to the Basscin branch of the Irawadi R., on which a splendid lighthouse was erected by Capt. Alex. Fraser (now Lieut.-General Fraser, C.B.) of the Engineers, in 1861-65. See some remarks and quotations under NEGRAIS.

1404.—"And from these bazaars (alcoceiras) issue certain gates into certain streets, where they sell many things, such as cloths of silk and cotton, and sendals, and tafitalanas, and silk, and pearl (alxofar)."—Clavijo, § lxxxi. (comp. Markham, 81).

1508.—"The aljofar and pearls that (your Majesty) orders me to send you I cannot have as they have them in Ceylon and in Caille, which are the sources of them: I would buy them with my blood, and with my money, which I have only from your giving. The Sinabaffs (sínabafes), porcelain vases (porceltanas), and wares of that sort are further off. If for my sins I stay here longer I will endeavour to get everything. The slave girls that you order me to send you must be taken from prizes,* for the heathen women of this country are black, and are mistresses to everybody by the time they are ten years old."—Letter of the Vicerey D. Francisco d'Almeida to the King, in Correia, i. 908-9.

[1665.—"As it (the idol) was too deformed, they made hands for it of the small pearls which we call 'pears by the ounce.'"—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 228.]

ALLAHABAD, n.p. This name, which was given in the time of Akbar to the old Hindu Prayāg or Prāg (PRAAG) has been subjected to a variety of corrupt pronunciations, both European and native. Ilahābdz is a not uncommon native form, converted by Europeans into Halabas, and further by English soldiers formerly into Isle o' bats. And the Illiabad, which we find in the Hastings charges, survives in the Elleebad still heard occasionally.

* Query, from captured vessels containing foreign (non-Indian) women? The words are as follows: "As escravas que me diz que o mando, tomávam de prenses, que as Gentias d'esta terra são pretas, e mancah a mundo como chega a dez annos."
c. 1666.—"La Province de Halabas s'appelait autrefois Purup (Poorub)."—Thvenot, v. 197.

1726.—"This exceptionally great river (Ganges) ... comes so far from the N. to the S. ... and so further to the city Halabas."—Valentinüs.

Here D'Anville is in error. But see Rennell's Memoir, pp. 50-54, which clearly identifies Palibothra with Patna.

1786.—"... an attack and invasion of the Rohillas ... which nevertheless the said Warren Hastings undertook at the very time when, under the pretence of the difficulty of defending Corah and Illiabed, he sold these provinces to Sajah Dowla. ... Articles of Charge, &c., in Burke, vi. 577.

"... You will see in the letters from the Board ... a plan for obtaining Illisbad from the Vizier, to which he had spirit enough to make a successful resistance."—Cormwallis, i. 238.

ALLEJA. s. This appears to be a stuff from Turkestan called (Turki) alchah, alajah, or alâchah. It is thus described: "a silk cloth 5 yards long, which has a sort of wavy line pattern running in the length on either side." (Baden-Powell's Punjab Handbook, 66). [Platts in his Hind. Dict. gives ilâchah, "a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardanoms (ilâchî)."

But this is evidently a folk etymology. Yusuf Ali (Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 95) accepts the derivation from Aleha or Alâcha, and says it was probably introduced by the Moguls, and has historical associations with Agra, where alone in the N.W.P. it is manufactured. "This fabric differs from the Doriya in having a substantial texture, whereas the Doriya is generally flimsy. The colours are generally red, or bluish-red, with white stripes." In some of the western Districts of the Panjâb various kinds of fancy cotton goods are described as Lacha. (Francis, Mon. on Cotton, p. 8). It appears in one of the trade lists (see PIECE-GOODS) as Elatches.

1612.—"Hold the *Allesas at 50 Rs."—Dawers, Letters, i. 205."

1613.—"The Nabob bestowed upon him 850 Mamoodles, 10 fine Bafats, 30 Topeselles and 30 Aliazaes."—Dowton, in Purchas, i. 504. "Topeselles are Tufélial (a stuff from *Mecca").—Ara, i. 98. [See ADATI, PIECE-GOODS].

1615.—"I pec. alleia of 30 Rs. ..."—Cocks's Diary, i. 64.

1648.—See Van Twist above, under ALCATIF. And 1673, see Fryer under ATLAS.

[c. 1666.—"Alâchah, or silk stuffs interwoven with gold and silver."—Berner (ed. Constable), p. 120-21.]

1712.—"An Allejah petticato striped with green and gold and white."—Advert. in Spectator, cited in Malcolm, Anecdotes, 429.

1726.—"Gold and silver Allegas."—Valentinüs (Suratt), iv. 146.

1813.—"Allassas (pieces to the ton) 1200."—Milburn, ii. 221.

1855.—"The cloth from which these pyjamas are made (Swât) is known as Alacha, and is as a rule manufactured in their own houses, from 2 to 20 threads of silk being let in with the cotton; the silk as well as the cotton is brought from Peshawur and spun at home."—M'Nair's Report on Explorations, p. 5.

ALLIGATOR. s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian term for the great lacertine amphibia of the rivers. It was apparently in origin a corruption, imported from S. America, of the Spanish El or al lagarto (from Lat. lacerta, 'a lizard.') The "Summary of the Western Indies" by Pietro Martire d'Angheria, as given in Ramusio, recounting the last voyage of Columbus, says that, in a certain river, "they sometimes encountered those crocodiles which they call Lagarti; these make away when they see the Christians, and in making away they leave behind them an odour more fragrant than musk." (Ram. iii
f. 17v.). Oviedo, on another page of the same volume, calls them "Lagarto o dragón" (f. 62).

Bluteau gives "Lagarto, Crocodilo" and adds: "In the Oriente Conquistado (Part I. f. 823) you will find a description of the Crocodile under the name of Lagarto."

One often, in Anglo-Indian conversation, used to meet with the endeavour to distinguish the two well-known species of the Ganges as Crocodile and Alligator, but this, like other applications of popular and general terms to mark scientific distinctions, involves fallacy, as in the cases of 'panther, leopard,' 'camel, dromedary,' 'attorney, solicitor;' and so forth. The two kinds of Gangetic crocodile were known to Aelian (c. 250 a.d.), who writes: "It (the Ganges) breeds two kinds of crocodiles; one of these is not at all hurtful, while the other is the most voracious and cruel eater of flesh; and these have a horny prominence on the top of the nostril. These latter are used as ministers of vengeance upon evil-doers; for those convicted of the greatest crimes are cast to them; and they require no executioner."

1493.—"In a small adjacent island... our men saw an enormous kind of lizard (lagarto muy grande), which they said was as large round as a calf, and with a tail as long as a lance... but bulky as it was, it got into the sea, so that they could not catch it."

Letter of Dr. Chance, in Select Letters of Columbus by Major, Hak. Soc. 2nd ed., 43.

1599.—"All along this River, that was not very broad, there were a number of Lizards (lagartos), which might more properly be called Serpents... with scales upon their backs, and mouths two foot wide... there be of them that will sometimes get upon an almadia... and overturn it with their tails, swallowing up the men whole, without dismembering of them."—Pinto, in Cogan's tr. 17 (orig. cap. xiv.).

1552.—"... aquatic animals such as... very great lizards (lagartos), which in form and nature are just the crocodiles of the Nile."—Barros, I. iii. 8.

1568.—"In this River we killed a monstrous Lagarto, or Crocodile... he was 23 foot by the rule, headed like a hogge."

Job Hortop, in Hakl. iii. 580.

1579.—"We found here many good commodities... besides alagartos, munokeyes, and the like."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 112.

1591.—"In this place I have seen very great water aligartos (which we call in English crocodiles), seven yards long."— Master Antonio Knivet, in Purchas, iv. 1228.

1593.—"In this River (of Guayaquil) and all the Rivers of this Coast, are great abundance of Alagartoes... persons of credit have certified to me that as small fishes in other Rivers abound in scores, so the Alagartos in this..."

c. 1593.—"And in his needy shop a tortoise hung, An alligator stuff'd, and other skins Of ill-shaped fishes..."

Romeo & Juliet, v. 1.

1595.—"Upon this river there were great store of fowle... but for lagartos it exceeded, for there were thousands of those vgy serpents; and the people called it for the abundance of them, the rier of Lagarto's in their language."—Raleigh, The Discoverie of Guiana, in Hakl. iv. 157.

1596.—"Once he would needs defend a rat to be animal rationale... because she eate and gnaw his books... And the more to confirm it, because everie one laught at him... the next rat he saw'd him to be a man made an amoatize of, and read a lecture of 3 days long upon everie artire or muscle, and after hanged her over his head in his study in stead of an apothe- carie's crocodile or dride Alligatur."—T. Nashe's 'Have with you to Saffron Walden', Repr. in J. Payne Collier's Misc. Tracts, p. 72.

1610.—"These Blackes... told me the River was full of Alligatas, and if I saw any I must fight with him, else he would kill me."—D. Milletton, in Purchas, i. 244.

1613.—"... mais avante... por distancia de 2 legos, esta o fennoso ryo de Cassam dos lagartos o crocodillos."—Go- disco de Ñorina, 10.

1673.—"The River was full of Aligators or Crocodiles, which lay basking in the Sun in the Mud on the River's side..."—Fryer, 55.

1727.—"I was cleaning a vessel... and had Stages fitted for my People to stand on... and we were plagued with five or six Aliegators, which wanted to be on the Stage."—A. Hamilton, ii. 133.

1761.—"... else that sea-like Stream (Whence Traffic pours her bounties on mankind) Dread Alligators would alone possess."—Greynger, Bk. ii.

1881.—"The Hooghly alone has never been so full of sharks and alligators as now. We have it on undoubted authority that within the past two months over a hundred people have fallen victims to these brutes."—Pioneer Mail, July 10th.

ALLIGATOR-PEAR, s. The fruit of the Laurus persica, Lin., Persica grattissima, Gaertn. The name as here given is an extravagant, and that of avacato or avogato a more moderate, corruption of aguacate or ahuacatl (see below), which appears to have been the native name in Central America, still surviving there. The Quichua name is pallta, which is used as well as aguacaté by Cieza de Leon, and also by Joseph de Acosta. Grainger (Sugarcane, Bk. I.) calls it “rich sabbacu,” which he says is “the Indian name of the avocado, avocado, avigato, or as the English corruptly call it, alligator pear. The Spaniards in S. America call it Aguacate, and under that name it is described by Ulloa.” In French it is called avocat. The praise which Grainger, as quoted below, “liberally bestows” on this fruit, is, if we might judge from the specimens occasionally met with in India, absurd. With liberal pepper and salt there may be a remote suggestion of marrow; but that is all. Indeed it is hardly a fruit in the ordinary sense. Its common sea name of “midshipman’s butter” [or “subaltern’s butter”] is suggestive of its merits, or demerits.
ALLIGATOR-PEAR. 15

Though common and naturalised throughout the W. Indies and E. coasts of tropical S. America, its actual native country is unknown. Its introduction into the Eastern world is comparatively recent; not older than the middle of 18th century. Had it been worth eating it would have come long before.

1532-50.—“There are other fruits belonging to the country, such as fragrant pines and plantains, many excellent guavas, cajunitos, aguacates, and other fruits.”—Cieza de Leon, 16.

1608.—“The Palla is a great tree, and carries a fair leaf, which has a fruite like to great pears; within it hath a great stone, and all the rest is soft meate, so as when they are full ripe, they are, as it were, butter, and have a delicate taste.”—Joseph de Acosta, 250.

c. 1660.—

“The Aguacat no less is Venus Friend (To th’ Indies Venus Conquest doth extend) A fragrant Leaf the Aguacata bears; Her Fruit in fashion of an Egg appears, With such a white and sperrny Juice it swells As represents moist Life’s first Principles.”

Cowley, Of Plantes, v.

1680.—“This Tavoga is an exceding pleasant Island, abounding in all manner of fruits, such as Pine-apples . . . Albecatos, Pears, Mammes.”—Capt. Sharpe, in Dampier, iv.

1685.—“The Avogato Pear-tree is as big as most Pear-trees . . . and the Fruit as big as a large Lemon. . . . The Substance in the inside is green, or a little yellowish, and soft as Butter. . . .”—Dampier, I, 203.

1736.—“Avogato, Bauam, . . . This fruit itself has no taste, but when mixt with sugar and lemon juice gives a wholesome and tasty flavour.”—Zeidler’s Lexicon, s.v.

Grainger, Bk. I.

1830.—“The avocado, with its Brodigmag pear, as large as a parser’s lantern.”—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 40.

1861.—“There is a well-known West Indian fruit which we call an avocado or alligator pear.”—Tylor, Anahuac, 227.

1870. — “The aguacate or Alligator pear.”—Squier, Honduras, 142.

1873.—“Thus the fruit of the Persia gratissima was called Ahucatl by the ancient Mexicans; the Spaniards corrupted it to avocado, and our sailors still further to ‘Alligator pears.’”—Bell’s Nicaragua, 107.

[ALLYGOLE, ALIGHOL, ALLYGOOL, ALLEGOLE, s. H.—P. ‘aligol, from al ‘lofty, excellent,’ Skt. gola, a troop; a nondescript word used for ‘irregular foot in the Maratha service, without discipline or regular arms. According to some they are so named from charging in a dense mass and invoking *Ali, the son-in-law of Mohammed, being chiefly Mohammedans.’”—(Wilson.)

1796.—“The Nezibs (Nujeeb) are matchlocks, and according to their different casts are called Allegoles or Rohillas; they are indifferently formed of high-cast Hindoos and Musselmans, armed with the country Bandook (bundook), to which the ingenuity of De Bogne had added a Bayonet.”—W. H. Tone, A Letter on the Maratta People, p. 50.

1804.—“Alleegole, A sort of chosen light infantry of the Rohilla Patans: sometimes the term appears to be applied to troops supposed to be used generally for desperate service.”—Fraser, Military Memoirs of Skinner, ii. 71 note, 75, 76.

1817.—“The Allygoole answer nearly the same description.”—Blacker, Mem. of Operations in India, p. 22.]

ALMADIA, s. This is a word introduced into Portuguese from Moorish al-mudaiya. Properly it means ‘a raft’ (see Dozy, s.v.). But it is generally used by the writers on India for a canoe, or the like small native boat.

1610.—"Light vessels which they call almadia."—Pyrrad della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 122; and also see under DONEY.] 1644.—"Huma Almadia pera servizio do dito Baluarte, com seis marinheiros que cada hum ven-se hum xera[m] por mes . . . .—x* 72."—Expenses of Dix, in Bocaro (Sloane MSS. 187, fol. 175).

ALMANACK, s. On this difficult word see Dozy's Oosterlingen and N.E.D. In a passage quoted by Eusebius from Porphyry (Præp. Evang. t. iii. ed. Gaisford) there is mention of Egyptian calendars called almawianâ. Also in the Vocabular Arawigo of Pedro de Alcalá (1505) the Ar. Mandîk is given as the equivalent of the Span. almanaque, which seems to show that the Sp. Arabs did use mandîk in the sense required, probably having adopted it from the Egyptian, and having assumed the initial al to be their own article.

ALMYRA, s. H. almârî. A wardrobe, chest of drawers, or like piece of (closed) furniture. The word is in general use, by masters and servants in Anglo-Indian households, in both N. and S. India. It has come to us from the Port. almario, but it is the same word as Fr. armoire, Old E. ambry [for which see N.E.D.] &c., and Sc. armory, originating in the Lat. armarium, or -ria, which occurs also in L. Gr. as ἀμπαρί, ἀμπάρα.

c. b.c. 200.—"Hoc est quod olim clanculum ex armario te surripisse iesbeas uxori tuae . . . ."—Plautus, Men. iii. 3.

A.D. 1450.—"Item, I will my chambre prestes haue . . . the thone of thame the to almer, & to theth of yame the tother almar whilst I ordnyd for kepyng of vestmente."—Will of Sir T. Cumberlege, in Academy, Sept. 27, 1879, p. 291.

1589.—"Item one langsettle, item one almarie, one Kist, one saut burde . . . ."—Ext. Records Burgh of Glasgow, 1876, 190.

ALOE, s. The name of aloe is applied to two entirely different substances: a. the drug prepared from the inspissated bitter juice of the Aloë Socotrina, Lam. In this meaning (a) the name is considered (Hanbury and Flückiger, Pharmacographia, 616) to be derived from the Syriac 'elbaw (in P. albâ). b. Aloes-wood, the same as Eagle-wood. This is perhaps from one of the Indian forms, through the Hebrew (pl. forms) alûkim, alêkim and ahlôth, ahlîth. Neither Hippocrates nor Theophrastus mentions aloes, but Dioscorides describes two kinds of it (Mat. Med. iii. 3). "It was probably the Socotrine aloes with which the ancients were most familiar. Eustathius says the aloe was called ἰέπα, from its excellence in preserving life (ad. II. 630). This accounts for the powder of aloes being called Ἡίερα πικρα in the older writers on Pharmacy."—(Francis Adams, Names of all Minerals, Plants, and Animals desc. by the Greek authors, etc.)

(a) c. A.D. 70.—"The best Aloë (Latin the same) is brought out of India. . . . Much use there is of it in many cases, but principally to loosen the belly; being the only purgative medicine that is comfortable to the stomach . . . ."—Pliny, Bk. xxvii (Ph. Holland, ii. 212).

(b) "Ἡλε δὲ καὶ Νικόδημος . . . σφένων μέγα σφάγης καὶ ἄλος ὡσεὶ Λίτρας ἐκατ."—John xix. 39.

[c. 1605.—"In webl hand of Allassakrina are good harbors faire depth and good Anchor ground."—Discription in Bird-wood, First Letter Book, 82. (Here there is a confusion of the name of the island Socotra with that of its best-known product—Aloes Socotrina.)]

1617.—". . . a kind of lignum Allo-wales."—Cocks's Diary, i. 309 [and see i. 9].

ALOO, s. Skt. — H. ālā. This word is now used in Hindustani and other dialects for the 'potato.' The original Skt. is said to mean the esculent root Arum campanulatum.

ALOO BOKHARA, s. P. ālā-bokhâra, 'Bokh. plum;' a kind of prune commonly brought to India by the Afghan traders.

1817.—
“Plantains, the golden and the green, Malaya’s nectar’d mangosteen; Prunes of Bokhara, and sweet nuts
From the far groves of Samarkand.”
Moore, Lalla Rookh.

AMPEEN, s. H. alpūn, used in Bombay. A common pin, from Port. alfinete (Panjub N. & Q., ii. 117).

AMAH, s. A wet nurse; used in Madras, Bombay, China and Japan. It is Port. ama (comp. German and Swedish amme).

1839.—“... A sort of good-natured housekeeper-like bodies, who talk only of ayahs and amahs, and bad nights, and babies, and the advantages of Hodgson’s ale while they are nursing: seeming in short devoted to ‘suckling fools and chronicling small beer.’”—Letters from Madras, 294. See also p. 106.

AMBAREE, s. This is a P. word (‘amārī) for a Howdah, and the word occurs in Colebrooke’s letters, but is quite unusual now. Gladwin defines Amaree as “an umbrella over the Howdeh” (Index to Ayeen, i.). The proper application is to a canopied howdah, such as is still used by native princes.

[c. 1661.—“Aurungzebe felt that he might venture to shut his brother up in a covered embary, a kind of closed litter in which women are carried on elephants.”—Bernier (ed. Constable), 69.]

c. 1665.—“On the day that the King went up the Mountain of Pire-ponjale ... being followed by a long row of elephants, upon which sat the Women in Mikdembers and Embarys ...”—Bernier, E.T. 130 [ed. Constable, 407].

1798.—“The Rajah’s Sowarree was very grand and superb. He had twenty elephants, with richly embroidered ambarrehs, the whole of them mounted by his sirdars, —he himself riding upon the largest, put in the centre.”—Skinner, Mem. i. 157.

1799.—“Many of the largest Ceylon and other Deycany Elephants bore ambarës on which all the chiefs and nobles rode, dressed with magnificence, and adorned with the richest jewels.”—Life of Colebrooke, p. 164.

1805.—“Amaury, a canopied seat for an elephant. An open one is called Houza or Howoda.”—Dict. of Words used in E. Indies, 2nd ed. 21.

1807.—“A royal tiger which was started in beating a large cover for game, sprang up so far into the umbarry or state howdah, in which Sujah Dowlah was seated, as to leave little doubt of a fatal issue.”—Williamson, Orient. Field Sports, 15.

AMBARREEH, s. Dekh. Hind. and Mahr. ambārā, ambārī [Skt. amla-vṛtika], the plant Hibiscus cannabinus, affording a useful fibre.

AMBOYNA, n.p. A famous island in the Molucca Sea, belonging to the Dutch. The native form of the name is Ambun [which according to Marsden means ‘dew’].

[1605.—“He hath sent hither his forces which hath expelled all the Portingalls out of the forts they here hould att Ambweno and Tydore.”—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 68.]

AMEEN, s. The word is Ar. amin, meaning ‘a trustworthy person,’ and then an inspector, intendant, &c. In India it has several uses as applied to native officials employed under the Civil Courts, but nearly all reducible to the definition of fide-commissarius. Thus an ameen may be employed by a Court to investigate accounts connected with a suit, to prosecute local enquiries of any kind bearing on a suit, to sell or to deliver over possession of immovable property, to carry out legal process as a bailiff, &c. The name is also applied to native assistants in the duties of land-survey. But see Sudder Ameen (SUDDER).

1817.—“Native officers called aumeens were sent to collect accounts, and to obtain information in the districts. The first incidents that occurred were complaints against these aumeens for injurious treatment of the inhabitants. ...”—Mill. Hist., ed. 1840, iv. 12.

1861.—“Bengalee dawans, once pure, are converted into demons; Ameens, once harmless, become tigers; magistrates, supposed to be just, are converted into oppressors.”—Peterson, Speech for Prosecution in Nil Durpan case.

1878.—“The Ameen employed in making the partition of an estate.”—Life in the Moghull, i. 206.

1882.—“A missionary .... might, on the other hand, be brought to a standstill when asked to explain all the terms used by an amin or valuator who had been sent to fix the judicial rents.”—Saty. Rev., Dec. 30, p. 866.

AMEER, s. Ar. Amīr (root āmr, ‘commanding,’ and so) a ‘commander, chief, or lord,’ and, in Ar. application, any kind of chief from the Amīru l-māminin, ‘the Amir of the Faithful’
i.e. the Caliph, downwards. The word in this form perhaps first became familiar as applied to the Princes of Sind, at the time of the conquest of that Province by Sir C. J. Napier. It is the title affected by many Musul-man sovereigns of various calibres, as the Amir of Kâbul, the Amir of Bokhârâ, &c. But in sundry other forms the word has, more or less, taken root in European languages since the early Middle Ages. Thus it is the origin of the title 'Admiral,' now confined to generals of the sea service, but applied in varying forms by medieval Christian writers to the Amirs, or lords, of the court and army of Egypt and other Mohammedan States. The word also came to us again, by a later importation from the Levant, in the French form, Emir or Emer.—See also Omrah, which is in fact Umarâd, the pl. of Amir. Byzantine writers use 'Amed, 'Ammâd, 'Ammânas, 'Amnânas, &c. (See Ducange, Gloss. Græcic.) It is the opinion of the best scholars that the forms Amirâl, Ammâraglio, Admiral &c., originated in the application of a Low Latin termination -alis or -allius, though some doubt may still attach to this question. (See Marcel Devic, s.v. Amirâl, and Dozy, Oosterlingen, s.v. Admiral [and N.E.D. s.v. Admiral]. The d in admiral probably came from a false imagination of connection with admirâl.

1250.—"Li grand amirâus des galies m'envia querre, et me demanda si j'estoie cousins le roy ; et je le di que nain . . ."—Joinville, p. 178. This passage illustrates the sort of way in which our modern use of the word admiral originated.

c. 1345.—"The Master of the Ship is like a great amir; when he goes ashore the archers and the blackamoors march before him with javelins and swords, with drums and horns and trumpets."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 93.

Compare with this description of the Commander of a Chinese Junk in the 14th century. A. Hamilton's of an English Captain in Malabar in the end of the 17th:

"Captain Beawes, who commanded the Albaharte, accompanied us also, carrying a Drum and two Trumpets with us, so as to make our Compliment the more solemn."—i. 294.

And this again of an "interloper" skipper at Hooghly, in 1683:

1683.—"Alley went in a splendid Equip- age, habited in scarlet richly laced. Ten Englishmen in Blue Capps and Coats edged with Red, all armed with Blunderbusses, went before his pullankan, 80 (18) Peons before them, and 4 Musicians playing on the Weights with 2 Flagggs, before him, like an Agent . . ."—Hedges, Oct. 8 (Hak. Soc. i. 129).

1615.—'The inhabitants (of Sidon) are of sundry nations and religions; governed by a succession of Princes whom they call Emers; descended, as they say, from the Drasses.'—Sunday, Journey, 210.

AMOY, n.p. A great seaport of Fokien in China, the name of which in Mandarin dialect is Hia-men, meaning 'Hall Gate,' which is in the Changchau dialect A-mui'. In some books of the last century it is called Emey and the like. It is now a Treaty-Port.

1657.—"Amoy or Anany, which is a city standing on a Navigable River in the Province of Fokien in China, and is a place of vast trade."—Dampier, i. 417. (This looks as if Dampier confounded the name of Amoy, the origin of which (as generally given) we have stated, with that of An-hai, one of the connected ports, which lies to the N.E., about 30 m., as the crow flies, from Amoy).

1727.—"There are some curiosities in Amoy. One is a large Stone that weighs above forty Tuns . . . in such an Equilibrium, that a Youth of twelve Years old can easily make it move."—A. Hamilton, ii. 243.

AMSHOM, s. Malayâl, ânîsâm, from Skt. âmsah, 'a part,' defined by Guntert as "part of a Talook, formerly called hobîli, greater than a tarî." [Logan (Man. Malabar, i. 87) speaks of the ânsâm as a 'parish.'] It is further explained in the following quotation:

1758.—"The amshom is really the smallest revenue division there is in Malabar, and is generally a tract of country some square miles in extent, in which there is no such thing as a village, but a series of scattered homesteads and farms, where the owner of the land and his servants reside . . . separate and apart, in single separate huts, or in scattered collections of huts."—Report of Census Com. in India.

A MUCK, to run, v. There is we believe no room for doubt that, to us at least, this expression came from the Malay countries, where both the phrase and the practice are still familiar. Some valuable remarks on the phenomenon, as prevalent among the Malays, were contributed by Dr Oxley of Singapore to the Journal of the Indian Archipelago, vol. iii. p. 532; see a quotation below. [Mr W. W. Skeat writes—"The best explanation of the fact is perhaps that it was the Malay national method of committing suicide, especially as one never hears of Malays committing suicide in any other way. This form of suicide may arise from a wish to die fighting and thus avoid a 'straw death, a cow's death'; but it is curious that women and children are often among the victims, and especially members of the suicide's own family. The act of running amuck is probably due to causes over which the culprit has some amount of control, as the custom has now died out in the British Possessions in the Peninsula, the offenders probably objecting to being caught and tried in cold blood. I remember hearing of only about two cases (one by a Sikh soldier) in about six years. It has been suggested further that the extreme monotonous heat of the Peninsula may have conducd to such outbreaks as those of Running amuck and Latah."

The word is by Crawfurd ascribed to the Javanese, and this is his explanation:

"Amuck (J.). An a-muck; to run a-muck; to tilt; to run furiously and desperately at any one; to make a furious onset or charge in combat."—(Malay Dict.). [The standard Malay, according to Mr Skeat, is rather amok (mengamok).]

Marsden says that the word rarely occurs in any other than the verbal form menyamuk, 'to make a furious attack' (Mem. of a Malayana Family, 96).

There is reason, however, to ascribe an Indian origin to the term; whilst the practice, apart from the term, is of no rare occurrence in Indian history. Thus Tod records some notable instances in the history of the Rájputs. In one of these (1634) the eldest son of the Raja of Mårwar ran a-muck at the court of Shah Jahân, failing in his blow at the Emperor, but killing five courtiers of eminence before he fell himself. Again, in the 18th century, Bijai Singh, also of Mårwar, bore strong resentment against the Tâlpura prince of Hyderabad, Bijær Khân, who had sent to demand from the Rájput tribute and a bride. A Bhatti and a Chondawat offered their services for vengeance, and set out for Sind as envoys. Whilst Bijær Khân read their credentials, muttering, 'No mention of the bride!' the Chondawat buried a dagger in his heart, exclaiming 'This for the bride!' 'And this for the tribute!' cried the Bhatti, repeating the blow. The pair then plied their daggers right and left, and 36 persons were slain before the envoys were hacked to pieces (Tod, ii. 45 & 315). But it is in Malabar that we trace the apparent origin of the Malay term in the existence of certain desperadoes who are called by a variety of old travellers amouchi or amuco. The nearest approach to this that we have been able to discover is the Malayálam amar-kkan, 'a warrior' (from amar, 'fight, war'). [The proper Malayálam term for such men was Chaver, literally those who took up or devoted themselves to death.] One of the special applications of this word is remarkable in connection with a singular custom in Malabar. After the Zamorin had reigned 12 years, a great assembly was held at Tirunâvâyí, when that Prince took his seat surrounded by his dependants, fully armed. Any one might then attack him, and the assailant, if successful in killing the Zamorin, got the throne. This had often happened. [For a full discussion of this custom see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed., ii. 14 sq.] In 1600 thirty such assailants were killed in the enterprise. Now these men were called amar-kâr (pl. of amar-kkan, see Gundert s.v.). These men evidently ran a-muck in the true Malay sense; and quotations below will show other illustrations from Malabar which confirm the idea that both name and practice originated in Continental India. There is indeed a difficulty as to the derivation here indicated, in the fact that the amuce or amouchi of European writers on Malabar seems by no means close enough to amar-kkan, whilst it is so close to the Malay amuk; and on this further light may be hoped for. The identity between the amoucos of Malabar and the amuck runners of the Malay peninsula is clearly shown by the passage from Correa given below. [Mr Whiteway adds—"Gouvea (1606) in his Iornada (ch. 9, Bk. ii.) applies the word amouques to certain Hindus whom he saw in S. Malabar near Quilon, whose duty it was to defend the Syrian Christians with their lives. There are reasons for thinking that the worthy priest got hold of the story of a cock and a bull; but in any case the Hindus referred to were really Jangadas.”] (See JANCADA).

De Gubernatis has indeed suggested that the word amouchi was derived from the Skt. amokshya, ‘that cannot be loosed’; and this would be very consistent with several of the passages which we shall quote, in which the idea of being ‘bound by a vow’ underlies the conduct of the persons to whom the term was applicable both in Malabar and in the Archipelago. But amokshya is a word unknown to Malayalam, in such a sense at least.

We have seen a-muck derived from the Ar. abmāk, ‘fatuous’ [(e.g. Ball, Jungle Life, 358).] But this is etymology of the kind which scorns history.

The phrase has been thoroughly naturalised in England since the days of Dryden and Pope. [The earliest quotation for “running amuck” in the N.E.D. is from Marvell (1672).]

c. 1430.—Nicolo Conti, speaking of the greater Islands of the Archipelago under the name of the Two Javas, does not use the word, but describes a form of the practice:—

“Homicide is here a jest, and goes without punishment. Debtors are made over to their creditors as slaves; and some of these, preferring death to slavery, will with drawn swords rush on, stabbing all whom they fall in with, of less strength than themselves, until they meet death at the hands of some one more than a match for them. This man, the creditors then sue in Court for the dead man’s debt.”—In India in the XVth C. 45.

1516.—“There are some of them (Javanese) who if they fall ill of any severe illness vow to God that if they remain in health they will of their own accord seek another more honourable death for their service, and as soon as they get well they take a dagger in their hands, and go out into the streets and kill as many persons as they meet, both men, women, and children, in such wise that they go like mad dogs, killing until they are killed. These are called Amuco. And as soon as they see them begin this work, they cry out, saying Amuco, Amuco, in order that people may take care of themselves, and they kill them with dagger and spear thrusts.”—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 194. This passage seems to show that the word amuk must have been commonly used in Malay countries before the arrival of the Portuguese there, c. 1511.

1539.—“... The Tyrant (o Rey Ache) sallied forth in person, accompanied with 5000 resolute men (cinco mil Amoucos) and charged the Batanes very furiously.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xvii.) in Cogan, p. 20.

1552.—De Barros, speaking of the capture of the Island of Beth (Beyt, off the N.W. point of Káthia, ar) by Nuno da Cunha in 1538, adds: “But the natives of Gujarát stood in such fear of Sultan Badur that they would not consent to the terms. And so, like people determined on death, all that night they shaved their heads (this is a superstitious practice of those who despise life, people whom they call in India Amoucos) and betook themselves to their mosque, and there devoted their persons to death ... and as an earnest of this vow, and as a madman—known as amouchi—and count themselves as already among the dead. These men dispersed, seeking wherever they might find men of Calicut, and among these they rushed fearless, killing and slaying till they were slain. And some of them, about twenty, reckoning more highly of their honour, desired to turn their death to better account; and these separated, and found themseves next day determined to slay the king. But as it became known that they were amoucos, the city gave the alarm, and the King sent his servants to slay them as they slew others. But they like desperate men played the devil (fazendo diaburias) before they were slain, and killed many people, with women and children. And five of them got together to a wood near the city, while they hunted a good while after, making robberies and doing much mischief, until the whole of them were killed.”—Correa, i. 364-5.

1566.—“The King of Cochín ... hath a great number of gentlemen which he calleth Amocchi, and some are called Nairi: these two sorts of men esteem not their lives anything, so that it may be for the honour of their King.”—M. Cesar Frederik in Purchas, ii. 1708. [See Logan, Man. Malabar, i. 138.]

1584.—“Their forces (in Cochín) consist in a kind of soldiers whom they call amochi, who are under obligation to die at the King’s pleasure, and all soldiers who in war lose their King or their general lie under this obligation. And of such the King makes use in urgent cases, sending them to die fighting.”—Letter of F. Sassetti to Francesco I., Gd. D. of Tuscany, in De Gueribusti, 154.

c. 1584.—“There are some also who are called Amochi . . . who being weary of living, set themselves in the way with a weapon in their hands, which they call a Critæ, and kill as many as they meet with, till somebody killeth them; and this they doe for the least anger they conceive, as desperate men.”—G. Balbi in Purchas, ii. 1724.

1602.—De Couto, speaking of the Java-nese: “They are chivalrous men, and of such determination that for whatever offence may be offered them they make themselves amoucos in order to get satisfaction thereof. And were a spear run up in the stomach of such an one he would still press forward without fear till he got at his foe.”—Dec. IV. iii. 1.

In another passage (ib. vii. 14) De Couto speaks of the amouco of Malabar just as Della Valla does below. In Dec. VI. p. 5 he describes how, on the death of the King of Pimenta, in action with the Portuguese, “nearly 4000 Nairs made themselves amoucos with the usual ceremonies, shaving their heads on one side, and swearing by their pagoda to avenge the King’s death.”

1604.—“Auiua hecho una junta de Amocos, con sus ceremonias para venir a morir adonde el Panical auiua sedo muerto.”—Guerrero, Relation, 91.

1611.—“Viceroy. What is the meaning of amoucos? Soldier. It means men who have made up their mind to die in killing as many as they can, as is done in the parts about Malaca by those whom they call amoucos in the language of the country.”—Couto, Diálogo do Soldado Prático, 2nd part, p. 9.—(Printed at Lisbon in 1790).

1615.—“Hos inter Narios genus est et ordo quem Amocas vocant quibus ob studium rei bellicaee præcipla laus tribuitur, et omnium habentur validissimi.”—Jarric, Thesaurus, i. 65.

1624.—“Though two kings may be at war, either enemy takes great heed not to kill the King of the opposite faction, nor yet to strike his umbrella, wherever it may go . . . for the whole kingdom of the slain or wounded king would be bound to avenge him with the complete destruction of the enemy, or all, if needful, to perish in the attempt. The greater the king’s dignity among these people, the longer period lasts this obligation to furious revenge . . . this period or method of revenge is termed Amoco, and so they say that the Amoco of the Samori lasts one day; the Amoco of the king of Cochin lasts a lifetime, and so of others.”—P. della Valte, ii. 745 [Hak. Soc., ii. 380 seq.].

1648.—“Derrière ces palissades s’estoit caché un coquin de Bantamois qui estoit revenu de la Meeque et jouoit à Moqua . . . il court par les rues et tue tous ceux qu’il rencontre . . .”—Tavernier, V. des Indes, lie. iii. ch. 24 [Ed. Balli, ii. 361 seq.].

1659.—“I saw in this month of February at Batavia the breasts torn with red-hot tongs off a black Indian by the executioner; and after this he was broken on the wheel from below upwards, This was because through the evil habit of eating opium (according to the godless custom of the Indians) he had become mad and raised the cry of Amoco (misp. for Amock) . . . in which mad state he had slain five persons . . . This was the third Amock-creyer whom I saw during that visit to Batavia (a few months) broken on the wheel for murder.”

1672.—“Every community (of the Malabar Christians), every church has its own Amouchi, which . . . are people who take an oath to protect with their own lives the persons and places put under their safeguard, from all and every harm.”—P. Vicenzo Maria, 145.

1673.—“If the Prince is slain the amouchi, who are numerous, would avenge him desperately. If he be injured they put on festive raiment, take leave of their parents, and with fire and sword in hand invade the hostile territory, burning every dwelling, and slaying man, woman, and child, sparing none, until they themselves fall.”—Ibid. 237-8.

1687.—“And they (the Mohammedans) are hardly restrained from running a muck (which is to kill whoever they meet, till they are slain themselves) especially if they have been at Hodge [Hodge] a Pilgrimage to Mecca.”—Fryer, 91.

1687.—Dryden assailing Burnet:—

“Prompt to assault, and careless of defence, Invulnerable in his impudence, He dares the World; and eager of a name, He thirsts about and justles into fame. Frontless and satire-proof, he scours the streets And runs an Indian Muck at all he meets.”—The Hind and the Panther, line 2477.

1689.—“Those that run these are called Amouki, and the doing of it Running a Muck.”—Ovington, 237.
1712.—"Amouco (Termo da India) val o mesmo que homem determinado e apostado que despreza a vida e não teme a morte."
—Bluette, s.v.

1727.—"I answered him that I could no longer bear their Insults, and, if I had not Permission in three Days, I would run a Muck (which is a mad Custom among the Mallayas when they become desperate)."—A. Hamilton, ii. 231.

1737.—"Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet To run a muck, and tilt at all I meet."
—Pope, Im. of Horace, B. ii. Sat. i. 69.

1768-71.—"These acts of indiscriminate murder are called by us mucks, because the perpetrators of them, during their frenzy, continually cry out amok, amok, which signifies kill, Etc...."—Stavorinus, i. 291.

1798.—At Bencoolen in this year (1798)—
"the Cour (d'Staining) afraid of an insurrection among the Bugresses.... invited several to the Fort, and when these had entered the Wicket was shut upon them; in attempting to disarm them, they mangedom, that is ran a muck; they drew their cresses, killed one or two Frenchmen, wounded others, and at last suffered themselves, for supporting this point of honour."—Forrest's Voyage to Mergui, 77.

1803.—"It is not to be controverted that these desperate acts of indiscriminate murder, called by us mucks, and by the natives amokam, do actually take place, and frequently too, in some parts of the east (in Java in particular)."—Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 239.

1849.—"We are determined to run a muck rather than suffer ourselves to be forced away by these Hollanders."—Mem. of a Malayan Family, 66.

1798.—"At Batavia, if an officer take one of these amoks, or mohawks, as they have been called by an easy corruption, his reward is very considerable; but if he kill them, nothing is added to his usual pay...."—Translator of Stavorinus, i. 294.

1803.—"We cannot help thinking, that one day or another, when they are more full of opium than usual, they (the Malays) will run a muck from Cape Comorin to the Caspian."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed., iii. 6.

1846.—"On the 8th July, 1846, Sunan, a respectable Malay house-builder in Penang, ran amok.... killed an old Hindu woman, a Kling, a Chinese boy, and a Kling girl about three years old.... and wounded two Hindus, three Klings, and two Chinese, of whom only two survived..... On the trial Sunan declared he did not know what he was about, and persisted in this at the place of execution.... The amok took place on the 8th, the trial on the 13th, and the execution on the 15th July,—all within 8 days."—J. Ind. Arch., vol. iii. 460-61.

1849.—"A man sitting quietly among his friends and relatives, will without provocation suddenly start up, weapon in hand, and slay all within his reach..... Next day when interrogated.... the answer has invariably been, "The Devil entered into me, my eyes were darkened, I did not know what I was about." I have received the same reply on at least 20 different occasions; on examination of these monomaniacs, I have generally found them labouring under some gastric disease, or troublesome ulcer..... The Bwig, whether from revenge or disease, are by far the most addicted to run amok. I should think three-fourths of all the cases I have seen have been by persons of this nation."—Dr. T. Oxley, in J. Ind. Arch., iii. 592.

1869.—"Macassar is the most celebrated place in the East for "running a muck.""

1870.—For a full account of many cases in India, see Chevers, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 781 seqq.

1873.—"They (the English).... craved governors who, not having bound themselves beforehand to 'run amuck,' may give the land some chance of repose."—Blackwood's Magazine, June, p. 759.

1875.—"On being struck the Malay at once stabbed Arshad with a kris; the blood of the people who had witnessed the deed was aroused, they ran amok, attacked Mr Birch, who was bathing in a floating bath close to the shore, stabbed and killed him."
—Sir W. D. Jervois to the E. of Carnarvon, Nov. 16, 1875.

1876.—"Twice over, while we were wending our way up the steep hill in Galata, it was our luck to see a Turk 'run a muck'.... nine times out of ten this frenzy is feigned, but not always, as for instance in the case where a priest took to running a-muck on an Austrian Lloyd's boat on the Black Sea, and after killing one or two passengers, and wounding others, was only stopped by repeated shots from the Captain's pistol."—Barkley, Five Years in Bulgaria, 240-41.

1877.—The Times of February 11th mentions a fatal muck run by a Spanish sailor, Manuel Alves, at the Sailors' Home, Liverpool; and the Overland Times of India (31st August) another run by a sepoy at Meerut.

1879.—"Running a muck does not seem to be confined to the Malays. At Ravena, on Monday, when the streets were full of people celebrating the festa of St John the Baptist, a maniac rushed out, snatched up a knife from a butcher's stall and fell upon everyone he came across.... before he was captured he wounded more or less seriously 11 persons, among whom was one little child."—Pal Mall Gazette, July 1.

9. "Captain Shaw mentioned.... that he had known as many as 40 people being injured by a single 'amok' runner. When the cry 'amok! amok!' is raised, people fly to the right and left for shelter, for after the blinded madman's kris has once 'drunk blood,' his fury becomes un gov-ernable, his sole desire is to kill; he strikes here and there; he stabs fugitives in the back, his kria drips blood, he rushes on yet more wildly, blood and murder in his course; there are shrieks and groans, his bloodshot eyes start from their sockets, his frenzy gives him unnatural strength; then all of a sudden he drops, shot through the heart, or from sudden exhaustion, clenching his bloody kria."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersovese, 356.

ANAConDA. s. This word for a great python, or boa, is of very obscure origin. It is now applied in scientific zoology as the specific name of a great S. American water-snake. Cuvier has "L'Anacondo (Boa seytale et murina, L.—Boa aquatica, Prince Max.)." (Règne Animal, 1829, ii. 78). Again, in the Official Report prepared by the Brazilian Government for the Philadelphia Exhibition of 1876, we find: "Of the genus Boa . . . we may mention the . . . sucuriou or sucurivuba (B. anaconda), whose skins are used for boots and shoes and other purposes." And as the subject was engaging our attention we read the following in the St James' Gazette of April 3, 1852:—"A very unpleasant account is given by a Brazilian paper, the Voc do Povo of Diamantino, of the proceedings of a huge water-snake called the sucurvyya, which is to be found in some of the rivers of Brazil. . . . A slave, with some companions, was fishing with a net in the river, when he was suddenly seized by a sucurvyua, who made an effort with his hinder coils to carry off at the same time another of the fishing party." We had naturally supposed the name to be S. American, and its S. American character was rather corroborated by our finding in Ramusio's version of Pietro Martire d'Angheria such S. American names as Anacauchoa and Anacaona. Serious doubt was however thrown on the American origin of the word when we found that Mr H. W. Bates entirely disbelieved it, and when we failed to trace the name in any older books about S. America.

In fact the oldest authority that we have met with, the famous John Ray, distinctly assigns the name, and the serpent to which the name properly belonged, to Ceylon. This occurs in his Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum et Serpentinæ Generis, Lond. 1693. In this he gives a Catalogue of Indian Serpents, which he had received from his friend Dr Tancred Robinson, and which the latter had noted in Museo Leydensi. No. 8 in this list runs as follows:—

The following passage from St Jerome, giving an etymology, right or wrong, of the word boa, which our naturalists now limit to certain great serpents of America, but which is often popularly applied to the pythons of E. Asia, shows a remarkable analogy to Ray's explanation of the name Anacœndaïæ:—

c. A.D. 385-400.—"Si quidem draco mirae magnitudinis, quos gentili sermone Boas vocant, ab eo quod tam grandes sint ut boves glutire solet, omnem latum vastabat provinciam, et non solum armentina et pecudes sed agricolas quoque et pastores tractus ad se vi spiritualis obserbabit."—In Vita Sct. Hilarionis Eremitae, Opera Sct. Eus. Hieron. Venetii, 1767, ii. col. 35. Ray adds that on this No. 8 should be read what D. Clegerus has said in the Ephem. German. An 12. obser. 7, entitled: De Serpente magno Indiciæ Orientalis Urobalum deglutiente. The serpent in question was 25 feet long. Ray quotes in abridgment the description of its treatment of the buffalo; how, if the resistance is great, the victim is dragged to a tree, and compressed against it; how the noise of the crushing bones is heard as far as a cannon; how the crushed carcass is covered with saliva, etc. It is added that the country people (apparently this is in Amboyana) regard this great serpent as most desirable food.

The following are extracts from Cleger's paper, which is more fully cited, Miscellanea Curiosa, sive Ephemeridum Medico-Physicalum Germaniæcarum Academiae Natura Curiosiorum, Dec. ii.—Annus Secundus, Anni MDCLXXXIII. Norimbergae. Anno MDCLXXXIV. pp. 18-20. It is illustrated by a formidable but inaccurate picture showing the serpent seizing an ox (not a buffalo) by the muzzle, with huge teeth. He tells how he dissected a great snake that he bought from a huntsman in which he found a whole stag of middle age, entire in skin and every part; and another which contained a wild goat with great horns, likewise quite entire; and a third which had swallowed a porcupine armed with all his "sagittiferis aculeis." In Amboyna a woman great with child had been swallowed by such a serpent.

"Quod si animal quoddam robustius renitatur, ut spiris anguis exsaevis non possit, serpens crebris cum animali convoluturos caudâ suâ proximam arborem in auxilium et robur corporis arripit eamque circumdat, quo eo fortius et valentius gyris suis animal comprimere, suffocare, et demum enecae possit . . . ."

"Factum est hoc modo, ut (quod ex fide dignissimis habeo) in Regno Aracan . . . talis vasti corporis anguis prope flumen quoddam, cum Uro-bubalo, sive sylvestri bubalo aut uro . . . immani spectaculo congrexi visus fuerit, eumque dicto modo occidit; quo conflictu et plus quam hostili amplexi fragor ossium in bubalo comminutorum ad distantiam tormenti bellici majoris . . . a spectatoribus sat eminus stantibus exaudiri potuit."

The natives said these great snakes had poisonous fangs. These Cleyer could not find, but he believes the teeth to be in some degree venomous, for a servant of his scratched his hand on one of them. It swelled, greatly inflamed, and produced fever and delirium:

"Nec prius cessabant symptomata, quam Serpentinus lapis (see SNAKE-STONE) quam Patres Jesuïtæ hie compont, vulneri adaptatus omne venenum extraheret, et ubique symptomata convenientibus antidotis essent profugata."

Again, in 1768, we find in the Scots Magazine, App. p. 673, but quoted from "London pap. Aug. 1768," and signed by R. Edwin, a professed eyewitness, a story with the following heading: "Description of the Anaconda, a monstrous species of serpent. In a letter from an English gentleman, many years resident in the Island of Ceylon in the East Indies . . . . The Ceylonese seem to know the creature well; they call it Anaconda, and talked of eating its flesh when they caught it." He describes its seizing and disposing of an enormous "tyger." The serpent darts on a "tyger" from a tree, attacking first with a bite, then partially crushing and dragging it to the tree . . . . "winding his body round both the tyger and the tree with all his violence, till the ribs and other bones began to give way . . . each giving a loud crack when it burst . . . the poor creature all this time was living, and at every loud crash of its bones gave a houl, not loud, yet piteous enough to pierce the cruelest heart."

Then the serpent drags away its victim, covers it with slaver, swallows it, etc. The whole thing is very cleverly told, but is evidently a romance founded on the description by "D. Cleyerus," which is quoted by Ray. There are no tigers in Ceylon. In fact, "R. Edwin" has developed the Romance of the Anaconda out of the description of D. Cleyerus, exactly as "Mynheer Försch" some years later developed the Romance of the Upas out of the older stories of the poison tree of Macassar. Indeed, when we find "Dr Andrew Cleyer" mentioned among the early relators of these latter stories, the suspicion becomes strong that both romances had the same author, and that "R. Edwin" was also the true author of the wonderful story told under the name of Foersch. (See further under UPAS.)

In Percival's Ceylon (1803) we read: "Before I arrived in the island I had heard many stories of a monstrous snake, so vast in size as to devour tigers and buffaloes, and so daring as even to attack the elephant" (p. 303). Also, in Pridham's Ceylon and its Dependencies (1849, ii. 750 - 51): "Pimbera or Anaconda is of the genus Python, Cuvier, and is known in English as the rock-snake." Emerson Tennent (Ceylon, 4th ed., 1860, i. 196) says: "The great python (the 'boa' as it is commonly designated by Europeans, the 'anaconda' of Eastern story) which is supposed to crush the bones of an elephant, and to swallow a tiger . . . . It may be suspected that the letter of "R. Edwin" was the foundation of all or most of the stories alluded to in these passages. Still we have the authority of Ray's friend that Anaconda, or rather Anacondaia, was at Leyden applied as a Ceylonese name to a specimen of this python. The only interpretation of this that we can offer is Tamil anai-kondra [anakkondda], "which killed an elephant": an appellative, but not a name. We have no authority for the application of this appellative to a snake, though the passages quoted from Percival, Pridham, and Tennent are all suggestive of such stories, and the interpretation of the name anaconda given to Ray: “Bubalorum . . . membra conterens,” is at least quite analogous as an appellative. It may be added that in Malay anakanda signifies “one that is well-born,” which does not help us. . . [Mr Skeat is unable to trace the word in Malay, and rejects the derivation from anakanda given above. A more plausible explanation is that given by Mr D. Ferguson (8 Ser. N. & Q. xii. 123), who derives anaconda from Singhalese Henakanday (hena, ‘lightning’; kanda, ‘stem, trunk,’) which is a name for the whip-snake (Passerita mycterizans), the name of the smaller reptile being by a blunder transferred to the greater. It is at least a curious coincidence that Ogilvy (1670) in his “Description of the African Isles” (p. 690), gives: “Anakandef, a sort of small snakes,” which is the Malagasy Anakandify (‘a snake.’)

ANANAS. 8. The Pine-apple (Ananassa sativa, Lindl.; Bromelia Ananas, L.), a native of the hot regions of Mexico and Panama. It abounded, as a cultivated plant, in Hispaniola and all the islands according to Oviedo. The Brazilian Nana, or perhaps Nanas, gave the Portuguese Ananas or Ananaz. This name has, we believe, accompanied the fruit whithersoever, except to England, it has travelled from its home in America. A pine was brought home to Charles V., as related by J. D’Acosta below. The plant is stated to have been first, in Europe, cultivated at Leyden about 1650 (?). In England it first fruited at Richard, in Sir M. Decker’s garden, in 1712.* But its diffusion in the East was early and rapid. To one who has seen the hundreds of acres covered with pine-apples on the islands adjoining Singapore, or their profusion in a seemingly wild state in the valleys of the Kasia country on the eastern borders of Bengal, it is hard to conceive of this fruit as introduced in modern times from another hemisphere. But, as in the case of tobacco, the name bewrayeth its true origin, whilst the large natural family of plants to which it belongs is exclusively American. The names given by Oviedo, probably those of Hispaniola, are Taiana as a general name, and Boniana and Aiagua for two species. Pine-apples used to cost a pardao (a coin difficult to determine the value of in those days) when first introduced in Malabar, says Linschoten, but “now there are so many grown in the country, that they are good cheape” (91); [Hak. Soc. ii. 19]. Athanasius Kircher, in the middle of the 17th century, speaks of the ananas as produced in great abundance in the Chinese provinces of Canton, Kiangsu and Fuhkien. In Ibn Muhammad Wali’s H. of the Conquest of Assam, written in 1662, the pine-apples of that region are commended for size and flavour. In the last years of the preceding century Carletti (1599) already commends the excellent ananas of Malacca. But even some 20 or 30 years earlier the fruit was grown profusely in W. India, as we learn from Chr. d’Acosta (1578). And we know from the Ein that (about 1590) the ananas was habitually served at the table of Akbar, the price of one being reckoned at only 4 dams, or 4 of a rupee; whilst Akbar’s son Jahangir states that the fruit came from the sea-ports in the possession of the Portuguese.—(See Ein, i. 66-68.)

In Africa too, this royal fruit has spread, carrying the American name along with it. “The Mananazi† or pine-apple,” says Burton, “grows luxuriantly as far as 3 marches from the coast (of Zanzibar). It is never cultivated, nor have its qualities as a fibrous plant been discovered.” (J.R.G.S. xxix. 35). On the Ile Ste Marie, of Madagascar, it grew in the first half of the 17th century as mananze (Flacourt, 29).

Abul Fazl, in the Ein, mentions that the fruit was also called kathal-i-safarī, or ‘travel jack-fruit,’ “because young plants put into a vessel may be taken on travels and will yield fruits.” This seems a nonsensical pretext for the name, especially as another American fruit, the Guava, is sometimes known in Bengal as the Safarī-dīm, or 'travel mango.' It has been suggested by one of the present writers that these cases may present an uncommon use of the word safarī in the sense of 'foreign' or 'outlandish,' just as Clusius says of the pine-apple in India, "peregrinus est hic fructus," and as we begin this article by speaking of the ananas as having 'travelled' from its home in S. America. In the Tesoro of Cobarruvias (1611) we find "Çafarī, cosa de Africa o Argel, como grenada" ('a thing from Africa or Algiers, such as a pomegranate'). And on turning to Dorsey and Eng. we find that in Saracenic Spain a renowned kind of pomegranate was called rommān safarī: though this was said to have its name from a certain Safar ibn-Obaid al Kilaī, who grew it first. One doubts here, and suspects some connection with the Indian terms, though the link is obscure. The lamented Prof. Blochmann, however, in a note on this suggestion, would not admit the possibility of the use of safarī for 'foreign.' He called attention to the possible analogy of the Ar. safarjal for 'quince.' (Another suggestion may be hazarded. There is an Ar. word, ḍasfīry, which the dicta. define as 'a kind of olive.' Burton (Ar. Nights, iii. 79) translates this as 'sparrow-olives,' and says that they are so called because they attract sparrows (ḍasfir). It is perhaps possible that this name for a variety of olive may have been transferred to the pine-apple, and on reaching India, have been connected by a folk etymology with safarī applied to a 'travelled' fruit.) In Macassar, according to Crawfurd, the ananas is called Pandun, from its strong external resemblance, as regards fruit and leaves, to the Pandanus. Conversely we have called the latter screw-pine, from its resemblance to the ananas, or perhaps to the pine-cone, the original owner of the name. Acosta again (1578) describes the Pandanus odoratusissima as the 'wild ananas,' and in Malayalam the pine-apple is called by a name meaning 'pandanus-jackfruit.'

* The English Cyclop. states on the authority of the Sloane MSS. that the pine was brought into England by the Earl of Portland, in 1690. [See Encyl. Brit., 9th ed., xix. 106.]

The term ananas has been Arabized, among the Indian pharmacists at least, as 'ain-un-nās 'the eye of man'; in Burmese nan-na-sī, and in Singhalese and Tamil as annāsi (see Mooden Sheriff).

We should recall attention to the fact that pine-apple was good English long before the discovery of America, its proper meaning being what we have now been driven (for the avoiding of confusion) to call a pine-cone. This is the only meaning of the term 'pine-apple' in Minshew's Guide into Tongues (2nd ed. 1627). And the ananas got this name from its strong resemblance to a pine-cone. This is most striking as regards the large cones of the Stone-Pine of S. Europe. In the following three first quotations 'pine-apple' is used in the old sense:

1563.—"To all such as die so, the people erectceth a chappell, and to each of them a pillar and pole made of Pine-apple for a perpetuall monument."—Reports of Japan, in Hakl. ii. 567.

1577.—"In these islands they found no trees knownen unto them, but Pine-apple trees, and Date trees, and those of maruweis heigith, and exceeding hard."—Peter Martyr, in Eden's H. of Travoyle, fol. 11.

Oviedo, in H. of the (Western) Indies, fills 2½ folio pages with an enthusiastic description of the pine-apple as first found in Hispaniola, and of the reason why it got this name (pina in Spanish, pigna in Ramusio's Italian, from which we quote). We extract a few fragments.

1535.—"There are in this isle of Spagnolo certain thistles, each of which bears a Pigna, and this is one of the most beautiful fruits that I have seen. . . . It has all these qualities in combination, viz. beauty of aspect, fragrance of colour, and exquisite flavour. The Christians gave it the name it bears (Pigna) because it is, in a manner, like that. But the pine-apples of the Indies of which we are speaking are much more beautiful than the pigna [i.e. pine-cones] of Europe, and have nothing of that hardiness which is seen in those of Castile, which are in fact nothing but wood," &c.—Ramusio, iii. f. 135 v.

1564.—"Their pines be of the bigness of two fists, the outside whereof is of the making of a pine-apple [i.e. pine-cone], but it is softe like the rinde of a cucumber, and the inside eateh like an apple, but it is more delicious than any sweet apple sugared."—Master John Hawkins, in Hakl. iii. 602.

1590.—"... The Pines, or Pine-apples, are of the same fashion and forme outwards to those of Castille, but within they wholly differ. ... One presented one of these Pine-apples to the Empourer Charles the fift, which must have cost much pane and care to bring it so farre, with the plant from the Indies, yet would he not trie the taste."—Jos. de Acosta, E. T. of 1604 (Hak. Soc.), 236-7.

1595.—"... with divers sorte of excellent fruits and rootes, and great abundance of Pines, the prinsesse of fruits that grow under the Sun."—Raleigh, Disc. of Guinea (Hak. Soc.), 73.

c. 1610.—"Ananats, et plusieurs autres fruits..."—P. de Laval, i. 293 [Hak. Soc. i. 328].

1616.—"The ananas or Pine, which seems to the taste to be a pleasing compound, made of strawberres, claret-wine, rose-water, and sugar, well tempered together."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1469.

1623.—"The ananats is esteemed, and with reason, for it is of excellent flavour, though very peculiar, and rather acid than otherwise, but having an indescribible dash of sweetness that renders it agreeable. And as even these books (Chusius, &c.) don't mention it, if I remember rightly, I will say in brief that when you regard the entire fruit externally, it looks just like one of our pine-cones (pinus), with just such scales and of that very colour."—P. della Valle, ii. 582 [Hak. Soc., i. 135].

1631.—Bontius thus writes of the fruit:—
"Qui legitis Cynaros, atque Indica dulcia fraga, Ne nimi haece comedas, fugito hinc, laetet anguis in herbâ."—Lib. vi. cap. 50, p. 145.

1661.—"I first saw the famous Queen Pine brought from Barbados and presented to his Majestie; but the first that were ever seen in England were those sent to Cromwell House four yeares since."—Evelyn's Diary, July 19.

c. 1665.—"Among other fruits, they preserve large citrons, such as we have in Europe, a certain delicate root about the length of sarsaparilla, that common fruit of the Indies called ambu, another called ananas ... "—Bernier (ed. Constable), 438.

1667.—"Je peux à très-juste titre appeller l'Ananas le Roy des fruits, parcequ'il est le plus beau, et le meilleur de tous ceux qui sont sur la terre. C'est sans doute pour cette raison le Roy des Roys luy a mis une couronne sur la teste, qui est comme une marque essentielle de sa Royauté, puis qu'à la cheute du pere, il produit un jeune Roy qui luy succede en toutes ses admirables qualitez."—P. Du Testre, Hist. Gén. des Antilles Habitées par les François, ii. 127.

1688.—"Standing by his Majesty at dinner in the Presence, there was of that rare fruit call'd the King-pine, grown in the Barbadoes and the West indies, the first of them I have ever seen. His Majesty having cut it up was pleas'd to give me a piece off his owne plate to taste of, but in my opinion it falls short of those ravishing varieties of deliciousness describ'd in Capt. Ligon's history and others."—Evelyn, July 19.

1673.—"... The fruit the English call Pine-Apple (the Moors Ananas) because of the Resemblance."—Fryer, 182.

1716.—"I had more reason to wonder that night at the King's table " (at Hanover) "to see a present from a gentleman of this country ... what I thought, worth all the rest, two ripe Ananasses, which to my taste are a fruit perfectly delicious. You know they are naturally the growth of the Brazil, and I could not imagine how they came here but by enchantment."—Lady M. W. Montagu, Letter XIX.

1727.—"... Oft in humble station dwells Unboastful worth, above fastidious pomp;
Witness, thou best Anana, thou the pride
Of vegetable life, beyond whate'er
The poets imgaged in the golden age."—Thomson, Summer.

The poet here gives the word an unusual form and accent.

1730.—"... They (the Portuguese) cultivate the skirts of the hills, and grow the best products, such as sugar-cane, pine-apples, and rice."—Khâfî Khân, in Elliot, vii. 345.

A curious question has been raised regarding the ananas, similar to that discussed under Custard-Apple, as in the existence of the pineapple to the Old World, before the days of Columbus.

In Prof. Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies (i. 578), it is stated in reference to ancient Assyria: "Fruits... were highly prized; amongst those of most repute were pomegranates, grapes, citrons, and apparently pine-apples." A foot-note adds: "The representation is so exact that I can hardly doubt the pine-apple being intended. Mr Layard expresses himself on this point with some hesitation (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 338)." The cut given is something like the conventional figure of a pine-apple, though it seems to us by no means very exact as such. Again, in Winter Jones's tr. of Conti (c. 1430) in India in the 15th Century, the traveller, speaking of a place called Panconia (read
Pauconia apparently Pegu is made to say: "they have pine-apples, oranges, chestnuts, melons, but small and green, white sandal-wood and camphor."²

We cannot believe that in either place the object intended was the Ananas, which has carried that American name with it round the world. Whatever the Assyrian representation was intended for, Conti seems to have stated, in the words pinus habent (as it runs in Poggio's Latin) merely that they had pine-trees. We do not understand on what ground the translator introduced pine-apples. If indeed any fruit was meant, it might have been that of the screw-pine, which though not eaten might perhaps have been seen in the bazaars of Pegu, as it is used for some economical purposes. But pinus does not mean a fruit at all. 'Pine-cones' even would have been expressed by pinaus or the like. [A reference to Mr L. W. King was thus answered: "The identity of the tree with the date-palm is, I believe, acknowledged by all naturalists who have studied the trees on the Assyrian monuments, and the 'cones' held by the winged figures have obviously some connection with the trees. I think it was Prof. Tylor of Oxford (see Academy, June 8, 1886, p. 283) who first identified the ceremony with the fertilization of the palm, and there is much to be said for his suggestion. The date-palm was of very great use to the Babyloniens and Assyrians, for it furnished them with food, drink, and building materials, and this fact would explain the frequent repetition on the Assyrian monuments of the ceremony of fertilisation. On the other hand, there is no evidence, so far as I know, that the pine-apple was extensively grown in Assyria."³ Also see Maspero, Dawn of Cœ, 556 seq.; on the use of the pinecone in Greece, Fraser, Pausanias, ill. 65.]

A small island off the W. coast of India, a little S. of Carwar, which is the subject of frequent and interesting mention in the early narratives. The name is interpreted by Malayalím as anjju-diva, 'Five Islands,' and if this is correct belongs to the whole group. This may, however, be only an endeavour to interpret an old name, which is perhaps traceable in Ἀρχιδίβα Νῦος of Ptolemy. It is a remarkable example of the slovenliness of English professional map-making that Keith Johnston's Royal Atlas map of India contains no indication of this famous island. [The Times Atlas and Constable's Hand Atlas also ignore it.] It has, between land surveys and sea-charts, been omitted altogether by the compilers. But it is plain enough in the Admiralty charts; and the way Mr Birch speaks of it in his translation of Alboquerque as an "Indian seaport, no longer marked on the maps," is odd (ii. 168).

c. 1345.—Ibn Batuta gives no name, but Anjediva is certainly the island of which he thus speaks: "We left behind us the island (of Sindibâdur or Goa), passing close to it, and cast anchor by a small island near the mainland, where there was a temple, with a grove and a reservoir of water. When we had landed on this little island we found there a Jogi leaning against the wall of a Buddhânah or house of Idols."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 63.

The like may be said of the Roteiro of V. da Gama's voyage, which likewise gives no name, but describes in wonderful correspondence with Ibn Batuta; as does Correa, even to the Jogi, still there after 150 years!

c. 1498.—"So the Captain-Major ordered Nicolas Coello to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was; and he found in the same island a building, a church of great ashar-work, which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found, just beyond the church, a tank of wrought ashar, in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tank of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship."—Roteiro, 95.

c. 1510.—"I quitted this place, and went to another island which is called Anazediva... There is an excellent port between the island and the mainland, and very good water is found in the said island."—Vortemina, 120.

c. 1552.—"Dom Francisco de Almeida arriving at the Island of Anchediva, the first thing he did was to send João Homem with letters to the factors of Cananor, Cochin, and Coulão..."—Barros, i. viii. 9.

c. 1561.—"They went and put in at Angediva, where they enjoyed themselves much; there were good water springs, and there was in the upper part of the island a tank ANDOR.

ANDAMAN, n.p. The name of a group of islands in the Bay of Bengal, inhabited by tribes of a negrito race, and now partially occupied as a convict settlement under the Government of India. The name (though perhaps obscurely indicated by Piolemy—see H. Y. in P.R.G.S. 1881, p. 665) first appears distinctly in the Ar. narratives of the 9th century. [The Ar. dual form is said to be from Agamita, the Malay name of the aborigines.] The persistent charge of cannibalism seems to have been unfounded. [See E. H. Man, On the Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands, Intro. xiii. 45.]

A.D. 861.—"Beyond are two islands divided by a sea called ANDAMAN. The natives of those isles devour men alive; their hue is black, their hair woolly; their countenance and eyes have something frightful in them . . . . they go naked, and have no boats. . . ."—Relation des Voyages, &c. par Reinou, i. 8.

c. 1050.—These islands are mentioned in the great Tanjore temple-inscription (11th cent.) as Tumattiva, 'Islands of Impurity,' inhabited by cannibals.

c. 1292.—"Angamanain is a very large Island. The people are without a King and are idolaters, and are no better than wild beasts . . . . they are a most cruel generation, and eat everybody that they can catch if not of their own race."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. c. 13.

c. 1430.—". . . leaving on his right hand an island called ANDAMANIA, which means the island of Gold, the circumference of which is 800 miles. The inhabitants are cannibals. No travellers touch here unless driven to do so by bad weather, for when taken they are torn to pieces and devoured by these cruel savages."—Conti, in India in XV. Cent., 6.

c. 1566.—"Da Nicobar sinò a Pegu è una catena d'Isole infinite, delle quali molte sono abitate da gengite selvagge, e chiamamoli ISOLE D'ANDEMAN . . . . e se per disgrazia si perde in queste Isole qualche naume, come già se n'ha perso, non ne scampa alcuno, che tutti gli amazzano, e mangiano."—Cesare de' Federici, in Ravusio, iii. 391.

1727.—"The Islands opposite the Coast of Tanacerin are the ANDEMANS. They lie about 80 leagues off, and are surrounded by many dangerous Banks and Rocks; they are all inhabited with Canibals, who are so fearless that they will swim off to a Boat if she approach near the shore, and attack her with their wooden Weapons . . . ."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65.

ANDOR, s. Port. 'a litter,' and used in the old Port, writers for a palankin. It was evidently a kind of Muncheel or Dandy, i.e. a slung hammock rather than a palankin. But still, as so often is the case, comes in another word to create perplexity. For andas is, in Port., a bier or a litter, appearing in Bluteau as a genuine Port. word, and the use of which by the writer of the Roteiro quoted below shows that it is so indeed. And in defining Andor the same lexicographer says: "A portable vehicle in India, in those regions where they do not use beasts, as in Malabar and elsewhere. It is a kind of contrivance like an uncovered Andas, which men bear on their shoulders, &c. . . . Among us Andor is a machine with four arms in which images or reliques of the saints are borne in processions." This last term is not, as we had imagined an old Port. word. It is Indian, in fact Sanskrit, hindola, 'a swing, a swinging cradle or hammock,' whence also Mahr. hindolä, and H. hindolkä or handolä. It occurs, as will be seen, in the old Ar. work about Indian wonders, published by MM. Van der Lith and Marcel Devic. [To this Mr Skeat adds that in Malay andor means 'a buffalo-sledge for carting rice,' &c. It would appear to be the same as the Port. word, though it is hard to say which is the original.]

1013.—"Le même m'a conté qu'à Sérendib, les rois et ceux qui se comportent à la façon des rois, se font porter dans le handoul (handâl) qui est semblable à une litière, soutenu sur les épaules de quelques piétons."—Kitâb 'Ajâ'ib al Hind, p. 118.

matrass of the same size, and this all made of silk-stuff wrought with gold-thread, and with many decorations and fringes and tassels; whilst the ends of the cane are mounted with silver, all very gorgeous, and rich, like the lords who travel so. — Correa, i. 102.

[1574. — See quotation under PUNDIT.] 1623. — Della Valle describes three kinds of shoulder-borne vehicles in use at Goa: (1) reti or nets, which were evidently the simple hammock, muncheel or dandy; (2) the andor; and (3) the palankin. And these two, the palankins and the andors, also differ from one another, for in the andor the cane which sustains it is, as it is in the reti, straight; whereas in the palankin, for the greater convenience of the inmate, and to give more room for raising his head, the cane is arched upward like this, ί. For this purpose the canes are bent when they are small and tender. And those vehicles are the most commodious and honourable that have the curved canes, for such canes, of good quality and strength to bear the weight, are not numerous; so they sell for 100 or 120 pardaos each, or about 60 of our scudi." — P. della Valle, ii. 610.

c. 1760. — "Of the same nature as palankeens, but of a different name, are what they call andolas . . . these are much cheaper, and less esteemed." — Gross, i. 153.

ANDRUM, s. Malayal. andreem. The form of hydrocele common in S. India. It was first described by Kaempfer, in his Decas, Leyden, 1694. (See also his Aemoenitates Exoticae, Fascic. iii. pp. 557 seqq.)

ANGELY-WOOD, s. Tam. angili, or anjali-maram; artocarpus hirsuta Lam. [in Malabar also known as Lyne (ayint) (Logan, i. 39)]. A wood of great value on the W. Coast, for shipbuilding, house-building, &c.

c. 1550. — "In the most eminent parts of it (Siam) are thick Forests of Angelin wood, whereof thousands of ships might be made." — Pinto, in Cogan, p. 285; see also p. 64.

1598. — "There are in India other wonderfull and thicke trees, whereof Shippes are made: there are trees by Cochini, that are called Angelina, whereof certaine scents or skiffes called Tones [Doney] are made . . . it is so strong and hard a woode that Iron in tract of time would bee consumed thereby by reason of the hardness of the woode." — Linschoten, ch. 58 [Hak. Soc. ii. 56].

1644. — "Another thing which this province of Mallavar produces, in abundance and of excellent quality, is timber, particularly that called Angelin, which is most durable, lasting many years, insomuch that even if you desire to build a great number of ships, or vessels of any kind . . . you may make them all in a year." — D'Ancon, MS. f. 315.

ANGENGO, n.p. A place on the Travancore coast, the site of an old English Factory; properly said to be Anju-lengu, Anichutenni, Malayal; the trivial meaning of which would be "five cocoa-nuts." This name gives rise to the marvellous rhapsody of the once famous Abbé Raynal, regarding "Sterne's Eliza," of which we quote below a few sentences from the 3½ pages of close print which it fills.

1711. — . . . Anjengo is a small Fort belonging to the English East India Company. There are about 40 Soldiers to defend it . . . most of whom are Topazes, or mungrel Portuguese." — Lockyer, 199.

1782. — "Territoire d'Anjengia; tu n'es rien; mais tu as donne naissance a Eliza. Un jour, ces entrepots . . . ne subsisteront plus . . . mais si mes écrits ont quelque duree, le nom d'Anjengia restera dans le memoire des hommes . . . Anjengia, c'est l'influence de ton heureux climat qu'elle devoit, sans doute, cet accord presqu'incompatible de volup'té et de decence qui accompagnoit tout sa personne, et qui se meloto a tous ses mouvements, &c., &c." — Hist. Philosophique des Dern Indes, ii. 72-73.

ANICUT, s. Used in the irrigation of the Madras Presidency for the dam constructed across a river to fill and regulate the supply of the channels drawn off from it; the cardinal work in fact of the great irrigation systems. The word, which has of late years become familiar all over India, is the Tam. comp. ani-katty, 'Dam-building.'

1776. — "Sir — We have received your letter of the 24th. If the Rajah pleases to go to the Anacut, to see the repair of the bank, we can have no objection, but it will not be ANNA, s. Properly H. āna, ānah, the 16th part of a rupee. The term belongs to the Mohammedan monetary system (RUPEE). There is no coin of one anna only, so that it is a money of account only. The term anna is used in denoting a corresponding fraction of any kind of property, and especially in regard to coparcenary.

ANILE, NEEL. s. An old name for indigo, borrowed from the Port. anil. They got it from the Ar. al-nil, pron. an-nil; nil again being the common name of indigo in India, from the Skt. nīla, 'blue.' The vernacular (in this instance Bengali) word appears in the title of a native satirical drama Nil-Durpan, 'The Mirror of Indigo (planting),' famous in Calcutta in 1861, in connection with a cause célèbre, and with a sentence which credited the now extinct Supreme Court of Calcutta in a manner unknown since the days of Impey.

"Nīl-walla" is a phrase for an Indigo-planter [and his Factory is "Nīl-kothē"].

1501.—Amerigo Vespucci, in his letter from the Id. of Cape Verde to Lorenzo di Piero Francesco de' Medici, reporting his meeting with the Portuguese Fleet from India, mentions among other things brought "anib and tuzia," the former a manifest transcript's error for anil.—In Baldelli Boni, "Il Milione," p. lvi.

1516.—In Barbosa's price list of Malabar we have:

"Anil nadador (i.e. floating; see Garcia below) very good, per jarrazo ... jaranas 30.
Anil loaded, with much sand, per jarrazo ... fansas 18 to 20."
In Lisbon Collection, ii. 393.

1552.—"A load of anyil in cakes which weighs 3½ maunds, 353 tangas."—Lembrança, 52.
shares in land, or shares in a speculation. Thus a one-anna share is 1/12 of such right, or a share of 1/12 in the speculation; a four-anna is 1/5, and so on. In some parts of India the term is used as subdivision (1/12) of the current land measure. Thus, in Saugor, the anna = 16 rāsīs, and is itself 1/12 of a kancha (Elliot, Gloss. s.v.). The term is also sometimes applied colloquially to persons of mixt parentage. 'Such a one has at least 2 annas of dark blood, or 'coffee-colour.' This may be compared with the Scotch expression that a person of deficient intellect 'wants twopenny in the shilling.'

1708.—"Provided ... that a debt due from Sir Edward Littleton ... of 80,407 Rupees and Eight Annas Money of Bengal, with Interest and Damages to the said English Company shall still remain to them. ..."—Earl of Godolphin's Award between the Old and the New E. I. Co., in Charters, &c., p. 558.

1727.—"The current money in Surat:
Bitter Almonds go 52 to a Piece:
  1 Annos is ... 4 Pice.
  1 Rupee ... 16 Annos.
* * * * * * * * *
In Bengal their Accounts are kept in Piece:
  12 to an Annos.
  16 Annos to a Rupee."

ANT, WHITE, s. The insect (Termes bellicosus of naturalists) not properly an ant, of whose destructive powers there are in India so many disagreeable experiences, and so many marvellous stories. The phrase was perhaps taken up by the English from the Port. formīgas branchas, which is in Bluteau's Dict. (1713, iv. 175). But indeed exactly the same expression is used in the 14th century by our medieval authority. It is, we believe, a fact that these insects have been established at Rochelle in France, for a long period, and more recently at St. Helena. They exist also at the Convent of Mt. Sinai, and a species in Queensland.

A.D. c. 250.—It seems probable that Aelian speaks of White Ants.—"But the Indian ants construct a kind of heaped-up dwellings, and these not in depressed or flat positions easily liable to be flooded, but in lofty and elevated positions. ..."—De Nat. Animal. xvi. cap. 15.

c. 1328.—"Est etiam unum genus parvisiinarum formiinarum sicut lana albarum, quorum duritis dentium tanta est quod etiam ligna rodunt et venas lapidum; et quotquot breviter inveniunt suisurum terram, et annos lanaces, et bombycinos laminant; et faciunt ad medium muri crustam unam de arenæ minutissimæ, ita quod sol non possit eam tangere; et sic remanent coeperatae; verum est quod si contingat illam crustam frangi, et solen eas tangere, quam citius moriuntur.—Fr. Jordanus, p. 53.

1679.—"But there is yet a far greater inconvenience in this Country, which proceeds from the infinite number of white Emmets, which though they are but little, have teeth so sharp, that they will eat down a wooden Post in a short time. And if great care be not taken in the places where you lock up your Bales of Silk, in four and twenty hours they will eat through a Bale, as if it had been saw'd in two in the middle."
—Tavernier's Tunquin, E. T., p. 11.

1688.—"Here are also abundance of Ants of several sorts, and Wood-lice, called by the English in the East Indies, White Ants."
—Dampier, ii. 127.

1713.—"On voit encore des fourmis de plusieurs espèces; la plus pernicieuse est celle que les Européens ont nommé fourmi blanche."
—Lettres Edifiantes, xii. 98.

1727.—"He then began to form Projects how to clear Accounts with his Master's Creditors, without putting anything in their Pockets. The first was on 500 chests of Japan Copper ... and they were brought into Account of Profit and Loss, for so much eaten up by the White Ants."—A. Hamilton, ii. 169.

1751.—"... concerning the Organ, we sent for the Revd. Mr. Bellamy, who declared that when Mr. Frankland applied to him for it that he told him that it was not in his power to give it, but wished it was removed from thence, as Mr. Pearson informed him it was eaten up by the White Ants."—Pt. Will. Cons., Aug. 12. In Long, 25.

1789.—"The White Ant is an insect greatly dreaded in every house; and this is not to be wondered at, as the devastation it occasions is almost incredible."—Munro, Narrative, 31.

1876.—"The metal cases of his baggage are disagreeably suggestive of White Ants, and such omnivorous vermin."—Sat. Review, No. 1057, p. 6.

APIL, s. Transfer of Eng. 'Appeal'; in general native use, in connection with our Courts.

1872.—"There is no Sind, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Raśed' (receipt) [Rased] and 'Apil' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 283.

APOLLO BUNDER, n.p. A well-known wharf at Bombay. A street near it is called Apollo Street, and a gate of the Port leading to it 'the Apollo Gate.' The name is said to be a corruption, and probably is so, but of what it is a corruption is not clear. The quotations given afford different suggestions, and Dr Wilson's dictum is entitled to respect, though we do not know what pālawa here means. Sir G. Birdwood writes that it used to be said in Bombay, that Apollo-bander was a corr. of pālawa-bandar, because the pier was the place where the boats used to land pālawa fish. But we know of no fish so called; it is however possible that the pālu or Sable-fish (Hilsa) is meant, which is so called in Bombay, as well as in Sind. [The Ain (ii. 338) speaks of "a kind of fish called pulwah which comes up into the Indus from the sea, unrivalled for its fine and exquisite flavour," which is the Hilsa.] On the other hand we may observe that there was at Calcutta in 1748 a frequented tavern called the Apollo (see Long, p. 11). And it is not impossible that a house of the same name may have given its title to the Bombay street and wharf. But Sir Michael Westropp's quotation below shows that Pallo was at least the native representation of the name more than 150 years ago. We may add that a native told Mr W. G. Pedder, of the Bombay C.S., from whom we have it, that the name was due to the site having been the place where the "pola" cake, eaten at the Holi festival, was baked. And so we leave the matter.

[1823.—"Lieut. Mudge had a tent on Apollo-green for astronomical observations.*"
---Queen, Narrative, i. 327.]

1847.—"A little after sunset, on 2nd Jan. 1843, I left my domicile in Ambrolie, and drove to the Pālawa bandar, which receives from our accommodative country, the more classical name of Apollo pier."

1860.—"And atte what place ye Knyghte came to Londe, theyre ye holle .. worschyppen II Idoles in cheefe. Ye fyreste is Apollo, wherefore ye cheefe londyng place of theyr Metropole is hyght Apollo-Bundar .. ."—Ext. from a MS. of Sir John Mandeville, lately discovered. (A friend here queries: 'By Mr. Shapira?')

1877.—"This bunder is of comparatively recent date. Its name 'Apollo' is an English corruption of the native word Pillow (fish), and it was probably not extended and brought into use for passenger traffic till about the year 1819. .. ."
---Maclean, Guide to Bombay, 167. The last work adds a note: "Sir Michael Westropp gives a different derivation. .. .: Polo, a corruption of Pālwa, derived from Pāl, which inter alia means a fighting vessel, by which kind of craft the locality was probably frequented. From Pālwa or Pālwar, the bunder now called Apollo is supposed to take its name. In the memorial of a grant of land, dated 5th Dec., 1743, the pālīkā in question is called Pollo."—High Court Reports, iv. pt. 3.

APRICOT, s. Prunus Armeniaca, L. This English word is of curious origin, as Dozy expounds it. The Romans called it Malum Armeniacum, and also (Pericicum?) prroxox, or 'early.' Of this the Greeks made πρωτόκκοκια, &c., and the Arab conquerors of Byzantine provinces took this up as birkōk and barkōk, with the article al-barkōk, whence Sp. albarcoque, Port. albrique, alboquero, Ital. albercoca, albicucca, Prov. ambritic, ambricôt, Fr. abricot, Dutch abricock, abrikoos, Eng. apricot, apricot. Dozy mentions that Dodonaeus, an old Dutch writer on plants, gives the vernacular name as Vroge Persen, 'Early Peaches,' which illustrates the origin. In the Cyprus lazars, apricots are sold as χρυσιβάζα; but the less poetical name of kill-johns is given by sailors to the small hard kinds common to St. Helena, the Cape, China, &c. Zard alā [aloo] (Pers.) 'yellow-plum' is the common name in India.

1615.—"I received a letter from Jorge Durois .. . with a basket of apricockes for my selfe .. ."—Cook's Diary, i. 7.

1711.—"Apricocks—the Persians call Kill Franks, because Europeans not knowing the Danger are often hurt by them."—Lockyer, p. 231.

ARAB, s. This, it may be said, in Anglo-Indian always means 'an Arab horse.'

c. 1590.—"There are fine horses bred in every part of the country; but those of Cachh excel, being equal to Arabs."—Avin, i. 133.

1825.—"Arabs are excessively scarce and dear; and one which was sent for me to look at, at a price of 800 rupees, was a skittish, cat-legged thing."—Heber, i. 189 (ed. 1844).

c. 1844.—A local magistrate at Simla had returned from an unsuccessful investigation. An acquaintance hailed him next day: 'So I hear you came back re infectâ! 'No such Arab!' was the reply: 'I came back on my grey Arab!'

1856.—"... the true blood-royal of his race, The silver Arab with his purple veins Translucent, and his nostrils caverned wide, And flaming eye. ..."—The Banyan Tree.

ARAKAN, ARRACAN, n.p. This is an European form, perhaps through Malay [which Mr Skeat has failed to trace], of Rakhaing, the name which the natives give themselves. This is believed by Sir Arthur Phayre [see Journ. As. Soc. Ben. xii. 24 seqq.] to be a corruption of the Skt. râk-hâsa, Pali rakkhâsa, i.e. 'ogre' or the like, a word applied by the early Buddhists to unconverted tribes with whom they came in contact. It is not impossible that the 'Arpyph of Ptolemy, which unquestionably represents Arakan, may disguise the name by which the country is still known to foreigners; at least no trace of the name as 'Silver-land' in old Indian Geography has yet been found.

We may notice, without laying any stress upon it, that in Mr. Beal's account of early Chinese pilgrims to India, there twice occurs mention of an Indo-Chinese kingdom called O-li-ki-la, which transliterates fairly into some name like Arpyph, and not into any other yet recognisable (see J.R.A.S. (N.S.) xiii. 560, 562).

1624.—"And therewith they mix a little ashes of sea-shells and some small pieces of an Indian nut sufficiently common, which they here call Fonfál, and in other places Araca; a very dry fruit, seeming within like perfect wood; and being of an astrigent nature they hold it good to strengthen the Teeth."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 36.

Mr Grey says: "As to the Port. name, Fonfal or Fonfel, the origin is uncertain. In Sir J. Manndevelle's Travels it is said that black pepper 'is called Fufal,' which is probably the same word as "Fonfel." But the Ar. Fawfal or Fufal is 'betel-nut.']

1689.—". . . the nerí which is drawn from the Arequies Tree in a fresh earthen vessel, is as sweet and pleasant as Milk."—Ovington, 297. [Neri=H. and Mahr. नरी, 'sap,' but nerí is, we are told, Guzerati for teddy in some form.]

ARGEMONE MEXICANA. This American weed (N.O. Papawveraceae) is notable as having overrun India, in every part of which it seems to be familiar. It is known by a variety of names, Firimghi dhätāra, gamboge thistle, &c. [See Watt, Dict. Econ. Prod., i. 306 seqq.]
ARGUS PHEASANT, s. This name, which seems more properly to belong to the splendid bird of the Malay Peninsula (Argusianus giganteus, Tem., Pavo argus, Lin.), is confusingly applied in Upper India to the Himalayan horned pheasant Ceriornis (Spp. satyra, and melanoleucina) from the round white eyes or spots which mark a great part of the bird’s plumage. — See remark under MOONAU.

ARRACK, RACK, s. This word is the Ar. 'arâk, properly 'perspiration,' and then, first the exudation or sap drawn from the date palm (arâk al-tamar); secondly any strong drink, ‘distilled spirit,’ ‘essence,’ etc. But it has spread to very remote corners of Asia. Thus it is used in the forms arîki and arki in Mongolia and Manchuria, for spirit distilled from grain. In India it is applied to a variety of common spirits; in S. India to those distilled from the fermented sap of sundry palms; in E. and N. India to the spirit distilled from cane-molasses, and also to that from rice. The Turkish form of the word, râki, is applied to a spirit made from grape-skins; and in Syria and Egypt to a spirit flavoured with anise, made in the Lebanon. There is a popular or slang Fr. word, riquiqui, for brandy, which appears also to be derived from arâki (Marcel Devie). Humboldt (Examen, &c., ii. 300) says that the word first appears in Pigafetta’s Voyage of Magellan; but this is not correct.

c. 1420.—"At every yam (post-house) they give the travellers a sheep, a goose, a fowl . . . arâk . . ."—Shah Rukh’s Embassy to China, in N. & E., iv. 396.

1516.—"And they bring cocoa-nuts, huracca (which is something to drink). . ."—Barbour, Hak. Soc. 59.

1518.—"—que todos os mantimentos asy de pão, como vinhos, orracas, arrozos, carnês, e pescados."—In Archiv. Port. Oriental, fasc. 2, 57.

1521.—"When these people saw the politeness of the captain, they presented some fish, and a vessel of palm-wine, which they call in their language uraca . . ."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 72.

1544.—"Manueli a cruce . . . commend to plurimum invigilèt dubuos illis Christianorum Caracaram pagis, diligenter attendere . . . nemo potu Orracae se inebrét . . . si ex hó deinceps tempore Punicali Orracae potetur, ipsos ad míhi suoi gravi damno luituros."—Scri. Fr. Xav. Bipटं, p. 111.

1554.—"And the eoxise on the orragus made from palm-trees, of which there are three kinds, viz., cura, which is as it is drawn; orragua, which is cura once boiled (cosida, qu. distilled) ; shairab (zaro) which is boiled two or three times and is stronger than orragua."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 50.

1563.—"One kind (of coco-palm) they keep to bear fruit, the other for the sake of the cura, which is vino mosto; and when this it has been distilled they call orraça."—Garcia D’O., f. 67. (The word sura, used here, is a very ancient importation from India, for Casius (6th century) in his account of the coco-nut, confounding (it would seem) the milk with the toddy of that palm, says: "The Argelion is at first full of a very sweet water, which the Indians drink from the nut, using it instead of wine. This drink is called rhoncouéra, and is extremely pleasant." It is indeed possible that the rhonco here may already be the word arrack).

1605.—"A Chines borne, but now turned lauan, who was our next neighbour . . . and brewed the Aracke which is a kind of hot drink, that is used in most of these parts of the world, instead of Wine. . ."—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 173.

1631.—". . . jecur . . . a poti istius maledicti Arac, non tantum in temperamento immutatum, sed etiam in substantia suâ corruptumitur."—Jac. Bontius, lib. ii. cap. vii. p. 22.

1657.—"Two jars of Arack (made of rice as I judged) called by the Chinese Samshu [Samshoo]."—Dampier, i. 419.

1719.—"We exchanged some of our wares for opium and some arrack . . ."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. II.

1727.—"Mr Boucher had been 14 Months soliciting to procure his Pharrmawnd; but his repeated Petitions . . . had no Effect. But he had an Englishman, one Swan, for his Interpreter, who often took a large Dose of Arrack . . . Swan got pretty near the King (Aurungzeh) . . . and cried with a loud Voice in the Persian Language that his Master wanted Justice done him" (see DOAI).—A. Hamilton, i. 97.

Rack is a further corruption; and rack-punch is perhaps not quite obsolete.

1603.—"We taking the But-end of Pikes and Halberts and Faggot-sticks, draw them into a Racke-house."—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 184.

Purchas also has Vraca and other forms; and at i. 648 there is mention of a strong kind of spirit called Rack-apee (Malay drâ/= fire’). See FOOL’S RACK.

1616.—"Some small quantitie of Wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Raack, distilled from Sugar and a spicie Rinde of a Tree called Jagra [Jaggery]."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1622.—"We’ll send him a jar of rack by next conveyance."—Letter in Sainsbury, iii. 40.
ARSÉNÁL, s. An old and ingenious etymology of this word is ars navalis. But it is really Arabic. Hyde derives it from tarṣ-ḥādnah, 'domus terroris,' contracted into tarṣānāh, the form (as he says) used at Constantinople (Syntagma Dissert., i. 100). But it is really the Ar. dār-al-ṣināʿa, 'domus artificiī,' as the quotations from Masʿūdi clearly show. The old Itāl. forms darsēna, darsinale corroborate this, and the Sp. ataragana, which is rendered in Ar. by Pedro de Alcalá, quoted by Dozy, as dar a cincas.—(See details in Dozy, Oosterlingen, 16-18.)

A.D. 943-4.—"At this day in the year of the Hijra 332, Rhodes (Rodas) is an arsenal (dār-ṣināʿa) where the Greeks build their war-vessels."—Masʿūdi, ii. 423. And again "dār-ṣināʿat al marākib," 'an arsenal of ships," iii. 67.

1573.—"In this city (Fez) there is a very great building which they call Daracanā, where the Christian captives used to labour at blacksmith's work and other crafts under the superintendence and orders of renegade headmen ... here they made cannon and powder, and wrought swords, cross-bows, and arquebuses."—Marmol, Desc. General de Affrīca, lib. iii. f. 92.

1672.—"On met au Tershana deux belles galères à l'eau."—Antoine Galland, Journ., i. 80.

ART, EUROPEAN. We have heard much, and justly, of late years regarding the corruption of Indian art and artistic instinct by the employment of the artists in working for European patrons, and after European patterns. The copying of such patterns is no new thing, as we may see from this passage of the brightest of writers upon India whilst still under Asiatic government.

c. 1665.—"... not that the Indians have not wit enough to make them successful in Arts, they doing very well (as to some of them) in many parts of India, and it being found that they have inclination enough for them, and that some of them make (even without a Master) very pretty workmanship and imitate so well our work of Europe, that the difference thereof will hardly be discerned."—Bernier, E. T., 81-82 [ed. Constable, 254].

ARTICHOKE, s. The genealogy of this word appears to be somewhat as follows: The Ar. is al-ḥarshūf (perhaps connected with ḥarash, 'rough-skinned') or al-kharṣaf, hence Sp. alcarchofa and It. arcicofo and arciocco, Fr. artichaut, Eng. artichoke.

c. 1318.—"The Incense (benzoin) tree is small ... its branches are like those of a thistle or an artichoke (al-kharṣaf)."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 240. Al-kharṣaf in the published text. The spelling with h instead of kh is believed to be correct (see Dozy, s. v. Alcarchofa); [also see N. E. D. s. v. Artichoke.

ARYAN, adj. Skt. Ārya, 'noble.' A term frequently used to include all the races (Indo-Persic, Greek, Roman, Celtic, Sclavonic, &c.) which speak languages belonging to the same family as Sanskrit. Much vogue was given to the term by Pictet's publication of Les Origines Indo-Européennes, ou les Aryas Primitifs (Paris, 1859), and this writer seems almost to claim the name in this sense as his own (see quotation below). But it was in use long before the date of his book. Our first quotation is from Ritter, and there it has hardly reached the full extent of application. Ritter seems to have derived the use in this passage from Lassen's Pentapotamia. The word has in great measure superseded the older term Indo-Germanic, proposed by F. Schlegel at the beginning of the last century. The latter is, however, still sometimes used, and M. Hovelacque, especially, prefers it. We may observe here that the connection which evidently exists between the several languages classed together as Aryan cannot be regarded, as it was formerly, as warranting an assumption of identity of race in all the peoples who speak them.

It may be noted as curious that among the Javanese (a people so remote in blood from what we understand by Aryan), the word ārya is commonly used as an honorary prefix to the names of men of rank; a survival of the ancient Hindu influence on the civilisation of the island.

The earliest use of Aryan in an ethnic sense is in the Inscription on the tomb of Darius, in which the king calls himself an Aryan, and of Aryan descent, whilst Ormuzd is in the Median version styled, 'God of the Aryans'.

“These Medes were called anciently by all people Arians, but when Medes, the Colchian, came to them from Athens, they changed their name.”—Herodot., vii. 62 (Rawlins).

1838.—“Those eastern and proper Indians, whose territory, however, Alexander never touched by a long way, call themselves in the most ancient period Ariains (Ariërs) (Mans, ii. 22, x. 45), a name coinciding with that of the ancient Medes.”—Ritter, v. 458.

1838.—See also Ritter, viii. 17 seqq.; and Potto’s art. in Ersch & Gruber’s Encyc., ii. 18, 46.

1850.—“The Arian tribes in conquering India, urged by the Brahman, made war against the Turanian demon-worship, but not always with complete success.”—Dr. J. Wilson, in Life, 450.

1851.—“We must request the patience of our readers whilst we give a short outline of the component members of the great Arian family. The first is the Sanskrit . . . . The second branch of the Arian family is the Persian . . . . There are other scions of the Arian stock which struck root in the soil of Asia, before the Arians reached the shores of Europe, . . .”—(Prof. Max Müller) Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1851, pp. 312-316.

1853.—“Sur les sept premières civilisations, qui sont celles de l’ancien monde, six appartenaient, en partie au moins, à la race ariane.”—Gobineau, De l’Inégalité des Races Humaines, i. 864.

1855.—“I believe that all who have lived in India will bear testimony . . . . that to natives of India, of whatever class or caste, Mussulman, Hindoo, or Parsee, ‘Aryan’ or ‘Tamulian,’ unless they have had a special training, our European paintings, prints, drawings, and photographs, plain or coloured, if they are landscapes, are absolutely unintelligible.”—Yule, Mission to Ava, 59 (publ. 1858).

1858.—“The Aryan tribes—for that is the name they gave themselves, both in their old and new homes—brought with them institutions of a simplicity almost primitive.”—Whitney, Or. & Ling. Studies, ii. 5.

1861.—“Latin, again, with Greek, and the Celtic, the Teutonic, and Slavonic languages, together likewise with the ancient dialects of India and Persia, must have sprung from an earlier language, the mother of the whole Indo-European or Aryan family of speech.”—Prof. Max Müller, Lectures, 1st Ser. 32.

We also find the verb Aryantize:

1858.—“Thus all India was brought under the sway, physical or intellectual and moral, of the alien race; it was thoroughly Aryanized.”—Whitney, u. s. 7.

ASHRAFEE, s. Arab, ashrafī, ‘noble,’ applied to various gold coins (in analogy with the old English ‘noble’), especially to the dinār of Egypt, and to the Gold Mohur of India.—See XERAFINE.

c. 1550.—“There was also the sum of 500,000 Falory ashrāfēs equal in the currency of Persia to 50,000 royal Irak tomans.”—Mem. of Humayyn, 125. A note suggests that Falory, or Flori, indicates florin.

ASSAM, n.p. The name applied for the last three centuries or more to the great valley of the Brahmaputra River, from the emergence of its chief sources from the mountains till it enters the great plain of Bengal. The name Assām and sometimes Aṣham is a form of ʿAlām or ʿAlom, a dynasty of Shan race, who entered the country in the middle ages, and long ruled it. Assam politically is now a province embracing much more than the name properly included.

c. 1590.—“The dominions of the Rajah of Aṣham join to Kamroop; he is a very powerful prince, lives in great state, and when he dies, his principal attendants, both male and female, are voluntarily buried alive with his corpse.”—Gladwin’s Ayen (ed. 1800) ii. 3; [Jarrett, trans. ii. 118].

1682.—“Ye Nabob was very busy dispatching and vesting divers principal officers sent with all possible diligence with recruits for their army, lately overthrown in Aṣham and Sillet, two large plentiful countries 8 days’ journey distant from this city (Dacca).”

—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 29th; [Hak. Soc. i. 43].

1770.—“In the beginning of the present century, some Bramins of Bengal carried their superstitions to Aṣham, where the people were so happy as to be guided solely by the dictates of natural religion.”—Raynal (tr. 1777) i. 420.

1788.—“M. Chevalier, the late Governor of Chandernagor, by permission of the King, went up as high as the capital of Assam, about the year 1762.”—Rennell’s Mem., 3rd ed. p. 299.

ASSEGAY, s. An African throwing-spear. Dozy has shown that this is Berber zagḥāya, with the Ar. article prefixed (p. 223). Those who use it often seem to take it for a S. African or Eastern word. So Godinho de Eredia seems to use it as if Malay (f. 21r). [Mr Skeat remarks that the nearest word in Malay is seligi, explained by Klinkert as ‘a short wooden throwing-spear,’ which is possibly that referred to by G. de Eredia.

c. 1270.—"There was the King standing with three 'orquinas' (men of the guard) by his side armed with javelins [lab tur atzagayes'].”—Chronicle of K. James of Aragon, tr. by Mr. Foster, 1883, i. 173.

c. 1444.—"... They have a quantity of azagaias, which are kind of light darts."—Cadamosto, Navegacao primeira, 52.

1666.—"Les autres armes offensives (in India) sont l'arc et la flèche, le javelot ou zagaye ..."—Thavenot, v. 132 (ed. 1727).

1681.—"... encontraron diez y nueve hombres bazos armados con dardas, y azagayas, assi llamán los Arabes vnas lanzas pequenas arrojadizas, y pelearon con ellos."—Martines de la Puente, Compendio, 87.

ATAP, ADAP, s. Applied in the Malayo-Javanese regions to any palmfronds used in thatching, commonly to those of the Nipa (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.). [Atap, according to Mr Skent, is also applied to any roofing; thus tiles are called atap butu, 'stone ataps.']

The Nipa, "although a wild plant, for it is so abundant that its culture is not necessary, it is remarkable that its name should be the same in all the languages from Sumatra to the Philippines."—(Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch. 301.)

Atép is Javanese for 'thatch.'

1672.—"Atap or leaves of Palm-trees ..."—Baldaeus, Ceylon, 164.

1690.—"Adapol (quae fuit sica et vetusta) ..."—Rumphius, Herb. Amb. i. 14.

1817.—"In the maritime districts, atap or thatch is made ... from the leaves of the nipah."—Raffles, Java, i. 166; [2nd ed. i. 186].

1878.—"The universal roofing of a Perak house is Atap stretched over bamboo rafters and ridge-poles. This atap is the dried leaf of the nipah palm, doubled over a small stick of bamboo, or mbihong."—McNair, Perak, ed. 16.

ATLAS, s. An obsolete word for 'satin,' from the Ar. atlas, used in that sense, literally 'bare' or 'bald' (comp. the Ital. rasò for 'satin'). The word is still used in German. [The Draper's Dict. (s.v.) says that "a silk stuff wrought with threads of gold and silver, and known by this name, was at one time imported from India." Yusufl Ali (Mon. on Silk Fabrics, p. 93) writes: "Atlas is the Indian satin, but the term satin (corrupted from the English) is also applied, and sometimes specialised to a thicker form of the fabric. This fabric is always substantial, i.e. never so thin or netted as to be semi-transparent; more of the west showing on the upper surface than of the warp."

1284.—"Cette mème nuit par ordre du Sultan quinze cents de ses Mamlouks furent revêtus de robes d'atlas rouges brodées. ..."—Makrizi, t. ii. pt. i. 69.

"... The Sultan Mas'ud clothed his dogs with trappings of atlas of divers colours, and put bracelets upon them."—Fakhri, p. 68.

1673.—"They go Rich in Apparel, their Turbats of Gold, Damask'd Gold Atlas Coats to their Heels, Silk, Almain or Cattane breeches."—Fryer, 196.

1683.—"I saw ye Taffeties and Atlases in ye Warehouse, and gave directions concerning their several colours and stripes."—Hedges, Diary, May 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 85].

1689.—(Surat) "is renown'd for ... rich Silks, such as Atlases ... and for Zarbafts [Zerbaft]. ..."—Ovington, 218.
1712.—In the Spectator of this year are advertised “a purple and gold Atlas gown” and “a scarlet and gold Atlas petticoat edged with silver.”—Cited in Malcolm’s Anecdotes (1808), 429.

1727.—“They are exquisite in the Weaver’s Trade and Embroidery, which may be seen in the rich Atlases . . . made by them.”—A. Hamilton, i. 160.

c. 1750 - 60.—“The most considerable (manufacture) is that of their atlases or satin flowered with gold and silver.”—Grose, i. 117.

Note.—I saw not long ago in India a Polish Jew who was called Jacob Atlas, and he explained to me that when the Jews (about 1800) were forced to assume surnames, this was assigned to his grandfather, because he wore a black satin gaberdisne!—(A. B. 1879.)

ATOLL, s. A group of coral islands forming a ring or chaplet, sometimes of many miles in diameter, inclosing a space of comparatively shallow water, each of the islands being on the same type as the atoll. We derive the expression from the Maldivian islands, which are the typical examples of this structure, and where the form of the word is atolu. [P. de Laval (Hak. Soc. i. 93) states that the provinces in the Maldives were known as Atollon.] It is probably connected with the Singhalese atul, ‘inside’; [or etulu, as Mr Gray (P. de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 94) writes the word. The Mad. Admin. Man. in the Glossary gives Malayal. attidam, ‘a sinking reef’.] The term was made a scientific one by Darwin in his publication on Coral Reefs (see below), but our second quotation shows that it had been generalised at an earlier date.

c. 1610.—“Estant au milieu d’un Atollon, vous voyez autour de vous ce grand banc de pierre que jay dit, qui environne et qui defend les isles contre l’impetuosité de la mer.”—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 71 (ed. 1679); [Hak. Soc. i. 94].

1732.—“Atollon, a name applied to such a place in the sea as exhibits a heap of little islands lying close together, and almost hanging on to each other.”—Zeidler’s; (German) Universal Lexicon, s.v.

1842.—“I have invariably used in this volume the term atoll, which is the name given to these circular groups of coral islands by their inhabitants in the Indian Ocean, and is synonymous with ‘lagoon-island.’”—Darwin, The Structure, &c. of Coral Reefs, 2.

AUMIL, s. Ar. and thence H. ‘amil (noun of agency from ‘amal, ‘he performed a task or office,’ therefore ‘an agent’). Under the native governments a collector of Revenue; also a farmer of the Revenue invested with chief authority in his District. Also

AUMILDAR. Properly ‘amaldar, ‘one holding office’; (Ar. ‘amal, ‘work,’ with P. term of agency). A factor or manager. Among the Mahrattas the ‘amaldar was a collector of revenue under varying conditions.—(See details in Wilson.) The term is now limited to Mysore and a few other parts of India, and does not belong to the standard system of any Presidency. The word in the following passage looks as if intended for ‘amaldar, though there is a term Maldar, ‘the holder of property.’

1680.—“The Mauldar or Didowan [Dewan] that came with the Ruvus [Roocka] from Golconda sent forward to Lingappa at Conjiveram.”—Fl. St. Geo. Cos., 9th Novr. No. III., 38.

c. 1780.—“. . . having detected various frauds in the management of the Amuldar or renter . . . . (M. Lally) paid him 40,000 rupees.”—Orme, iii. 496 (ed. 1803).

1793.—“The amildars, or managers of the districts.”—Dirom, p. 56.

1799.—“I wish that you would desire one of your people to communicate with the Amildar of Soondaah respecting this road.”—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Munro’s Life, i. 335.

1804.—“I know the character of the Peshwah, and his ministers, and of every Mahratta amildar sufficiently well . . . .”—Wellington, iii. 38.

1809.—“Of the amul I saw nothing.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

AURUNG, s. H. from P. aurang, ‘a place where goods are manufactured, a depot for such goods.’ During the Company’s trading days this term was applied to their factories for the purchase, on advances, of native piece-goods, &c.

1778.—“. . . Gentoo-factors in their own pay to provide the investments at the different Aurungs or cloth markets in the province.”—Orme, ii. 51.

1789.—“I doubt, however, very much whether he has had sufficient experience in the commercial line to enable him to manage so difficult and so important an aurung as Luckipore, which is almost the only one of any magnitude which supplies the species of coarse cloths which do not interfere with the British manufacture.”—Cornwallis, i. 435.

AVA, n.p. The name of the city which was for several centuries the AVADAVAT.

Capital of the Burmese Empire, and was applied often to that State itself. This name is borrowed, according to Crawfurd, from the form Ava or Aavak used by the Malays. The proper Burmese form was Eng-va, or 'the Lake-Mouth,' because the city was built near the opening of a lagoon into the Irrawady; but this was called, even by the Burmese, more popularly A-va, 'The Mouth.' The city was founded A.D. 1364. The first European occurrence of the name, so far as we know, is (c. 1440) in the narrative of Nicolo Conti, and it appears again (no doubt from Conti's information) in the great World-Map of Fra Mauro at Venice (1459).

c. 1490. —"Having sailed up this river for the space of a month he arrived at a city more noble than all the others, called Ava, and the circumference of which is 15 miles. —Conti, in India in the XVth Cent. ii.

c. 1490. —"The country (Pegu) is a distant 15 days' journey by land from another called Ava in which grow rubies and many other precious stones."—Hier. di Sto. Stefano, u. s. p. 6.

1516. —"Inland beyond this Kingdom of Pegu ... there is another Kingdom of Gentiles which has a King who resides in a very great and opulent city called Ava, 8 days' journey from the sea; a place of rich merchants, in which there is a great trade of jewels, rubies, and spinel-rubies, which are gathered in this Kingdom."—Barbosa, 186.

c. 1610. —"... The King of Ová having already sent much people, with cavalry, to relieve Porso (Prone), which marches with the Pozio (?) and city of Ová or Anvá, (which means 'surrounded on all sides with streams') ..."—Antonio Bocorro, Decada, 150.

1726. —"The city Ava is surpassing great. ... One may not travel by land to Ava, both because this is permitted by the Emperor to none but envoys, on account of the Rubies on the way, and also because it is a very perilous journey on account of the tigers."—Valentijn, V. (Chorom.) 127.

AVADAVAT, s. Improperly for Amadavat. The name given to a certain pretty little cage-bird (Estrella amandavala, L. or 'Red Wax - Bill') found throughout India, but originally brought to Europe from Ahmadábâd in Guzerat, of which the name is a corruption. We also find Ahmadábâd represented by Madava: as in old maps Astárbâd on the Caspian is represented by Strava (see quotation from Correa below). [One of the native names for the bird is lat, 'ruby,' which appears in the quotation from Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali below.]

1546. —"The greater the resistance they made, the more of their blood was spilt in their defeat, and when they took to flight, we gave them chase for the space of half a league. And it is my belief that as far as the will of the officers and lascars went, we should not have halted on this side of Madavá; but as I saw that my people were much fatigued, and that the Moors were in great numbers, I withdrew them and brought them back to the city."—D. João de Castro's despatch to the City of Goa respecting the victory at Dir.—Correa, iv. 574.

1648. —"The capital (of Guzerat) lies in the interior of the country and is named Hamad-Ebat, i.e. the City of King Hamid who built it; nowadays they call it Amadavar or Amadatat."—Van Twist, 4.

1673. —"... From Amidavod, small Birds, who, besides that they are spotted with white and Red no bigger than Measles, the principal Chorister beginning, the rest in Consort, Fifty in a Cage, make an admirable Chorus."—Fryer, 116.

[1777. —"... a few presents now and then —china, shawls, congou tea, avadavats, and Indian crackers."—The School for Scandal, v. i.]

1813. —"... amadavats, and other songsters are brought thither (Bombay) from Surat and different countries."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47. [The 2nd ed. (i. 32) reads amadavads.]

[1832. —"The lolith, known to many by the name of haaver-dewatt, is a beautiful little creature, about one-third the size of a hedge-sparrow."—Mrs Meer Hassan Ali, Observat. ii. 51.]

AVATAR, s. Skt. Avatāra, an incarnation on earth of a divine Being. This word first appears in Baldaeus (1672) in the form Autaar (Afgederse, p. 52), which in the German version generally quoted in this book takes the corrupter shape of Altar.

[c. 1590. —"In the city of Sambl is a temple called Hari Mandal (the temple of Vishnu) belonging to a Brahman, from among whose descendants the tenth avatar will appear at this spot."—Ain, tr. Jarrett, ii. 281.]

1672. —"Bey den Benjen ten haben auch diese zehen Verwandlungen den Namen daa sie Altare heissen, und also hat Mats Altar als dieser erste, gewuracht 2500 Jahr."—Baldaeus, 472.

1784. —"The ten Avatâras or descents of the deity, in his capacity of Preserver."—Sir W. Jones, in Asiat. Res. (reprint) i. 234.
The Aватарs of Vishnu, by which are meant his descent(s) upon earth, are usually counted ten. . . ."—Maria Graham, 49.

1821.—"The Irish Aватар."—Byron.

1872.—"... all which cannot blind us to the fact that the Master is merely another Aватar of Dr Holmes himself."—Sat. Review, Dec. 14, p. 768.

1875.—"The . . . builds up a curious History of Spiritualism, according to which all matter is mediately or immediately the Aватar of some Intelligence, not necessarily the highest."—Academy, May 15th, 1726.

1875.—"Balzac's Aватar was a hundred-fold as numerous as those of Vishnu."—Ibid., April 24th, p. 421.

AVERAGE, s. Skeat derives this in all its senses from L. Latin aверia, used for cattle; for his deduction of meanings we must refer to his Dictionary. But it is worthy of consideration whether average, in its special marine use for a proportionate contribution towards losses of those whose goods are cast into the sea to save a ship, &c., is not directly connected with the Fr. aвери, which has quite that signification. And this last Dozy shows most plausibly to be from the Ar. 'авар, spolit merchandise.' [This is rejected by the N.E.D., which concludes that the Ar. 'авар is "merely a mod. Arabic translation and adaptation of the Western term in its latest sense."]. Note that many European words of trade are from the Arabic; and that aвери is in Dutch averij, averij, or haverrij.—(See Dozy, Oosterlingen.)

AYAH, s. A native lady's-maid or nurse-maid. The word has been adopted into most of the Indian vernaculars in the forms অয়া or অয, but is really Portuguese (f. aia, 'a nurse, or governess'; m. aio, 'the governor of a young noble'). [These again have been connected with L. Latin aidia, Fr. aide, 'a helper'.]

1779.—"I was sitting in my own house in the compound, when the যা came down and told me that her mistress wanted a candle."—Kitturaga's evidence, in the case of Grah v. Francis. Ext. in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 225.

1782.—(A Table of Wages):—

"Consumah........10 (rupees a month)." * * * * * *
Eyah............. 5."—India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1810.—"The female who attends a lady while she is dressing, etc., is called an Aayah."—Williamson, V. M. i. 337.

1826.—"The lieutenant's visits were now less frequent than usual; one day, however, he came . . . and on leaving the house I observed him slip something which I doubted not was money, into the hand of the Aayah, or serving woman, of Jane."—Pandurang Hari, 71; [ed. 1873, i. 99).

1842.—"Here (at Simla) there is a great preponderence of Mahometans. I am told that the guns produced absolute consternation, visible in their countenances. One Aayah threw herself upon the ground in an agony of despair . . . I fired 42 guns for Ghuzni and Cabul; the 22nd (42nd) gun—which announced that all was finished—was what overcame the Mahometans."—Lord Ellenborough, in Indian Administration 295.

This stuff was written to the great Duke of Wellington!

1873.—"The white-robed aayah flits in and out of the tents, finding a home for our various possessions, and thither we soon retire."—Fraser's Mag., June, i. 99.

1879.—"He was exceedingly fond of his two children, and got for them servants; a man to cook their dinner, and an aayah to take care of them."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 7.

BABA, s. This is the word usually applied in Anglo-Indian families, by both Europeans and natives, to the children—often in the plural form, bābā lōg (lōg= 'folk'). The word is not used by the natives among themselves in the same way, at least not habitually; and it would seem as if our word baby had influenced the use. The word bābā is properly Turki—'father'; sometimes used to a child as a term of endearment (or forming part of such a term, as in the P. Babā-jān, 'Life of your Father'). Compare the Russian use of batushka. [Bābājī is a common form of address to a Fakir, usually a member of one of the Musulman sects. And hence it is used generally as a title of respect.]

1826.—"I reached the hut of a Gossein, and reluctantly tapped at the wicket, calling, 'O Baba, O Maharaj.'"—Pandurang Hari [ed. 1873, i. 76].

[1880.—"While Sunny Baba is at large, and might at any time make a raid on Mamma, who is dozing over a novel on the spider chair near the mouth of the ther-manticote, the Ayah and Bearer dare not leave their charge."— Aberigh-Mackay, Twenty-one Days, p. 94.]

BABAGOOREE, s. H. Babirussa, the white agate (or chalcedony) of Cambay. [For these stones see Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 323: Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 68.] It is apparently so called from the patron saint or martyr of the district containing the mines, under whose special protection the miners place themselves before descending into the shafts. Tradition alleges that he was a prince of the great Ghori dynasty, who was killed in a great battle in that region. But this prince will hardly be found in history.

1516.—"They also find in this town (Lîmadura in Guzerat) much chalcedony, which they call babagore. They make beads with it, and other things which they wear about them."—Barbosa, 67.

1554.—"In this country (Guzerat) is a profusion of Babâghûri and carnelians; but the best of these last are those coming from Yaman."—Sidi 'Ali Kapudân, in J.A.S.B. v. 463.

1590.—"By the command of his Majesty grain weights of bâbâghûri were made, which were used in weighing."—Alîn, i. 35, and note, p. 615 (Blochmann).

1818.—"On the summit stands the tomb . . . of the titular saint of the country, Baba Ghor, to whom a devotion is paid more as a deity than as a saint. . . ."—Copland, in Tr. Ed. Soc. Bo., i. 294.

1849.—Among ten kinds of carnelians specified in H. Briggs’s Cities of Gujardôsta we find "Bawa Gori Akik, a veined kind."—p. 183.

BABBS, n.p. This name is given to the I. of Perim, in the St. of Babelmandel, in the quotation from Ovington. It was probably English sea-slang only. [Mr Whiteway points out that this is clearly from albabo, the Port. form of the Ar. word. João de Castro in Roteiro (1541), p. 34, says: "This strait is called by the neighbouring people, as well as those who dwell on the shores of the Indian Ocean, Albabo, which in Arabic signifies ‘gates.’"]

1890.—"The Babbs is a small island opening to the Red Sea. . . . Between this and the Main Land is a safe Passage. . . ."—Ovington, 453.

[1769.—"Yet they made no estimation of the currents without the Babs," (note), "This is the common sailors’ phrase for the Straits of Babelmandel."—Bruce, Travels to discover the Source of the Nile, ed. 1790, Bk. i. cap. ii.]

BABER, BHABUR, s. H. bâbar, babar. A name given to those districts of the N.W. Provinces which lie immediately under the Himalaya to the dry forest belt on the talus of the hills, at the lower edge of which the moisture comes to the surface and forms the wet forest belt called Tarail. (See TERAIL) The following extract from the report of a lecture on Indian Forests is rather a happy example of the danger of "a little learning" to a reporter:

1877.—"Beyond that (the Tarail) lay another district of about the same breadth, called in the native dialect the Babadar. That in fact was a great filter-bed of sand and vegetation."—London Morning Paper of 26th May.

BABGOOREE, s. Malay babi* ('hog') ráwa ('stag'). The ‘Stag-hog,’ a remarkable animal of the swine genus (Sus babirussa, Lat.; Babirussa alfurus, F. Cuvier), found in the island of Borneo, and some others of the I. Archipelago, but nowhere on continental Asia. Yet it seems difficult to apply the description of Pliny below, or the name and drawing given by Cosmas, to any other animal. The 4-horned swine of Adian is more probably the African Wart-hog, called accordingly by F. Cuvier Psaocochoerus Aeliani.

C. A.D. 70.—"The wild bores of India have two bowing fangs or tuskes of a cubit length, growing out of their mouth, and as many out of their foreheads like calves hornes."—Pitius, viii. 52 (Holland’s Tr. i. 231).

C. 250.—"Δένθρα δὲ Διόνυσος ἀνθρώπινος γένεσθαι ... ὑπὲ τετράκερων."—Aelian, De Nat. Anim. xvii. 10.

C. 545.—"The Choletoedesps ('Hog-stag') I have both seen and eaten."—Cosmas Indiopoeistes, in Cathay, &c., p. clxxv.

1555.—"There are hogs also with hornes, and parats which prattle much which they call with (Larry)."—Galeno, Discoveries of the World, Hak. Soc. 120.

* This word takes a ludicrous form in Dampier: "All the Indians who speake Malayan . . . lookt on those Meangias as a kind of Barbarians, and upon any occasion of dislike, would call them Bobby, that is Hogs."—i. 515.
1658.—"Quadrupes hoc inusitatae figurae monstrosis bestiis ascribunt Induti quod adversae speciei animalibus, Porco selicet et Cerva, pronatum putent. . . . ita ut primo intuito quatuor cornibus juxta se positis videatur armatum hoc animal Baby-Roussa."—Piso, App. to Bontius, p. 61.

[1869.—"The wild pig seems to be of a species peculiar to the island (Celebes); but a much more curious animal of this family is the Babirusa or Pig-deer, so named by the Malays from its long and slender legs, and curved tusks resembling horns. This extraordinary creature resembles a pig in general appearance, but it does not dig with its snout, as it feeds on fallen fruits. . . . Here again we have a resemblance to the Wart-hogs of Africa, whose upper canines grow outwards and curve up so as to form a transition from the usual mode of growth to that of the Babirusa. In other respects there seems no affinity between these animals, and the Babirusa stands completely isolated, having no resemblance to the pigs of any other part of the world."—Wallace, Malay Archip. (ed. 1890), p. 211, seqq.

BABOO, s. Beng. and H. Babū [Skt. vapra, 'a father']. Properly a term of respect attached to a name, like Master or Mr., and formerly in some parts of Hindustan applied to certain persons of distinction. Its application as a term of respect is now almost altogether confined to Lower Bengal (though C. P. Brown states that it is also used in S. India for 'Sir, My lord, your Honour'). In Bengal and elsewhere, among Anglo-Indians, it is often used with a slight savour of disparagement, as characterizing a superficially cultivated, but too often effeminate, Bengali. And from the extensive employment of the class, to which the term was applied as a title, in the capacity of clerks in English offices, the word has come often to signify 'a native clerk who writes English.'

1781.—"I said . . . From my youth to this day I am a servant to the English. I have never gone to any Rajahs or Baboons nor will I go to them."—Depn. of Doorab Singh, Commandant. In Narr. of Travels at Benaras in 1781. Calc. 1782. Reprinted at Rockee, 1853. App., p. 165.

Letters of Simkin the Second, 147.

1803.—". . . Calling on Mr. Neave I found there Baboo Deep Naran, brother to Oodit Naran, Rajah at Benares."—Lord Valentia's Travels, i. 112.

1824.—". . . the immense convent-like mansion of some of the more wealthy Baboos. . . ."—Heber, i. 31, ed. 1844.

1844.—"The Baboo and other Tales, descriptive of Society in India."—Smith & Elder, London. (By Augustus Prinsep.)

1850.—"If instruction were sought for from them (the Mohammedan historians) we should no longer hear bombastic Baboons, engage them under our Government the highest degree of personal liberty. . . . rave about patriotism, and the degradation of their present position."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Orig. Preface to Mahom. Historians of India, in Dowson's ed., i. xxii.

c. 1866.

"But I'd sooner be robbed by a tall man who showed me a yard of steel, Than be fleeced by a sneaking Baboo, with a peon and badge at his heel."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1873.—"The pliable, plastic, receptive Baboo of Bengal eagerly avails himself of this system (of English education) partly from a servile wish to please the Sahib loge, and partly from a desire to obtain a Government appointment."—Fraser's Mag., August, 1909.

[1880.—"English officers who have become de-Europeanised from long residence among uncivilized natives. . . . Such officials are what Lord Lytton calls White Baboons."—Aberigh-Mackay, Twenty-one Days, p. 104.]

N.B.—In Java and the further East bābā means a nurse or female servant (Javanese word).

BABOOL, s. H. babū, babūr (though often mispronounced bābūl, as in two quotations below); also called kikar. A thorny mimosa common in most parts of India except the Malabar Coast; the Acacia arabica, Willd. The Bils use the gum as food.

1666.—"L'eau de Vie de ce Païs . . . qu'y boit ordinairement, est faict de jaigr ou sucre noir, qu'on met dans l'eau avec de l'écorce de l'arbre Babou, pour y donner quelque force, et ensuite on les dis-tille ensemble."—Thevenot, v. 50.

1780.—"Price Current. Country Produce: Bable Trees, large, 5 pc. each tree."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, April 29. [This is babūl, the Bengali form of the word.]

1824.—"Rampoorn is . . . chiefly remarkable for the sort of fortification which surrounds it. This is a high thick hedge . . . of bamboos . . . faced on the outside by a formidable underwood of cactus and bābūl."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 290.

1849.—"Look at that great tract from Desea to the Hāla mountains. It is all BABOON. s. This, no doubt, comes to us through the Ital. babuino; but it is probable that the latter word is a corruption of Pers. maimān [the auspicious one], and then applied by way of euphemism or irony to the baboon or monkey. It also occurs in Ital. under the more direct form of maimone in gatto-maimone, cat-monkey, or rather monkey-cat. [The N.E.D. leaves the origin of the word doubtful, and does not discuss this among other suggested derivations.]

BACANORe and BARCELORE, un. pp. Two ports of Canara often coupled together in old narratives, but which have entirely disappeared from modern maps and books of navigation, insomuch that it is not quite easy to indicate their precise position. But it would seem that Bacanore, Malayāl. Vakkanūr, is the place called in Canarese Bārkūr, the Barcoor-pettah of some maps, in lat. 13° 28'. This was the site of a very old and important city, "the capital of the Jain kings of Tulava ... and subsequently a stronghold of the Vījyanagar Rājas."—Imp. Gazet. [Also see Stuart, Man. S. Canara, ii. 264.]

Also that Barcelore is a Port. corruption of Basrūr [the Canarese Basarārū, "the town of the waved-leaf fig tree." (Mad. Adm. Man. Gloss, s.v.)]. It must have stood immediately below the "Barsilur Peak" of the Admiralty charts, and was apparently identical with, or near to, the place called Seroor in Scott's Map of the Madras Presidency, in about lat. 13° 55'. [See Stuart, ibid. ii. 242. Seroor is perhaps the Shīrūr of Mr Stuart (ibid. p. 243).]

c. 1380.—"Thence (from Hinnaur) the traveller came to Bāsarūr, a small city. . . ."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 184.

c. 1348.—"The first town of Mulaihār that we visited was Abu-Sarūr, which is small, situated on a great estuary, and abounding in coco-nut trees. . . . Two days after our departure from that town we arrived at Papaṇṭūr, which is large and situated on an estuary. One sees there an abundance of sugar-cane, such as has no equal in that country."—Ibn Batūta, iv. 77-78.

c. 1420.—"Duas praeterea ad maritimas arbes, alteram Pachamuriam . . . nomine, xx diebus transit."—Conti, in Poggias de Var. Fort, iv.

1501.—"Bacanūr," for Bacanur, is named in Amerigo Vespucci's letter, giving an account of Da Gama's discoveries, first published by Baldelli Boni, I. Milione, pp. liii. seqq.

1516.—"Passing further forward . . . along the coast, there are two little rivers on which stand two places, the one called Bacanor, and the other Bracalor, belonging to the kingdom of Narsyngua and the province of Tolinate (Tulū-nāda, Tulūwa or S. Canara). And in them is much good rice grown round about these places, and this is loaded in many foreign ships and in many of Malabar. . . ."—Barboos, in Lisbon Coll. 294.

1548.—"The Port of the River of Barcalor pays 500 loads (of rice as tribute)."—Botelho, Tombo, 216.

1552.—"Having dispatched this vessel, he (V. da Gama) turned to follow his voyage, desiring to erect the padrò (votive pillar) of which we have spoken; and not finding a place that pleased him better, he erected one on certain islets joined (as it were) to the land, giving it the name of Sancta Maria, whence these islands are now called Saint Mary's Isles, standing between Bacanor and Baticāla, two notable places on that coast."—De Barros, l. iv. 11.

... "... the city Onor, capital of the kingdom, Baticāla, Bendor, Bracelor, Bacanor."—Ibid. I. ix. 1.

1726.—"In Barceloar or Basseloar have we still a factory . . . a little south of Basseloar lies Baquanor and the little River Vier."—Valentijn, v. (Malabar) 6.

1727.—"The next town to the Southward of Batacola [Batucil] is Barcelor, standing on the Banks of a broad River about 4 Miles from the Sea . . . The Dutch have a Factory here, only to bring up Rice for their Garrisons . . . Bacanor and Molkey lie between Barcelor and Mangalore, both having the benefit of Rivers to export the large quantities of Rice that the Fields produce."—A. Hamilton, i. 284-5. [Molkey is Mulki, see Stuart, op. cit. ii. 259.]

1780.—"St Mary's Islands lie along the coast, N. and S. as far as off the river of Bacanor, or Callianpoor, being about 6 leagues . . . In lat. 13° 50' N., 5 leagues from Bacanor, runs the river Barsalor."—Dunn's N. Directory, 5th ed. 105.

1814.—"Barcelore, now frequently called Cundapore."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109, also see 113; [2nd ed. II. 464].

BACKDORRe, s. H. bāg-dor ('bridle-cord'); a halter or leading rein.

BACKSEE. Sea H. bākši: nautical 'aback,' from which it has been formed (Roebuck).
BADEGA, n.p. The Tamil Vađagar, t.e. 'Northern.' The name has at least two specific applications:

a. To the Telegu people who invaded the Tamil country from the kingdom of Vijayanagara (the Bīṣnaga or Narsinga of the Portuguese and old travellers) during the later Middle Ages, but especially in the 16th century. This word first occurs in the letters of St. Francis Xavier (1544), whose Parava converts on the Tinnevelly Coast were much oppressed by these people. The Badega language of Lucena, and other writers regarding that time, is the Telegu. The Badagas of St. Fr. Xavier's time were in fact the emissaries of the Nāyaka rulers of Madura, using violence to exact tribute for those rulers, whilst the Portuguese had conferred on the Parava "the somewhat dangerous privilege of being Portuguese subjects."—See Caldwell, H. of Tinnevelly, 69 seqq.

1544.—"Ego ad Comorimum Promontorium contendó eoque naviculas deduce xx. cibaris onustas, ut miseris illis subveniam Neophytis, qui Bagadarum (read Badaquam) acerrimorum Christiani nominis hostium terreore perculsi, relictis, in desertas insulas se abdiderunt."—S. P. Xav. Épis. I. vi., ed. 1677.

1737.—"In eâ parte missionis Carnatensis in quâ Telougou, ut aiunt, lingua viget, seu inter Badagos, quinque annos versatus sum; neque quumdiu viguerint vires ab illâ dilectissimâ et sanctissimâ Missione Pudichierum veni."—In Norbert, iii. 299.

BADGIR, s. The Malay jacket (Mal. bōjū) [of which many varieties are described by Denny's Disc. Dict. p. 107].

[See Bp. Caldwell's Grammar, 2nd ed., pp. 34, 125, &c.] [The best recent account of this people is that by Mr Thurston in Bulletin of the Madras Museum, vol. ii. No. 1.] The name of these people is usually in English corrupted to Burghers.

BADGEER, s. P. bād-gir, 'windcatch.' An arrangement acting as a windsail to bring the wind down into a house; it is common in Persia and in Sind. [It is the Bādhanj of Arabia, and the Malkaf of Egypt (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 237; Lane, Mod. Egypt, i. 23.)

1298.—"The heat is tremendous (at Hormus), and on that account the houses are built with ventilators (ventierna) to catch the wind. These ventilators are placed on the side from which the wind comes, and they bring the wind down into the house to cool it."—Marco Polo, ii. 450.

1598.—A similar arrangement at the same place is described by Linschoten, i. 51, Hak. Soc.

1682.—At Gamron (Gombroon) "most of the houses have a square tower which stands up far above the roof, and which in the upper part towards the four winds has ports and openings to admit air and catch the wind, which plays through these, and ventilates the whole house. In the heat of summer people lie at night at the bottom of these towers, so as to get good rest."—Nieuwko, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 79.

1798.—"The air in it was continually refreshed and renewed by a cool-sail, made like a funnel, in the manner of M. du Hamel."—Stavorinus, Voyage, ii. 104.

BADJOE, BAJOO, s. The Malay jacket (Mal. bōjū) [of which many varieties are described by Denny's Disc. Dict. p. 107].

[c. 1610.—"The women (Portuguese) take their ease in their smocks or Bajus, which are more delicate and fine than the most elegant taffets or dresses."—Pyard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 112.]

1794.—"Of this they wear the badjoo, which resembles a morning gown, open at the neck, but fastened close at the wrist, and half-way up the arm."—Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 44.

1878.—"The general Malay costume . . . consists of an inner vest, having a collar to button tight round the neck, and the bajoo, or jacket, often of light coloured dimity, for undress."—McNair, 147.
BAEL. s. H. bel, Mahr. buil, from Skt. vilva, the Tree and Fruit of Aegle marmelos (Correa), or 'Bengal Quince,' as it is sometimes called, after the name (Marmelos de Benguala) given it by Garcia de Orta, who first described the virtues of this fruit in the treatment of dysentery, &c. These are noticed also by P. Vincenzo Maria and others, and have always been familiar in India. Yet they do not appear to have attracted serious attention in Europe till about the year 1850. It is a small tree, a native of various parts of India. The dried fruit is now imported into England.—(See Hanbury and Fluckiger, 116); [Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 117 seqq.]. The shelly rind of the bel is in the Punjab made into carved snuff-boxes for sale to the Afghans.

1563.—"And as I knew that it was called beli in Bâcaîm, I enquired of those native physicians which was its proper name, cirifole or beli, and they told me that cirifole [cirifhala] was the physician's name for it."—Garcia De O., ff. 227 v., 222.

1614.—"One jar of Byle at ru. 5 per mandum."—Foster, Letters, iii. 41.

1631.—Jac. Bontius describes the bel as malum cydonium (i.e. a quince), and speaks of its pulp as good for dysentery and the cholerae, tummenem organum.—Lib. vi. cap. viii.

1672.—"The Bili plant grows to no greater height than that of a man [this is incorrect], all thorny . . . the fruit in size and hardness, and nature of rind, resembles a pomegranate, dotted over the surface with little dark spots equally distributed . . . With the fruit they make a decoction, which is a most efficacious remedy for dysenteries or fluxes, proceeding from excessive heat . . ."—P. Vincenzo, 353.

1879.—". . . On this plain you will see a large bêl-tree, and on it one big bêl-fruit."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 140.

BAFTA, s. A kind of calico, made especially at Baroeh; from the Pers. bêtfa, 'woven.' The old Baroeh baftas seem to have been fine goods. Nothing is harder than to find intelligible explanations of the distinction between the numerous varieties of cotton stuffs formerly exported from India to Europe under a still greater variety of names; names and trade being generally alike obsolete. Baftas however survived in the Tariffs till recently. [Bafta is at present the name applied to a silk fabric. (See quotation from Yasan Ali below.) In Bengal, Charpata and Noakhali in the Chittagong Division were also noted for their cotton baftas (Birdwood, Industr. Arts, 249).]

1593.—"There is made great store of Cotton Linnen of durers sort . . . Boftetas."—Linschoten, p. 18. [Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

1606-7.—"Patta Kasaa of the finest Topya, Baffa."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 72. We have also "Black Baftatta."—Ibid. 74.

1610.—"Baftas, the corze Rs. 100."—Dawers, Letters, i. 72.

1612.—"Baftas or white Callicos, from twente to fortie Royals the corze."—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 547.

1665.—"The Baftas, or Callicuts painted red, blue, and black, are carried white to Agra and Amadabad, in regard those cities are nearest the places where the Indigo is made that is use'd in colouring."—Tavernier, (E. T.) p. 127; [ed. Ball, ii. 5].

1672.—"Brooch Baftas, broad and narrow."—Fryer, 86.

1727.—"The Baroach Baftas are famous throughout all India, the country producing the best Cotton in the World."—A. Hamilton, i. 144.

1875.—In the Calcutta Tariff valuation of this year we find Piece Goods, Cotton:

Baftas, score, Rs. 30.

1900.—"Akin to the pot thâns is a fabric known as Bafta (literally woven), produced in Benares; body pure silk, with butis in kalabahan or cloth; . . . used for angarkhas, kots, and women's pañjamas (Musulmans)."—Yasan Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 97.

It is curious to find this word now current on Lake Nyanza. The burial of King Mtesa's mother is spoken of:

1883.—"The chiefs half filled the nicely-padded coffin with butfa (bleached calico) . . . after that the corpse and then the coffin was filled up with more butfa . . ."—In Ch. Missy. Intelligencer, N.S., viii. p. 543.

BAHAR. s. Ar. bahâr, Malayal. bhâtram, from Skt. bhâra, 'a load.' A weight used in large trading transactions; it varied much in different localities; and though the name is of BAHAR.

Indian origin it was naturalised by the Arabs, and carried by them to the far East, being found in use, when the Portuguese arrived in those seas, at least as far as the Moluccas. In the Indian islands the bahar is generally reckoned as equal to 3 peculs (q.v.), or 400 avoirdupois. But there was a different bahar in use for different articles of merchandise; or, rather, each article had a special surplus allowance in weighing, which practically made a different bahar (see PICOTA).

[Mr. Skeat says that it is now uniformly equal to 400 lbs. av. in the British dominions in the Malay Peninsula; but Klinkert gives it as the equivalent of 12 pukuls of Agar-agar; 6 of cinnamon; 3 of Triang.]

1.498.—"... and begged him to send to the King his Lord a bagar of cinnamon, and another of clove ... for sample" (a mostra).

—Rodeiro de V. da Gama, 78.

1506.—"In Cananor el suo Re si è zentili, e qui nascezzz (i.e. senzeveri or 'ginger'); ma li zz. poche e non così boni come quelli de Colcut, e suo peso si chiama baar, che sono K. (Cantari) 4 da Lisbôa."—Relazione di Leonardo da Masser, 26.

1510.—"If the merchandise about which they treat be spices, they deal by the bahar, which bahar weighs three of our cartari."—Varthema, p. 170.

1516.—"It (Malacca) has got such a quantity of gold, that the great merchants do not estimate their property, nor reckon otherwise than by bahars of gold, which are 4 quintals to each bahar."—Barbosa, 193.

1552.—"300 bahares of pepper."—Castanheda, ii. 301. Correa writes bares, as does also Couto.

1554.—"The bar of nuts (not) contains 20 faraças, and 5 maunds more of picota; thus the bar, with its picota, contains 20½ faraços."—A. Nunes, 6.

c. 1569.—"After this I saw one that would have given a barre of Pepper, which is two Quintals and a half, for a little Measure of water, and he could not have it."—C. Fredericke, in Hakl. ii. 358.

1598.—"Each Bahr of Sunda weigheth 300 cattos of China."—Einschoten, 34: [Hak. Soc. x. 113.]

1606.—"... their came in his company a Portuguese Saddilier, which brought a Warrant from the Capitaine to the Governor of Manilla, to trade with vs, and likewise to give John Rogers, for his pains a Bahr of Cloues."—Middleton's Voyage, D. 2. b.

1613.—"Porque os natarazs na quelle tempo possuyão muitos bares de ouro."—Godinho de Erodia, 4 v.

[1802.—"That at the proper season for gathering the pepper and for a Paltam weighing 13 rupees and 1/2 Vissam 120 of which are equal to a Paltam or Maund weigh-

Bahadur is one of the terms which the hosts of Chingiz Khan brought with them from the Mongol Steppes. In the Mongol genealogies we find Yesugai Bahadur, the father of Chingiz, and many more. Subutai Bahadur, one of the great soldiers of the Mongol host, twice led it to the conquest of Southern Russia, twice to that of Northern China. In Sanag Setzen’s poetical annals of the Mongols, as rendered by I. J. Schmidt, the word is written Baghatur, whence in Russian Bogatir still survives as a memento probably of the Tartar domination, meaning “a hero or champion.” It occurs often in the old Russian epic ballads in this sense; and is also applied to Samson of the Bible. It occurs in a Russian chronicle as early as 1240, but in application to Mongol leaders. In Polish it is found as Bo-hatyry; and in Hungarian as Bátor,—this last being in fact the popular Mongol pronunciation of Baghatur. In Turki also this elision of the guttural extends to the spelling, and the word becomes Bátur, as we find it in the Dicts. of Vambéry and Pavet de Courteille. In Manchu also the word takes the form of Baturu, expressed in Chinese characters as Po-tu-lu; the Kirghiz has it as Batyr; the Altai-Tataric as Paatyr, and the other dialects even as Magathyr. But the singular history of the word is not yet entirely told. Benfey has suggested that the word originated in Skt. bhoga-dhara (“happiness-possessing”).‡ But the late lamented Prof. A. Schieffner, who favoured us with a note on the subject, was strongly of opinion that the word was rather a corruption “through dissimilation of the consonant” of the Zend bagha-pathra “Son of God;” and thus but another form of the famous term Faghfür, by which the old Persians rendered the Chinese Tien-tao (“Son of Heaven”), applying it to the Emperor of China.

1280-90.—In an eccentric Persian poem purportedly stuffed with Mongol expressions, written by Furbası Jami in praise of Arghun Khan of Persia, of which Hammer has given a German translation, we have the following:

“...The Great Khan names thee his Ulugh-Bitekchi [Great Secretary].
Seeing thou art bitekchi and Behâdir to boot; O Well-beloved, the yarîgh [rescript] that thou dost issue is obeyed
By Turk and Mongol, by Persian, Greek, and Barbarian!”

Russian and German chroniclers, and the following add to the tale:

- c. 1400.—“...I ordained that every Ameer who should reduce a Kingdom, or defeat an army, should be exalted by three things: by a title of honour, by the Tugh [Yak’s tail standard], and by the Nakhâna [great kettle drum]; and should be dignified by the title of Bahadur.”—Timour’s Institutes, 283; see also 291-282.

1404.—“...E elles le dixeron q’ aquel era uno de los valîtes e Bahadures q’en el linage del Señor auia.”—Clavijo, § lxxxix.

- “...El home q’ este haze e mas vino beue dizen que es Bahadur, que dizen elles por homen rezo.”—Do. § exii.

1407.—“...The Prince mounted, escorted by a troop of Bahadures, who were always about his person.”—Abdurrazâk’s Hist. in Not. et Ezet. xiv. 126.

1536.—“...As a proper name. “...Itaqu ille potentissimus Rex Badur, Indiæ universæ terror, a quo nonulli regnâ Porî maximâ quodam regis tenere affirmant. ...”.—Letter from John III. of Portugal to Pope Paul III.

Hardly any native name occurs more frequently in the Portuguese Hist. of India than this of Badur—viz. Bahadur Shâh, the warlike and powerful king of Guzerat (1826-37), killed in a fray which closed an interview with the Viceroy, Nuno da Cunha, at Diu.

1754.—“...The Kirgez Tartars ... are divided into three Horâds, under the Government of a Khan. That part which borders on the Russian dominions was under the authority of Jean Beek, whose name on all occasions was honoured with the title of Bater.”—Harvey, 1. 239. The name Jean Beek is probably Janibek, a name which one finds among the hordes as far back as the early part of the 14th century (see Ibn Batuta, ii. 397).

1759.—“...From Shah Alum Bahadre, son of Alum Guire, the Great Mogul, and successor of the Empire, to Colonel Sabut Jung Bahadre” (i.e. Clive).—Letter in Long, p. 163.

We have said that the title Behaunder (Bahadur) was one by which Hyder Ali of Mysore was commonly known in his day. Thus in the two next quotations:

* At Lord Wellesley’s table, Major Malcolm mentioned as a notable fact that he and three of his brothers had once met together in India. “Impossible, Malcolm, quite impossible!” said the Governor-General. Malcolm persisted. “No, no,” said Lord Wellesley, “if four Malcolms had met, we should have heard the noise all over India!”

1872.—"... the word 'Bahadur'... (at the Mogul's Court)... was only used as an epithet. Ahmed Shah used it as a title and ordered his name to be read in the Friday prayer as 'Mujahid ud din Muhammad Abi nayr Ahmad Shâh Bahadur. Hence also 'Kampani Bahadur,' the name by which the E. I. Company is still in India. The modern 'Khan Bahadur' is, in Bengal, by permission assumed by Muhammedan Deputy Magistrates, whilst Hindu Deputy Magistrates assume 'Râj Bahadur'; it stands, of course, for 'Khân-i-Bahadur, 'the courageous Khan.' The compound, however, is a modern abnormal one; for 'Khân' was conferred by the Dihli Em-perors, and so also 'Bahadur' and 'Bahadur Khân,' but not 'Khân Bahadur.'"—PROF. BLOCKMAN, in Ind. Antiquary, i. 281.

1876.—"Reverencing at the same time bravery, dash, and boldness, and loving their freedom, they (the Kirghiz) were always ready to follow the standard of any batyr, or hero, ... who might appear on the stage."—SCHUYLER'S Turkestan, i. 33.

1878.—"Peacock feathers for some of the subordinate officers, a yellow jacket for the successful general, and the bestowal of the Manchoo title of Baturu, or 'Brave,' on some of the most distinguished brigadiers, are probably all the honours which await the return of a triumphal army. The reward which fell to the share of 'Chinese Gordon' for the part he took in the suppression of the Taiping rebellion was a yellow jacket, and the title of Baturu has lately been bestowed on Mr Mesny for years of faithful service against the rebels in the province of Kwei-chow."—SATURDAY REV., Aug. 10, p. 182.

"... There is nothing of the great bahawder about him."—ATHENÆUM, No. 2670, p. 581.

1879.—"This strictly prohibitive Proclamation is issued by the Provincial Administrative Board of Likin... and Chang, Brevet- Provincial Judge, chief of the Foochow Likin Central Office, Taot'ai for special service, and Bat'uru with the title of 'Awe-inspiring Brave.'"—Transl. of Proclamation against the cultivation of the Poppy in Foochow, July 1879.

BAHIRWUTTEEA, s. Guj. bāhirwatā. A species of outlawry in Guzerat; bāhirwatā, the individual practising the offence. It consists in the Rajpoots or Grassias making their ryots and dependants quit their native village, which is suffered to remain waste; the Grassias with his brethren then retires to some asylum, whence he may carry on his depredations with impunity. Being well acquainted with the country, and the redress of injuries being common cause with the members of every family, the Bahir-wutteea has little to fear from those who are not in the immediate interest of his enemy, and he is in consequence enabled to commit very extensive mischief."—COL. WALKER, quoted in FORBES, Râs Mâla, 2nd ed., p. 364-5. Col. Walker derives the name from bâthir, 'out,' and wât, 'a road.' [Tod, in a note to the passage quoted below, says "this term is a compound of bār (bâthir) and wuttan (wât), literally ex patriâ."]

[1829.—"This petty chieftain, who enjoyed the distinctive epithet of outlaw (bàihrwatâ), was of the Sonicurra clan. ..."— pers. NARR., in Annals of Raj. (Calcutta reprint), i. 724.]

The origin of most of the brigandage in Sicily is almost what is here described in Kattîwār.

BAIKREE, s. The Bombay name for the Barking-deer. It is Guzarâti bekri; and acc.to JERDON and [BLANDFORD, Mammalia, 533] Mahr. bekra or bekar, but this is not in Molesworth's Dict. [FORSYTH (Highlands of C. I., p. 470) gives the Gond and Korku names as Bherki, which may be the original].

1879.—"Any one who has shot baikri on the spurs of the Ghats can tell how it is possible unerringly to mark down these little beasts, taking up their position for the day in the early dawn."—OVERT. TIMES OF INDIA, Suppt. May 12, 7b.

BAJRA, s. H. bôtjra and bôtjri (Pezzellaia spicata, Willden.). One of the tall millets forming a dry crop in many parts of India. Forbes calls it bajiree (OR. MEM. ii. 406; [2nd ed. i. 167], and bajiree (i. 23)].

1844.—"The ground (at Maharajpore) was generally covered with bajree, full 5 or 6 feet high."—LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in Ind. Admin. 414.

BÂKIR-KHÂNÎ, s. P.—H. bâqîrvkhâni; a kind of cake almost exactly resembling pie-crust, said to owe its name to its inventor, Bâkîr Khân.
BALÁCHONG, BLACHONG, s. Malay baláckán; [acc. to Mr Skeat the standard Malay is blachan, in full belachan.] The characteristic condiment of the Indo-Chinese and Malay races, composed of prawns, sardines, and other small fish, allowed to ferment in a heap, and then mashed up with salt. [Mr Skeat says that it is often, if not always, trodden out like grapes.] Marsden calls it 'a species of caviare,' which is hardly fair to caviare. It is the ngiḍi (Ngapee) of the Burmese, and triši (of the Javanese, and is probably, as Crawford says, the Roman garum. One of us, who has witnessed the process of preparing ngiḍi on the island of Negrais, is almost disposed to agree with the Venetian Gasparo Balbi (1583), who says "he would rather smell a dead dog, to say nothing of eating it" (f. 125r). But when this experience is absent it may be more tolerable.

1683.—Dampier writes it Balachason, ii. 28.

1727.—"Boonkamy is famous for making Ballichang, a Sauce made of dried Shrimps, Cod-pepper, Salt, and a Sea-weed or Grass, all well mixed and beaten up to the Consistency of thick Mustard."—A. Hamilton, ii. 194. The same author, in speaking of Pegu, calls the like sauce Prock (44), which was probably the Talain name. It appears also in Sonnerat under the form Prox (ii. 305).

1784.—"Blachang . . . is esteemed a great delicacy among the Malays, and is by them exported to the west of India. It is a species of caviare, and is extremely offensive and disgusting to persons who are not accustomed to it."—Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 57.

[1871.—Riddell (Ind. Domest. Econ. p. 227) gives a receipt for Ballachong, of which the basis is prawns, to which are added chilies, salt, garlic, tamarind juice, &c.]

BALAGHAUT, used as n.p.; P. balt, 'above,' H. Mahr., &c., ghát, 'a pass,'—the country 'above the passes,' i.e. above the passes over the range of mountains which we call the 'Western Ghauts.' The mistaken idea that ghát means 'mountains' causes Forbes to give a nonsensical explanation, cited below. The expression may be illustrated by the old Scotch phrases regarding "below and above the Pass" of so and so, implying Lowlands and Highlands.

c. 1562.—"All these things were brought by the Moors, who traded in pepper which they brought from the hills where it grew, by land in Binsega, and Balagate, and Cambay."—Correa, ed. Ld. Stanley, Hak. Soc. p. 344.

1563.—"R. Let us get on horseback and go for a ride; and as we go you shall tell me what is the meaning of Nizamoshia (Nizamaluco), for you often speak to me of such a person.

"O, I will tell you now that he is King in the Bagalate (misprint for Balagate), whose father I have often attended medically, and the son himself sometimes. From him I have received in time to time more than 12,000 pardoas; and he offered me a salary of 40,000 pardoas if I would visit him for so many months every year, but I would not accept."—Garçia de Orta, f. 33v.

1598.—"This high land on the toppe is very flatte and good to build upon, called Balagatte."—Linackoten, 20; [Hak. Soc. i. 15; cf. i. 255].

1614.—"The coast of Coromandel, Balagott or Telingana."—Sainsbury, i. 301.

1673.—". . . opening the ways to Bili-gaot, that Merchants might with safety bring down their Goods to Port."—Fryer, 78.

c. 1760.—"The Ball-a-gat Mountains, which are extremely high, and so called from Bel, mountain, and gatt, flat [?], because one part of them affords large and delicious plains on their summit, little known to Europeans."—Grose, i. 231.

This is nonsense, but the following are also absurd misdescriptions:—

1805.—"Bala Gaht, the higher or upper Gaat or Gaht, a range of mountains so called to distinguish them from the Payen Gahts, the lower Gahts or Passes."—Dict. of Words used in E. India, 28.

1813.—"In some parts this tract is called the Balla-Gaut, or high mountains; to distinguish them from the lower Gaut, nearer the sea."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 119].

BALASORE, n.p. A town and district of Orissa; the site of one of the earliest English factories in the "Bay," established in 1642, and then an important seaport; supposed to be properly Bāléśvara, Skt. bāla, 'strong,' āśvāra, 'lord,' perhaps with reference to Krishna. Another place of the same name in Madras, an isolated peak, 6762' high, lat. 11° 41' 43'', is said to take its name from the Asura Bana.

1676.—

"When in the vale of Balaser I fought,
And from Bengal the captive Monarch brought."

Dryden, Annwnyzebe, ii. 1.

1727.—"The Sea-shore of Bālawes, being very low, and the Depths of Water very gradual from the Strand, make Ships in Bāllasore Road keep a good Distance from the Shore; for in 4 or 5 Fathoms, they ride 3 Leagues off."—A. Hamilton, i. 397.

s. A kind of ruby, or rather a rose-red spinelle. This is not an Anglo-Indian word, but it is a word of Asiatic origin, occurring frequently in old travellers. It is a corruption of Balakhshī, a popular form of Badakhshān, because these rubies came from the famous mines on the Upper Oxus, in one of the districts subject to Badakhshān. [See Vambréy, Sketches, 255; Ball, Tavernier, i. 382 n.]

c. 1350.—"The mountains of Badakhshān have given their name to the Badakhshī ruby, vulgarly called at-Balashāh."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 59, 394.

1404.—"Tenia (Tamerlan) vestido vna ropa et vn paño de seda raso sin lavores e à la cabeza tenia vn sombrero blaco alto con un Balax en cima e con aljofar e piedras."—Clavijo, § cx.

1516.—"These balasses are found in Balaxayo, which is a kingdom of the mainland near Pegu and Bengal."—Barbosa, 213. This is very bad geography for Barbosa, who is usually accurate and judicious, but it is surpassed in much later days.

1531.—"I could never understand from whence those that be called Balassi come."—Caesar Fredericke, in Hakt. i. 572.

[1598.—"The Ballayese are likewise sold by weight."—Linckoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 156.]

1611.—"Of Ballace Rubies little and great, and good and bad, there are single two thousand pieces" (in Akbar's treasury).—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 217.

1673.—"The last sort is called a Balace Ruby, which is not in so much esteem as the Spinell, because it is not so well coloured."—Fryer, 215.

1689.—"... The Balace Ruby is supposed by some to have taken its name from Palatium, or Palace;... the most probable Conjecture is that of Marcus Plutus Venetus, that it is borrow'd from the Country, where they are found in greatest Plentie. "..."—Ovington, 588.

s. Not an Anglo-Indian word, but sometimes regarded as of Oriental origin; a thing more than doubtful. The etymology alluded to by Mr. Schuyler and by the lamented William Gill in the quotations below, is not new, though we do not know who first suggested it. Neither do we know whether the word balagani, which Erman (Tr. in Siberia, E. T. i. 115) tells us is the name given to the wooden booths at the Nijnei Fair, be the same P. word or no. Wedgwood, Litrè, [and the N.E.D.] connect balcony with the word which appears in English as balk, and with the Italian balco, 'a scaffolding' and the like, also used for 'a box' at the play. Balco, as well as paleo, is a form occurring in early Italian. Thus Franc. da Buti, commenting on Dante (1385-87), says: "Balco è locuo alto doue si monta e scende." Hence naturally would be formed balcone, which we have in Giov. Villani, in Boccaccio and in Petrarch. Manuzzi (Vocabolario It.) defines balcone as = finestra (?)

It may be noted as to the modern pronunciation that whilst ordinary mortals (including among verse-writers Scott and Lockhart, Tennison and Hood) accent the word as a dactyl (bālōnc), the crème de la crème, if we are not mistaken, makes it, or did in the last generation make it, as Cowper does below, an amphibrach (bālōncyn): "Xanthus his name with those of heavenly birth, But called Scamander by the sons of earth!" [According to the N.E.D. the present pronunciation, "which," said Sam. Rogers, "makes me sick," was established about 1825.]

c. 1348.—"E al continuo v'era pieno di belle donne a' balconi."—Giov. Villani, x. 132-4.

c. 1340-50.—

"Il figliuol di Latona avea già nove Volute guardato dal balcon sovrano, Per quella, ch'ha'ncan tempo mosse I suoi sospiro, ed ogn'altro commove in vano."—Petrarco, Rime, Pte. i. Sonn. 35, ed. Pisa, 1805.
c. 1340-50.—

"Ma si com' onom talor che piange, a parte Vede cosa che gli occhi, e 'l cor alletta, Coel coelo per ch'io son in prigione Standosi ad un balcone,
Che fu sola a' suoi di cosa perfetta
Comincia a mirar con tale deso Che me stesso, e 'l mio mal poso in oblio:
'l era in terra, e 'l cor mio in Paradiso."

1645-52.—"When the King sits to do Justice, I observe that he comes into the Balcone that looks into the Piazza."— Tavernier, E. T. ii. 64; [ed. Ball, i. 152].

1667.—"And be it further enacted, That in the Front of all Houses, hereafter to be erected in any such Streets as by Act of Common Council shall be declared to be High Streets, Balconies Four Foot broad with Rails and Bars of Iron shall be placed...."—Act 19 Car. II., cap. 3, sect. 13. (Act for Rebuilding the City of London.)

"At Edmonton his loving wife From the balconies spied Her tender husband, wond'ring much To see how he did ride."

"For from the lofty balcony, Rung trumpet, shalm and psaltery."

"Under tower and balconies, By garden-wall and gallery, A gleaming shape she floated by, Dead pale between the houses high."

Tennyson's Lady of Shalott.

1876.—"The houses (in Turkistan) are generally of but one story, though sometimes there is a small upper room called bala-khawa (P. bala, upper, and khawa, room) whence we get our balcony."—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 120.

1880.—"Bala khawa means 'upper house,' or 'upper place,' and is applied to the room built over the archway by which the choppa khana is entered, and from it, by the way, we got our word 'Balcony.'"—MS. Journal in Persia of Captain W. J. Gill, R.E.

BALOON, BALLOON, &c., s. A rowing vessel formerly used in various parts of the Indies, the basis of which was a large canoe, or 'dug-out.' There is a Mahr. word bālēnā, a kind of large, which is probably the original. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiv. 26.]

1539.—"E embarcando-se...partiu, eo forão acompanhand o deu ou doze balões ate a lhâ de Upe...."—Pinto, ch. xiv.

"Neste tempo da terra para a armada Balões, e cal' luzes cruzar vimos...."

—Malaca Conquistada, iii. 44.

1673.—"The President commanded his own Baloon (a Barge of State, of Two and Twenty Oars) to attend me."—Fryer, 70.

1755.—"The Burmas has now Eighty Balongs, none of which as [sic] great Guns,"—Letter from Capt. R. Jackson, in Dalrymple Or. Report, i. 195.

1811.—"This is the simplest of all boats, and consists merely of the trunk of a tree hollowed out, to the extremities of which pieces of wood are applied, to represent a stern and prow; the two sides are boards joined by rottins or small bambous without nails; no iron whatsoever enters into their construction. . . . The Baloons are used in the district of Chittagong."—Nolens, iii.

BALSORA, BUSSORA, &c., n.p. These old forms used to be familiar from their use in the popular version of the Arabian Nights after Galland. The place is the sea-port city of Basra at the mouth of the Shat-al'Arab, or United Euphrates and Tigris. [Burton (Ar. Nights, x. 1) writes Bassorah.]

c. 1580.—"Balsara, altrimenti detta Bassora, è una città posta nell' Arabia, la quale al presente e signorreggiata dal Turco... è città di gran negozio di spettarie, di droghe, e altre merci che uengono d'Ormus; è abondante di dattoli, risi, e graniti."—Balbi, f. 32r.

1671.—

"From Atropatia and the neighbouring plains... Of Adiabene, Media, and the south Of Susiana to Balsara's Haven...."

—Paradise Regained, iii.

1747.—"He (the Prest of Bombay) further advises us that they have wrote our Honble. Masters of the Loss of Madras by way of Busero, the 7th of November."—Pt. St. David Consn., 8th January 1746-7. MS. in India Office.

[Also see CONGO.]

BALTY, s. H. bāltī, 'a bucket,' which Platts very impossibly connects with Skt. vazā, 'water,' is the Port. balde.

BÁLVAR, s. This is the native servant's form of 'barber, shaped by the 'striving after meaning' as bālvar, for bālval, i.e. 'capillarius,' 'hair-man.' It often takes the further form bāl-būr, another factitious hybrid, shaped by P. bāridan, 'to cut,' quasi 'hair-cutter.' But though now obsolete, there was also (see both Meninski and Vullers s.v.) a Persian word bârbâr, for a barber or surgeon, from which came this Turkish term "Le Barber-bachi, qui fait la barbe au Pacha," which we find (c. 1674) in the Appendix to the Journal of Antoine Galland, pubd. at Paris, 1881 (ii. 190).

It looks as if this must have been an early loan from Europe.

BAMBOO, s. Applied to many gigantic grasses, of which Bambusa arundinacea and B. vulgaris are the most commonly cultivated; but there are many other species of the same and allied genera in use; natives of tropical Asia, Africa, and America. This word, one of the commonest in Anglo-Indian daily use, and thoroughly naturalised in English, is of exceedingly obscure origin. According to Wilson it is Canarese bûmbû [or as the Madras Admin. Man. (Gloss. s.v.) writes it, bombu], which is said to be "onomatopaeic from the crackling and explosions when they burn". Marsden inserts it in his dictionary as good Malay. Crawford says it is certainly used on the west coast of Sumatra as a native word, but that it is elsewhere unknown to the Malay languages. The usual Malay word is buluh. He thinks it more likely to have found its way into English from Sumatra than from Canara. But there is evidence enough of its familiarity among the Portuguese before the end of the 16th century to indicate the probability that we adopted the word, like so many others, through them. We believe that the correct Canarese word is baunav. In the 16th century the form in the Concan appears to have been mumbu, or at least it was so represented by the Portuguese. Rumphius seems to suggest a quainter onomatopoeia: "vehementissimos edunt ictus et sonitus, quum incendio conburuntur, quando notum ejus nomen Bambu, Bambo, facile exanditur."—(Herb. Amb. iv. 17.) [Mr. Skewet writes: "Although buluh is the standard Malay, and bombu apparently introduced, I think bombu is the form used in the low Javanese vernacular, which is quite a different language from high Javanese. Even in low Javanese, however, it may be a borrowed word. It looks curiously like a trade corruption of the common Malay word samambu, which means the well-known 'Malacca cane,' both the bamboo and the Malacca cane being articles of export. Kleftert says that the samambu is a kind of rattan, which was used as a walking-stick, and which was called the Malacca cane by the English. This Malacca cane and the rattan 'bamboo cane' referred to by Sir H. Yule must surely be identical. The fuller Malay name is actually rotan samambu, which is given as the equivalent of Calamus Scipionum, Lour. by Mr. Ridley in his Plant List (J.R.A.S., July 1897).

The term applied to tabapeshir (Tabasheer), a siliceous concretion in the bamboo, in our first quotation seems to show that bambu or mumbu was one of the words which the Portuguese inherited from an earlier use by Persian or Arab traders. But we have not been successful in finding other proof of this. With reference to sôkkâr-mambu, Ritter says: "That this drug (Tabashir), as a product of the bamboo-cane, is to this day known in India by the name of Succar Mambu is a thing which no one needs to be told" (ix. 334). But in fact the name seems now entirely unknown.

It is possible that the Canarese word is a vernacular corruption, or development, of the Skt. avaśa [or vambha], from the former of which comes the H. bâns. Bamboo does not occur, so far as we can find, in any of the earlier 16th-century books, which employ canna or the like.

In England the term bamboo-cane is habitually applied to a kind of walking-stick, which is formed not from any bamboo but from a species of rattan. It may be noted that some 30 to 35 years ago there existed along the high road between Putney Station and West Hill a garden fence of bamboos of considerable extent; it often attracted the attention of one of the present writers.

1568.—"The people from whom it (tабашкр) is got call it sucar-mambu . . . because the canes of that plant are called by the Indians mumbu."—Garcia, f. 194.

1578.—"Some of these (canes), especially in Malabar, are found so large that the people make use of them as boats (embarcaciones) not opening them out, but cutting one of the canes right across and using the natural knots to stop the ends, and so a couple of naked blacks go upon it . . . each of them at his own end of the mumbu [in orig. mabu] (so they call it), being provided with two paddles, one in each hand . . . .

and so upon a canoe of this kind the folk pass across, and sitting with their legs clinging naked."—C. Acosta, Tratado, 296.

Again:

". . . and many people on that river (of Crangamar) make use of these canoes in place of boats, to be safe from the numerous Crocodiles or Caymanis (as they call them) which are in the river (which are in fact great and ferocious lizards)"—Ibid.—Ibid. 297.

These passages are curious as explaining, if they hardly justify, Ctesias, in what we have regarded as one of his greatest bounces, viz. his story of Indian canes big enough to be used as boats.

1586.——"All the houses are made of canes, which they call Bambos, and bee covered with Straw."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 391.

1598.——. . . a thicke reede as big as a man's legge, which is called Bambus."—Linneotken, 59; [Hak. Soc. i. 195].

c. 1610.——"Les Portugais et les Indiens ne se servent point d'autres bastons pour porter leurs palanquins ou litières. Ils l'appellent partont Bambou."—Pyrard, i. 237; [Hak. Soc. i. 329].

1615.——"These two kings (of Camboja and Siam) have neyther Horses, nor any fiery Instruments; but make use only of bowes, and a certaine kind of pike, made of a knottie wood like Canes, called Bambuc, which is exceeding strong, though plant and supple for vse."—De Monfort, 33.

1621.——"These Forts will better appeare by the Draught thereof, herewith sent to your Worships, inclosed in a Bamboo."—Letter in Porches, i. 699.

1620.——"Among the other trees there was an immanse quantity of bambû, or very large Indian canes, and all clothed and covered with pretty green folige that went creeping up them."—P. della Valle, ii. 840; [Hak. Soc. ii. 220].

c. 1666.——"Cette machine est suspendue à une longue barre que l'on appelle Pambou."—Thevenot, v. 162. (This spelling recurs throughout a chapter describing palankins, though elsewhere the traveller writes bambou.)

1673.——"A Bambo, which is a long hollow cane."—Fryer, 34.

1727.——"The City (Awa) tho' great and populous, is only built of Bambou canes."—A. Hamilton, ii. 47.

1855.——"When I speak of bamboo huts, I mean to say that post and walls, wall-plates and rafters, floor and thatch and the withes that bind them, are all of bamboo. In fact it might almost be said that among the Indo-Chinese nations the staff of life is a Bambou. Scaffolding and ladders, landing-jetties, fishing apparatus, irrigation-wheels and scoops, oars, masts and yards, spears and arrows, hats and helmets, bow, bow-string and quiver, oil-cans, water-stoups and cooking-pots, pipe-sticks, conduits, clothes-boxes, pan-boxes, dinner-trays, pickles, preserves, and melodious musical instruments, toches, footballs, cordage, bellows, mats, paper, these are but a few of the articles that are made from the bamboo."—Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 158.

To these may be added, from a cursory inspection of a collection in one of the museums at Kew, combs, mugs, sun-blinds, cages, grotesque carvings, brushes, fans, shirts, sails, teapots, pipes and harps.

Bamboos are sometimes popularly distinguished (after a native idiom) as male and female; the latter embracing all the common species with hollow stems, the former title being applied to a certain kind (in fact, a sp. of a distinct genus, Dendrocalamus strictus), which has a solid or nearly solid core, and is much used for bludgeons (see LATTEE) and spear-shafts. It is remarkable that this popular distinction by sex was known to Ctesias (c. B.C. 400) who says that the Indian reeds were divided into male and female, the male having no ēntepāwmp.

One of the present writers has seen (and partaken of) rice cooked in a joint of bamboo, among the Khyens, a hill-people of Arakan. And Mr Markham mentions the same practice as prevalent among the Churchos and savage aborigines on the eastern slopes of the Andes (J. R. Geog. Soc. xxv. 155). An endeavour was made in Pegu in 1855 to procure the largest obtainable bamboo. It was a little over 10 inches in diameter. But Clusius states that he had seen two great specimens in the University at Leyden, 30 feet long and from 14 to 16 inches in diameter. And E. Haeckel, in his Visit to Ceylon (1882), speaks of bamboo-stems at Peridenia, "each from a foot to two feet thick." We can obtain no corroboration of anything approaching 2 feet. [See Gray's note on Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 330.]

BAMÔ, n.p. Burn. Bha-maw, Shan Manmaw; in Chinese Sin-Kai, "New-market." A town on the upper Irrawadi, where one of the chief routes from China abuts on that river; regarded as the early home of the Karens. [(McMahon, Karens of the Golden Cher., 103.)] The old Shan town of Banió was on the Tapeng R., about 20 m. east of the Irawadi, and it is supposed that the English factory alluded to in the quotations was there.

1759.—"This branch seems formerly to have been driven from the Establishment at Prammo."—Dalympie, Or. Rep., i. 111.

BANANA, s. The fruit of Musa paradisaca, and M. sapientum of Linnaeus, but now reduced to one species under the latter name by R. Brown. This word is not used in India, though one hears it in the Straits Settlements. The word itself is said by De Orta to have come from Guinea; so also Pigafetta (see below). The matter will be more conveniently treated under PLANTAIN. Prof. Robertson Smith points out that the coincidence of this name with the Ar. banan, 'fingers or toes,' and banana, 'a single finger or toe,' can hardly be accidental. The fruit, as we learn from Mukaddasi, grew in Palestine before the Crusades; and that it is known in literature only as mauz would not prove that the fruit was not somewhere popularly known as 'fingers.' It is possible that the Arabs, through whom probably the fruit found its way to W. Africa, may have transmitted with it a name like this; though historical evidence is still to seek. [Mr. Skeat writes: "It is curious that in Norwegian and Danish (and I believe in Swedish), the exact Malay word pisang, which is unknown in England, is used. Prof. Skeat thinks this may be because we had adopted the word banana before the word pisang was brought to Europe at all."] 1563.—"The Arab calls these musa or awasa; there are chapters on the subject in Avicenna and Serapion, and they call them by this name, as does Rasis also. Moreover, in Guinea they have these figs, and call them bananas."—García, 93v.

1598.—"Other fruits there were termed Banana, which we think to be the Musas of Egypt and Soria . . . but here they cut them yearly, to the end they may bear the better."—Tr. of Pigafetta's Congo, in Harleian Coll. ii. 553 (also in Purchas, ii. 1068.)

c. 1610.—"Des bannes (marginal rubric Bannanes) que les Portugais appellent figues d'Inde, and aux Maldives Quella."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 55; [Hak. Soc. i. 115]. The Maldivian word is here the same as H. kolá (Skt. kadalá).

1673.—"Bananoes, which are a sort of Plantain, though less, yet much more grateful."—Fryer, 40.

1686.—"The Banano tree is exactly like the Plantain for shape and bigness, not easily distinguishable from it but by the Fruit, which is a great deal smaller."—Dampier, i. 316.

BANCHOOT, BETEECHOOT, ss. Terms of abuse, which we should hesitate to print if their odious meaning were not obscure "to the general." If it were known to the Englishmen who sometimes use the words, we believe there are few who would not shrink from such brutality. Something similar in character seem the words which Saul in his rage flings at his noble son (1 Sam. xx. 30).

1688.—"L'on nous monstra à vne demy lieue de la ville vn sepulcre, qu'ils appellent Betchuit, c'est à dire la vergone de la fille decouverte."—Mandelsto, Paris, 1658, 142. See also Valentijn, iv. 157.

There is a handsome tomb and mosque to the N. of Ahmedabad, erected by Hajji Malik Bahá-ud-din, a wazir of Sultan Mohammed Bigara, in memory of his wife Bibi Achut or Achkut; and probably the vile story to which the 17th-century travellers refer is founded only on a vulgar misrepresentation of this name.

1648.—"Betchuit; dat is (onder eerbreiding gesprooen) in one tale te seggen, u Dooters Schaemelheyt."—Van Twist, 16.

1792.—"The officer (of Tippoo's troops) who led, on being challenged in Moors answered (Agari que logve), 'We belong to the advance'—the title of Lilly's brigade, supposing the people he saw to be their own Europeans, whose uniform also is red; but soon discovering his mistake the commandant called out (Pereunky Banchoot!—ckelow) 'they are the rascally English!' Make off'; in which he set the corps a ready example."—Dirom's Narrative, 147.

BANCOCK, n.p. The modern capital of Siam, properly Bangkok; see explanation by Bp. Pallegoix in quotation. It had been the site of forts erected on the ascent of the Menam to the old capital Ayuthia, by Constantine Phaulcon in 1675; here the modern seat of government was established as the seat of government in 1767, after the capture of Ayuthia (see JUDEA) by the Burmese in that year. It is uncertain if the first quotation refer to Bancock.
1552.—"... and Bampiacot, which stands at the mouth of the Menam."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1611.—"They had arrived in the Road of Syjam the fifteenth of August, and cast Anchor at three fathome high water... The Towne lyeth some thirtie leagues vp along the River, whither they sent newes of their arrivall. The Sabander (see SHAH-BUNDER) and the Governor of Mancok (a place situateid by the River), came backe with the Messengers to receive his Majesties Letters, but chiefly for the presents expected."—P. Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 321.

1727.—The Ship arrived at Bencock, a Castle about half-way up, where it is customary for all Ships to put their Guns ashore."—A. Hamilton, i. 366.

BANDANNA, s. This term is properly applied to the rich yellow or red silk handkerchief, with diamond spots left white by pressure applied to prevent their receiving the dye. The etymology may be gathered from Shakespear's Dict., which gives "Bän dividends: 1. A mode of dyeing in which the cloth is tied in different places, to prevent the parts tied from receiving the dye; . . . 3. A kind of silk cloth." A class or caste in Guzerat who do this kind of preparation for dyeing are called Bandhurá (Drummond). [Such handkerchiefs are known in S. India as Pulicat handkerchiefs. Cloth dyed in this way is in Upper India known as Chāñári. A full account of the process will be found in Journ. Ind. Art., ii. 63, and S. M. Hadi's Mon. on Dyes and Dyeing, p. 35.]

1813.—"Bandannooes . . . 800."—Millburn (List of Bengal Piece-goods, and no. to the ton), ii. 221.

1848.—"Mr Scaple, lately admitted partner into the great Calcutta House of Fogle, Fake, and Crackman... taking Fake's place, who retired to a princely Park in Sussex (the Foggles have long been out of the firm, and Sir Horace Fogle is about to be raised to the peerage as Baron Bandanna), . . . two years before it failed for a million, and plunged half the Indian public into misery and ruin."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. 25.

1866.—"'Of course,' said Toogood, wiping his eyes with a large red bandana handkerchief. 'By all means, come along, Major.' The major had turned his face away, and he also was weeping."—Last Chronicle of Barset, ii. 362.

1875.—"In Calcutta Tariff Valuations: 'Piece goods silk: Bandanah Choppahs, per piece of 7 handkerchiefs... score... 115 Rs.'

BANDAREE, s. Mahr. Bhandārī, the name of the caste or occupation. It is applied at Bombay to the class of people (of a low caste) who tend the coco-palm gardens in the island, and draw toddy, and who at one time formed a local militia. [It has no connection with the more common Bhandārī, 'a treasurer or storekeeper.'] 1548.—"... certain duties collected from the bandarys who draw the toddy (eurot) from the aldeas..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 263.

1841.—"The people... are all Christians, or at least the greater part of them consisting of artizans, carpenters, bandaries (this word is manifestly a mistranscription of bandaris), whose business is to gather nuts from the coco-palms, and corumbus (see KOONBEE) who till the ground..."—Bocarro, M.S.

1673.—"The President... if he go abroad, the Bandarines and Moors under two Standards march before him."—Fryer, 68.

. . . besides 60 Field-pieces ready in their Carriages upon occasion to attend the Militia and Bandarines."—Ibid. 66.

c. 1760.—"There is also on the island kept up a sort of militia, composed of the land-tillers, and bandarees, whose living depends chiefly on the cultivation of the coco-nut trees."—Grose, i. 46.

1808.—"... whilst on the Brab trees the cast of Bhundaries paid a due for extracting the liquor."—Bombay Regulation, i. of 1808, sect. vi. para. 2.

1810.—"Her husband came home, laden with toddy for distilling. He is a bandari or toddy-gatherer."—Maria Graham, 26.

c. 1836.—"Of the Bhundaries the most remarkable usage is their fondness for a peculiar species of long trumpet, called Bhongales, which, ever since the dominion of the Portuguese, they have had the privilege of carrying and blowing on certain State occasions."—R. Murphy, in Tr. Bo. Geol. Soc. i. 131.

1883.—"We have received a letter from one of the large BHUNDARIES in the city, pointing out that the tax on toddy trees is now Rs. 18 (1 Rs. 1. 8 as.) per tapped toddy tree per annum, whereas in 1872 it was only BANDEJAH. s. Port. bandeja, 'a salver,' 'a tray to put presents on.' We have seen the word used only in the following passages:

1621. —'We and the Hollanders went to vizet Semi Dono, and we carid bym a bottell of strong water, and an other of Spanish wine, with a great box (or bandeja) of sweet bread.'—Cocks's Diary, ii. 143.

1753. —'... the officers of the Portuguese presidents, from the courts of Portuguese Porto, Germany, and many other parts of Europe, have brought as much wine of the best quality with them.'—D'Aubert, Éclaircissements, p. 64.

1758. —'... there are five European factories within the space of 20 miles, on the opposite banks of the river Ganges in Bengal; Houghly, or Bandel, the Portuguese Presidency; Chinsura, the Dutch; Chandernagore, the French; Sirampore, the Danish; and Calcutta, the English.'—Price's Observations, &c., p. 51. In Price's Tracts, i.

BANDICOOT. s. Corr. from the Telegu pandi-kokku, lit. 'pig-rat.' The name has spread all over India, as applied to the great rat called by naturalists Mus malabaricus (Blanford), Mus giganteus (Hardwicke), Mus bandicota (Bechstein), [Nesokia bandicota (Blanford, p. 425)]. The word is now used also in Queensland, and is the origin of the name of the famous Bendigo gold-field (3 ser. N. & Q. ix. 97).

c. 1300. —'In Lesser India there are some rats as big as foxes, and venomous exceedingly.'—Friar Jordanus, Hak. Soc. 29.

c. 1348. —'They imprison in the dungeons (of Dwaigir, i.e. Dalatatabad) those who have been guilty of great crimes. There are in those dungeons enormous rats, bigger than cats. In fact, these latter animals run away from them, and can't stand against them, for they would get the worst of it. So they are only caught by stratagem. I have seen these rats at Dwaigir, and much amazed I was !'—Ibn Batuta, iv. 47.

Fryer seems to exaggerate worse than the Moor:

1673. —'For Vermin, the strongest huge Rats as big as our Pigs, which burrow under the Houses, and are bold enough to venture to Poultry.'—Fryer, 116.

The following surprisingly confounds two entirely different animals:

1789. —'The Bandicoot, or musk rat, is another troublesome animal, more indeed from its offensive smell than anything else.'—Munro, Narrative, 32. See MUSK-RAT.

[1828. —'They be called Brandy-cutes.'—Or. Sporting Mag. i. 128.]

BANDEJA, n.p. The name of the old Portuguese settlement in Bengal about a mile above Hoogly, where there still exists a monastery, said to be the oldest church in Bengal (see Imp. Gazeteer). The name is a Port. corruption of bandar, 'the wharf;' and in this shape the word was applied among the Portuguese to a variety of places. Thus in Correa, under 1541-42, we find mention of a port in the Red Sea, near the mouth, called Bandel dos Malemos ('of the Pilots'). Chittagong is called Bandel de Chatiqito (e.g. in Bocarre, p. 444), corresponding to Bandar Chatiqim in the Autobiog. of Jahangir (Elliot, vi. 326). In the Diary of Sir T. Roe (see below) it is applied to Gomboon], and in the following passage the original no doubt runs Bandar-i-Hughli or Hughli-Bandar.

1631. —'... these Europeans increased in number, and erected large substantial buildings, which they fortified with cannons, muskets, and other implements of war. In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of Port of Hughli.'—Abdul Hamid, in Elliot, vii. 32.

1753. —'... les établissements formés pour assurer leur commerce sont situés sur les bords de cette rivière. Celui des Portugais, qu'ils ont appelé Bandel, en adoptant le terme Persan de Bender, qui signifie port, est aujourd'hui réduit à peu de chose ... et il est presque contigu à Ugli en remontant.'—D'Aubert, Éclaircissements, p. 64.

1768. —'... there are five European factories within the space of 20 miles, on the opposite banks of the river Ganges in Bengal; Houghly, or Bandel, the Portuguese Presidency; Chinsura, the Dutch; Chandernagore, the French; Sirampore, the Danish; and Calcutta, the English.'—Price's Observations, &c., p. 51. In Price's Tracts, i.
1879.—"I shall never forget my first night here (on the Cocos Islands). As soon as the Sun had gone down, and the moon risen, thousands upon thousands of rats, in size equal to a bandicoot, appeared."—Pollok, Sport in B. Burmah, &c., ii. 14.

1880.—"They (wild dogs in Queensland) hunted Kangaroo when in numbers . . . but usually preferred smaller and more easily obtained prey, as rats, bandicoots, and 'possoms.'"—Blackwood's Mag., Jan., p. 65.

BANDICOY, s. The colloquial name in S. India of the fruit of Hibiscus esculentus; Tamil ven̤lai-khāi, i.e. unripe fruit of the vendai, called in H. bhendi. See BENDY.

BANDO! H. imperative bāndho, 'tie or make fast.' "This and probably other Indian words have been naturalised in the docks on the Thames frequented by Lascar crews. I have heard a London lighter-man, in the Victoria Docks, throw a rope ashore to another Londoner, calling out, Band!"—(M.-Gen. Keatinge.)

BANDY, s. A carriage, bullock-carriage, buggy, or cart. This word is usual in both the S. and W. Presidencies, but is unknown in Bengal, and in the N.W.P. It is the Tamil bandi, Telug. bāndi, 'a cart or vehicle.' The word, as bandi, is also used in Java. [Mr Skert writes—"Klinkert has Mal. bendi, 'a chaise or calèche,' but I have not heard the word in standard Malay, though Clifford and Swett, have bendu, 'a kind of sedan-carriage carried by men,' and the commoner word tandu 'a sedan-chair or litter,' which I have heard in Selangor. Wilkinson says that kereta (i.e. kreta bendi) is used to signify any two-wheeled vehicle in Johor."—1791.—"To be sold, an elegant new and fashionable Bandy, with copper panels, lined with Morocco leather."—Madras Courier, 29th Sept.

1800.—"No wheel-carriages can be used in Canara, not even a buffalo-bandy."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 243.

1810.—"None but open carriages are used in Ceylon; we therefore went in bandies, or, in plain English, gigs."—Maria Graham, 88.

1826.—"Those persons who have not European coachmen have the horses of their . . . bandies or gigs, led by these men. . . . Gigs and hackeries all go here (in Ceylon) by the name of bandy."—Heber (ed. 1844), ii. 152.

1860.—"Bullock bandies, covered with canjas met us."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 146.

1862.—"At Coimbatore I bought a bandy or country cart of the simplest construction."—Markham's Peru and India, 393.

BANG, BHANG, s. H. bhāng, the dried leaves and small stalks of hemp (i.e. Cannabis indica), used to cause intoxication, either by smoking, or when eaten mixed up into a sweetmeat (see MAJOON). Hashish of the Arabs is substantially the same; Birdwood says it "consists of the tender tops of the plants after flowering." [Bhang is usually derived from Skt. bhang, 'breaking,' but Burton derives both it and the Ar. bāng from the Oid Coptic Nībān, "meaning a preparation of hemp; and here it is easy to recognise the Homeric Nepenthe.""

"On the other hand, not a few apply the word to the henbane (hyoscyamus niger) so much used in medieval Europe. The Kāmis evidently means henbane, distinguishing it from Hashish al hārūfīs, 'rascal's grass,' i.e. the herb Pantarguelion. . . . The use of Bhang doubtless dates from the dawn of civilisation, whose earliest social pleasures would be inebriants. Herodotus (iv. c. 75) shows the Scythians burning the seeds (leaves and capsules) in worship and becoming drunk upon the fumes, as do the S. African Bushmen of the present day."—(Arab. Nights, i. 65.)

1563.—"The great Sultan Badur told Martim Affonso de Souza, for whom he had a great liking, and to whom he told all his secrets, that when in the night he had a desire to visit Portugal, and the Brazil, and Turkey, and Arabia, and Persia, all he had to do was to eat a little bhangue . . . ."—Garcia, f. 26.

1578.—"Bangue is a plant resembling hemp, or the Cannabis of the Latins . . . the Arabs call this Bango 'Azip'" (i.e. Hashish).—C. Acosta, 360-61.

1598.—"They have . . . also many kinds of Droguens, as Amfon, or Opium, Camfora, Bangue and Sandell Wood."—Linschoten, 19; [Hak. Soc. i. 61; also see ii. 115].

1606.—"O mais de têpo estava choe de bangue."—Guerra, 93.

1638.—"Il se fit apporter un petit cabinet d'or . . . . dont il tira deux layettes, et prit dans l'une de l'offrun, ou opium, et dans l'autre du bengi, qui est vne certaine drogue ou poudre, dont ils se servent pour s'exerter à la luxury."—Mandello, Paris, 1659, 150.
1685.—"I have two sorts of the Bangue, which were sent from two several places of the East Indies; they both differ much from our Hemp, although they seem to differ most as to their magnitude."—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray's Correspondence, 1848, p. 160.

1673.—"Bang (a pleasant intoxicating Seed mixed with Milk). . . ."—Fryer, 91.

1711.—"Bang has likewise its Vertues attributed to it; for being used as Tea, it inhabres, or exhberates them according to the Quantity they take."—Lockyer, 61.

1727.—"Before they engage in a Fight, they drink Bang, which is made of a Seed like Hemp-seed, that has an intoxicating Quality."—A. Hamilton, i. 131.

1763.—"Most of the troops, as is customary during the agitation of this festival, had eaten plentifully of bang. . . ."—Orme, i. 194.

1784.—". . . it does not appear that the use of bank, an intoxicating weed which resembles the hemp of Europe, . . . is considered even by the most rigid (Hindoo) a breach of the law."—G. Forster, Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 291.

1789.—"A shop of Bang may be kept with a capital of no more than two shillings, or one rupee. It is only some mats stretched under some tree, where the Bangereus of the town, that is, the viles of mankind, assemble to drink Bang."—Note on Seir Mutagherin, iii. 305.

1808.—"The Hemp—with which we used to hang our prison pets, you felon gang,—In Eastern climes produces Bang. Esteemed a drug divine.

As Hashish dressed, its magic powers
Can lap us in Elysian bowers;
But sweeter far our social hours,
O'er a flakc of rosy wine.

Lord Neaves.

BANGED—is also used as a participle, for 'stimulated by bang', e.g. "banged up to the eyes."

BANGLE, s. H. bangri or bangri. The original word properly means a ring of coloured glass worn on the wrist by women; [the chhärî of N. India;] but bangle is applied to any native ring-bracelet, and also to an anklet or ring of any kind worn on the ankle or leg. Indian silver bangles on the wrist have recently come into common use among English girls.

1803.—"To the cutwaâl he gave a heavy pair of old bangles, of which he considerably enhanced the value by putting them on his wrists with his own hands."—Journal of Sir J. Nicholls, in note to Wellington Despatches, ed. 1837, ii. 373.

1809.—"Bangles, or bracelets."—Maria Graham, 13.
[1843.—"I engaged eight bearers to carry my palankeen. Besides these I had four banghy-bordars, men who are each obliged to carry forty pound weight, in small wooden or tin boxes, called petarraks."—Traveller's account, Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 91.]

c. 1844.—"I will forward this by banghy dàk a copy of Capt. Moreshby's Survey of the Red Sea."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Admin. of Lord Ellenborough, p. 221.

1873.—"The officers of his regiment . . . subscribed to buy the young people a set of crockery, and a plated tea and coffee service (got up by dawk banghee . . . at not much more than 200 per cent. in advance of the English price."—The True Reformer, i. 57.

BANJO, s. Though this is a West- and not East-Indian term, it may be worth while to introduce the following older form of the word:

1764.—
"Permit thy slaves to lead the choral dance To the wild banshaw's melancholy sound."—Grainger, iv.

See also Davies, for example of banjore, [and N.E.D for banjier].

BANKSHALL, s. a. A warehouse. b. The office of a Harbour Master or other Port Authority. In the former sense the word is still used in S. India; in Bengal the latter is the only sense recognised, at least among Anglo-Indians; in Northern India the word is not in use. As the Calcutta office stands on the banks of the Hoogly, the name is, we believe, often accepted as having some indefinite reference to this position. And in a late work we find a positive and plausible, but entirely unfounded, explanation of this kind, which we quote below. In Java the word has a specific application to the open hall of audience, supported by wooden pillars without walls, which forms part of every princely residence. The word is used in Sea Hindustani, in the forms banstir, and bangsil for a 'store-room' (Roebuck).

Bankshall is in fact one of the oldest of the words taken up by foreign traders in India. And its use not only by Correa (c. 1561) but by King John (1524), with the regularly-formed Portuguese plural of words in -al, shows how early it was adopted by the Portuguese. Indeed, Correa does not even explain it, as is his usual practice with Indian terms.

More than one serious etymology has been suggested:—(1). Crawford takes it to be the Malay word bangsal, defined by him in his Malay Dict. thus: "(J.) A shed; a storehouse; a workshop; a porch; a covered passage" (see J. Ind. Archip., iv. 182). [Mr Skeat adds that it also means in Malay 'half-lusked paddy,' and 'fallen timber, of which the outer layer has rotted and only the core remains.'] But it is probable that the Malay word, though marked by Crawford ("J.") as Javanese in origin, is a corruption of one of the two following:

(2) Beng. bankasalā, from Skt. banik or vānik, 'trade,' and sāla, 'a hall.' This is Wilson's etymology.

(3) Skt. bhāndsāla, Čanar. bhānda-śāla, Malayāl. pandisāla, Tam. pandā-śālai or pandakaśālai, 'a storehouse or magazine.'

It is difficult to decide which of the two last is the original word; the prevalence of the second in S. India is an argument in its favour; and the substitution of g for ð would be in accordance with a phonetic practice of not uncommon occurrence.

c. 1345.—"For the bandar there is in every island (of the Maldives) a wooden building, which they call bajansār [evidently for bandjaśar, i.e. Arabic spelling for bandjaśar] where the Governor . . . collects all the goods, and there sells or barter them."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 120.

1524.—A grant from K. John to the City of Goa, says: "that henceforward even if no market rent in the city is collected from the bacacamās, viz. those at which are sold honey, oil, butter, betre (i.e. betel), spices, and cloths, for permission to sell such things in the said bacacamās, it is our pleasure that they shall sell them freely." A note says: "Apparently the word should be bacacamās, or bacacamās, or bangacamās, which then signified any place to sell things, but now particularly a wooden house."—Archiv. Portog. Or., Fasc. ii. 43.

1561.—" . . . in the bangacamas, in which stand the goods ready for shipment."—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 290.

1610.—The form and use of the word have led P. Teixeira into a curious confusion (as it would seem) when, speaking of foreigners at Ormus, he says: "hay muchos gentiles, Baneanes [see BANYAN], Bangasalys, y Cambayatys"—where the word in italics probably represents Bangalys, i.e. Bengâlis (Red. de Harnet, 18).

c. 1610.—“Le facteur du Roy chrestien des Maldives tenoit sa banqueselle ou plastoust collier, sur le bord de la mer en l’isle de Malé,”—Pyrand de Luxal, ed. 1679, i. 65; [Hak. Soc. i. 85; also see i. 267].

1623.—“Bangasal, a shed (or barn), or often also a roof without walls to sit under, sheltered from the rain or sun.”—Gaspar Willens, Vocabulairien, &c., ins’ Graven-haagje; repr. Batavia, 1706.

1734-5.—“Paid the Bankshall Merchants for the house poles, country reapers, &c., necessary for housebuilding.”—In Wheeler, iii. 148.

1748.—“A little below the town of Wampo ... These people (compradores) build a house for each ship. ... They are called by us banksaulls. In these we deposit the rigging and yards of the vessel, chests, water-casks, and every thing that incommodes us aboard.”—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748 (1762), p. 294. It appears from this book (p. 118) that the place in Canton River was known as Banksall Island.

1750-52.—“One of the first things on arriving here (Canton River) is to procure a bancshall, that is, a great house, constructed of bamboo and mats ... in which the stores of the ship are laid up.”—A Voyage, &c., by Olyf Toren ... in a series of letters to Dr Limens, Transl. by J. R. Forster (with Osbeck’s Voyage), 1771.

1783.—“These people (Chulias, &c., from India, at Achin) ... on their arrival immediately build, by contract with the natives, houses of bamboo, like what in China at Wampo is called bankshall, very regular, on a convenient spot close to the river.”—Forrest, V. to Meryzi, 41.

1788.—“Banksaulls—Storehouses for depositing ships’ stores in, while the ships are unloading and refitting.”—Indian Vocab. (Stockdale).

1813.—“The East India Company for seventy years had a large banksaull, or warehouse, at Mirzee, for the reception of the pepper and sandalwood purchased in the dominions of the Mysore Rajah.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 100.

1817.—“The bangas or mendippo is a large open hall, supported by a double row of pillars, and covered with shingles, the interior being richly decorated with paint and gilding.”—Raffles, Java (2nd ed.), i. 93. The Javanese use, as in this passage, corresponds to the meaning given in Jansz, Javanese Dicit.: “Bangsai, Vorstelijke Zitplaats” (Prince’s Sitting-place).

1623.—“And on the Place by the sea there was the Custom-house, which the Persians in their language call Banksaull, a building of no great size, with some open outer porticoes.”—P. della Valle, ii. 465.

1673.—“... Their Bank Solis, or Custom House Keys, where they land, are Two; but mean, and shut only with ordinary Gates at Night.”—Fryer, 27.

1683.—“I came ashore in Capt. Goyer’s Pinnace to ye Bankshall, about 7 miles from Bullanore.”—Hedges, Diary, Feb. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 85].

1857.—“The Mayor and Aldermen, etc., do humbly request the Honourable President and Council would please to grant and assign over to the Corporation the petty dues of Bankshall Tolls.”—In Wheeler, i. 207.

1727.—“... Above it is the Dutch Bankshall, a Place where their Ships ride when they cannot get further up for the too swift Currents.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 6.

1789.—“... And that no one may plead ignorance of this order, it is hereby directed that it be placed constantly in view at the Bankshall in the English and country languages.”—Procl. against Slave-Trading in Seton-Karr, ii. 5.

1878.—“The term ‘Banksall’ has always been a puzzle to the English in India. It is borrowed from the Dutch. The ‘Soll’ is the Dutch or Danish ‘Zoll,’ the English ‘Toll.’ The Banksoll was then the place on the ‘bank’ where all tolls or duties were levied on landing goods.”—Talboys Wheeler, Early Records of B. India, 196. (Quite erroneous, as already said; and Zoll is not Dutch.)

BANTAM, n.p. The province which forms the western extremity of Java, properly Bantan. [Mr Skeat gives Bantan, Crawfurd, Bantân.] It formed an independent kingdom at the beginning of the 17th century, and then produced much pepper (no longer grown), which caused it to be greatly frequented by European traders. An English factory was established here in 1603, and continued till 1682, when the Dutch succeeded in expelling us as interlopers.

1727.—“... The only Product of Bantan is Pepper, wherein it abounds so much, that they can export 10,000 Tuns per annum.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 127.

BANTAM FOWLS, s. According to Crawfurd, the dwarf poultry which we call by this name were imported from Japan, and received the name “not from the place that produced them, but from that where our votio il giorno” (251). See also Luillier below. The men of this class profess an extravagant respect for animal life; but after Stanley brought home Dr. Livingstone’s letters they became notorious as chief promoters of slave-trade in Eastern Africa. A. K. Forbes speaks of the mediaeval Wániats at the Court of Anhilwára as “equally gallant in the field (with Rajputs), and wiser in council . . . already in profession puritans of peace, but not yet drained enough of their hery Kshatri blood.”—(Râs Mâlu, i. 240; [ed. 1878, 184]).

Banya is the form in which vâniya appears in the Anglo-Indian use of Bengal, with a different shade of meaning, and generally indicating a grain-dealer.

1516.—“There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Razbut . . . others are called Banians, and are merchants and traders.”—Barrow, 51.

1552.—“. . . Among whom came certain men who are called Baneanes of the same heathen of the Kingdom of Cambaia ... coming on board the ship of Vasco da Gama, and seeing in his cabin a pictorial image of Our Lady, to which our people did reverence, they also made adoration with much more fervency. . . .”—Barrow, Dec., i. liv. iv. cap. 6.

1555.—“We may mention that the inhabitants of Guzerat call the unbelievers Banyans, whilst the inhabitants of Hindostan call them Hindu.”—Sidi ’Ali Koyndían, in J. As., 1555, S. ix. 197-8.

1563.—“R. If the fruits were all as good as this (mango) it would be no such great matter in the Baneanes, as you tell me, not to eat flesh. And since I touch on this matter, tell me, prithee, who are these Baneanes . . . who do not eat flesh?”—Garcia, f. 136.

1608.—“The Governor of the Towne of Gandevee is a Bannyan, and one of those kind of people that observe the Law of Pythagoras.”—Jones, in Parochas, i. 251.

1610.—“Baneanes.” See quotation under BANKSHALL, a.]

1623.—“One of these races of Indians is that of those which call themselves Vainí, but who are called, somewhat corruptly by the Portuguese, and by all our other Franks, Banians; they are all, for the most part, traders and brokers.”—I. della Valle, i. 486-7; [and see i. 78 Hak. Soc.].

1630.—“A people presented themselves to mine eyes, clothed in linnen garments, somewhat low descending, of a gesture and garbe, as I may say, maddenly and well nigh effeminante; of a countenance shy, and somewhat estranged; yet smiling out a closed and bashful familiarity. . . . I asked what manner of people these were, so strangely notable, and notably strange. Reply was made that they were Banians.

—Lord, Preface.

1665.—"In trade these Banians are a thousand times worse than the Jews; more expert in all sorts of cunning tricks, and more maliciously mischievous in their revenge."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 68; [ed. Ball, i. 396, and see i. 91].

c. 1666. —"Aussi chacun a son Banian dans les Indes, et il y a des personnes de qualité qui leur confient tout ce qu'ils ont . . ."—Thevenot, v. 166. This passage shows in anticipation the transition to the Calcutta use (b, below).

1672. —"The inhabitants are called Guizeratts and Banyans."—Baldevu, 2.

"It is the custom to say that to make one Bagnan (so they call the Gentile Merchants) you need three Chinese, and to make one Chinese three Hebrews."—I. F. Vincenzo di Maris, 114.

1673. —"The Banyan follows the Soldier, though as contrary in Humour as the Antipodes in the same Meridian are opposite to one another. . . . In Cases of Trade they are not so hide-bound, giving their Consciences more Scope, and boggle at no Villainy for an Emolument."—Fryer, 193.

1677. —"In their letter to Ft. St. George, 15th March, the Court offer £20 reward to any of our servants or soldiers as shall be able to speak, write, and translate the Banian language, and to learn their arithmetic."—In Madras Notes and Exts., No. i. p. 18.

1705. —". . . ceux des premières castes, comme les Baignans."—Lullier, 102.

1813. —". . . it will, I believe, be generally allowed by those who have dealt much with Banians and merchants in the larger trading towns of India, that their moral character cannot be held in high estimation."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 456.

1817. —"Of the Ward, Banyan, or trades-caste there are five great families in this country."—Barton, Sind Revisited, ii. 381.

1761. —"We expect and positively direct that if our servants employ Banians or black people under them, they shall be accountable for their conduct."—The Court of Directors, in Long, 254.

1764. —"Resolutions and Orders. That no Mooshee, Linguist, Baniun, or Writer, be allowed to any officer, excepting the Commander-in-Chief."—Fl. William Proc., in Long, 382.

1775. —"We have reason to suspect that the intention was to make him (Nundcomar) Banyan to General Clavering, to surround the General and us with the Governor's creatures, and to keep us totally unacquainted with the real state of the Government."—Minute by Clavering, Monson, and Francis, Fl. William, 11th April. In Price's Tracts, ii. 138.

1780. —"We are informed that the Juty Wallahs or Makers and Vendors of Bengal Shoes in and about Calcutta . . . intend sending a Joint Petition to the Supreme Council . . . on account of the great decay of their Trade, entirely owing to the Luxury of the Bengalis, chiefly the Bangans (sic) and Sarcars, as there are scarce any of them to be found who does not keep a Chariot, Phaeton, Bugry or Pallanquin, and some all four . . ."—In Hicky's Bengal Gazette, June 24th.

1783. —"Mr. Hastings' bannian was, after this auction, found possessed of territories yielding a rent of £140,000 a year."—Burke, Speech on E. I. Bill, in Writings, &c., iii. 490.

1786. —"The said Warren Hastings did permit and suffer his own banyan or principal black steward, named Canto Baboo, to hold farms . . . to the amount of 13 lacs of rupees in annum."—Art. agst. Hastings, Burke, vii. 111.

"A practice has gradually crept in among the Banians and other rich men of Calcutta, of dressing some of their servants . . . nearly in the uniform of the Honourable Company's Sepoys and Lascars. . . ."—Notification, in Seton Karr, i. 122.

1788. —"Banyan—A Gentoo servant employed in the management of commercial affairs. Every English gentleman at Bengal has a Banyan who either acts of himself, or as the substitute of some great man or black merchant."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

1810. —"The same person frequently was banian to several European gentlemen; all of whose concerns were of course accurately known to him, and thus became the subject of conversation at those meetings the baniuns of Calcutta invariably held. . . ."—Williamson, V. M. i. 189.

1817. —"The European functionary . . . has first his banyan or native secretary."—Mill, Hist. (ed. 1840), ii. 14. Mr. Mill does not here accurately interpret the word.

(2). BANYAN, s. An undershirt, originally of muslin, and so called as resembling the body garment of the Hindus; but now commonly applied to under-body-clothing of elastic cotton, woollen, or silk web. The following quotations illustrate the stages by which the word reached its present application. And they show that our predecessors in India used to adopt the native or Banyan costume in their hours of ease. C. P. Brown defines Banyan as "a loose dressing-gown, such as Hindu tradesmen wear." Probably this may have been the original use; but it is never so employed in Northern India.

1672. —"It is likewise ordered that both Officers and Souldiers in the Fort shall, both on every Sabbath Day, and on every day when they exercise, weare English apparel; in respect the garbe is most becoming as Souldiers, and correspondent to their profession."—Sir W. Langhorne's Standing Order, in Wheeler, iii. 426.

1731.—"The Ensign (as proved, for his first appearance, being undressed in his banyon coat, I did not know him) came off from his cot, and in a very haughty manner cried out, 'None of your disturbance, Gentlemen.'"—In Wheeler, iii. 109.

1781.—"I am an Old Stager in this Country, having arrived in Calcutta in the Year 1736. . . . Those were the days, when Gentlemen studied Base instead of Fashion; when even the Hon. Members of the Council met in Banyan Shirts, Long Drawers (q.v.), and Conjees (Congee) caps; with a Case Bottle of good old Arack, and a Gouget of Water placed on the Table, which the Secretary (a Skillful Hand) frequently converted into Punch . . . ."—Letter from An Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feb. 24th.

[1773.—In a letter from Horace Walpole to the Countess of Upper Osory, dated April 30th, 1773 (Cunningham's ed., v. 459) he describes a ball at Lord Stanley's, at which two of the dancers, Mr. Storer and Miss Wrottesley, were dressed "in banians with furts, for winter, cock and hen." It would be interesting to have further details of these garments, which were, it may be hoped, different from the modern Banyan.]

1810.—". . . an undershirt, commonly called a banian."—Williamson, V. M. i. 19.

(3) BANYAN, s. See BANYAN-TREE.

BANYAN-DAY, s. This is sea-slang for a joure navigre, or a day-on which no ration of meat was allowed; when (as one of our quotations above expresses it) the crew had "to observe the Law of Pythagoras."

1690.—"Of this (Kitchery or Kedgere, q.v.) the European Sailors feed in these yards once or twice a Week, and are forc'd at those times to a Pagan Abstinence from Flesh, which creates in them a perfect Dislike and utter Detestation to those Bannian Days, as they commonly call them."—Ovington, 310, 311.

BANYAN-FIGHT, s. Thus:

1690.—"This Tongue Tempest is termed there a Bannian-Fight, if it never rises to blows or bloodshed."—Ovington, 275. Sir G. Birdwood tells us that this is a phrase still current in Bombay.

BANYAN-TREE, also elliptically Banyan, s. The Indian Fig-Tree (Ficus Indica, or Ficus bengalensis, L.), called in H. bar for bargat, the latter the "Bourjade" of Bernier (ed. Constable, p. 309).] The name appears to have been first bestowed popularly on a famous tree of this species growing near Gombroon (q.v.), under which the Banyans or Hindu traders settled at that port, had built a little pagoda. So says Tavernier below. This original Banyan-tree is described by P. della Valle (ii. 453), and by Valentijn (v. 202). P. della Valle's account (1622) is extremely interesting, but too long for quotation. He calls it by the Persian name, lāl. The tree still stood, within half a mile of the English factory, in 1758, when it was visited by Ives, who quotes Tickell's verses given below. [Also see CUBER BURR.]

c. a.d. 70.—"First and foremost, there is a Fig-tree there (in India) which beareth very small and slender figges. The propietie of this Tree, is to plant, and set it selfe without mams helpe. For it spreadeth out with mightie armes, and the lowest water-boughes underneath, do bend so downward to the very earth, that they touch it againe, and lie upon it: whereby, within one years space they will take fast root in the ground, and put forth a new Spring round about the Mother-tree: so as these branches, thus growing, seeme like a traile or border of arbours most curiously and artificially made," &c.—Pliny's Nat. Historie, by Philemon Holland, i. 360.

1624.—". . . The goodly bole being got To certain cubits' height, from every side The boughs decline, which, taking root afresh, Spring up new boles, and these spring new, and newer Till the whole tree become a porticus, Or arched arbour, able to receive A numerous troop."

Ben Jonson, Neptune's Triumph.

c. 1650.—"Cet Arbre estoit de mème espece que celuy qui est a une lieue du Bander, et qui passe pour une merveille; mais dans les Indes il y en a quantité. Les Persans l'appellent Lul, les Portugais Arber de Rega, et les Francais l'Arbre des Banianes; parce que les Banianes ont fait bâtir dessous une Pagode avec un carvanserai accompagné de plusieurs petits étangs pour se laver."—Tavernier, l. de Perse, liv. v. ch. 23. [Also see ed. Balî, ii. 198.]

c. 1650.—"Near to the City of Ormus was a Bannian tree, being the only tree that grew in the Island."—Tavernier, Eng. Tr. i. 255.

c. 1666.—"Nous vimes a cent ou cent cinquante pas de ce jardin, l'arbre War dans toute son étendue. On l'appelle aussi Ber, et arbre des Banianes, et arbre des racines . . . ."—Thevet, v. 76.
1667.—
"The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit renown'd;
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother-tree, a pillar'd shade High over-arch'd, and echoing walks between."
Paradise Lost, ix. 1101.

[Warren points out that Milton must have had in view a description of the Banyan-tree in Gerard's Herbal under the heading "of the arched Indian fig-tree."]

1672.—"Eastward of Surat two Courses, i.e. a League, we pitched our Tent under a Tree that besides its Leaves, the Branches bear its own Roots, therefore called by the Portuguese, Arbor de Raiz; For the Adoration the Banyans pay it, the Banyan-tree."
Fryer, 105.

1691.—"About a (Dutch) mile from Gamron ... stands a tree, heretofore described by Mandelslo and others. ... Beside this tree is an idol temple where the Banyas do their worship."—Valentia, v. 267-8.

1717.—
"The fair descendants of thy sacred bed Wide-branching o'er the Western World shall spread,
Like the fam'd Banian Tree, whose pliant shoot
To earthward bending of itself takes root, Till like their mother plant ten thousand stand
In verdant arches on the fertile land;
Beneath her shade the tawny Indians rove,
Or hunt at large through the wide-echoing grove."
Tickell, Epistle from a Lady in England to a Lady in Aegypt.

1726.—"On the north side of the city (Surat) is there an uncommonly great Pichar or Waringia * tree. ... The Portuguese call this tree Albero de lauz, i.e. Root-tree. ... Under it is a small chapel built by a Benyan. ... Day and night lamps are alight there, and Benyans constantly come in pilgrimage, to offer their prayers to this saint."—Valentia, iv. 145.

1771.—"... being employed to construct a military work at the fort of Trip-losore (afterwards called Marsden's Bastion) it was necessary to cut down a banyan-tree which so incensed the brahmans of that place, that they found means to poison him" (i.e. Thomas Marsden of the Madras Engineers).—Mem. of W. Marsden, 7-8.

1809.—"Their greatest enemy (i.e. of the buildings) is the Banyan-Tree."—I. Valentia, i. 396.

"In the midst an aged Banian grew.
It was a goodly sight to see
That venerable tree,
For o'er the lawn, irregularly spread,
Fifty straight columns prop't its lofty head;
And many a long depending shoot,
Seeking to strike its root,
Straight like a plummet grew towards the ground,
Some on the lower boughs which crost their way,
Fixing their bearded fibres, round and round.
With many a ring and wild contortion wound;
Some to the passing wind at times, with sway
Of gentle motion swung;
Others of younger growth, unmoved, were hung Like stone-drops from the cavern's fretted height."
Southey, Curse of Kehama, xiii. 51. [Southey takes his account from Williamson, Orient. Field Sports, ii. 113.]

1821.—
"Des banians touffus, par les brames adorés, Depuis longtemps la langueur nous inprove, Courbés par le midi, dont l'ardoe les dévore,
Ils étendent vers nous leurs rameaux a'térés."
Casimir Delavigné, Le Pariis, iii. 6.

A note of the publishers on the preceding passage, in the edition of 1855, is diverting:
"Un journaliste allemand a accusé M. Casimir Delavigné d'avoir pris pour un arbre une secte religieuse de l'Inde. ..." The German journalist was wrong here, but he might have found plenty of matter for ridicule in the play. Thus the Brahmins (men) are Akèbar (!), Idaïmore (!!), and Empereur (!?); their women Néida (!), Zaïde (!), and Mélour (!!).

1825.—"Near this village was the finest banyan-tree which I had ever seen, literally a grove rising from a single primary stem, whose massive secondary trunks, with their straightness, orderly arrangement, and evident connexion with the parent stock, gave the general effect of a vast vegetable organ. The first impression which I felt on coming under its shade was, 'What a noble place of worship!'"—Heber, ii. 93 (ed. 1844).

1834.—"Cast forth thy word into the everliving, everworking universe; it is a seed-grain that cannot die; unnoticed to-day, it will be found flourishing as a banyan-grove (perhaps alas! as a hemlock forest) after a thousand years."—Sartor Resartus.

"... its pendant branches, rooting in the air, Yearn to the parent earth and grappling fast, BARASINHÁ. The H. name of the widely-spread Cervus Wallachii, Cuvier. This H. name ("12-horn") is no doubt taken from the number of times being approximately twelve. The name is also applied by sportsmen in Bengal to the Rucervus Duvaucellii, or Swamp-Deer. [See Blanford, Mamm. 538 seqq.]

[BARBAR’S BRIDGE, n.p.] This is a curious native corruption of an English name. The bridge in Madras, known as Barber’s Bridge, was built by an engineer named Hamilton. This was turned by the natives into Ambuton, and in course of time the name Ambuton was identified with the Tamil combattan, ‘barber,’ and so it came to be called Barber’s Bridge.—See Le Fanu, Man. of the Salem Dist. ii. 169, note.]

BARBICAN, s. This term of mediæval fortification is derived by Litttré, and by Marcel Devic, from Ar. barbakh, which means a sewer-pipe or water-pipe. And one of the meanings given by Litttré is, "une ouverture longue et étroite pour l’écoulement des eaux." Apart from the possible, but untraced, history which this alleged meaning may involve, it seems probable, considering the usual meaning of the word as ‘an outwork before a gate,’ that it is from Ar. P. bâb-khâna, ‘gate-house.’ This etymology was suggested in print about 50 years ago by one of the present writers, and confirmed to his mind some years later, when in going through the native town of Cawnapore, not long before the Mutiny, he saw a brand-new double-towered gateway, or gate-house, on the face of which was the inscription in Persian characters: "Bâb-Khâna-i-Mahommed Bakhsh," or whatever was his name, i.e. "The Barbican of Mahommed Bakhsh." [The N.E.D. suggests P. barbar-khânah, ‘house on the wall,’ it being difficult to derive the Romanic forms in bar- from bâb-khâna.]

The editor of the Chron. of K. James of Aragon (1833, p. 423) says that barbarcana in Spain means a second, outermost and lower wall; i.e. a fausse-braye. And this agrees with facts in that work, and with the definition in Cobarruvias; but not at all with Joinville’s use, nor with V.-le-Duc’s explanation.

c. 1250.—"Tuit le baron... s'acorderent que en un tertre... est l'en une forttrresse qui fut bien garnie de gent, si qui se li Tor fesoient saillies... cell tore fut ainsi como barbarcana (orig. 'quasi antemura') de l'oste."—The Med. Fr. tr. of William of Tyre, ed. Paul Paris, i. 158.

c. 1270.—"... on condition of his at once putting me in possession of the albarrana tower... and should besides make his Saraccens construct a barbarcana round the tower."—James of Aragon, as above.

c. 1309.—"Pour requerre sa gent plus sauverment, fust le roys faire une barbaquane devant le pont qui estoit entre nos doux os, en tel maniere que l'on poot entrer de doux pars en la barbaquane a cheval."—Joinville, p. 162.

c. 1552.—"Lorenzo de Brito ordered an intrenchment of great strength to be dug, in the fashion of a barbarcan (barbacâ) outside the wall of the fort... on account of a well, a stone-estate distant..."—Barros, ii. i. 5.

c. 1870.—"Barbacana. Défense extérieure protégeant une entrée, et permettant de réunir un assez grand nombre d’hommes pour disposer des sorties ou protéger une retraite."—Violet-le-Duc, II. d’une Forteresse, 361.

BARBIERS, s. This is a term which was formerly very current in the East, as the name of a kind of paralysis, often occasioned by exposure to chills. It began with numbness and imperfect command of the power of movement, sometimes also affecting the muscles of the neck and power of articulation, and often followed by loss of appetite, emaciation, and death. It has often been identified with beriberi, and medical opinion seems to have come back to the view that the two are forms of one disorder, though this was not admitted by some older authors of the last century. The allegation of Lind and others, that the most frequent subjects of barbers were Europeans of the lower class who, when in drink, went to sleep in the open air, must be contrasted with the general experience that beriberi rarely attacks Europeans. The name now seems obsolete.

1673.—"Whenee follows Fluxes, Dropes, Seury, Barbers (which is an enervating sic the whole Body, being neither able to use hands or Feet), Gout, Stone, Malignant and Putrid Fevers."—Fryer, 68.

1690.—"Another Distemper with which the Europeans are sometimes afflicted, is the Barbers, or a depravation of the Vse and Activity of their Limbs, whereby they are rendered unable to move either Hand or Foot."—Ovington, 350.

1755.—(If the land wind blow on a person sleeping) the consequence of this is always dangerous, as it seldom fails to bring on a fit of the Barbers (as it is called in this country), that is, a total depravation of the use of the limbs."—Tess, 77.

[c. 1757.—"There was a disease common to the lower class of Europeans, called the Barbers, a species of palsy, owing to exposure to the land winds after a fit of intoxication."—In Carey, Good Old Days, ii, 298.]

1768.—"The barbers, a species of palsy, is a disease most frequent in India. It distresses chiefly the lower class of Europeans, who when intoxicated with liquors frequently sleep in the open air, exposed to the land winds."—Lind on Diseases of Hot Climates, 260. (See BERIBERI.)

BARGANY, BARGANY, H. bāru-kāṇi. The name of a small silver coin current in W. India at the time of the Portuguese occupation of Goa, and afterwards valued at 40 reis (then about 5d.). The name of the coin was apparently a survival of a very old system of coinage-nomenclature. Kāṇi is an old Indian word, perhaps Dravidian in origin, indicating ⅓ of ⅓ or 1-64th part. It was applied to the jital (see JETUL) or 64th part of the medieval Delhi silver tanka—this latter coin being the prototype in weight and position of the Rupee, as the kāṇi therefore was of the modern Anglo-Indian pice (= 1-64th of a Rupee). There were in the currency of Mohammed Tughlak (1324-1351) of Delhi, aliquot parts of the tanka, Dokāns, Shash-kāns, Hash-kāns, Dwīz-da-kāns, and Shāzda-kāns, representing, as the Persian numerals indicate, pieces of 2, 6, 8, 12, and 16 kāns or jītals. (See E. Thomas, Pathan Kings of Delhi, pp. 218-219.) Other fractional pieces were added by Firoz Shah, Mohammed's son and successor (see Id. 276 seqq. and quotation under c. 1360, below). Some of these terms long survived, e.g. do-kāns in localities of Western and Southern India, and in Western India in the present case the bārakāns or 12 kāns, a vernacular form of the dwīz-da-kāns of Mohammed Tughlak.

1390.—"Thousands of men from various quarters, who possessed thousands of these copper coins . . . now brought them to the treasury, and received in exchange gold tankas and silver tankas (Tanga), shāz-gānsi and dwāz-gānsi, which they carried to their homes."—Tārīkh-i-Firoz Shahi, in Elliot, iii, 240-241.

c. 1350.—"Sultan Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tanka and the silver tanka. There were also distinct coins of the respective value of 48, 25, 24, 12, 10, 8 and 6, and one jital, known as chimal-o-hash-gāni, bist-o-panjgāni, bist-o-chāhār-gāni, dwāz-dāh-gāni, dah-gāni, hash-gāni, shāz-gāni, and yak jītal."—Ibid. 357-358.

1510.—Bargany, in quotation from Correa under Pardao.

1554.—"E as tangnas brancas que se recebem dos foros, são de 4 barganis a tangna, e de 24 leaes o bargani. . . . i.e. "And the white tangnas that are received in payment of land revenue are at the rate of, 4 barganis to the tangna, and of 24 leaes to the bargany."—A. Nuñez, in Subsidios, p. 31.

"Statement of the Revenues which the King our Lord holds in the Island and City of Goa."

*Item—The Islands of Ticearty, and Diver, and that of Churhop, and Jodhko, all of them, pay in land revenue (de foro) according to ancient custom 36,474 white tangnas, 3 barguanis, and 21 leaes, at the tale of 3 barguanis to the tangna and 24 leaes to the bargunanim, the same thing as 24 basarucos, amounting to 14,006 pardaos, 1 tangna and 47 leaes, making 2,201,918 ⅔ reis. The Isle of Ticeary (Salsette) is the largest, and on it stands the city of Goap; the others are much smaller and are annexed to it, they being all contiguous, only separated by rivers."—Botelho, Tombo, ibid. pp. 46-7.

1584.—"They vse also in Goa amongst the common sort to bargain for coals, wood, lime and such like, at so many braganines, accounting 24 basaruciea for one bragunin, albeit there is no such money stamped."—Barret, in Hiatl, ii. 411; (but it is copied from G. Balbo’s Italian, i. 716).

BARGEER. s. H. from P. birgir. A trooper of irregular cavalry who is not the owner of his troop horse and arms (as is the normal practice (see SILLADAR), but is either put in by another person, perhaps a native officer in the regiment, who supplies horses and arms and receives the man's full pay, allowing him a reduced rate, or has his horse from the State in whose service he is. The P. word properly means 'a load-taker,' 'a baggage horse.' The transfer of use is not quite clear. ["According to a man's reputation or connections, or the number of his followers, would be the rank (mansab) assigned to him. As a rule, his followers brought their own horses and other equipment; but sometimes a man with a little money would buy extra horses, and mount relations or dependants upon them. When this was the case, the man riding his own horse was called, in later parlance, a silahdér (literally, 'equipment-holder'), and one riding somebody else's horse was a bārgir ('burden-taker')."]—IV. Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moghuls, J. R. A. S. July 1896, p. 539.

1841.—"If the man again has not the cash to purchase a horse, he rides one belonging to a native officer, or to some privileged person, and becomes what is called his bargeer . . . ."—Calcutta Rev., vol ii. p. 57.

BARKING-DEER, s. The popular name of a small species of deer (Cervulus aureus, Jerdon) called in H. kākar, and in Nepal ratāv; also called Rib-faced-Deer, and in Bombay Baikree. Its common name is from its call, which is a kind of short bark, like that of a fox but louder, and may be heard in the jungles which it frequents, both by day and by night.—(Jerdon).

BARODA, n.p. Usually called by the Dutch and older English writers Baroda; proper name according to the Imp. Gazetteer, Wadodra; a large city of Gujarat, which has been since 1732 the capital of the Mahratta dynasty of Guzerat, the Gaikwars. (See GUICOWAR.)

1552.—In Barros, "Cidade de Barodar," IV. vi. 8.

1555.—"In a few days we arrived at Baridj; some days after at Baloudra, and then took the road towards Champaiz (read Champanur)."—Sidi ‘Abî, p. 91.

1606.—"That city (Champaniel) may be a day's journey from Deberadora or Barodar, which we commonly call Verdora."—Conto, IV. ix. 5.

[1614.—"We are to go to Madavadar, Cambala and Brothera."—Foster, Letters, ii. 213; also see iv. 197.]

1813.—Brodera, in Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 268; [2nd ed. ii. 282, 389].

1857.—"The town of Baroda, originally Barpatra (or a bar leaf, i.e. leaf of the Ficus indica, in shape), was the first large city I had seen."—Autobiog. of Lutfullah, 39.

BAROS, n.p. A fort on the West Coast of Sumatra, from which the chief export of Sumatra camphor, so highly valued in China, long took place. [The name in standard Malay is, according to Mr Skeat, Barus.] It is perhaps identical with the Fansūr or Fānsūr of the Middle Ages, which gave its name to the Fānsūrī camphor, famous among Oriental writers, and which by the perpetuation of a mis-reading is often styled Kāsištārī camphor, &c. (See CAMPHOR, and Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 282, 285 seqq.) The place is called Barrowse in the E. I. Colonial Papers, ii. 52, 153.

1727.—"Baros is the next place that abounds in Gold, Camphire, and Benzoin, but admits of no foreign Commerce."—A. Hamilton, ii. 113.

BARRACKPORE, n.p. The auxiliary Cantonment of Calcutta, from which it is 15 m. distant, established in 1772. Here also is the country residence of the Governor-General, built by Lord Minto, and much frequented in former days before the annual migration to Simla was established. The name is a hybrid. (See ACHANOCK).

BARRAMUHUL, n.p. H. Bārama-hāll, ‘Twelve estates’; an old designation of a large part of what is now the district of Salem in the Madras Presidency. The identification of the Twelve Estates is not free from difficulty; [see a full note in Le Fanu’s Man. of Salem, i. 83, seqq.]

1881.—“The Baramahal and Dindigal was placed under the Government of Madras; but owing to the deficiency in that Presidency of civil servants possessing a competent knowledge of the native languages, and to the unsatisfactory manner in which the revenue administration of the older possessions of the Company under the Madras Presidency had been conducted, Lord Cornwallis resolved to employ military officers for a time in the management of the Baramahal.”—Arbuthnot, M. of Sir T. Munro, xxxviii.

BASHAW, s. The old form of what we now call pusha, the former being taken from başa, the Ar. form of the word, which is itself generally believed to be a corruption of the P. paδiṣdah. Of this the first part is Skt. patis, Zend. paitis, Old P. pati, ‘a lord or master’ (comp. Gr. δέσποτης). Pechah, indeed, for ‘Governor’ (but with the ch guttural) occurs in I. Kings x. 15, II. Chron. ix. 14, and in Daniel iii. 2, 3, 27. Prof. Max Müller notices this, but it would seem merely as a curious coincidence.—(See Pusey on Daniel, 567.)

“Great kings of Barbary and my portly bassas.”

Marlowe, Tamburlaine the Great, 1st Part, iii. 1.

c. 1590.—“Filius alter Osmanis, Vrchanis frater, alium non habet in Annalibus titulum, quam Alis bassa quoq basseae vocabulum Turcis caput significant.”—Lencelclavies, Anales Sultannorum Othmanidarnm, ed. 1650, p. 402. This etymology connecting basah with the Turkish baş, ‘head,’ must be rejected.

c. 1610.—“Un Bascha estoit venu en sa Cour pour luy rendre compte du tribut qu’il luy apportoit; mais il fut neuf mois entiers à attendre que celuy qui a la charge... eut le temps et le loisir de le compter... Pyrard de Lasal (of the Great Mogul), ii. 161.

1702.—“... The most notorious injustice we have suffered from the Arabs of Muscat, and the Bashaw of Judda.”—In Wheeler, ii. 7.

1727.—“It (Bagdad) is now a prodigious large City, and the Seat of a Beglerbeg. ... The Bashaws of Bassora, Comera, and Musol (the ancient Nineveh) are subordinate to him.”—A. Hamilton, i. 78.

BASIN, s. H. besem. Pease-meal, generally made of Gram (q. v.) and used, sometimes mixed with ground orange-peel or other aromatic substance, to cleanse the hair, or for other toilette purposes.

[1832.—“The attendants present first the powdered peas, called basun, which answers the purpose of soap.”—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 328.]

BASSADORE, n.p. A town upon the island of Kishm in the Persian Gulf, which belonged in the 16th century to the Portuguese. The place was ceded to the British Crown in 1817, though the claim now seems dormant. The permission for the English to occupy the place as a naval station was granted by Saiyyid Sultan bin Ahmad of ‘Omān, about the end of the 18th century; but it was not actually occupied by us till 1831, from which time it was the depot of our Naval Squadron in the Gulf till 1882. The real form of the name is, according to Dr. Badger’s transliterated map in (H. of Imāns, dec. of Omland), Bāsiddā.

1673.—“At noon we came to Bassatu, an old ruined town of the Portugals, fronting Congo.”—Fryer, 320.

BASSAN, s. H. bāsān, ‘a dinner-plate’; from Port bacia (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 117).

BASSEIN, n.p. This is a corruption of three entirely different names, and is applied to various places remote from each other.

(1) Vasai, an old port on the coast, 26 m. north of Bombay, called by the Portuguese, to whom it long pertained, Baçaim (e.g. Burros, I. ix. 1).

c. 1565.—“Dopo Daman si troua Basain con molte ville... ne di questa altro si caua che risi, frumenti, e molto ligname.”—Cesare de’ Federici in Ramusio, iii. 387v.

1756.—“Bandar Bassai.”—Mirat-i-Ahmad, Bird’s tr., 129.

1781.—“General Goddard after having taken the fortress of Bessi, which is one of the strongest and most important fortresses under the Mahratta power...”—Seir Mutaghurin, iii. 327.

(2) A town and port on the river which forms the westernmost delta-arm of the Irawadi in the Province of Pegu. The Burmese name Baṭhein, was, according to Prof. Forchammer, a change, made by the Burmese conqueror Alompra, from the former the present Dutch Provinces of Batutam, Buitenzorg, Krawang, and the Preanger Regencies.

1619.—“On the day of the capture of Jakatra, 30th May 1619, it was certainly time and place to speak of the Governor-General’s dissatisfaction that the name of Batavia had been given to the Castle.”—
Valentijn, iv. 489.

The Governor-General, Jan Pietersen Coen, who had taken Jakatra, desired to have called the new fortress New Hoorn, from his own birth-place, Hoorn, on the Zuider Zee.

c, 1649.—“While I stay’d at Batavia, my Brother dy’d; and it was pretty to consider what the Dutch made me pay for his Funeral.”
—Tavernier (E.T.), i. 208.

BATCUl, BATCOLE, BATE-CALA, &c., n.p. Bhatkal. A place often named in the older narratives.
It is on the coast of Canara, just S. of Pigeon Island and Hog Island, in lat.
13° 59’, and is not to be confounded
(as it has been) with BEITCUL.

1328.—“ . . . there is also the King of Batigala, but he is of the Sarcoens.”— Friar Jordanus, p. 41.

1510.—The “Bathecala, a very noble city of India,” of Varthema (119), though misplaced, must we think be this place and not Beitcul.

1548.—“Trelado ([i.e. ‘Copy’) do Contrato que o Governor da Saea fez com a Raynha da Batecalaa por não aver Reey e eela reger o Reeyno.”—In S. Botelho, Tomo, 242.

1599.—“ . . part is subject to the Queene of Baticala, who solith great store of pepper to the Portugals, at a towne called Onor . . .
—Sir Fulke Greville to Sir Fr. Walsingham, in Bruce’s Annals, i. 125.

1618.—“The fift of Marche we anchored at Batachala, shooting three Peeches to give notice of our arrival . . .”—Wm. Hor, in Purchas, i. 657. See also Sainsbury, ii.
p. 374.

[1624.—“We had the wind still contrary, and having sail’d three other leaues, at the usual hour we cast anchor near the Rocks of Baticala.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii.

1727.—“The next Sea-port, to the Southward of Onnor, is Baticola, which has the restitia of a very large city . . . .”—A.
Hamilton, i. 282.

[1785.—“Eye Koal.” See quotation under DIOH.]
Batta, s. Two different words are thus expressed in Anglo-Indian colloquial, and in a manner founded.

a. H. bhaṭa or bhāṭṭi: an extra allowance made to officers, soldiers, or other public servants, when in the field, or on other special grounds; also subsistence money to witnesses, prisoners, and the like. Military Batta, originally an occasional allowance, as defined, grew to be a constant addition to the pay of officers in India, and constituted the chief part of the excess of Indian over English military emoluments. The question of the right to batta on several occasions created great agitation among the officers of the Indian army, and the measure of economy carried out by Lord William Bentinck when Governor-General (G. O. of the Gov.-Gen. in Council, 29th November 1828) in the reduction of full batta to half batta, in the allowances received by all regimental officers serving at stations within a certain distance of the Presidency in Bengal (viz. Barrackpore, Dumdum, Berhampore, and Dinapore) caused an enduring bitterness against that upright ruler.

It is difficult to arrive at the origin of this word. There are, however, several Hindi words in rural use, such as bhāṭ, bhāntā, 'advances made to ploughmen without interest,' and bhāṭṭa, bhāntā, 'ploughmen's wages in kind,' with which it is possibly connected. It has also been suggested, without much probability, that it may be allied to bahūt, 'much, excess,' an idea entering into the meaning of both a and b. It is just possible that the familiar military use of the term in India may have been influenced by the existence of the European military term bāṭ or bāṭ-money. The latter is from bāṭ, 'a pack-saddle,' [Late Lat. bastum], and implies an allowance for carrying baggage in the field. It will be seen that one writer below seems to confound the two words.

b. H. bāṭā and bāṭṭa: agio, or difference in exchange, discount on coins not current, or of short weight. We may notice that Sir H. Elliot does not recognize an absolute separation between the two senses of Batta. His definition runs thus: "Difference of exchange; anything extra; an extra allowance; discount on uncurrent, or short-weight coins; usually called Batta. The word has been supposed to be a corruption of Bharta, increase, but it is a pure Hindi vocable, and is more usually applied to discount than to premium."—(Supp. Gloss. ii. 41.) [Platts, on the other hand, distinguishes the two words—Batta, Skt. vṛatta, 'turned,' or varta, 'livelihood'—"Exchange, discount, difference of exchange, deduction, &c.," and Bhatta, Skt. bhaṭṭa 'allotted,'—"advances to ploughmen without interest; ploughman's wages in kind.".] It will be seen that we have early Portuguese instances of the word apparently in both senses.

The most probable explanation is that the word (and I may add, the thing) originated in the Portuguese practice, and in the use of the Canarese word bhāṭta, Mahr, bāṭ, 'rice' in the husk,' called by the Portuguese bate and batta, for a maintenance allowance.

The word batty, for what is more generally called paddy, is or was commonly used by the English also in S. and W. India (see Linschoten, Lucena and Fryer quoted s.v. Paddy, and Wilson's Glossary, s.v. Bhatta).

The practice of giving a special allowance for mantimento began from a very early date in the Indian history of the Portuguese, and it evidently became a recognised augmentation of pay, corresponding closely to our batta, whilst the quotation from Botelho below shows also that bata and mantimento were used, more or less interchangeably, for this allowance. The correspondence with our Anglo-Indian batta went very far, and a case singularly parallel to the discontent raised in the Indian army by the reduction of full-batta to half-batta is spoken of by Correa (iv. 256). The mantimento had been paid all the year round, but the Governor, Martin Afonso de Sousa, in 1542, "desiring," says the historian, "a way to curry favour for himself, whilst going against the people and sending his soul to hell," ordered that in future the mantimento should be paid only during the 6 months of Winter (i.e. of the rainy season), when the force was on shore, and not for the other 6 months when they were on board the cruisers, and received rations. This created great bitterness, perfectly analogous in depth and in expression to that entertained with regard to Lord W. Bentinck and Sir John Malcolm, in 1829. Correa's utterance, just quoted, illustrates this, and a little lower down he adds: "And thus he took away from the troops the half of their mantimento (half their batta, in fact), and whether he did well or ill in that, he'll find in the next world."—(See also ibid. p. 430).

1502.—"The Captain-major . . . between officers and men-at-arms, left 60 men (at Cochin), to whom the factor was to give their pay, and every month a cruzado of mantimento, and to the officers when on service 2 cruzados. . . ."—Correia, i. 328.

1507.—(In establishing the settlement at Mozambique) "And the Captains took counsel among themselves, and from the money in the chest, paid the force each a cruzado a month for mantimento, with which the men greatly refreshed themselves. . . ."—Ibid. 786.

1511.—"All the people who served in Malacca, whether by sea or by land, were paid their pay for six months in advance, and also received monthly two cruzados of mantimento, cash in hand" (i.e. they had double batta).—Ibid. ii. 237.

1548.—"And for 2 jívaras (see PARASH) 2 pardos a month for the two and 4 tangas for bata." . . .—S. Botelho, Tombo, 233. The editor thinks this is for bate, i.e. paddy. But even if so it is used exactly like bata or maintenance money. A following entry has: "To the constable 38,920 reis a year, in which is comprised maintenance (mantimento)."

1564.—An example of batee for rice will be found s. v. MOORAH.

The following quotation shows batee (or batty) used at Madras in a way that also indicates the original identity of batty, 'rice,' and batta, 'extra allowance':—

1680.—"The Peons and Tarrygars (see TALIAR) sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted from the garrison returned with answer that they could not light of them, whereupon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession were taken in again, and fined each one month's pay, and to repay the money paid them for Battee . . ."—Pt. St. Geo. Consn., Feb. 10. In Notes and Extts. No. iii. p. 3.

1707.—". . . that they would allow Batta or subsistence money to all that should desert us."—In Wheeler, ii. 63.

1765.—". . . orders were accordingly issued . . . that on the 1st January, 1766, the double batta should cease. . . ."—Caraccioli's Cives, iv. 160.

1779.—". . . batta, or as it is termed in England, bat and forage money, which is here, in the field, almost double the peace allowance."—Munro's Narrative, p. 97.

1799.—"He would rather live on half-pay, in a garrison that could boast of a five court, than vegetate on full batta, where there was none."—Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 227.

The following shows Batty used for rice in Bombay:

kans.—Sir,—Is it understood that the Wives and daughters of officers on half batta are included in the order to mourn for the Queen of Wirtemberg; or will half-mourning be considered sufficient for them?"—Letter in above, dated 15th April 1829.

1857.—"They have made me a K.C.B. I may confess to you that I would much rather have got a year's batta, because the latter would enable me to leave this country a year sooner."—Sir John Grant, in Incidents of the Sepoy War.

1554.—"And gold, if of 10 mates or 24 carats, is worth 10 cruzados the tael . . . if of 9 mates, 9 cruzados; and according to whatever the mates may be it is valued; but moreover it has its batao, i.e. its shroffage (carrafojagem) or agio (caio) varying with the season."—A. Nunes, 40.

1860.—"The payment or receipt of Batta or VATUM upon the exchange of Poularch for Madras pagodas prohibited, both comine being of the same MATT and weight, upon pain of forfeiture of 24 pagodas for every offence together with the loss of the Batta."—Pt. St. Geo. Consn., Feb. 10. In Notes and Extts., p. 17.

1760.—"The Nabob receives his revenues in the siccas of the current year only . . . and all siccas of a lower date being esteemed, like the coin of foreign provinces, only a merchandise, are bought and sold at a certain discount called batta, which rises and falls like the price of other goods in the market. . . ."—Fl. Wm. Cons., June 30, in Long, 216.

1810.—"... he immediately tells master that the batta, i.e., the exchange, is altered."
—Williamson, V. M. i. 203.

BATTAS, BATAKS. &c. n.p. [the latter, according to Mr. Skeat, being the standard Malay name]; a nation of Sumatra, noted especially for their singular cannibal institutions, combined with the possession of a written character of their own and some approach to literature.

c. 1430.—"In ejus insulae, quam dicunt Bathech, parte, anthropophagi habitant . . . capita humana in thesauris habent, quae ex hostibus captis absissa, esis carnibus recondunt, risque utuntur pro nummis."—Conti, in Poggins, De Var. Fort. lib. iv.

c. 1539.—"This Ambassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of Battas . . . brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aoes, Calamaba, and five quintals of Benjamom in flowers."—Cogan's Pinto, 15.

c. 1555.—"This Island of Sumatra is the first land wherein we know man's flesh to be eaten by certain people which live in the mountains, called Bacas (read Batas), who use to gilde their teethes."—Galeano, Discoveries of the World, Hak. Soc. 108.

1586.—"Nel regno del Dacin sono alcuni lugghi, ne' quali si ritrovano certe genti, che mangiano le creature humane, e tali genti, si chiamano Batacchi, e quando fà loro i padri, e i madri sono vecchi, si accordano i vicinati di mangiarsi, e li mangiano."—G. Balsb, t. 130.

BAWUSTYE, s. Corr. of bobstay in Lascar dialect (Roebuck).

BAY, The. n.p. In the language of the old Company and its servants in the 17th century, The Bay meant the Bay of Bengal, and their factories in that quarter.

1683.—"And the Councell of the Bay is as expressly distinguished from the Councell of Hugly, over which they have noe such power."—In Hedges, under Sept. 24. [Hak. Soc. i. 114.]

1747.—"We have therefore laden on her 1754 Bales . . . which we sincerely wish may arrive safe with You, as We do that the Gentlemen at the Bay had according to our repeated Requests, furnished us with an earlier conveyance . . ."—Letter from Fl. St. David, 2nd May, to the Court (MS. in India Office).

BAYA, s. H. baya (boyga), the Weaver-bird, as it is called in books of Nat. Hist., Plocus boyga, Blyth (Fringillidae). This clever little bird is not only in its natural state the builder of those remarkable pendant nests which are such striking objects, hanging from eaves or palm-branches; but it is also docile to a singular degree in domestication, and is often exhibited by itinerant natives as the performer of the most delightful tricks, as we have seen, and as is detailed in a paper of Mr Blyth's quoted by Jerdon. "The usual procedure is, when ladies are present, for the bird on a sign from its master to take a cardamom or sweatmeat in its bill, and deposit it between a lady's lips. . . . A miniature cannon is then brought, which the bird loads with coarse grains of powder one by one . . . it next seizes and skillfully uses a small ramrod; and then takes a lighted match from its master, which it applies to the touch-hole." Another common performance is to scatter small beads on a sheet; the bird is provided with a needle and thread, and proceeds in the prettiest way to thread the beads successively. [The quotation from Abul Fazl shows that these performances are as old as the time of Akbar and probably older still.]

[c. 1590.—"The baya is like a wild sparrow but yellow. It is extremely intelligent, obedient and docile. It will take small coins from the hand and bring them to its master, and will come to a call from a long distance. Its nests are so ingeniously constructed as to defy the rivalry of clever artificers."—Ain (trans. Jarrett), iii. 122.]

1790.—"The young Hindu women of Banaras . . . wear very thin plates of gold, called tico's, slightly fixed by way of ornament between the eyebrows; and when they pass through the streets, it is not uncommon for the youthful libertines, who amuse themselves with training Bayà's, to give them a sign, which they understand, and to send them to pluck the pieces of gold from the foreheads of their mistresses."—Asiat. Researches, ii. 110.

[1813.—Forbes gives a similar account of the nests and tricks of the Baya.—Or. Mem., 2nd ed. i. 33.]
BAYADÈRE, s. A Hindu dancing-girl. The word is especially used by French writers, from whom it has been sometimes borrowed as if it were a genuine Indian word, particularly characteristic of the persons in question. The word is in fact only a Gallicized form of the Portuguese bailadeira, from bailar, to dance. Some 50 to 60 years ago there was a famous ballet called Le dieu et la bayadère, and under this title Punch made one of the most famous hits of his early days by presenting a cartoon of Lord Ellenborough as the Bayadère dancing before the idol of Somnath; [also see DANCING-GIRL].

1526.—"XLVII. The dancers and danceresses (bayadères e bailadeiras) who come to perform at a village shall first go and perform at the house of the principal man of the village "(Gancar, see GAUM).—Fortal de usos costumes dos Ganceres e Larvadores de esta Ilha de Goa, in Arch. Port. Or., fascic. 5, 132.

1598.—"The heathenish whore called Bailiádiera, who is a dancer."—Linschoten, 74; [Hak. Soc. i. 264].

1599.—"In hâc icones primum proponitur Hâda Bailiádiera, id est saltatrix, quae in publicis ludis aliae solentinatis salutando spectaculum exhibet."—De Brey, Text to pl. xii. in vol. ii. (also see p. 80, and vol. vii. 20), etc.

[c. 1676.—"All the Baladines of Gombroon were present to dance in their own manner according to custom."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 335.]

1782.—"Surate est renommé par ses Bayadères, dont le véritable nom est Déridiâwi: celui de Bayadères que nous leur donnons, vient du mot Bailaddleiras, qui signifie en Portugais Danseuses."—Sommerat, i. 7.

1794.—"The name of Bailadère, we never heard applied to the dancing girls; or saw but in Raynal, and War in Asia, by an Officer of Colonel Baillie's Detachment; it is a corrupt Portuguese word."—Moore's Narrative of Little Detachment, 556.

1825.—"This was the first specimen I had seen of the southern Bayadère, who differ considerably from the nāch girls in northern India, being all in the service of different temples, for which they are purchased young."—Heber, ii. 180.

c. 1836.—"On one occasion a rumour reached London that a great success had been achieved in Paris by the performance of a set of Hindoo dancers, called Les Bayadères, who were supposed to be priestesses of a certain sect, and the London theatrical managers were at once on the qui vive to secure the new attraction. My father had concluded the arrangement with the Bayadères before his brother managers arrived in Paris. Shortly afterwards, the Hindoo priestesses appeared at the Adelphi. They were utterly uninteresting, wholly unattractive. My father lost £2000 by the speculation; and in the family, they were known as the 'Buy-em-dears' ever after."—Edmund Yates, Recollections, i. 29, 30 (1841).

BAYPARREE, BEOPARRY, s. H. bepari, and byoparî (from Skt. yopāparini); a trader, and especially a petty trader or dealer.

A friend long engaged in business in Calcutta (Mr. J. F. Ogilvy, of Gillanders & Co.) communicates a letter from an intelligent Bengalee gentleman, illustrating the course of trade in country produce before it reaches the hands of the European shipper:

1878.—"... the enhanced rates... do not practically benefit the producer in a marked, or even in a corresponding degree; for the lion's share goes into the pockets of certain intermediate classes, who are the growth of the above system of business.

"Following the course of trade as it flows into Calcutta, we find that between the cultivators and the exporter these are: 1st. The Bepparree, or petty trader; 2nd. The Aurut-dar;* and 3rd. The Mahajun, interested in the Calcutta trade. As soon as the crops are cut, Bepparree appears upon the scene; he visits village after village, and goes from household to household, buying the produce of the village marts, from the ryots; he then takes his purchases to the Aurut-dar, who is stationed at a centre of trade, and to whom he is perhaps under advances, and from the Aurut-dar the Calcutta Mahajun obtains his supplies... for eventual despatch to the capital. There is also a fourth class of dealers called Phoreas, who buy from the Mahajun and sell to the European exporter. Thus, between the cultivator and the shipper there are so many middlemen, whose participation in the trade involves a multiplication of profits, which goes a great way towards enhancing the price of commodities before they reach the shipper's hands."—Letter from Baboo Nobobias Ghose. [Similar details for Northern India will be found in Hoey, Mon. Trade and Manufactures of Lucknow, 59 seq.]

BAZZAR, s. H. &c. From P. bāḍār, a permanent market or street of shops. The word has spread westward into

* Aurut-dar is ārut-där, from H. ārhät, 'agency'; phoreas=H. pharjadi, 'a retailer.'
Arabic, Turkish, and, in special senses, into European languages, and eastward into India, where it has generally been adopted into the vernaculars. The popular pronunciation is bazdr. In S. India and Ceylon the word is used for a single shop or stall kept by a native. The word seems to have come to S. Europe very early. F. Balducci Pegolotti, in his Mercantile Hand- book (c. 1340) gives Bazaar as a Genoese word for ‘market-place’ (Catthay, &c. ii. 286). The word is adopted into Malay as pasdr, [or in the poems pasara].

1474.—Ambrose Contarini writes of Kazan, that it is “walled like Como, and with ba- zars ([bazzari] like it.”—Ramusio, ii. f. 117.

S. vii. p. 617 (Vienna, by M. D. Conway).

BDELLIUM. S. This aromatic gum-resin has been identified with that of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker, inhabiting the dry regions of Arabia and Western India; gugal of Western India, and mokl in Arabic, called in P. bo-i-jahadân (Jews’ scent). What the Hebrew bdolah of the R. Phison was, which was rendered bdellium since the time of Josephus, remains very doubtful. Lassén has suggested musk as possible. But the argument is only this: that Dioscorides says some called bdellium madelkov; that madelkov perhaps represents Mad- alaka, and though there is no such Skt. word as madalaka, there might be madiraka, because there is madara, which seems some perfume, no one knows what! (Ind. Alterth. i. 292.)

Dr. Royle says the Persian authors describe the Bdellium as being the product of the Dooam palm (see Hindu Medicine, p. 90). But this we imagine is due to some ambiguity in the sense of mokl. [See the authorities quoted in Encycl. Bibl. s.v. Bdel- lium which still leave the question in some doubt.]

c. a.D. 90.—[In exchange are exported from Barbarese (Indus Delta) costus, bdella. ...”—Periplus, ch. 39.

1612.—[Bdellium, the pond ... xxx.”—Rates and Valuations (Scotland), p. 298.

BEADALA. n.p. Formerly a port of some note for native craft on the Râmnâd coast (Madura district) of the Gulf of Manar, Vadaulay in the Atlas of India. The proper name seems to be Vêdalâri, by which it is mentioned in Bishop Caldwell’s Hist. of Tinnevelly (p. 235), [and which is derived from Tam. vedu, ‘hunting,’ and al, ‘a banyan-tree’ (*Mad. p. 953). The place was famous in the Portuguese History of India for a victory gained there by Martin Affonso de Sousa (Capítulo Mór do Mar) over a strong land and sea force of the Zamorin, commanded by a famous Mahomedan Captain, whom the Portuguese called Pate Marcar, and the Tuhfat-al-Mujāhidin calls 'Ali Ibrahim Markēr, 15th February, 1538. Barros styles it "one of the best fought battles that ever came off in India." This occurred under the viceroyalty of Nuno da Cunha, not of Stephen da Gama, as the allusions in Camões seem to indicate. Captain Burton has too hastily identified Beadala with a place on the coast of Malabar, a fact which has perhaps been the cause of this article (see Lusiads, Commentary, p. 477).

1552.—"Martin Affonso, with this light fleet, on which he had not more than 400 soldiers, went round Cape Comorin, being aware that the enemy were at Beadalā . . . . —Barros, Dec. IV., liv. viii. cap. 13.

c. 1570.—"And about this time Alee Ibrahim Murka, and his brother-in-law Kunjee-Alee-Murka, sailed out with 22 guns in the direction of Kaseel, and arriving off Bentalah, they landed, leaving their guns at anchor. . . . But destruction overtook them at the arrival of the Franks, who came upon them in their galliots, attacking and capturing all their guns. . . . Now this capture by the Franks took place in the latter part of the month of Shaban, in the year 944 [end of January, 1538]."—Tuhfat-al-Mujahideen, tr. by Rowlandson, 141.

Camões, x. 65.

By Burton (but whose misconception of the locality has here affected his translation):

BEAR-TREE, BAIR, &c. s. H. ber, Mahr. bora, in Central Provinces bor, [Malay badara or bidara Chinta,] (Skt. badara and vadara) Zizyphhus jujuba, Lam. This is one of the most widely diffused trees in India, and is found wild from the Punjab to Burma, in all which region it is probably native. It is cultivated from Queensland and China to Morocco and Guinea. "Sir H. Elliot identifies it with the lotus of the ancients, but although the large juicy product of the garden Zizyphus is by no means bad, yet, as Madden quaintly remarks, one might eat any quantity of it without risk of forgetting home and friends."—(Punjab Plants, 43.)

The name in Canarese is bor, and in the Dean bēr, and the Malays call them vidaras, and they are better than ours; yet not so good as those of Balagate . . . which are very tasty."—Garcia De O., 33 [1609.—"Here is also great quantity of gum-lack to be had, but is of the tree called Bēr, and is in grain like unto red mastic."—Davies, Letters, i. 30.]

BEARER, s. The word has two meanings in Anglo-Indian colloquial:

a. A palanquin-carrier; b. (In the Bengal Presidency) a domestic servant who has charge of his master's clothes, household furniture, and (often) of his ready money. The word in the latter meaning has been regarded as distinct in origin, and is stated by Wilson to be a corruption of the Bengali vēhārā from Skt. vyavahārī, a domestic servant. There seems, however, to be no historical evidence for such an origin, e.g. in any habitual use of the term vēhārā, whilst as a matter of fact the domestic bearer (or sirdār-bearer, as he is usually styled by his fellow-servants, often even when he has no one under him) was in Calcutta, in the penultimate generation when English gentlemen still kept palankins, usually just what this literally implies, viz. the head-man of a set of palankin-bearers. And throughout the Presidency the bearer, or valet, still, as a rule, belongs to the caste of Kāhār (see KUHAR), or palki-bearers. [See BOY.]

BEEBEE, s. H. from P. bibå, a lady. [In its contracted form bi, it is added as a title of distinction to the names of Musulman ladies.] On the principle of degradation of titles which is so general, this word in application to European ladies has been superseded by the hybrids Mem-Sâhib, or Madam-Sâhib, though it is often applied to European maid-servants or other Englishwomen of that rank of life. [It retains its dignity as the title of the Bibå of Cananore, known as Bibå Valiya, Malayal, 'great lady,' who rules in that neighbourhood and exercises authority over three of the islands of the Laccadives, and is by race a Moplah Mohammedan.] The word also is sometimes applied to a prostitute. It is originally, it would seem, Oriental Turk. In Pavet de Courteille's Dict. we have “Bibi, dame, épouse légitime” (p. 181). In W. India the word is said to be pronounced boho (see Burton's Sind). It is curious that among the Sakalava of Madagascar the wives of chiefs are termed biby; but there seems hardly a possibility of this having come from Persia or India. [But for Indian influence on the island, see Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xv. 174.] The word in Hova means "animal."—(Sibree's Madagascar, p. 253.)

The Nawaub smiled, and said, "O friend, you and I are both the sons of slave women, and the two Housseins only (on whom be good wishes and Paradise!) are the sons of a Bibi."—Hist. of Hyder Naik, tr. by Miles, 486.

BEECH-DE-MER, s. The old trade way of writing and pronouncing the name, bicho-de-mar (borrowed from the Portuguese) of the sea-slug or holothuria, so highly valued in China. [See menu of a dinner to which the Duke of Connaught was invited, in Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. p. 247.] It is split, cleaned, dried, and then carried to the Straits for export to China, from the Maldives, the Gulf of Manar, and other parts of the Indian seas further east. The most complete account of the way in which this somewhat important article of commerce is prepared, will be found in the Tijdschrift voor Nederlandsch Indie, Jaarg, xvii. pt. i. See also SWALLOW and TRIPANG.

* The "Bahadur" could hardly have read Don Quixote! But what a curious parallel presents itself! When Sancho is bragging of his daughter to the "Squire of the Wood," and takes umbrage at the free epithet which the said Squire applies to her (= lawadiké and more); the latter reminds him of the like term of apparent abuse (hardly reproducible here) with which the mob were wont to greet a champion in the bull-ring after a dent aper-thrust, meaning only the highest fondness and applause!—Part ii. ch. 13.

BEECHMÁN, also MEECHIL-MÁN, s. Sea-H. for 'midshipman.' (Roebuck).

BEEGHÁH, s. H. bighá. The most common Hindu measure of land-area, and varying much in different parts of India, whilst in every part that has a bighá there is also certain to be a pucka beegah and a kutcha beegah (vide CUTHA and PUCKA), the latter being some fraction of the former. The beegah formerly adopted in the Revenue Survey of the N.W. Provinces, and in the Canal Department there, was one of 3025 sq. yards or \( \frac{3}{4} \) of an acre. This was apparently founded on Akbar's beegah, which contained 3600 sq. Itádi gáz, of about 33 inches each. [For which see Áín, trans. Jarrrett, ii. 62.] But it is now in official returns superseded by the English acre.

1783.—"I never seized a beega or beewu (H. bighá) belonging to Calcutta, nor have I ever impressed your gomastas."—Nawáb Kásim 'Ali, in Gleg's Mem. of Hastings, i. 129.

1823.—"A Begah has been computed at one-third of an acre, but its size differs in almost every province. The smallest Begah may perhaps be computed at one-third, and the largest at two-thirds of an acre."—Malcolm's Central India, ii. 15.

1877.—"The Resident was gratified at the low rate of assessment, which was on the general average eleven annas or 1s. 4½d. per beegah, that for the Nizam's country being upwards of four rupees."—Meadows Taylor, Story of my Life, ii. 5.

BEGUM, BEGUM, &c. s. A Princess, a Mistress, a Lady of Rank; applied to Mahommedan ladies, and in the well-known case of the Begum Sumroo to the professedly Christian (native) wife of a European. The word appears to be Or. Turki. bigam, [which some connect with Skt. bhaga, 'lord,'] a feminine formation from Beg, 'chief, or lord,' like Khánum from Khán; hence P. begam. [Beg appears in the early travellers as Beage.]

BEEJOO, s. Or 'Indian badger,' as it is sometimes called, H. biù [bijá], Melivora indica, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 176]. It is also often called in Upper India the Grave-digger, (gorkhodo) from a belief in its bad practices, probably unjust.

BEER, s. This liquor, imported from England, [and now largely made in the country], has been a favourite in India from an early date. Porter seems to have been common in the 18th century, judging from the advertisements in the Calcutta Gazette; and the Pale Ale made, it is presumed, expressly for the India market, appears in the earliest years of that publication. That expression has long been disused in India, and beer, simply, has represented the thing. Hodgson's at the beginning of this century, was the beer in almost universal use, replaced by Bass, and Allsopp, and of late years by a variety of other brands. [Hodgson's ale is immortalised in Bon Guiller.]

1638.—"... the Captain... was well provided with... excellent good Sack, English Beer, French Wines, Arak, and other refreshments."—Mandelslo, E. T., p. 10.

BEER, COUNTRY. At present, at least in Upper India, this expression simply indicates ale made in India (see COUNTRY) as at Masurí, Kasaulí, and Ootacumund Breweries. But it formerly was (and in Madras perhaps still is) applied to ginger-beer, or to a beverage described in some of the quotations below, which must have become obsolete early in the last century. A drink of this nature called Sugar-beer was the ordinary drink at Batavia in the 17th century, and to its use some travellers ascribed the prevalent unhealthiness. This is probably what is described by Jacob Bontius in the first quotation:

1631.—There is a recipe given for a beer of this kind, "not at all less good than Dutch beer. ... Take a hooped cask of 30 amphorae (f.), fill with pure river water; add 2 lb. black Java sugar, 4 oz. tamarinds, 3 lemons cut up, cork well and put in a cool place. After 14 hours it will boil as if on a fire," &c.—Hist. Nat. et Med. Indic. Orient., p. 8. We doubt the result anticipated.

1789.—"They use a pleasant kind of drink, called Country-beer, with their victuals; which is composed of toddy ... porter, and brown-sugar; is of a brisk nature, but when cooled with saltpetre and water, becomes a very refreshing draught."—Manro, Narrative, 42.

1810.—"A temporary beverage, suited to the very hot weather, and called Country-beer, is in rather general use, though water artificially cooled is commonly drunk during the repasts."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 122.

BEER-DRINKING. Up to about 1850, and a little later, an ordinary exchange of courtesies at an Anglo-Indian dinner-table in the provinces, especially a mess-table, was to ask a guest, perhaps many yards distant, to "drink beer" with you; in imitation of the English custom of drinking wine together, which became obsolete somewhat earlier. In Western India, when such an invitation was given at a mess-table, two tumblers, holding half a bottle each, were brought to the inviter, who carefully divided the bottle between the two, and then sent one to the guest whom he invited to drink with him.

1848.—"'He aint got distany manners, dammy,' Bragg observed to his first mate; 'he wouldn't do at Government House, Roper, where his Lordship and Lady William was as kind to me ... and asking me at dinner to take beer with him before the Commander-in-Chief himself ...'"—Vanity Fair, II. ch. xxii.

1858.—"First one officer, and then another, asked him to drink beer at mess, as a kind of tacit extension of hostilities."—Oakfield, ii. 52.

BEETLEFKEE, n.p. "In some old Voyages coins used at Mocha are so called. The word is Bait-ul-fakih, the 'Fruit-market,' the name of a bazar there," So C. P. Brown. The place is in fact the Coffee-mart of which Hodeida is the port, from which it is about 30 m. distant inland, and 4 marches north of Mocha. And the name is really Bait-ul-Fakih, 'The House of the Divine,' from the tomb of the Saint Ahmad Ibn Mūsā, which was the nucleus of the place.—(See Ritter, xii. 872; see also BEETLE-PACKIE, Milburn, i. 96.)

1690.—"Coffee ... grows in abundance at Beetle-fuckee ... and other parts."—Ovington, 465.

1710.—"They daily bring down coffee from the mountains to Betelfaquy, which is not above 3 leagues off, where there is a market for it every day of the week."—(French) Voyage to Arabia the Happy, E. T., London, 1726, p. 90.

1770.—"The tree that produces the Coffee grows in the territory of Betel-faqui, a town belonging to Yemen."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 352.

BEGAR, BIGARRY. s. H. begārī, from P. begar, 'forced labour' [be 'without', gār (for kār), 'one who works']; a person pressed to carry a load, or do other work really or professedly for public service. In some provinces begār is the forced labour, and bigārī the pressed man; whilst in Karmātā, begārī is the performance of the lowest village offices without money payment, but with remuneration in grain or land (Wilson). C. P. Brown says the word is Canarese; but the P. origin is hardly doubtful.

[1519.—“It happened that one day sixty bigairis went from the Comorin side towards the fort loaded with oyster-shells.”—Custane-kota, Bk. V. ch. 83.]

1882.—“The Malama people were some time back ordered to make a practicable road, but they flatly refused to do anything of the kind, saying they had never done any begār labour, and did not intend to do any.”—[ref. wanting.]

BEHAR, n.p. H. Bihār. That province of the Mogul Empire which lay on the Ganges immediately above Bengal, was so called, and still retains the name and character of a province, under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and embracing the ten modern districts of Patna, Sāran, Gāya, Shaḥābād, Tirhut, Champārān, the Santāl Parganas, Bhāgalpūr, Monghīr, and Purniāh. The name was taken from the old city of Bihār, and that derived its title from being the site of a famous Vihaṇa in Buddhist times. In the later days of Mahomedan rule the three provinces of Bengal, Behar and Orissa were under one Subadar, viz. the Nawāb, who resided latterly at Murshidābād.

[1676.—“Translate of a letter from Shaus-teth Caukne (Shaista Khan) . . . in answer to one from Wares Cawne, Great Chancellor of the Province of Bearnā about the English.”—In Birkwood, Rep. 50.]

The following is the first example we have noted of the occurrence of the three famous names in combination:

1679.—“On perusal of several letters relating to the procuring of the Great Mogul’s Phynmaund for trade, custome free, in the Bay of Bengall, the Chief in Council at Hugly is ordered to procure the same, for the English to be Customs free in Bengal, Orixa and Bearnā.”—Pt. St. Geo. Cons., 20th Feb. in Notes and Extts., Pt. ii. p. 7.

BEHUT, n.p. H. Behot. One of the names, and in fact the proper name, of the Punjab river which we now call Jelum (i.e. Jhīlam) from a town on its banks: the Hydaspes or Bīdaspe of the ancients. Both Behot and the Greek name are corruptions, in different ways, of the Skt. name Vitastā. Sidi Ali (p. 200) calls it the river of Bahura. Bahra or Bhara was a district on the river, and the town and tahsil still remain, in Shāhpur Dist. [It “is called by the natives of Kaśmir, where it rises, the Bedasta, which is but a slightly-altered form of its Skt. name, the Vitastā, which means ‘wide-spread.’”—McCrindle, Invasion of India, 93 seqq.]

BEIRAMEE, BYRAMTEE, also BYRAMPAUT, s. P. bairam, bairami. The name of a kind of cotton stuff which appears frequently during the flourishing period of the export of these from India; but the exact character of which we have been unable to ascertain. In earlier times, as appears from the first quotation, it was a very fine stuff. [From the quotation dated 1609 below, they appear to have resembled the fine linen known as “Holland” (for which see Draper’s Dict. s.v.).]

c. 1313.—Ibn Batuta mentions, among presents sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak of Delhi to the great Kaan, “100 suits of rainement called bairamfuyah, i.e. of a cotton stuff, which were of unequalled beauty, and were each worth 100 dinārs [rupees].”—iv. 2.

the Harbour of Carwar, the inner part of which is Beite Cul Cove.

BELGAUM, n.p. A town and district of the Bombay Presidency, in the S. Maharatta country. The proper name is said to be Canarese Venavgramā, ‘Bamboo-Town.’ [The name of a place of the same designation in the Vizagapatam district in Madras is said to be derived from Skt. bila-grāma, ‘cave-

The name occurs in De Barros under the form ‘Cidade de Bilgan’ (Dec. IV., liv. viii. cap 5).

BENAMEE, adj. P.—H. be-nāmā,

‘anonymous’; a term specially applied to documents of transfer or other contract in which the name entered as that of one of the chief parties (e.g. of a purchaser) is not that of the person really interested. Such transactions are for various reasons very common in India, especially in Bengal, and are not by any means necessarily fraudulent, though they have often been so.

["There probably is no country in the world except India, where it would be necessary to write a chapter ‘On the practice of putting property into a

373.)]

In the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), sections 421-423, on fraudulent deeds and dispositions of Property," appear to be especially directed against the dishonest use of this benamee system.

It is alleged by C. P. Brown on the authority of a statement in the Friend of India (without specific reference) that the proper term is banāmī, adopted from such a phrase as banāmī chittī,

‘a transferable note of hand,’ such notes commencing, ‘ba-nām-i-falām,’ to the name or address of (Abraham Newlands). This is conceivable, and probably true, but we have not the evidence, and it is opposed to all the authorities: and in any case the present form and interpretation of the term be-nāmī has become established.

1854.—"It is very much the habit in India to make purchases in the name of others, and from whatever causes the practice may have arisen, it has existed for a series of years: and these transactions are known as ‘Benamee transactions’; they are noticed at least as early as the year

1778, in Mr. Justice Hyde’s Notes."—Ed.

p. 72.

(\"The presumption of the Hindoo law, in a joint undivided family, is that the whole property of the family is joint estate . . . where a purchase of real estate is made by a Hindoo in the name of one of his sons, the presumption of the Hindoo law is in favour of its being a benamee purchase, and the burden of proof lies on the party in whose name it was purchased, to prove that he was solely entitled.\")—Note by the Editor of above Vol., p. 53.

1861.—"The decree Sale law is also one chief cause of that nuisance, the benamee system . . . It is a peculiar contrivance for getting the benefits and credit of property, and avoiding its charges and liabilities.

It consists in one man holding land, nominally for himself, but really in secret trust for another, and by ringing the changes between the two . . . relieving the land from being BENARES. n.p. The famous and holy city on the Ganges. H. Bandras from Skt. Vārānasi. The popular Pundit etymology is from the names of the streams Varana (mod. Barna) and Asī, the former a river of some size on the north and east of the city, the latter rivulet now embraced within its area; or from the mythical founder, Rājā Bānārāj. This origin is very questionable. The name, as that of a city, has been (according to Dr. F. Hall) familiar to Sanscrit literature since B.C. 120. The Buddhist legends would carry it much further back, the name being in them very familiar.

1665.—“Banarou is a large City, and handsomely built; the most part of the Houses being either of Brick or Stone ... but the inconvenience is that the Streets are very narrow.”—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 52; [ed. Ball, i. 118. He also uses the forms Benares and Banarous, Ibid. ii. 182, 225].

English factory at Bencoolen was from 1714 called Fort Marlborough.

1501.—“Bencool” is mentioned among the ports of the East Indies by Amerigo Vespucii in his letter quoted under Bac-anōre.

1800.—“We ... were forced to bear away to Bencool, another English Factory on the same Coast ... It was two days before I went ashore, and then I was importuned by the Governor to stay there, to be Gunner of the Fort.”—Dampier, i. 512.

1727.—“Bencolim is an English colony, but the European inhabitants not very numerous.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 114.

1788.—“It is nearly an equal absurdity, though upon a smaller scale, to have an establishment that costs nearly 40,000. at Bencoolen, to facilitate the purchase of one cargo of pepper.”—Cornwallis, i. 390.

BENDAMEER, n.p. Pers. Bandamīr. A popular name, at least among foreigners, of the River Kur (Araxes) near Shiraz. Properly speaking, the word is the name of a dam constructed across the river by the Amīr Fānā Khusrāh, otherwise called Aζed-ud-danāh, a prince of the Buwā family (A.D. 965), which was thence known in later days as the Band-i-Amīr, “The Prince’s Dam.” The work is mentioned in the Geog. Dict. of Yākūt (c. 1220) under the name of Sikrā Fānā-Khusrakh Khurrakh and Kirdū Fānā Khusrakh (see Barb. Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, 313, 480). Fryer repeats a rigmarole that he heard about the miraculous formation of the dam or bridge by Band Haimero (!) a prophet, “wherefore both the Bridge and the Plain, as well as the River, by Boterus is corruptly called Bindamire” (Fryer, 258).

1475.—“And from thence, a daies journey, ye come to a great bridge vpon the Ryndamyr, which is a notable great ryver. This bridge they sayd Salomon caused to be made.”—Barbaro (Old E. T.), Hak. Soc. 80.

1621.—“... having to pass the Kur by a longer way across another bridge called Bend Erim, which is as much as to say the Tie (ligatura), or in other words the Bridge, of the Erim, which is two leagues distant and at Chehil minar ... which is so called after a certain Erim Hamza the Dilemite who built it ... Fra Filippo Ferrari, in his Geographical Epitome, attributes the name of Bendemir to the river, but he is wrong, for Bendemir is the name of the bridge and not of the river.”—P. della Valle, ii. 264.
1686.—"Il est bon d’observer, vue le commun People appelle le Bend-Emir en cet endroit ab pulhen, c’est à dire le Fleuve du Pont Neuf; qu’on ne le appelle par son nom de Bend-Emir que proche de la Digue, qui lui a fait donner ce nom."—Chardin (ed.
1711), ix. 45.

1890.—"We proceeded three miles further, Journey), 124. See also (1811) 2nd Journey, pp. 73-74, where there is a view of the Bund-Amir.

1813.—"The river Bund Emeer, by some ancient Geographers called the Cyprius, takes its present name from a dyke (in Persian a brad) erected by the celebrated Ameer Azad-a-Doulah Delemi."—Macdonald Kine-uir, Geog. Mem. of the Persian Empire, 59.

1817.—"There’s a bower of roses by Bendameer’s 1850.—"The water (of Lake Neyriz) is almost entirely derived from the Kur (known to us as the Bund Amir River) . . .

"—Abbott, in J.R.G.S., xxv. 73.

1878.—We do not know whether the Band-i-Amir is identical with the quasisynonymous Put-i-Khâv by which Col.
Macgregor crossed the Kur on his way from Shiraz to Yezd. See his Khorsassan, i. 45.

BENDÁRA, s. A term used in the Malay countries as a title of one of the higher ministers of state—Malay bandahāra, Jav. bendārə, 'Lord.' The word enters into the numerous series of purely honorary Javanese titles, and the elegance in regard to it is very complicated. (See Tijdschr. v.
Nederl. India, year viii. No. 12, 253 seqq.) It would seem that the title is properly bandārə, 'a treasurer,' and taken from the Skt. bhändrən, 'a steward or treasurer.' Haex in his Malay-Latin Dict. gives Bandārī, 'OEconomus, questor, expeditor.'
[Mr. Skeat writes that Clifford derives it from Banda-hara-an, 'a treasury,' which he again derives from Malay benda, 'a thing,' without explaining hara, while Wilkinson with more probability classes it as Skt.]

1509.—"Whilst Sequeira was consulting with his people over this matter, the King sent his Bendhara or Treasure-Master on it is the custom that the eldest bintara should have green shades before his eyes, that he may not be dazzled by the greatness of the Raja, and forget his duty) brought the books and packets, and delivered them to the bintara with the black bren, from whose hands the Raja received them, one

BENGAL, n.p. The region of the Ganges Delta and the districts immediately above it; but often in English use with a wide application to the whole territory garrisoned by the Bengal army. This name does not appear, so far as we have been able to learn, in any Mahommedan or Western writing before the latter part of the 13th century. In the earlier part of that century the Mahommedan writers generally call the province Lakhnaoo, after the chief city, but we have also the old form Beng, from the indigenous Vaanga. Already, however, in the 11th century we have it as Vanngalam on the Inscription of the great Tanjore Pagoda. This is the oldest occurrence that we can cite.

The alleged City of Bengal of the Portuguese which has greatly perplexed geographers, probably originated with the Arab custom of giving an important foreign city or seaport the name of the country in which it lay (compare the city of Solmandela, under CORO-MANDEL). It long kept a place in maps. The last occurrence that we know of is in a chart of 1743, in Dalrymple’s Collection, which identifies it with Chittagong, and it may be considered certain that Chittagong was the place intended by the older writers (see Varthema and Ovington). The former, as regards his visiting Banghella, deals in fiction—a thing clear from internal evidence, and expressly alleged, by the judicious Garcia de Orta: “As to what you say of Ludovico Varto-mano, I have spoken, both here and in Portugal, with men who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and then reverted to us, doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calcut and Cochim.”—Colloquios, f. 30.

c. 1298.—“Bangala is a Province towards the south, which up to the year 1290 . had not yet been conquered. . . .” (Ecc.—Marco Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 55.

c. 1300.—. . . then to Bijâlar (but better reading Bangâla), which from of old is subject to Delhi . . . .”—Rashîddâddîn, in Elliot, i. 72.

c. 1315.—. . . we were at sea 45 days and then arrived in the country of Banjâla, which is a vast region abounding in rice. I have seen no country in the world where provisions are cheaper than in this; but it is muggy, and those who come from Khorâsân call it ’a hell full of good things.’” —Ibn Batuta, iv. 211. (But the Emperor Aurungzebe is alleged to have “emphatically styled it the Paradise of Nations.”—Note in Stavrovines, i. 291.)

1813.—“The banda (Hibiscus esculentus) is a nutritious oriental vegetable.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 32; [2nd ed. i. 22].

1880.—“I recollect the West Indian ookroo . . . being some years ago recommended for introduction in India. The seed was largely advertised, and sold at about 8s. the ounce to eager horticulturists, who . . . found that it came up nothing other than the familiar bendy, the seed of which sells at Bombay for 1s. the ounce. Yet . . . ookroo seed continued to be advertised and sold at 8s. the ounce. . . .”—Note by Sir G. Birdwood.

1516.—"... the Kingdom of Bengal, in which there are many towns. ... Those of the interior are inhabited by Gentiles subject to the King of Bengal, who is a Moor; and the seaports are inhabited by Moors and Gentiles, amongst whom there is much trade and much shipping to many parts, because this sea is a gulf ... and at its inner extremity there is a very great city inhabited by Moors, which is called Bengal, with a very good harbour."—Barrow, 178-9.

c. 1590.—"Bungale originally was called Bung; it derived the additional al from that being the name given to the mounds of earth which the ancient Rajahs caused to be raised in the low country, at the foot of the hills."—Ayeen Akbery, tr. Gladwin, ii. 4 (ed. 1800); [tr. Jarrett, ii. 120].

1609.—"Arracan ... is bounded on the North-West by the Kingdom of Bengal, some Authors making Chatigam to be its first Frontier City; but Teixeira, and generally the Portuguese Writers, reckon that as a City of Bengal; and not only so, but place the City of Bengal itself ... more South than Chatigam. 'Thou I confess a late French Geographer has put Bengal into his Catalogue of imaginary Cities.'—Ovington, 554.

BENGAL, s. This was also the designation of a kind of piece-goods exported from that country to England, in the 17th century. But long before, among the Moors of Spain, a fine muslin seems to have been known as albanga, surviving in Spanish albangala. (See Dozy and Eng. s. v.) [What were called "Bengal Stripes" were striped ginghams brought first, from Bengal and first made in Great Britain at Paisley, (Draper's Dict. s. v.). So a particular kind of silk was known as "Bengal wound," because it was "rolled in the rude and artless manner immemorially practised by the natives of that country," (Milburn, in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. 3, 185.) See N.E.D. for examples of the use of the word as late as Lord Macaulay.]

1896.—"Tis granted that Bengal and staine'd Callicoes, and other East India Goods, do hinder the Consumption of Norfolk stuffs ..."—Davenant, An Essay on the East India Trade, 31.

BENGALA, s. This is or was also applied in Portuguese to a sort of cane carried in the army by sergeants, &c. (Bluteau).

BENGALIEE, n.p. A native of Bengal [Baboo]. In the following early occurrence in Portuguese, Bengal is used:

1552.—"In the defence of the bridge died three of the King's captains and Tuam Bandam, to whose charge it was committed, a Bengal (Bengala) by nation, and a man sagacious and crafty in stratagems rather than a soldier (cavalheiro)."—Barros, ii., vi. iii.

[1610.—"Bangasalys." See quotation from Teixeira under BANKSHALL.] A note to the Seir Mutagheron quotes a Hindustani proverb: Bangali jangal, Kashmiri baapir, i.e. 'The Bengalie is ever an entangler, without religion.'

In modern Anglo-Indian parlance the title is often applied in provinces other than Bengal to officers from N. India. The following from Madras is a curious early instance of the same use of the word:—

[1699.—"Two Bengalles here of Council."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. colxvii.]

BENIGHTED, THE, adj. An epithet applied by the denizens of other Presidencies, in facetious disparagement to Madras. At Madras itself "all Carnatic fashion" is an habitual expression among older English-speaking natives, which appears to convey a similar idea. (See MADRAS, NULL.)

1860.—"... to ye Londe of St Thomé. It ys ane darke Londe, & ther dwelne ye Cimmerians whereof speketh Homerus Poeta in his Odyssey & to this Daye thei elepen Tenbrozi, or Je Benhitched folkte."—Fragments of Sir J. Maunderville, from a MS. lately discovered.

BENJAMIN, BENZOIN, &c., s. A kind of incense, derived from the resin of the Syrrax benzoin, Dryander, in Sumatra, and from an undetermined species in Siam. It got from the Arab traders the name laban-Jawi, i.e. "Java Frankincense," corrupted in the Middle Ages into such forms as we give. The first syllable of the Arabic term was doubtless taken as an article—lo benzoit, whence benzoit, benzoine, and so forth. This etymology is given correctly by De Orta, and by Valentijn, and suggested by Barbosa in the quotation below. Spanish forms are benjöi, menjöi; Modern Port. benjoim, bejoum; Ital. belzuino, &c. The terms Jawi, Jowri were applied by the Arabs to the Malay countries generally (especially

An acute disease, obscure in its nature and pathology, generally but not always presenting dropical symptoms, as well as paralytic weakness and numbness of the lower extremities, with oppressed breathing. In cases where debility, oppression, anxiety and dyspnoea are extremely severe, the patient sometimes dies in 6 to 30 hours. Though recent reports seem to refer to this disease as almost confined to natives, it is on record that in 1793, in Trincomalee, 200 Europeans died of it.

The word has been alleged to be Singhalese beri [the Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s. v. gives barbari], ‘debility.’ This kind of reduplication is really a common Singhalese practice. It is also sometimes alleged to be a W. Indian Negro term; and other worthless guesses have been made at its origin. The Singhalese origin is on the whole most probable [and is accepted by the N.E.D.]. In the quotations from Bondius and Bluteau, the disease described seems to be that formerly known as Barbiers. Some authorities have considered these diseases as quite distinct, but Sir Joseph Fayrer, who has paid attention to berberi and written about it (see The Practitioner, January 1877), regards Barbiers as “the dry form of beri-beri,” and Dr. Lodewijks, quoted below, says briefly that “the Barbiers of some French writers is incontestably the same disease.” (On this

This word, Malay banuuwa, [in standard Malay, according to Mr. Sket, benuwa or benua], properly means ‘land, country,’ and the Malays use orang-banuuwa in the sense of aborigines, applying it to the wilder tribes of the Malay Peninsula. Hence “Benuas” has been used by Europeans as a proper name of those tribes.—See Crawfurd, Dict. Ind. Arch. sub voce.

it is necessary to remark that the use of the term Barbiers is by no means confined to French writers, as a glance at the quotations under that word will show. The disease prevailed endemically in Ceylon, and in Peninsular India in the coast-tracts, and up to 40 or 60 m. inland; also in Burma and the Malay region, including all the islands, at least so far as New Guinea, and also Japan, where it is known as kakke: [see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 238 seqq.]. It is very prevalent in certain Madras Jails. The name has become somewhat old-fashioned, but it has recurred of late years, especially in hospital reports from Madras and Burma. It is frequently epidemic, and some of the Dutch physicians regard it as infectious. See a pamphlet, Beri-Beri door J. A. Lodewijks, ond. officier van Gezondheid bij het Ned. Indische Leger, Harderwijk, 1882. In this pamphlet it is stated that in 1879 the total number of beri-beri patients in the military hospitals of Netherlands-India, amounted to 9873, and the deaths among these to 1682. In the great military hospitals at Achin there died of beri-beri between 1st November 1879, and 1st April 1880, 574 persons, of whom the great majority were dwangarbeiders, i.e. 'forced labourers.' These statistics show the extraordinary prevalence and fatality of the disease in the Archipelago. Dutch literature on the subject is considerable.

Sir George Birdwood tells us that during the Persian Expedition of 1857 he witnessed beri-beri of extraordinary virulence, especially among the East African stokers on board the steamers. The sufferers became dropically distended to a vast extent, and died in a few hours.

In the second quotation squerry is evidently meant. This seems much allied by causes to beriberi though different in character.

BERILY. s. This word is perhaps a very ancient importation from India to the West, it having been supposed that its origin was the Skt. vais̄ūrya, Prak. vēṣūrya, whence [Malay baiduri and bīduri], P. bilaur, and Greek βήρυλλος.

Bochart points out the probable identity of the two last words by the transposition of 1 and r. Another transposition appears to have given Ptolomy his θρωδια ἄρη (for the Western Ghats), representing probably the native Vaidūrya mountains. In Ezekiel xxvii. 13, the Sept. has βήρυλλων, where the Hebrew now has taresh, [another word with probably the same meaning being shoahem (see Professor Ridgeway in Encycl. Bibl. s.v. Beryl)]. Professor Max Müller has treated of the possible relation between vaisūrya and vidāṭu, 'a cat,' and in connection with this observes that 'we should, at all events, have learnt the useful lesson that the chapter of accidents is sometimes larger than we suppose.'—(India, What can it Teach us? p. 267). This is a lesson which many articles in our book suggest; and in dealing with the same words, it may be indicated that the resemblance between the Greek αἰλώρως, bilaur, a common H. word for a cat, and the P. billaur, 'beryl,' are at least additional illustrations of the remark quoted.

c. A.D. 70.—"Berys ... from India they come as from their native place, for seldom are they to be found elsewhere. ... Those are best accounted of which carry a sea-water Greene."—Pliny, Bk. XXXVII. cap. 20 (in P. Holland, ii. 613).

c. 150.—"Πωνάτα ἡν ἐν βήρυλλοσ."—Ptolomy, I. vii.

s. The leaf of the Piper betel, L., chewed with the dried arecanut (which is thence improperly called betel-nut, a mistake as old as Fryer; 1673,—see p. 40), chewam, etc., by the natives of India and the Indo-Chinese countries. The word is Malayal. vettila, i.e. veru + ila = 'simple or mere leaf,' and comes to us through the Port. betre and bete. Pawn (q.v.) is the term more generally used by modern Anglo-Indians. In former times the betel-leaf was in S. India the subject of a monopoly of the E. I. Co.

1298.—"All the people of this city (Cael) as well as of the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called Tometul . . . . the lords and gentlefolks and the King have these leaves prepared with camphor and other aromatic spices, and also mixt with quick-lime. . . .—Marco Polo, ii. 358. See also Abularraszā, in India in XV. Cent., p. 32.

1510.—"This betel resembles the leaves of the sour orange, and they are constantly eating it."—Varthema, p. 144.

1516.—"We call this betel Indian leaf."—Barboas, 73.

[1521.—"Betre (or vettele)."—See under ARECA.]

1552.—"... at one side of the bed stood a man ... who held in his hand a gold plate with leaves of betel. ..."—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. viii.

1563.—"We call it betre, because the first land known by the Portuguese was Malabar, and it comes to my remembrance that in Portugal they used to speak of their coming not to Indiu, but to Calcutt ... insomuch that in all the names that occur, which are not Portugeuse, are Malabar, like betre."—Garcia, f. 37g.

1582.—The transl. of Castañeda by N. L. has betele (f. 35), and also vitele (f. 44).

1585.—A King's letter grants the revenue from betel (betre) to the bishop and clergy of Goa.—In Arch. Port. Or., fasc. 3, p. 38.

1615.—"He sent for Cocoa-Nuts to give the Company, himselfe chewing Bittile and lime of Oyster-shells, with a Kernell of Nut called Arracca, like an Akorne, it bites in the mouth, accords rhyme, cooles the head, strengthens the teeth, & is all their Phisicke."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [with some trifling variations in Foster's ed. (Hak. Soc.) 19].

1672.—"They pass the greater part of the day in indolence, occupied only with talk, and chewing Betel and Areca, by which means their lips and teeth are always stained."—P. di Vincenzo Maria, 232.

1677.—The Court of the E. I. Co. in a letter to Ft. St. George, Dec. 12, disapprove of allowing "Valentine Nurse 20 Rupees a month for diet, 7 Rs. for house- rent, 2 for a cook, 1 for Beetle, and 2 for a Porter, which is a most extravagant rate, which we shall not allow him or any other."—Notes and Ects., No. 1. p. 21.

1727.—"I presented the Officer that

waited on me to the Sea-side (at Calicut) with 5 zequeens for a feast of bettle to him and his companions."—A. Hamilton, i. 306.

BETTEELA, BEATELLE, &c., s. The name of a kind of muslin constantly mentioned in old trading-lists and narratives. This seems to be a Sp. and Port. word beatilla or beatilha, for 'a veil,' derived, according to Cobarruvias, from "certain beatas, who invented or used the like." Beata is a religieuse. ["The Betilla is a certain kind of white E. I. chintz made at Masulipatam, and known under the name of Oryandi."—Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. p. 233.]

"Vestida huma camisa preciosa Trazida de delgada beatilha, Que o corpo crystallino deixa ver-se;
Que tanto bem não he para esconder-se."
Comões, vi. 21.

1598.—"... this linen is of divers sorts, and is called Serampuras, Cassas, Comsas, Beatillassias, Tapotospas, and a thousand such names."—Linschoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 95; and cf. i. 56.]

1685.—"To servants, 3 pieces betelaes."—In Wheeler, i. 149.

1727.—"Before Aurungzeh conquered Vissapora, this country (Sundah) produced the finest Beteeelas or Muslins in India."
—A. Hamilton, i. 204.

[1788.—"There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengah: Betelles, &c.—Chambers' Cyc., quoted in 3 ser. Notes & Q. iv. 88.]

BEWAURIS, adj. P.—H. be-wāris, 'without heir.' Unclaimed, without heir or owner.

BEYPOOR, n.p. Properly Veppūr, or Bēppūr, [derived from Malayāl. veppu, 'deposit,' ur, 'village,' a place formed by the receding of the sea, which has been turned into the Skt. form Vayupura, 'the town of the Wind-god'] The terminal town of the Madras Railways on the Malabar coast. It stands north of the river; whilst the railway station is on the S. of the river—(see CHALIA). Tipoo Sahib tried to make a great port of Beypoor, and to call it Sultanapatnam. [It is one of the many places which have been suggested as the site of Ophir (Logan, Malabar, i. 246), and is probably the Belliporto of Tavernier, "where there was a fort which the Dutch had made with palms" (ed. Ball, i. 235).]

"Chamaré o Samorim mais gente nova; Virão Reis de Bipur, e de Tanor..."
Comões, x. 14.

1727.—"About two Leagues to the South of Calicut, is a fine River called Baypore, capable to receive ships of 3 or 400 Tuns."—A. Hamilton, i. 322.

BEZOAR, s. This word belongs, not to the A.-Indian colloquial, but to the language of old oriental trade and materia medica. The word is a corruption of the P. name of the thing, pdzahr, 'pellens venenum,' or pdzahr. The first form is given by Meninski as the etymology of the word, and this is accepted by Littre [and the N.E.D.]. The quotations of Littre from Ambrose Paré show that the word was used generically for 'an antidote,' and in this sense it is used habitually by Avicenna. No doubt the term came to us, with so many others, from Arab medical writers, so much studied in the Middle Ages, and this accounts for the b, as Arabic has no p, and writes bāzahr. But its usual application was, and is, limited to certain hard concretions found in the bodies of animals, to which antidotal virtues were ascribed, and especially to one obtained from the stomach of a wild goat in the Persian province of Lar. Of this animal and the bezar an account is given in Kaempfer's Amoenitates Exoticae, pp. 398 seqq. The Bezoor was sometimes called Snake-Stone, and erroneously supposed to be found in the head of a snake. It may have been called so really because, as Ibn Baitar states, such a stone was laid upon the bite of a venomous creature (and was believed) to extract the poison. Mooden Sheriff, in his Suppt. to the Indian Pharmacopia, says there are various bezars in use (in native mat. med.), distinguished according to the animal producing them, as a goat-, camel-, fish-, and snake-bezor; the last quite distinct from Snake-Stone (q.v.).

[A false Bezoar stone gave occasion for the establishment of one of the great distinctions in our Common Law, viz. between actions founded upon contract, and those founded upon wrongs: Chandelier v. Lopus was decided in 1804 (reported in 2. Croke, and in Smith's Leading Cases). The head-note runs—
The defendant sold to the plaintiff a stone, which he affirmed to be a Bezoar stone, but which proved not to be so. No action lies against him, unless he either knew that it was not a Bezoar stone, or warranted it to be a Bezoar stone (quoted by Gray, Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 484.).

1516.—Barbosa writes passar. [1528.—"Near this city (Lara) in a small mountain are bred some animals of the size of a buck, in whose stomach grows a stone they call bazar."—Tenreiro, ch. iii. p. 14.]

c. 1550.—"... ado ut ex solis Bezahar nonnulla vasa confitata viderim, maxime apud eos qui a veneris sibi cavere wordem."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i. p. 56.

1599.—"Body o' me, a shrewd mishance. Why, had you no unicorn's horn, nor bezoar's stone about you, ha?"—B. Johnson, Every Man out of his Humour, Act v. sc. 4.

1605.—The King of Bantam sends K. James I. "two beasor stones."—Soinsbury, i. 143.

1610.—"The Persian calls it, per excellenc, Pazzahar, which is as much as to say 'antidote' or more strictly 'remedy of poison or venom,' from Zazar, which is the general name of any poison, and pe, 'remedy'; and as the Arabic lacks the letter p, they replace it by b, or f; and so they say, instead of Pazzahar, Bazazar, and we with a little additional corruption Bezahar."—P. Teixeira, Relationes, &c., pt. 157.

1613.—"... elk, and great snakes, and apes of bazar stone, and every kind of game birds."—Godinho de Ereda, 10v.

1617.—"... late at night I drunk a little bezas stone, which gave me much paine most parte of night, as though 100 Wormes had byn knowing at my hart; yet it gave me ease afterward."—Cowper's Diary, i. 301 [in i. 154 he speaks of "beza stone."]

1634.—Bontius claims the etymology just quoted from Teixeira, erroneously, as his own.—Lib. iv. p. 47.

1673.—"The Persians then call this stone Pazzahar, being a compound of Pa and Za- kar, the first of which is against, and the other is Pozon."—Eger, 285.

","The Monkey Bezoars which are long, are the best. "—Ibid, 212.

1826.—"What is spikonard? what is miminat? what is pahzer? compared even to a twinkle of a royal eye-lash?"—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 148.

Bhat, s. H. &c. büt (Skt. bhatta, a title of respect, probably connected with bhattir, "a supporter or master"), a man of a tribe of mixed descent, whose members are professed genealogists and poets; a bard. These men in Rajputana and Guzerat had also extraordinary privileges as the guar- antors of travellers, whom they accompanied, against attack and robbery. See an account of them in Forbes's Râs Mâlâ, i. ix. &c., reprint 558 seqq.; for Bengal, Risley, Tribes & Castes, i. 101 seqg.; for the N.W.P., Crooke, Tribes & Castes, ii. 20 seqg.

[1554.—"Bats," see quotation under RAJPUT.]

c. 1555.—"Among the infidel Bânyaâns in this country (Guzerat) there is a class of literati known as Bats. These undertake to be guides to traders and other travellers when the caravans are waylaid on the road by Râshbâts, i.e. Indian horsemen, coming to pilage them, the Bât takes out his dagger, points it at his own breast, and says: 'I have become surety! If aught befals the caravan I must kill myself!' On these words the Râshbâts let the caravan pass unharmed."—Sidî 'Alî, 95.

1775.—"The Hindoo rajahs and Maharrata chieftains have generally a Bhat in the family, who attends them on public occasions; sounds their praise, and proclaims their titles in hyperbolic and figurative language; and in every way of them have another mode of living; they offer themselves as security to the different governments for payment of their revenue, and the good behaviour of the Zemindars, petels, and public farmers; they also become guarantees for treaties between native princes, and the performance of bonds by individuals."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 89; [2nd ed. i. 377; also see ii. 258. See TRAGÁ.

1810.—"Indis, like the nations of Europe, had its minstrels and poets, concerning whom there is the following tradition: At the marriage of Siva and Parvatty, the immortals having exhausted all the amusements then known, wished for something new, when Siva, wiping the drops of sweat from his brow, shook them to earth, upon which the Bawts, or Bards, immediately sprang up."—Maria Graham, 169.

1828.—"A 'Bhat' or Bard came to ask a gratuity."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 53.

Bheel, n.p. Skt. Bhílls; H. Bhil. The name of a race inhabiting the hills and forests of the Vindhaya, Malwa, and of the N.-Western Deccan, and believed to have been the aborigines of Râjputâna; some have supposed them to be the Phûlârau of Ptolemy. They are closely allied to the Coolies (q. v.) of Guzerat, and are believed to belong to the Kolâriân division of Indian aborigines. But no distinct Bhill language survives.

1785.—"A most infernal yell suddenly issued from the deep ravines. Our guides informed us that this was the noise always made by the Bheels previous to an attack." —Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 480.

1825.—"All the Bheels whom we saw to-day were small, slender men, less broad-shouldered ... and with faces less Celtic than the Puharees of the Rajmahal. ... Two of them had rude swords and shields, the remainder had all bows and arrows." —Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 75.

BHEEL, s. A word used in Bengal—bhîl; a marsh or lagoon; same as Jeel (q. v.)

[1860.—"The natives distinguish a lake so formed by a change in a river's course from one of usual origin or shape by calling the former a boot—whilst the latter is termed a Bheel."—Grant, Royal Life in Bengal, 35.]

1870.—"Below Shony-doong there used to be a big bheel, wherein I have shot a few duck, teal, and snipe." —Pottak, Sport in B. Burmah, i. 26.

BHEESTY, s. The universal word in the Anglo-Indian households of N. India for the domestic (corresponding to the sakkâ of Egypt) who supplies the family with water, carrying it in a mussuck (q. v.), or goatskin, slung on his back. The word is P. biihiskî, a person of biihisk to or paradise, though the application appears to be peculiar to Hindustan. We have not been able to trace the history of this term, which does not apparently occur in the Aim, even in the curious account of the way in which water was cooled and supplied in the Court of Akbar (Blochmann, tr. i. 55 seqq.), or in the old travellers, and is not given in Meninski's lexicon. Vullers gives it only as from Shakespear's Hindustani Diet. [The trade must be of ancient origin in India, as the leather bag is mentioned in the Veda and Manu (Wilson, Rig Veda, ii. 28; Institutes, ii. 79.) Hence Col. Temple (Ind. Ant., xi. 117) suggests that the word is Indian, and connects it with the Skt. vîsh, 'to sprinkle.' It is one of the fine titles which Indian servants rejoice to bestow on one another, like Mehtar, Khalîfa, &c. The title in this case has some justification. No class of men (as all Anglo-Indians will agree) is so diligent, so faithful, so unobtrusive, and uncomplaining as that of the biihiskîs. And often in battle they have shown their courage and fidelity in supplying water to the wounded in face of much personal danger.

[c. 1660.—"Even the menials and carriers of water belonging to that nation (the Pathans) are high-spirited and war-like." —Barnier, ed. Constable, 207.]

1773.—"Bheestee, Waterman" (etc.)—Ferguson, Dict. of the Hindostan Language, &c.

1871.—"I have the happiness to inform you of the fall of Bijah Gurh on the 9th inst. with the loss of only 1 sepoy, 1 beasty, and a cossy (q. Cossid) killed ..."—Letter in India Gazette of Nov. 24th.

Five Rupees continued to be the standard wage of a biihiskî for full 80 years after the date given.

1810.—"... If he carries the water himself in the skin of a goat, prepared for that purpose, he then receives the designation of Bheesty." —Williamson, V.M. i. 229.

1829.—"Dressing in a hurry, find the drunken bheesty ... has mistaken your boot for the golet in which you carry your water on the line of march."—Camp Miseries, in John Shipp, ii. 149. N.B.—We never knew a drunken bheesty.

1878.—"Here comes a seal carrying a porpoise on its back. No! it is only our friend the bheesty." —In my Indian Garden, 79.

BHIKTY, s. The usual Calcutta name for the fish Lates calcarifer. See COCKUP.

BHOOSA, s. H. Mahr. bhus, bhusa; the husks and straw of various kinds of corn, beaten up into chaff by the feet of the oxen on the threshing-floor; used as the common food of cattle all over India.

[1829.—"Every commune is surrounded with a circumvallation of thorns ... and the stacks of bhoos, or 'chaff,' which are placed at intervals, give it the appearance of a respectable fortification. These bhoo stacks are erected to provide provender for the cattle in scanty rainy seasons."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 737.]

[BHOOT. s. H. &c., bhōt, bhātā, Skt. bhāta, 'formed, existent,' the common term for the multitudinous ghosts and demons of various kinds by whom the Indian peasant is so constantly beset.

[1623. — "All confessing that it was Buto, i.e. the Devil."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 341.]

[1826. — "The sepoy started up, and cried 'Bhoo, bhō, arry arry.' This cry of a ghost' reached the ears of the officer, who bid his men fire into the tree, and that would bring him down, if there."—Pandoreang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 107.]

BHOUNSLA, n.p. Properly Bhoslah or Bhonslah, the surname of Sivaji, the founder of the Maharrata empire. It was also the surname of Parsoji and Raghuji, the founders of the Maharrata dynasty of Barat, though not of the same family as Sivaji.

1673.—"Seva Gi, derived from an Ancient Line of Rajahs, of the Cast of the Bounceleoes, a Warlike and Active Offspring."—Fryer, 171.

c. 1730. — "At this time two parganas, named Puna and Sūpa, became the jagirs of Sāhā Bhoslah. Sivaji became the manager. . . He was distinguished in his tribe for courage and intelligence; and for craft and trickery he was reckoned a sharp son of the devil."—Kāhi Khān, in Elliot, vii. 257.

1780.—"It was at first a particular tribe governed by the family of Bhosselah, which has since lost the sovereignty."—Seir Mutaghervin, iii. 214.

1782.—". . . le Bonzolo, les Maratos, et les Mogols,"—Sonnerat, i. 60.

BHAYACHARRA, s. H. bhayāchārā. This is a term applied to settlements made with the village as a community, the several claims and liabilities being regulated by established customs, or special traditional rights. Wilson interprets it as "fraternal establishments." [This hardly explains the tenure, at least as found in the N.W.P., and it would be difficult to do so without much detail. In its perhaps most common form each man's holding is the measure of his interest in the estate, irrespective of the share to which he may be entitled by ancestral right.]

BICHĀNA, s. Bedding of any kind. H. bichhānā.

1689.—"The Heat of the Day is spent in Rest and Sleeping . . . sometimes upon Cotts, and sometimes upon Bechanahs, which are thick Quilts."—Ovington, 313.

BIDREE, BIDRY, s. H. Bidri; the name applied to a kind of ornamental metal-work, made in the Deccan, and deriving its name from the city of Bidar (or Bedar), which was the chief place of manufacture. The work was, amongst natives, chiefly applied to hooka-bells, rose-water bottles and the like. The term has acquired vogue in England of late amongst amateurs of "art manufacture." The ground of the work is pewter alloyed with one-fourth copper: this is inlaid (or damascened) with patterns in silver; and then the pewter ground is blackened. A short description of the manufacture is given by Dr. G. Smith in the Madras Lit. Soc. Journ., N.S. i. 81-84; [by Sir G. Birdwood, Indust. Arts, 163 seqq.; Journ. Ind. Art, i. 41 seqq.] The ware was first described by B. Heyne in 1813.

BILABUNDY, s. H. bilabandī. An account of the revenue settlement of a district, specifying the name of each mahal (estate), the farmer of it, and the amount of the rent (Wilson). In the N.W.P. it usually means an arrangement for securing the payment of revenue (Elliot). C. P. Brown says, quoting Raikes (p. 109), that the word is bila-bandī, 'hole-stopping,' viz. stopping those vents through which the coin of the proprietor might ooze out. This, however, looks very like a 'striving after meaning,' and Wilson's suggestion that it is a corruption of behrī-bandī, from behrī, 'a share,' 'a quota,' is probably right.

[1858.—"This transfer of responsibility, from the landholder to his tenants, is called 'Jumog Logāna,' or transfer of jumma. The assembly of the tenants, for the purpose of such adjustment, is called zunjoer bandee, or linking together. The adjustment thus made is called the bilabundee."—Sleeman, Journey through Oudeh, i. 205.]

BILAYUT, BILLAÎT, &c. n.p. Europe. The word is properly Ar. Wildyut, 'a kingdom, a province,' variously used with specific denotation, as the Afghans term their own country.
often by this name; and in India again it has come to be employed for distant Europe. In Sicily Il Regno is used for the interior of the island, as we use Mofussil in India. Wildyat is the usual form in Bombay.

BILAYUTE PAWNEE, BILÁTEE PANEE. The adjct. bilátyat or wildyat is applied specifically to a variety of exotic articles, e.g. bilátyat boingan (see BRINJAU), to the tomato, and most especially bilátyat páni, 'European water,' the usual name for soda-water in Anglo-India.

1885. — "But look at us English," I urged, "we are ordered thousands of miles away from home, and we go without a murmur." "It is true, Khudawund," said Ganga Parsad, "but you stack drink English-water (soda-water), and the strength of it enables you to bear up under all fatigues and sorrows." His idea (adds Mr. Knighton) was that the effervescing force of the soda-water, and the strength of it which drove out the cork so violently, gave strength to the drinker of it."—Times of India Mail, Aug. 11, 1885.

BILDÁR, s. H. from P. beldár, 'a spade-wielder,' an excavator or digging labourer. Term usual in the Public Works Department of Upper India for men employed in that way.

1847. — "Ye Lyme is alle oute! Ye Masouns lounge about! Ye Beldars have alle strucke, and are smaokinge atte their Eese! Ye Brickes are alle done! Ye Kyne are Skynne and Bone, And ye Thressour hur has bolted with xii thousand Rupees!" Ye Dreme of an Executive Engineer.

BILOOCH, BELOOCH, n.p. The name (Balách or Bilách) applied to the race inhabiting the regions west of the Lower Indus, and S.E. of Persia, called from them Biláchistán; they were dominant in Sind till the English conquest in 1843. [Prof. Max Müller (Lectures, i. 97, note) identified the name with Skt. mlechcha, used in the sense of the Greek μληχασα for a despised foreigner.]

A.D. 643.—"In the year 32 H. 'Abdulla bin 'Amr bin Rabí invaded Kirmán and took the capital Kuváshir, so that the aid of the men of Kuj and Balúj was solicited in vain by the Kirmání."—In Elliot, i. 417.

c. 1200.—"He gave with him from Kandahár and Lár, mighty Balóchis, servants... with nobles of many castes, horses, elephants, men, carriages, charioteers, and chariots." —

The Poem of Chand Bardáí, in Ind. Ant. i. 272. c. 1211.—"In the desert of Khabis there was a body... of Bulúchis who robbed on the highway. These people came out and carried off all the presents and rarities in his possession."—Ubi, in Elliot, ii. 193.

1556.—"We proceeded to Gwádir, a trading town. The people here are called Balúj; their prince was Malik Jalaluddín, son of Malik Dínár."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 73.

[c. 1590.—"This tract is inhabited by an usual Balóch tribe called Kalmaní."—Ain, trans. Jarret, ii. 337.]

1613.—The Boloches are of Mahomet's Religion. They deal much in Camels, most of them robbers..."—N. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 485.

1648.—"Among the Machumatists next to the Pattans are the Biotias of great strength" [!] Wildyat.—Van Twist, 58.

1727.—"They were lodged in a Caravan-seray, when the Ballowches came with about 300 to attack them; but they had a brave warm Reception, and left four Score of their Number dead on the Spot, without the loss of one Dutch Man."—A. Hamilton, i. 107.

1813.—Müthurn calls them Bloaches (Or. Com. i. 145).

1844.—"Officers must not shoot Peacocks: if they do the Bolóches will shoot officers—at least so they have threatened, and M.-G. Napier has not the slightest doubt but that they will keep their word. There are no wild peacocks in Scinde,—they are all private property and sacred birds, and no man has any right whatever to shoot them."—Gen. Orders by Sir C. Napier.

BINKY-NABOB, s. This title occurs in documents regarding Hyde and Tipppo, e.g. in Gen. Stewart's desp. of 8th March 1739: "Mohammed Rezza, the Binky Naboli." [Also see Wilks, Mysoor, Madras reprint, ii. 346.] It is properly benki-nawáb, from Canar-ese benki, 'fire,' and means the Commander of the Artillery.

BIRD OF PARADISE. The name given to various beautiful birds of the family Paradízidae, of which many species are now known, inhabiting N. Guinea and the smaller islands adjoining it. The largest species was called by Linnaeus Paradisae apoda, in allusion to the fable that these birds had no feet (the dried skins brought for sale to the Moluccas having usually none attached to them). The name Manuice which Buffon adopted for these birds occurs in the form Manuicodiata in some of the following quotations. It is a corruption of the Javanese name Manu&-devata; ‘the Bird of the Gods,’ which our popular term renders with sufficient accuracy. [The Siamese word for ‘bird,’ according to Mr. Skeat, is nok, perhaps from manok.]

c. 1430.—“In majori Java avis precipua repertur sine pedibus, instar palumbi, phuma levi, cauda oblonga, semper in arboribus quiescens: caro non editur, pollis et cauda habentur pretiosiores, quibus pro ornamento capitis utuntur.” —N. Conti, in Poggia de Varietae Fortunaee, lib. iv.

c. 1524.—“He also (the K. of Bachian) gave us for the King of Spain two most beautiful dead birds. These birds are as large as thrushes; they have small heads, long beaks, legs slender like a writing pen, and a span in length; they have no wings, but instead of them long feathers of different colours, like plumes; their tail is like that of the thrush. All the feathers, except those of the wings (?), are of a dark colour; they never fly except when the wind blows. They told us that these birds come from the terrestrial Paradise, and they call them ‘bolon dinata,’ [burung-dinata, same as Javanes Manu&-devata, supra] that is, divine birds.” —Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 143.

1598.—“. . . in these Is. (Moluccas) once is found the bird, which the Portuguese call Papuaes de Sol, that is, the Boule of the Sunne, the Italians call it Manua codiata, and the Latinists Paradises, by us called Paradice birdes, for ye beauty of their feathers which passe al other birds: these birds are never seen alive, but being dead they are found vpon the Iland; they flee, as it is said, alwaies into the Sunne, and keepe themselves continually in the ayre . . . for they have neither head, nor wings, nor only head, nor bodie, and the most part tayle . . . .”—Linschoten, 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 118.]

1572.—“Olha cá pelos mares do Oriente
As infinitas ilhas espalhadas
* * * * * * *
Aqui as aureas aves, que não decem Nunca á terra, e só mortas aparecem.”

_Camões,* x. 132.

Eng. shed by Burton:

“Here see o’er oriental seas bespread Infinite island-groups and all where Strewed * * * * * * *
Here dwell the golden owls, whose home Is air,
And never earthward save in death may fare.”

1645.—“. . . the male and female Manu& codiata, the male having a hollow in the back, in which it reported the female both lays and hatches her eggs.” —Evelyn’s Diary, 4th Feb.

1674.—“The strangest long-wing’d hawk that flies,
That like a Bird of Paradise,
Or herald’s martlet, has no legs . . . .”

_Hudibras,* Pt. ii. cant. 3.

1591.—“As for the story of the Manu&codiata or Bird of Paradise, which in the former Age was generally received and accepted for true, even by the Learned, it is now discovered to be a fable, and rejected and exploded by all men” (i.e. that it has no feet). —Ray, Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of the Creation, ed. 1692, Pt. ii. 147.

1705.—“The Birds of Paradise are about the bigness of a Pidgeon. They are of varying Colours, and are never found or seen alive; neither is it known from whence they come . . . .”—Furnell, in Dampier’s Voyages, iii. 266-7.

1868.—“When seen in this attitude, the Bird of Paradise really deserves its name, and must be ranked as one of the most beautiful and wonderful of living things.” —Wallace, Malay Archip. 7th ed., 464.

BIRDS’ NESTS. The famous edible nests, formed with mucus, by certain swiftlets, Collocalia nudifica, and C. linchi. Both have long been known on the eastern coasts of the B. of Bengal, in the Malay Islands [and, according to Mr. Skeat in the islands of the Inland Sea (Tale Sap) at Singora]. The former is also now known to visit Darjeeling, the Assam Hills, the Western Ghats, &c., and to breed on the islets off Malabar and the Concan.

BISCOBRA, s. H. bis&hopra or bis&hupra. The name popularly applied to a large lizard alleged, and commonly believed, to be mortally venomous. It is very doubtful whether there is any real lizard to which this name applies, and it may be taken as certain that there is none in India with the qualities attributed. It is probable that the name does carry to many the terrific character which the ingenious author of Trèbes on My Frontier alleges. But the name has nothing to do with either bis in the sense of ‘twice,’ or cobra in that of ‘snake.’ The first element is no doubt bish, (q.v.) ‘poison,’ and the second is probably khorap, ‘a shell or skull.’ [See J. L. Kipling, Beast and Man in India (p. 317), who gives the scientific name as varanus dracaena, and says that the name biscobra is sometimes applied to the lizard generally known as the ghorap, for which see GUANA.]

1883.—“But of all the things on earth that bite or sting, the palm belongs to the biscobra, a creature whose very name seems to indicate that it is twice as bad as the cobra. Though known by the terror of its name to natives and Europeans alike, it has never been described in the Proceedings of any learned Society, nor has it yet received a scientific name. . . . The awful deadliness of its bite admits of no question, being supported by countless authentic instances. . . . The points on which evidence is required are—first, whether there is any such animal; second, whether, if it does exist, it is a snake with legs, or a lizard without them.”—Tribes on my Frontier, p. 206.

BISH, BIKH, &c., n. H. from Skt. visha, ‘poison.’ The word has several specific applications, as (a) to the poison of various species of aconite, particularly Aconitum ferox, otherwise more specifically called in Skt. vatsanāṭhā, ‘calf’s navel,’ corrupted into bachnāṭh or bachnāg, &c. But it is also applied (b) in the Himalaya to the effect of the rarefied atmosphere at great heights on the body, an effect which there and over Central Asia is attributed to poisonous emanations from the soil, or from plants; a doctrine somewhat naively accepted by Huc in his famous narrative. The Central Asiatic (Turki) expression for this is Esh, ‘smell.’

1554.—“Entre les singularités que le consul de Florentins me montra, me feist gouster vne racine que les Arabes nomment Bisch: laquelle me causa si grande chaleur en la bouche, qui me dura deux jours, qu'il me sembloit y avoir du feu. . . . Elle est bien petite comme vn petit naucne: les autres (aureurs) l'ont nommée Napoléon . . .”—Pierre Belon, Observations, &c., f. 97.

1681-2.—“Est autem Langurum omnium altissimus, ita ut in summitate ejus viatores vix respirare ob aeris subtilitatem quaeant: neque is ob virulentas nonnullarum herbarum exhalationes aestivo-tempore, sine manifesto vitae periculo transire possit.”—P. P. Dorville and Greuter, in Kircher, China Illustrata, 65. It is curious to see these intelligent Jesuits recognize the true cause, but accept the fancy of their guides as an additional one!

1812.—“Here begins the Esh—this is a Turkish word signifying Smell . . . it implies something the odour of which induces indisposition; far from hence the breathing of horse and man, and especially of the former, becomes affected.”—Mir Izet Ullah, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 283.

1815.—“Many of the coolies, and several of the Mewattee and Ghorkha sepoys and chuprasses now lagged, and every one complained of the bis or poisoned wind. I now suspected that the supposed poison was nothing more than the effect of the rarefaction of the atmosphere from our great elevation.”—Fraser, Journal of a Tour, &c., 1820, p. 442.

1819.—“The difficulty of breathing which at an earlier date Andrada, and more recently Moorcroft had experienced in this region, was confirmed by Webb; the Butias themselves felt it, and call it bis ki huwa, i.e. poisonous air; even horses and yaks . . . suffer from it.”—Webb’s Narrative, quoted in Ritter, Asien., ii. 532, 649.

1845.—“Nous arrivâmes à neuf heures au pied du Bourhan-Bota. La caravane s’arrêta un instant . . . on se montrait avec anxiété un gaz subtil et léger, qu’on nommait vasepe pestilente, et tout le monde paraissait abattu et découragé . . . Bientôt les chevaux se refusèrent à porter leurs cavaliers, et chacun avança à pied et à petits pas . . . tous les visages blêmirent, on sent le cœur s’affadire, et les jambs ne pouvaient plus fonctionner . . . Une partie de la troupe, par mesure de prudence s’arrêta . . . le reste par prudence aussi épuisâ toute leurs efforts pour arriver jusqu’au bout, et ne pas mourir asphyxié au milieu de cet air chargé d’acide carbonique,” &c., Huc et Gabet, ii. 211: [E. T., ii. 114].

[BISMILLAH, intj., lit. “In the name of God”; a pious ejaculation used by Mahomedans at the commencement of any undertaking. The ordinary form runs—Bi’smi ‘lāhî ‘r-raḥmānî ‘r-raḥîm, i.e. “In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful,” is of Jewish origin, and is used at the commencement of meals, putting on new clothes, beginning any new work, &c. In the second form, used at the time of going into battle or slaughtering animals, the allusion to the attribute of mercy is omitted.

[1535.—"As they were killed after the Portuguese manner without the bysmela, which they did not say over them."—Correa, iii. 746.]

BISNAGAR, BISNAGA, BEEJANUGGER, n.p. These and other forms stand for the name of the ancient city which was the capital of the most important Hindu kingdom that existed in the peninsula of India, during the later Middle Ages, ruled by the Raya dynasty. The place is now known as Human (Humph), and is entirely in ruins. [The modern name is corrupted from Pumpa, that of the river near which it stood. (Rice, Mysore, ii. 487.)] It stands on the S. of the Tangabhadra R., 36 m. to the N.W. of Bellary. The name is a corruption of Vijayaganara (City of Victory), or Vidyanagara (City of learning), [the latter and earlier name being changed into the former (Rice, Ibid. i. 342, note).] Others believe that the latter name was applied only since the place, in the 13th century, became the seat of a great revival of Hinduism, under the famous Sayana Madhava, who wrote commentaries on the Vedas, and much besides. Both the city and the kingdom were commonly called by the early Portuguese Narsinga (q.v.), from Narasimha (c. 1400-1508), who was king at the time of their first arrival. [Rice gives his dates as 1488-1508.]

c. 1420.—"Profectus hinc est procul a mari milliariis trescentis, ad civitatem ingentem, nomine Bizenegialiam, ambitu millarium sexaginta, circa praeruptos montes sitam."—Conti, in Poggia de Var. Fortuna, iv.

1442.—"... the chances of a maritime voyage had led Abd-er-razzak, the author of this work, to the city of Bidjanagar. He saw a place extremely large and thickly populated, and a King possessing greatness and sovereignty to the highest degree, whose dominion extends from the frontier of Serendib to the extremity of the country of Kalbergh—from the frontiers of Bengal to the environs of Malabar."—Abdurrazzak, in India in XV. Cent., 22.

c. 1470.—"The Hindu sultan Kadam is a very powerful prince. He possesses a numerous army, and resides on a mountain at Bichenegher."—Athan. Nikitin, in India in XV. Cent., 29.

1516.—"45 leagues from these mountains inland, there is a very great city, which is called Bijanagher. ..."—Barbosa, 85.

1611.—"Le Roy de Binsagar, qu'on appelle aussi quelquefois le Roy de Narzinga, est puissant."—Wyszet, H. des Indes, ii. 64.

BISON, s. The popular name, among Southern Anglo-Indian sportsmen, of the great wild-ox called in Bengal gaur and gavial (Gavcaeus gaurus, Jerdon); [Bos gaurus, Blanford]. It inhabits sparsely all the large forests of India, from near Cape Comorin to the foot of the Himalayas (at least in their Eastern portion), and from Malabar to Tenasserim.

1881.—"Once an unfortunate native superintendent or mistari [Maistry] was pounded to death by a savage and solitary bison."—Saty. Review, Sept. 10, p. 335.

BLACAN-MATEE, n.p. This is the name of an island adjoining Singapore, which forms the beautiful 'New Harbour' of that port; Malay belakang, or blakang-mati, lit. 'Dead-Buck island,' of which, writes Mr. Skeat, no satisfactory explanation has been given. According to Dennys (Diser. Dict., 51), "one explanation is that the Southern, or as regards Singapore, hinder, face was so unhealthy that the Malays gave it a designation signifying by onomatopoea that death was to be found behind its ridge.'"

The island (Blacan-mati) appears in one of the charts of Godinho de Eredia (1613) published in his Malaca, &c. (Brussels, 1882), and though, from the excessive looseness of such old charts, the island seems too far from Singapore, we are satisfied after careful comparison with the modern charts that the island now so-called is intended.

BLACK, s. Adj. and substantive denoting natives of India. Old-fashioned, and heard, if still heard, only from the lower class of Europeans; even in the last generation its habitual use was chiefly confined to these, and to old officers of the Queen's Army.

1676.—"We do not approve of your sending any persons to St. Helena against their wills. One of them you sent there makes a great complaint, and we have ordered his liberty to return again if he desires it; for we know not what effect it may have if complaints should be made to the King that we send away the natives; besides that it is against our inclination to buy any blacks, and to transport them from their wives and children without their own consent."—Court's Letter to Pl. St. Geo., in Notes and Essays, No. 1. p. 12.

1747.—"Vencatchalam, the Commanding Officer of the Black Military, having behaved very commendably on several occasions against the French; In consideration thereof Agreed that a Present be made him of Six hundred Rupees to buy a Horse, that it may encourage him to act in like manner."—Pt. St. David Cons., Feb. 6. (MS. Record, in India Office).

1750.—"Having received information that some Blacks residing in this town were dealing with the French for goods proper for the Europe market, we told them if we found any proof against any residing under your Honors' protection, that such should suffer our utmost displeasure."—Pt. Wm. Cons., Feb. 4, in Long, 24.

1753.—"John Wood, a free merchant, applies for a pass which, if refused him, he says "it will reduce a free merchant to the condition of a foreigner, or indeed of the meanest black fellow."

1761.—"You will also receive several private letters from Hastings and Sykes, which must convince me as Circumstances did me at the time, that the Dutch forces were not sent with a View only of defending their own Settlements, but absolutely with a Design of disturbing our Influence and Possessions; certain Rain must have been the Consequence to the East India Company. Through Black Forces at Patna, Cossimbazar, Chinsura, &c., and were working Night and day to compleat a Field Artillery... all these preparations previous to the commencement of Hostilities plainly prove the Dutch meant to act offensively not defensively."—Holograph Letter from Clive (unpublished) in the India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed "27th Decr. 1761."

1762.—"The Black inhabitants send in a petition setting forth the great hardship they labour under in being required to sit as arbitrators in the Court of Cutcherry."—Pt. Wm. Cons., in Long, 277.

1782.—See quotation under Sepoy, from Price.

... the 35th Regiment, commanded by Major Popham, which had lately behaved in a mutinous manner... was broke with infamy. ... The black officers with halters about their necks, and the sepoys strip of their coats and turbans were drummed out of the Cantonments."—India Gazette, March 30.

1787.—"As to yesterday's particular charge, the thing that has made me most inveterate and unrelenting in it is only that it related to cruelty or oppression inflicted on two black ladies..."—Lord Minto, in Life, etc., i. 128.

1789.—"I have just learned from a Friend at the India House, that the object of Troves' ambition at present is to be appointed to the Adwalt of Benares, wth is now held by a Black named Ali Caun. Understanding that most of the Adwalets are now held by Europeans, and as I am informed yt it is the intention yt the Europeans are to be so placed in future, I shd be vastly happy if without committing any injustice you c^d place young Troves in yt situation."—George P. of Wales, to Lord Cornwallis, in C.'s Correspondence, 29.

1832-3.—"And be it further enacted that... in all captures which shall be made by H. M.'s Army, Royal Artillery, provincial, black, or other troops..."—Act 2 & 3 Will. IV., ch. 53, sec. 2.

The phrase is in use among natives, we know not whether originating with them, or adopted from the usage of the foreigner. But Kālā ādmī 'black man,' is often used by them in speaking to Europeans of other natives. A case in point is perhaps worth recording. A statue of Lord William Bentinck, on foot, and in bronze, stands in front of the Calcutta Town Hall. Many years ago a native officer, returning from duty at Calcutta to Barrackpore, where his regiment was, reported himself to his adjutant (from whom we had the story in later days). 'Anything new, Sūbadār, Sāhib?' said the Adjutant. 'Yes,' said the Sūbadār, 'there is a figure of the former Lord Sahib arrived.' 'And what do you think of it?' 'Sāhib,' said the Sūbadār, 'abhi hai kālā ādmī kā sāt, jab potā ha jaega jab achehā hogā!' ('It is now just like a native—a black man'); when the whitewash is applied it will be excellent.'

In some few phrases the term has become crystallised and semi-official. Thus the native dressers in a hospital were, and possibly still are, called Black Doctors.

1787.—"The Surgeon's assistant and Black Doctor take their station 100 paces in the rear, or in any place of security to which the Doolies may readily carry the wounded."—Regulations for the H. C.'s Troops on the Coast of Coromandel.

In the following the meaning is special:

1788.—"For Sale. That small upper-roomed Garden House, with about 5 big-gahs (see BEEGAH) of ground, on the road leading from Charinghee to the Burying Ground, which formerly belonged to the BLACK ACT. This was the name given in odium by the non-official Europeans in India to Act XI., 1836, of the Indian Legislature, which laid down that no person should by reason of his place of birth or of his descent be, in any civil proceeding, excepted from the jurisdiction of the Courts named, viz.: Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Zillah and City Judge's Courts, Principal Sudder Ameens, Sudder Ameens, and Moonsiff's Court, or, in other words, it placed European subjects on a level with natives as to their subsection in civil causes to all the Company's Courts, including those under Native Judges. This Act was drafted by T. B. Macaulay, then Legislative Member of the Governor-General's Council, and brought great abuse on his head. Recent agitation caused by the "Ilbert Bill," proposing to make Europeans subject to native magistrates in regard to police and criminal charges, has been, by advocates of the latter measure, put on all fours with the agitation of 1836. But there is much that discriminates the two cases.

1876.—"The motive of the scruplity with which Macaulay was assailed by a handful of sorry scribblers was his advocacy of the Act, familiarly known as the Black Act, which withdrew from British subjects resident in the provinces so called privilege of bringing civil appeals before the Supreme Court at Calcutta."—Trevelyan's Life of Macaulay, 2nd ed., i. 398.

BLACK BEER, s. A beverage mentioned by early travellers in Japan. It was probably not a malt liquor. Dr. Aston suggests that it was kuro-hi, a dark-coloured sake used in the service of the Shinto gods.

1616.—"One jar of black beer."—Foster, Letters, iv. 270.

BLACK-BUCK, s. The ordinary name of the male antelope (Antelope cervicapra, Jerdon) [A. cervicapra, Blanford], from the dark hue of its back, by no means however literally black.

1690.—"The Indians remark, 'tis September's Sun which caused the black hairs on the Antelopes' Backs."—Ovington, 139.

BLACK COTTON SOIL. — (See REGUR.)

BLACK JEW, s. A term applied to the Jews of S. India; see 2 ser. N. & Q., iv. 4. 429; viii. 232, 418, 521; Logan, Malabar, i. 246 seqq.)

BLACK LANGUAGE. An old-fashioned expression, for Hindustani and other vernaculars, which used to be common among officers and men of the Royal Army, but was almost confined to them.

BLACK PARTRIDGE, s. The popular Indian name of the common francolin of S.E. Europe and Western Asia (Francolinus vulgaris, Stephens), notable for its harsh quasi-articulate call, interpreted in various parts of the world into very different syllables. The rhythm of the call is fairly represented by two of the imitations which come nearest one another, viz. that given by Sultan Baber (Persian): 'Shir dārām, shākark!' ('I've got milk and sugar!') and (Hind.) one given by Jerdon: 'Lahsun piyās udārūk!' ('Garlic, onion, and ginger!') A more pious one is: Khuda tēri kudrat, 'God is thy strength!' Another mentioned by Capt. Baldwin is very like the truth: 'Be quick, pay your debts!' But perhaps the Greek interpretation recorded by Athenaeus (ix. 39) is best of all: τρίς τοῖς κακοφργοις κακά 'Three-fold ills to the ill-doers!' see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. xviii. and note 1; [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 234, iv. 17].

BLACK TOWN, n.p. Still the popular name of the native city of Madras, as distinguished from the Fort and southern suburbs occupied by the English residents, and the bazars which supply their wants. The term is also used at Bombay.

1673.—Fryer calls the native town of Madras "the Heathen Town," and "the Indian Town.

1727.—"The Black Town (of Madras) is inhabited by Gentoes, Mahometans, and Indian Christians. . . . It was walled in towards the Land, when Governor Pit ruled it."—A. Hamilton, i. 367.

1780.—"Adjoining the glacie of Fort St. George, to the northward, is a large town commonly called the Black Town, and which is fortified sufficiently to prevent any surprise by a body of horse."—Hodges, p. 6.
BLACK WOOD.

1780.—"... Cadets upon their arrival in the country, many of whom... are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses in the Black Town..."—Munro's Narrative, 22.

1782.—"... When Mr. Hastings came to the government he added some new regulations... divided the black and white town (Calcutta) into 35 wards, and purchased the consent of the natives to go a little further off."—Price, Some Observations, &c., p. 60.
In Travels, vol. i.

[1813.—"The large bazar, or the street in the Black Town, (Bombay) ... contained many good Asiatic houses."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 96. Also see quotation (1809) under BOMBAY.]

1827.—"Hartley hastened from the Black Town, more satisfied than before that some deceit was about to be practised towards Menie Gray."—Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xi.

BLACK WOOD. The popular name for what is in England termed 'rose-wood'; produced chiefly by several species of Dalbergia, and from which the celebrated carved furniture of Bombay is made. [The same name is applied to the Chinese ebony used in carving (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed., 107).] (See SISSOO.)

[1813.—"Black wood furniture becomes like heated metal."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 106.]

1827.—(In Babylonia). "In a mound to the south of the mass of city ruins called Jum-juma, Mr. Rassam discovered the remains of a rich hall or palace... the cornices were of painted brick, and the roof of rich Indian blackwood."—Atheneum, July 5, 22.

BLANKS, s. The word is used for 'whites' or 'Europeans' (Port. branco) in the following, but we know not if anywhere else in English:

1718.—"... The Heathens... too shy to venture into the Churches of the Blanks (so they call the Christians), since these were generally adorned with fine cloaths and all manner of proud apparel."—(Ziegenbaly and Plutacho), Propagation of the Gospel, &c. Pt. I., 3rd ed., p. 70.

[BLATTY, adj. A corr. of wilāyatī, 'foreign' (see BILAYUT). A name applied to two plants in S. India, the Sonneratia acida, and Hydrolea zeylancica (see Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s. v.). In the old records it is applied to a kind of cloth. Owen (Narrative, i. 349) uses Blat as a name for the land-wind in Arabia, of which the origin is perhaps the same.

BLIMBEE, s. Malayul. vilimbhi; H. belamb (or bilumbu), Malay, billing or belimbing. The fruit of Averrhoa bilimbi, L. The genus was so called by Linneus in honour of Averroes, the Arab commentator on Aristotle and Avicenna. It embraces two species cultivated in India for their fruits; neither known in a wild state. See for the other CARAMBOLA.

BLOOD-SUCKER, s. A harmless lizard (Lacerta cristata) is so called, because when excited it changes in colour (especially about the neck) from a dirty yellow or grey, to a dark red.

1810.—"... On the morn, however, I discovered it to be a large lizard, termed a blood-sucker."—Morton's Life of Leyden, 110.

[1813.—"The large sereor, or lacerta, commonly called the bloodsucker."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 110 (2nd ed.).]

BOBACHEE, s. A cook (male). This is an Anglo-Indian vulgarisation of bāwarchi, a term originally brought, according to Hammer, by the hordes of Chingiz Khan into Western Asia. At the Mongol Court the Bāwarchi was a high dignitary, 'Lord Sewer' or the like (see Hammer's Golden Horde, 233, 461). The late Prof. A. Schiefner, however, stated to us that he could not trace a Mongol origin for the word, which appears to be Or. Turki. [Platts derives it from P. bāwvar, 'confidence.]

c. 1333.—"Chaque émir a un bāwredji, et lorsque la table a été dressée, cet officier s'assied devant son maître... le bāwredji coupe la viande en petits morceaux. Ces gens-là possèdent une grande habilété pour dépecer la viande."— Ibn Batuta, ii. 407.

c. 1500.—Bāwarchī is the word used for cook in the original of the 'Āin (Blockmann's Eng. Tr. i. 58).

1810.—"... the dripping... is returned to the meat by a bunch of feathers... tied to the end of a short stick. This little neat, cleanly, and cheap dripping-ladle, answers admirably; it being in the power of the babaschī to bestow any part with great precision."—Williamson, V. M. i. 293.

1866.—"And every night and morning The bobachee shall kill The somptifernal moorghee, And we'll all have a grill."

The Darak Bungalow, 228.
BOBACHEE CONNAH. s. H. Bāwarchi-khāna, 'Cook-house;' i.e. Kitchen; generally in a cottage detached from the residence of a European household.

[1829.—"In defiance of all Bawurchee-khana rules and regulations."—Or. Sport Mag., i. 118.]

BOBBERY, s. For the origin see BOBBERY-BOB. A noise, a disturbance, a row.

[1710.—"And beat with their hand on the mouth, making a certain noise, which we Portuguese call babare. Babare is a word composed of bab, 'a child' and are, an adverb implying 'to call.'"—Oriente Conquis-tado, vol ii; Conquista, i. div. i. sec. 8.]

1830.—"When the band struck up (my Arab) was much frightened, made bobbery, set his foot in a hole and nearly pitched me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 106.

1866.—"But what is the meaning of all this bobbery?"—The Dark Bengalow, p. 387.

Bobbery is used in 'pigeon English,' and of course a Chinese origin is found for it, viz. yā-pī, Cantonese, 'a noise.' [The idea that there is a similar English word (see 7 ser. N. & Q., v. 205, 271, 338, 415, 513) is rejected by the N.E.D.]

BOBBERY-BOB! interj. The Anglo-Indian colloquial representation of a common exclamation of Hindus when in surprise or grief—Bāp-re! or Bāp-re Bāp, 'O Father!' (we have known a friend from north of Tweed whose ordinary interjection was 'My great-grandmother!'). Blumenroth's Philippine Vocabulary gives Nacā! = Madre mía, as a vulgar exclamation of admiration.

1782.—"Captain Cowbe being again examined ... if he had any opportunity to make any observations concerning the execution of Nundecmar? said, he had; that he saw the whole except the immediate act of execution ... there were 8 or 10,000 people assembled; who at the moment the Rajah was turned off, dispersed suddenly, crying 'Ah-baup-area!' leaving nobody about the gallows but the Sheriff and his attendants, and a few European spectators. He explains the term Ah-baup-aree, to be an exclamation of the black people, upon the appearance of anything very alarming, and when they are in great pain."—Price's 2nd Letter to E. Burke, p. 5. In Tracts, vol. ii.

"If an Hindoo was to see a house on fire, to receive a smart slap on the face, break a china basin, cut his finger, see two Europeans boxing, or a sparrow shot, he would call out Ah-baup-aree!"—From Report of Select Committee of H. of C., Ibid. pp. 9-10.

1834.—"They both hastened to the spot, where the man lay senseless, and the syce by his side muttering Bāpre bāpre."—The Baboo, i. 48.

1863-64.—"My men soon became aware of the unwelcome visitor, and raised the cry, 'A bear, a bear!' "

"Ahi! bap-re-bap! Oh, my father! go and drive him away," said a timorous voice from under a blanket close by."—Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 142.

BOBBERY-PACK, s. A pack of hounds of different breeds, or (oftener) of no breed at all, wherewith young officers hunt jackals or the like; presumably so called from the noise and disturbance that such a pack are apt to raise. And hence a 'scratch pack' of any kind, as a 'scratch match' at cricket, &c. (See a quotation under BUNOW.)

1878.—"... on the mornings when the 'bobbera' pack went out, of which Macpherson was 'master,' and I 'whip,' we used to be up by 4 A.M."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 142.

The following occurs in a letter received from an old Indian by one of the authors, some years ago:

"What a Cabinet — has put together! — a regular bobbery-pack."

BOCCA TIGRIS, n.p. The name applied to the estuary of the Canton River. It appears to be an inaccurate reproduction of the Portuguese Boca do Tigre, and that to be a rendering of the Chinese name Hu-mên, "Tiger Gate." Hence in the second quotation Tigris is supposed to be the name of the river.

1747.—"At 8 o'clock we passed the Bog of Tygers, and at noon the Lyon's Tower."—A Voy. to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748.

1770.—"The City of Canton is situated on the banks of the Tigris, a large river. ..."—Rajyal (tr. 1771), ii. 258.

1782.—"... À sept lieues de la bouche du Tigre, on apperçoit la Tour du Lion."—Sonnerat, Voyage, ii. 234.

1900.—"The launch was taken up the Canton River and abandoned near the Bocca Tigris (the Bogue)."—The Times, 29 Oct.

BOCHA. s. H. hocha. A kind of chair-palankin formerly in use in Bengal, but now quite forgotten.

1810.—"Ladies are usually conveyed about Calcutta ... in a kind of palanquin called a bochah...being a compound of our sedan chair with the body of a chariot...I should have observed that most of the gentlemen residing at Calcutta ride in bochahs."—Williamson, V. M. i. 322.

BOGUE, n.p. This name is applied by seamen to the narrows at the mouth of the Canton River, and is a corruption of Boca. (See BOCCA TIGRIS.)

BOLIAH, BAULEAH, s. Beng. bālia. A kind of light accommodation boat with a cabin, in use on the Bengal rivers. We do not find the word in any of the dictionaries. Ives, in the middle of the 18th century, describes it as a boat very long, but so narrow that only one man could sit in the breadth, though it carried a multitude of rowers. This is not the character of the boat so called now. [Buchanan Hamilton, writing about 1820, says: "The bhauiliya is intended for the same purpose, [conveyance of passengers], and is about the same size as the Pansí (see PAUNCHWAY).] It is sharp at both ends, rises at the ends less than the Pansí, and its till is placed in the middle, the rowers standing both before and behind the place of accommodation of passengers. On the Kosi, the Bhauiliya is a large fishing-boat, carrying six or seven men." (Eastern India, iii. 345.) Grant (Rural Life, p. 5) gives a drawing and description of the modern boat.)

1757.—"To get two bolias, a Goordore, and 87 dandies from the Nazir."—Ives, 157.

1810.—"On one side the picturesque boats of the natives, with their floating huts; on the other the bolios and pleasure-boats of the English."—Maria Graham, 142.

1811.—"The extreme lightness of its construction gave it incredible...speed. An example is cited of a Governor General who in his Bawallees performed in 8 days the voyage from Lucknow to Calcutta, a distance of 400 marine leagues."—Solyns, iii. The drawing represents a very light skiff, with only a small kiosque at the stern.

1824.—"We found two Bholias, or large row-boats, with convenient cabins."—Heber, i. 26.

1834.—"Rivers's attention had been attracted by seeing a large beauliah in the act of swinging to the tide."—The Baboo, i. 14.

BOLTA, s. A turn of a rope; sea H. from Port. volta (Roebuck).

BOMBASA, n.p. The Island of Mombasa, off the E. African Coast, is so called in some old works. Bombāsā is used in Persia for a negro slave; see quotation.

1516.—"...another island, in which there is a city of the Moors called Bombaza, very large and beautiful."—Barbosa, ii. See also Colonial Papers under 1609, i. 188.

1883.—"...the Bombassi, or coal-black negro of the interior, being of much less price, and usually only used as a cook."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

BOMBAY, n.p. It has been alleged, often and positively (as in the quotations below from Fryer and Grose), that this name is an English corruption from the Portuguese Bombahā, 'good bay.' The grammar of the alleged etymology is bad, and the history is no better; for the name can be traced long before the Portuguese occupation, long before the arrival of the Portuguese in India. C. 1430, we find the islands of Mahim and Mumba-Devi, which united form the existing island of Bombay, held, along with Salsette, by a Hindu Rāj, who was tributary to the Mohammedan King of Guzerat. (See Rās Malā, ii. 350); [ed. 1878, p. 270]. The same form reappears (1516) in Barbosa's Tana-Mayambu (p. 68), in the Estado da India under 1525, and (1563) in García de Orta, who writes both Mombaim and Bombaím. The latter author, mentioning the excellence of the area produced there, speaks of himself having had a grant of the island from the King of Portugal (see below). It is customarily called Bombaím on the earliest English Rupee coinage. (See under RUPEE.) The shrine of the goddess Mumba-Devi from whom the name is supposed to have been taken, stood on the Esplanade till the middle of the 17th century, when it was removed to its present site in the middle of what is now the most frequented part of the native town.

1507.—"Sultan Mahommed Bigarrah of Guzerat having carried an army against Chaiwal, in the year of the Hijra 913, in order to destroy the Europeans, he effected his designs against the towns of Bassai (see BASSEIN) and Manbai, and returned to his own capital..."—Mīrāt-i-Ahmadī (Bird's transl.), 214-15.

1508.—"The Viceroy quitted Dabul, passing by Chaiwal, where he did not care to go in, to avoid delay, and anchored at Bombaím, whence the people fled when they saw the fleet, and our men carried off many cows, and caught some blacks whom they found hiding in the woods, and of these they took away those that were good, and killed the rest."—Correa, i. 926.

1516.—"... a fortress of the before-named King (of Guzerat), called Tana-mayambu, and near it is a Moorish town, very pleasant, with many gardens... a town of very great Moorish mosques, and temples of worship of the Gentiles... it is likewise a sea port, but of little trade."—Barros, 69. The name here appears to come from a common oriental fashion, the name of the adjoining town of Thana (see TANA) and Bombay.

1528.—"F a Ilha de Bombay, que no foral velho estaua em catarse mill e quatro cento fedeas... j xii ij, iii. 6 fedeas. 'E os anos outros estaua arrendada por mill trezentos setenta e cinco pardaos... j iii. e lxxv. pardaos.

"Fey afordata a mestre Dioneu pelo dito governador, por mill quatro centos trinta dous pardaos moé... j hiji. 800, pardaos moé."—Tomo do Estado da India, 160-161.

1531.—"The Governor at the island of Bombaim awaited the junction of the whole expedition, of which he made a muster, taking a roll from each captain, of the Portuguese soldiers and sailors and of the captive slaves who could fight and help, and of the number of musketeers, and other people, such as servants. And all taken together he found in the whole fleet some 3560 soldiers (homens d'armas), counting captains and gentlemen; and some 1450 Portuguese seamen, with the pilots and masters; and some 2000 soldiers who were Malabars and Goa Canarines; and 8000 slaves fit to fight; and among these he found more than 3000 musketeers (espingardeiros), and 4000 country seamen who could row (marineiros de terra remeirors), besides the mariners of the junks who were more than 800; and with married and single women, and people taking goods and provisions to sell, and menial servants, the whole together was more than 30,000 souls."

1552.—"... a small stream called Bate which runs into the Bay of Bombaim, and which is supposed as the demarcation between the Kingdom of Guzurante and the Kingdom of Decan."—Barros, i. ix. 1.
1711.—Lockyer declares it to be impossible, with all the Company's Strength and Art, to make Bombay "a Mart of great Business."—P. 83.

c. 1760.—"... one of the most commodious bays perhaps in the world, from which distinction it received the denomination of Bombay, by corruption from the Portuguese Bomão-Bahio, though now usually written by them Bombaim."—Grose, i. 29.

1770.—"No man chose to settle in a country so unhealthy as to give rise to the proverb That at Bombay a man's life did not exceed two monsoons."—Raynal (E. T., 1777), i. 389.

1809.—"The largest pagoda in Bombay is in the Black Town. ... It is dedicated to Mombò Devee ... who by her images and attributes seems to be Parvati, the wife of Siva."—Maria Graham, 14.

BOMBAY BOX-WORK. This well-known manufacture, consisting in the decoration of boxes, desks, &c., with veneers of geometrical mosaic, somewhat after the fashion of Tunbridge ware, is said to have been introduced from Shiraz to Surat more than a century ago, and some 30 years later from Surat to Bombay. The veneers are formed by cementing together fine triangular prisms of ebony, ivory, green-stained ivory, stag's horn, and tin, so that the sections when sawn across form the required pattern, and such thin sections are then attached to the panels of the box with strong glue.

BOMBAY DUCK.—See BUMMELO.

BOMBAY MARINE. This was the title borne for many years by the meritorious but somewhat depressed service which in 1830 acquired the style of the "Indian Navy," and on 30th April, 1863, ceased to exist. The detachments of this force which took part in the China War (1841-42) were known to their brethren of the Royal Navy, under the temptation of alliteration, as the "Bombay Buccaneers." In their earliest employment against the pirates of Western India and the Persian Gulf, they had been known as "the Grab Service." But, no matter for these names, the history of this Navy is full of brilliant actions and services. We will quote two noble examples of public virtue:

(1) In July 1811, a squadron under Commodore John Hayes took two large junks issuing from Batavia, then under blockade. These were lawful prize, laden with Dutch property, valued at £600,000. But Hayes knew that such a capture would create great difficulties and embarrassments in the English trade at Canton, and he directed the release of this splendid prize.

(2) 30th June 1815, Lieut. Boyce in the brig 'Nautilus' (180 tons, carrying ten 18-pr. carronades, and four 9-prs.) encountered the U. S. sloop-of-war 'Peacock' (539 tons, carrying twenty 32-pr. carronades, and two long 18-prs.). After he had informed the American of the ratification of peace, Boyce was peremptorily ordered to haul down his colours, which he answered by a flat refusal. The 'Peacock' opened fire, and a short but brisk action followed, in which Boyce and his first lieutenant were shot down. The gallant Boyce had a special pension from the Company (£435 in all) and lived to his 93rd year to enjoy it.

We take the facts from the History of this Navy by one of its officers, Lieut. C. R. Low (i. 294), but he erroneously states the pension to have been granted by the U.S. Govt.

1780.—"The Hon. Company's schooner, Carinjar, with Lieut. Murry Commander, of the Bombay Marines, is going to Archin (sic, see ACHEEN) to meet the Ceres and the other Europe ships from Madras, to put on board of them the St. Helena stores."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8th.

BONITO, s. A fish (Thynnus pelamys, Day) of the same family (Scœmbridae) as mackerel and tunny, very common in the Indian seas. The name is Port., and apparently is the adj. bonito, 'fine.'

c. 1610.—"On y pesche vne quantité admirable de gros poissons, de sept ou huit sortes, qui sont enántoins quasi de mesme race et espèce... commes bonites, albacores, daurades, et autres."—Pyrand, i. 137.

1615.—"Bonites and albacores are in colour, shape, and taste much like to Mackerils, but grow to be very large."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1464.

c. 1620.—"How many sail of well-mann'd ships As the Bonito does the Flying-fish Have we pursuad... ."—Beavm. & Flet., The Double Marriage, ii. 1.

c. 1760.—"The fish undoubtedly takes its name from relishing so well to the taste of the Portuguese... that they call it BONZE.

Bonito, which answers in our tongue to delicious."—Grose, i. 5.

1764.—

"While on the yard-arm the harpooner sits, Strikes the boneta, or the shark ensnarese."—Granger, B. ii.

1773.—"The Captain informed us he had named his ship the Bonetta, out of gratitude to Providence; for once ... the ship in which he then sailed was becalmed for five weeks, and during all that time, numbers of the fish Bonetta swim close to her, and were caught for food; he resolved therefore that the ship he should next get should be called the Bonetta."—Bowell, Journal of a Tour, &c., under Oct. 16, 1773.

BONZE, s. A term long applied by Europeans in China to the Buddhist clergy, but originating with early visitors to Japan. Its origin is however not quite clear. The Chinese Fên-sêng, 'a religious person' is in Japanese bosō or bonzō; but Köppen prefers fâ-sê, 'Teacher of the Law,' pron. in Japanese bo-zî (Die Rel. des Buddhismus, i. 321, and also Schott's Zur Litt. des Chin. Buddhismus, 1873, p. 46). It will be seen that some of the old quotations favour one, and some the other, of these sources. On the other hand, Bandhya (for Skt. vandya, 'to whom worship or reverence is due, very reverend') seems to be applied in Nepal to the Buddhist clergy, and Hodgson considers the Japanese bonze (bonzō?) traceable to this. (Essays, 1874, p. 63.) The same word, as bandhe or bande, is in Tibetan similarly applied.—(See Joachke's Dict., p. 365.)

The word first occurs in Jorge Álvarez's account of Japan, and next, a little later, in the letters of St. Francis Xavier. Cooks in his Diary uses forms approaching boze.

1549.—"I find the common secular people here less impure and more obedient to reason than their priests, whom they call bonzos."—Letter of St. F. Xavier, in Coleridge's Life, ii. 238.

1552.—"Erbuscens enim, et incredibili liter confunditur Bonzii, ubi male cohaerere, ac pugnare inter seae, quae docent, palam ostenditur."—Setl. Fr. Xaverii Epistol. V. xvi., ed. 1667.

1572.—"... sacerdotes ... qui ipsorum lingua Bonzii appellantur."—E. Acosta, 58.

1585.—"They have amongst them (in Japan) many priests of their idols whom they call Bonzos, of the which there be great convents."—Parkes's Tr. of Mendoza (1589), ii. 300.

1616.—"And their is 300 boze (or pagon priests) have allowance and mantynance for eaver to pray for his sole, in the same sorte as munkes and fryres use to doe amongst the Roman papistes."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 75; (in i. 117, boze); bosses (i. 143).

[1676.—"It is estimated that there are in this country (Siam) more than 200,000 priests called Bonzes."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 293.]

1727.—"... or perhaps make him fadge in a China bonzee in his Calendar, under the name of a Christian Saint."—A. Hamilton, i. 253.

1794.—7. "Alike to me encas'd in Grecian bronze Koran or Vulgate, Veda, Priest, or Bonze." Pursuits of Literature, 6th ed., p. 335.

While Fum deals in Mandarin, Bonzes, Bohea—Peers, Bishops, and Punch, Hum—are sacred to thee."—T. Moore, Hum and Fum.

(1) BORA, BOORA, s. Beng. bhada, a kind of cargo-boat used in the rivers of Bengal.

[1880.—"The boora ... being a very floaty light boat, rowinge with 20 to 30 Owares, these carry Salt Peeter and other goods from Hugly downewards, and some trade to Dacca with salt; they also serve for tow boats for ye ships bound up or dwayne ye river."—Ibid. ii. 15.]

(2) BORA, s. H. and G uz. bohārā and bohorā, which H. H. Wilson refers to the Skt. vyayahārī, 'a trader, or man of affairs,' from which are formed the ordinary H. words byohārā, byohārīyāt (and a Guzerati form which comes very near bohorā). This is confirmed by the quotation from Nurullah below, but it is not quite certain. Dr. John Wilson (see below) gives an Arabic derivation which we have been unable to verify. [There can be no reasonable doubt that this is incorrect.] There are two classes of Bohārs belonging to different Mohammedan sects, and different in habit of life.

1. The Shi'a Bohārs, who are essentially townspeople, and especially congregate in Surat, Bharanpur, Ujjain, &c. They are those best known far and wide by the name, and are usually devoted to trading and money-lending.
Their original seat was in Guzerat, and they are most numerous there, and in the Bombay territory generally, but are also to be found in various parts of Central India and the N.-W. Provinces, [where they are all Hindus]. The word in Bombay is often used as synonymous with pedlar or boxwallah. They are generally well-to-do people, keeping very cleanly and comfortable houses. [See an account of them in Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 470 seqq. 2nd ed.]

These Bohras appear to form one of the numerous Shi'a sects, akin in character to, and apparently of the same origin as, the Ismā'iliyyah (or Assassins of the Middle Ages), and claim as their original head and doctor in India one Ya'kub, who emigrated from Egypt, and landed in Cambay A.D. 1137. But the chief seat of the doctrine is alleged to have been in Yemen, till that country was conquered by the Turks in 1538. A large exodus of the sect to India then took place. Like the Ismā'iliyyah they attach a divine character to their Mullah or chief Pontiff, who now resides at Surat. They are guided by him in all things, and they pay him a percentage on their profits. But there are several sectarian subdivisions: Da'ūdī Bohrās, Sulaimānī Bohrās, &c. [See Forbes, Rās Mālā, ed. 1878, p. 264 seqq.]

2. The Sunni Bohrās. These are very numerous in the Northern Concan and Guzerat. They are essentially peasants, sturdy, thrifty, and excellent cultivators, retaining much of Hindu habit; and are, though they have dropped caste distinctions, very exclusive and "denominational" (as the Bombay Gazetteer expresses it). Exceptionally, at Pattan, in Baroda State, there is a rich and thriving community of trading Bohrās of the Sunni section; they have no intercourse with their Shi'a namesakes.

The history of the Bohrās is still very obscure; nor does it seem ascertained whether the two sections were originally one. Some things indicate that the Shi'a Bohrās may be, in accordance with their tradition, in some considerable part of foreign descent, and that the Sunni Bohrās, who are unquestionably of Hindu descent, may have been native converts of the foreign immigrants, afterwards forcibly brought over to Sunnism by the Guzerat Sultans. But all this must be said with much reserve. The history is worthy of investigation.

The quotation from Ibn Batuta, which refers to Gandari on the Baroda river, south of Cambay, alludes most probably to the Bohrās, and may perhaps, though not necessarily, indicate an origin for the name different from either of those suggested.

c. 1349.—"When we arrived at Kandahar . . . we received a visit from the principal Musalmans dwelling at his (the pagan King's) Capital, such as the Children of Khoyah Bohrāh, among whom was the Nākhoda Ibrahīm, who had 6 vessels belonging to him."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 58.

c. 1620.—Nurullah of Shuster, quoted by Colebrooke, speaks of this class as having been converted to Islam 300 years before. He says also: "Most of them subsist by commerce and mechanical trades; as is indicated by the name Bohrāh, which signifies 'merchant' in the dialect of Guzerat."—In As. Res., vii. 335.

1673.—" . . . The rest (of the Mohammedans) are adopted under the name of the Province or Kingdom they are born in, as Mogul . . . or Schisms they have made, as Bālikh, Jenootee, and the lowest of all is Bohrāh."—Fryer, 93.

c. 1780.—"Among the rest was the whole of the property of a certain Muhammad Mokrim, a man of the Bohrā tribe, the Chief of all the merchants, and the owner of three or four merchant ships."—H. of Hyder Nâil, 389.

1810.—"The Boras are an inferior set of travelling merchants. The inside of a Borah's box is like that of an English country shop, spelling-books, prayer-books, lavender water, cam de lace, soap, tapes, scissors, knives, needles, and thread make but a small part of the variety."—Maria Graham, 33.

1825.—"The Boras (at Broach) in general are unpopular, and held in the same estimation for parsimony that the Jews are in England."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 119; also see 72.

1853.—"I had the pleasure of baptizing Ismail Ibrahīm, the first Bohorā who, as far as we know, has yet embraced Christianity in India . . . He appears thoroughly divorced from Muhammad, and from 'Ali the son-in-law of Muhammad, whom the Bohorās or Ismailīs, according to the meaning of the Arabic word, from which the name is derived, esteem as an improvement on his father-in-law, having a higher degree of inspiration, which has in good measure, as they imagine, manifested itself among his successors, recognised by the Bohorās and by the Ansariyah, Ismailiyah, Drus, and Metwaliyeh of Syria . . ."—Letter of Dr. John Wilson in Life, p. 456.

1863.—" . . . India, between which and the north-east coast of Africa, a considerable trade is carried on, chiefly by Borah merchants of Guzerat and Cutch."—Badger, Introd. to Varthema, Hak. Soc. xix.

BORNEO, n.p. This name, as applied to the great Island in its entirety, is taken from that of the capital town of the chief Malay State existing on it when it became known to Europeans, Burné, Burma, &c., or Burnai, still existing and known as Brunei.

1516.—"In this island much camphor for eating is gathered, and the Indians value it highly. . . . This island is called Borney."—Barboza, 203-4.

1521.—"The two ships departed thence, and running among many islands came on one which contained much cinnamon of the finest kind. And then again running among many islands they came to the Island of Borneo, where in the harbour they found many junkas belonging to merchants from all the parts about Malacca, who make a great mart in that Borneo."—Cronce, ii. 831.

1584.—"Camphora from Brimeo (misreading probably for Brunco) near to China."—Barret, in Hakl. ii. 412.

The cloth called Borneleya perhaps took its name from this island.

[., , "There is brimstone, pepper, Bournesh camphor."—Dawers, Letters, i. 79.]

1727.—"The great island of Borneo or Borneo, the largest except California in the known world."—A. Hamilton, ii. 44.

BORO-BODOR, or -BUDUR, n.p. The name of a great Buddhistic monument of Indian character in the district of Kadâ in Java; one of the most remarkable in the world. It is a quasi-pyramidal structure occupying the summit of a hill, which apparently forms the core of the building. It is quadrangular in plan, the sides, however, broken by successive projections; each side of the basement, 406 feet. Including the basement, it rises in six successive terraces, four of them forming corridors, the sides of which are panelled with bas-reliefs, which Mr. Fergusson calculated would, if extended in a single line, cover three miles of ground. These represent scenes in the life of Sakya Muni, scenes from the Jâtakas, or pre-existences of Sakya, and other series of Buddhistic groups. Above the corridors the structure becomes circular, rising in three shallower stages, bordered with small dagobas (72 in number), and a large dagoba crowns the whole. The 72 dagobas are hollow, built in a kind of stone lattice, and each contains, or has contained, within, a stone Buddha in the usual attitude. In niches of the corridors also are numerous Buddhas larger than life, and about 400 in number. Mr. Fergusson concludes from various data that this wonderful structure must date from A.D. 650 to 800.

This monument is not mentioned in Valentijn's great History of the Dutch Indies (1726), nor does its name ever seem to have reached Europe till Sir Stamford Raffles, the British Lieut.-Governor of Java, visited the district in January 1814. The structure was then covered with soil and vegetation, even with trees of considerable size. Raffles caused it to be cleared, and drawings and measurements to be made. His History of Java, and Crawford's Hist. of the Indian Archipelago, made it known to the world. The Dutch Government, in 1874, published a great collection of illustrative plates, with a descriptive text.

The meaning of the name by which this monument is known in the neighbourhood has been much debated. Raffles writes it Bóro Bódo [Hist. of Java, 2nd ed., ii. 30 seqq.]. [Crawfurd, Descri. Dict. (s.v.), says : "Boro is, in Javanese, the name of a kind of fish-trap, and buder may possibly be a corruption of the Sanscrit buda, 'old.'"] The most probable interpretation, and accepted by Friedrich and other scholars of weight, is that of 'Myriad Buddhas.' This would be in some analogy to another famous Buddhist monument in a neighbouring district, at Brambían, which is called Chandí Sewre, or the "Thousand Temples," though the number has been really 238.

BOSH, s. and interj. This is alleged to be taken from the Turkish bosh, signifying "empty, vain, useless, void of sense, meaning or utility" (Redhouse's Dict.). But we have not been able to trace its history or first appearance in English. [According to the N.E.D. the word seems to have come into use about 1834 under the influence of Morier's novels, Ayesha, Hajji Baba, &c. For various speculations on its origin see 5 ser. N. & Q. iii. 114, 173, 257.

[1843. — "The people flatter the Envoy into the belief that the tumult is Bash (nothing)."—Lady Sale, Journal, 47.]

BOTICKEER, s. Port. botiqueiro. A shop or stall-keeper. (See BOUTIQUE.)

1567. — "Item, parece que... os botiqueiros não tenham as boticas apertas nos dias de festa, senão depois la messa da terça."—Decree 31 of Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 4.

1727. — "... he past all over, and was forced to relieve the poor Botickeers or Shopkeepers, who before could pay him Taxes."—A. Hamilton, i. 268.

BO TREE, s. The name given in Ceylon to the Pipal tree (see PEEPUL) as revered by the Buddhists; Singhb. bo-gás. See in Emerson Tennent (Ceylon, ii. 632 seqq.), a chronological series of notices of the Bo-tree from B.C. 288 to A.D. 1739.

1675. — "Of their (the Veddas') worship there is little to tell, except that like the Cingaleze, they set round the high trees Bógas, which our people call Pagod-trees, with a stone base and put lamps upon it."—Ryklof Van Goens, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 209.

1681. — "I shall mention but one Tree more as famous and highly set by as any of the rest, if not more so; tho' it bear no fruit, the benefit consisting chiefly in the Holiness of it. This tree they call Bo-gahah; we the God-tree."—Keen, 18.

BOTTLE-TREE. s. Qu. Adansonia digitata, or 'baobab'? Its aspect is somewhat suggestive of the name, but we have not been able to ascertain. [It has also been suggested that it refers to the Babool, on which the Baya, often builds its nest. "These are formed in a very ingenious manner, by long grass woven together in the shape of a bottle." (Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 33.)]

1880. — "Look at this prisoner slumbering peacefully under the suggestive bottle-tree."—Ali Baba, 153.

[BOUND-HEDGE, s. A corruption of boundary-hedge, and applied in old military writers to the thick plantation of bamboo or prickly-peach which used to surround native forts.

1792. — "A Bound Hedge, formed of a wide belt of thorny plants (at Seringapatam)."—Wilton, Historical Sketches, iii. 217.]

BOUTIQUE, s. A common word in Ceylon and the Madras Presidency (to which it is now peculiar) for a small native shop or booth: Port. botica or boteca. From Bluteau (Suppt.) it would seem that the use of botica was peculiar to Portuguese India.

[1548. — Buticas. See quotation under SIND.]

1780. — "You must know that Mrs. Henpeck... is a great buyer of Bargains, so that she will often go out to the Europe Shops and the Boutiques, and lay out 5 or 600 Rupees in articles that we have not the least occasion for."—India Gazette, Dec. 9.

1782. — "For Sale at No. 18 of the range Boutiques to the northward of Lyon's Build- ings, where musters (q.v.) may be seen..."—India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1834. — "The boutiques are ranged along both sides of the street."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 172.

BOWLA, s. A portmanteau. H. bōlā, from Port. baul, and bahu, 'a trunk.'

BOWLY, BOWRY, s. H. bālō, and bōrā, Mahr. bāvā. C. P. Brown (Zillah Dict. s.v.) says it is the Telegu bāvā; bōrī and bāvāi, = 'well.' This is doubtless the same word, but in all its forms it is probably connected with Skt. varra, 'a hole, a well,' or with vāpi, 'an oblong reservoir, a pool or lake.' There is also in Singhalese vëva, 'a lake or pond,' and in inscriptions vārvīya. There is again Maldivian boy, 'a well,' which comes near the Guzerati forms mentioned below. A great and deep rectangular well (or tank dug down to the springs), furnished with a descent to the water by means of long flights of steps, and generally with landings and loggias where travellers may rest in the shade. This kind of structure, almost peculiar to Western and Central India, though occasionally met with in Northern India also, is a favourite object of private native munificence, and though chiefly beneath the level of the ground, is often made the subject of most effective architecture. Some of the finest specimens are in Guzerat, where other forms of the word appear to be wão and wàin. One of the most splendid of these structures is that at Asârwa in the suburbs of Ahmedabad, known as the Well of Dhâi (or 'the Nurse') Harîr, built in 1485 by a lady of the household of Sultan Mohammed Bigara (that famous 'Prince of Camblay' celebrated by Butler—see under CAMBAY), at a cost of 3 lakhs of rupees. There is an elaborate model of a great Guzerati bâoli in the Indian Museum at S. Kensington.

We have seen in the suburbs of Palermo a regular bâoli, excavated in the tufaceous rock that covers the plain. It was said to have been made at the expense of an ancestor of the present proprietor (Count Ranchibile) to employ people in a time of scarcity.

c. 1343.—"There was also a bân, a name by which the Indians designate a very spacious kind of well, revetted with stone, and provided with steps for descent to the water's brink. Some of these wells have in the middle and on each side pavilions of stone, with seats and benches. The Kings and chief men of the country rival each other in the construction of such reservoirs on roads that are not supplied with water."—Ibn Batutta, iv. 13.

1596.—"There was an empty space within the fort (of Agra) between Ibrahim's palace and the ramparts. I directed a large wàin to be constructed on it, ten gez by ten. In the language of Hindostân they denominate a large well having a staircase down it wàin."—Bader, Mem., 312.

1775.—"Near a village called Sevasee Contra I left the line of march to sketch a remarkable building . . . on a near approach I discerned it to be a well of very superior workmanship, of that kind which the natives call Bhoure, or Bhouies;—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 102; [2nd ed. i. 387].

1808.—"Who so digs a well deserves the love of creatures and the grace of God,' but a Varidee is said to value 10 Koos (or wells) because the water is available to bipeds without the aid of a rope."—R. Drummond, Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c.

1825.—"These boolies are singular contrivances, and some of them extremely handsome and striking. . . ."—Höber, ed. 1844, ii. 37.

1856.—"The wây (Sansk. vâpeekâ) is a large edifice of a Picturesque and stately as well as peculiar character. Above the level of the ground a row of four or five open pavilions at regular distances from each other . . . is alone visible. . . . The entrance to the wây is by one of the end pavilions."—Forbes, Râs Mâlê, i. 257; [reprint 1878, p. 197].

1876.—"To persons not familiar with the East such an architectural object as a bowlee may seem a strange perversion of ingenuity, but the grateful coolness of all subterranean apartments, especially when accompanied by water, and the quiet gloom of these recesses, fully compensate in the eyes of the Hindoo for the more attractive magnificence of the ghâts. Consequently the descending flights of which we are now speaking, have often been more elaborate and expensive pieces of architecture than any of the buildings above-ground found in their vicinity."—Ferguson, Indian and Eastern Architecture, 486.

BOXWALLAH, s. Hybrid H. Bakas—(i.e. box) wâlâ. A native itinerant pedlar, or packman, as he would be called in Scotland by an analogous term. The Boxwâlâ sells cutlery, cheap nick-nacks, and small wares of all kinds, chiefly European. In former days he was a welcome visitor to small stations and solitary bungalows. The Bora of Bombay is often a boxwâlâ, and the boxwâlâ in that region is commonly called Bora. (See BORA.)

a. A servant. In Southern India and in China a native personal servant is so termed, and is habitually summoned with the vocative 'Boy!'

The same was formerly common in Jamaica and other W. I. Islands. Similar uses are familiar of puer (e.g. in the Vulgate Dixit Giesi puer Viri Dei. II Kings v. 20), Ar. waled, wâdâpaw, garçon, knaves (Germ. Knabe); and this same word is used for a camp-servant in Shakespeare, where Fluellen says: 'Kill the Poys and the luggage! 'tis expressly against the laws of arms.'—See also Grose's Mil. Antiquities, i. 183, and Latin quotation from Xavier under Conicopoly. The word, however, came to be especially used for 'Slave-boy,' and applied to slaves of any age. The Portuguese used mopp in the same way. In 'Pigeon English' also 'servant' is Boy, whilst 'boy' in our ordinary sense is discriminated as 'smallo-boy.'

b. A Palankin-bearer. From the name of the caste, Telug. and Malayul. bōyi, Tam. bōvi, &c. Wilson gives bhō as H. and Mahr. also. The word is in use northward at least to the Nerudda R. In the Konkan, people of this class are called Kahăr bhāṭi (see Ind. Ant. ii. 154, iii. 77). P. Paolino is therefore in error, as he often is, when he says that the word boy as applied by the English and other Europeans to the coolies or fuchini who carry the dooly, "has nothing to do with any Indian language." In the first and third quotations (under b), the use is more like a, but any connection with English at the dates seems impossible.

1609.—"I bought of them a Portugall Boy (which the Hollanders had given unto the King) . . . hee cost mee forty-five Dollers."—Keeling, in Purchas, i. 196.

1631.—"We had a black boy my father brought from Porto Nova to attend upon him, who seeing his Master to be a Prisoner in the Hands of the People of his own Complexion, would not now obey his Command."—Knox, 124.

1696.—"Being informed where the Chief man of the Choultry lived, he (Dr. Brown) took his sword and pistol, and being followed by his boy with another pistol, and his horse keeper. . . ."—In Weaver, i. 300.

1784.—"Eloped. From his master's House at Moidapore, a few days since, a Malay Slave Boy."—In Seton-Karr, i. 45; see also pp. 120, 179.

1836.—"The real Indian ladies lie on a sofa, and if they drop their handkerchief, they just lower their voices and say Boy! in a very gentle tone."—Letters from Madras, 38.

Also used by the French in the East:

1872.—"Mon boy m'accompagnait pour me servir à l'occasion de guide et d'interprète."—Rev. des Deux Mondes, xviii. 957.

1875.—"He was a faithful servant, or boy, as they are here called, about forty years of age."—Thomson's Malacca, 228.

1876.—"A Portuguese Boy . . . from Bombay."—Blackwood's Mag., Nov., p. 578.

1810.—"The palanquin-bearers are called Ehois, and are remarkable for strength and swiftness."—Maria Graham, 128.

BOYA, s. A buoy. Sea H. (Roeckuck). [Mr. Skeat adds: "The Malay word is also boya or bat-rop, which latter I cannot trace."] [BOYANORE, BAONOR, s. A corr. of the Malayal. Vällunavar, 'Ruler.'

1887.—"Somewhere about 1694-95... the Kaduttanad Raja, known to the early English as the Boyanore or Baenor of Badagara, was in semi-independent possession of Kaduttanad, that is, of the territory lying between the Mahé and Kotta rivers."—Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 345.]

BRAB, s. The Palm Tree (see PALMYRA) or Borassus flabelliferinus. The Portuguese called this Palmeira brava ('wild' palm), whence the English corruption. The term is unknown in Bengal, where the tree is called 'fan-palm,' 'palmyra,' or by the H. name tāl or tīr.
1623.—"The book is made after the fashion of this country, i.e., not of paper which is seldom or never used, but of palm leaves, viz. of the leaves of that which the Portuguese call palmam brama (sic), or wild palm."—P. della Valle, t. 811. [ Hak. Soc. ii. 291.]
c. 1666.—"Tous les Malabares écrivent comme nous de gauche à droit sur les feuilles des Palmes Bravas."—Thevenot, v. 268.
1673.—"Another Tree called Brab, bodied like the Cocce, but the leaves grow round like a Peacock's Tail set upright."—Fryer, 76.
1759.—"Brabb, so called at Bombay: Palmira on the coast; and Tall at Bengal."—Tees, 458.
c. 1760.—"There are also here and there interspersed a few bræb-trees, or rather wild palm-trees (the word brab being derived from Brabo, which in Portuguese signifies wild) ...: the chief profit from that is the toddy."—Gross, i. 48.

[1808.—See quotation under BANDAREE.]
1809.—"The Palmira... here called the brab, furnishes the best leaves for thatching, and the dead ones serve for fuel."—Maria Graham, 5.

BRAHMIN, BRAHMAN, s. In some parts of India called Bahman; Skt. Brahmamah. This word now means a member of the priestly caste, but the original meaning and use were different. Haug. (Brahma und die Brahmanen, pp. 8-11) traces the word to the root brīh, 'to increase,' and shows how it has come to have its present significance. The older English form is Brachman, which comes to us through the Greek and Latin authors.
c. B.C. 330.—"... τῶν εύν Ταξιδοσ σοφιστών ἐδείξαν δύο φην, Βραχμάνας ἀμφοτέρων, τῶν μὲν πρεσβίτερον ἐξειρωμένον, τῶν δὲ νεώτερον κοινηταν, ἀμφοτέροις ἡ ἀκολουθήσας μαθήσας..."—Aristobulus, quoted in Strabo, xv. c. 61.

c. A.D. 150.—"But the evil stars have not forced the Brahmins to do evil and abominable things; nor have the good stars persuaded the rest of the (Indians) to abstain from evil things."—Bardemanes, in Chretien's Specidegium, 18.
c. A.D. 500.—"Βραχμάνες; Ἡνδικύν ἔθνος οφθαλμών οὐς καὶ Βραχμάνες καλούνται."—Stephanus Byzantinus.
1298.—Marco Polo writes (pl.) Abrahama or Abrahamin, which seems to represent an incorrect Ar. plural (e.g. Abrahamin) picked up from Arab sailors; the correct Ar. plural is Barakhmon.
1444.—Poggio taking down the reminiscences of Nicolo Conti writes Brammounes. 1555.—"Among these is ther a people called Brachmanes, whiche (as Didimus their Kynge wrote unto Alexandre, ...) live a pure and simple life, led with no lickerous lustes of other mennes vanities."—W. Watreman, Farde of Factions.
1572.—"Brahmennes são os seus religiosos, Nome antigo, e de grande preeminência: Observam os preceitos tão famosos D'hum, que primeiramente nome à scienza."—Camões, vii. 40.
1578.—Acosta has Bragmen.
1582.—"Castañeda, tr. by N. L., has Bramane.
1600.—"The Bramanes... Origen, cap. 13 & 15, affirmeth to bee descended from Abraham by Cheturah, who seated themselves in India, and that so they were called Abrahmanes."—Lord, Desc. of the Banian Rel., 71.

"Comes he to upbraid us with his innocence?
Seize him, and take this preaching Brahman hence."

Dryden, Anvarglebe, iii. 3.

1888.—"The public worship of the pagods was tolerated at Goa, and the sect of the Brachmans daily increased in power, because these Pagan priests had bribed the Portuguese officers."—Dryden, Life of Xavier.

1714.—"The Dervis at first made some scruple of violating his promise to the dying brahman."

The Spectator, No. 578.

BRAHMINY BULL, s. A bull devoted to Siva and let loose; generally found frequenting Hindu bazars, and fattened by the run of the Bunyas' shops. The term is sometimes used more generally (Brahminy bull, -ox, or -cow) to denote the humped Indian ox as a species.

1872.—"He could stop a huge Bramini bull, when running in fury, by catching hold of its horns."—Govinda Samanta, i. 85.

[1889.—"Herbert Edwards made his mark as a writer of the Brahminy Bull Letters in the Delhi Gazette."—Calcutta Rev., app. xxii.]

BRAHMINY BUTTER, s. This seems to have been an old name for Ghee (q.v.). In MS. "Acct. Charges, Dieting, &c., at Fort St. David for Nov.—Jany., 1746-47," in India Office, we find:

"Butter . . . Pagodas 2 2 0
Brahminy do. " 1 34 0."

BRAHMINY DUCK, s. The common Anglo-Indian name of the handsome bird Casarea rutila (Pallas), or 'Ruddy Sheldrake'; constantly seen on the sandy shores of the Gangetic rivers in single pairs, the pair almost always at some distance apart. The Hindi name is chakved, and the chakvā-chakvē (male and female of the species) afford a commonplace comparison in Hindi literature for faithful lovers and spouses. "The Hindus have a legend that two lovers for their indiscretion were transformed into Brahminy Ducks, that they are condemned to pass the night apart from each other, on opposite banks of the river, and that all night long each, in its turn, asks its mate if it shall come across, but the question is always met by a negative—"Chakwa, shall I come?" "No, Chakwi." "Chakwa, shall I come?" "No, Chakwa." (Jerdon.) The same author says the bird is occasionally killed in England.

BRAHMINY KITE, s. The Milvus Pondicerianus of Jerdon, Halastur Indus, Boddart. The name is given because the bird is regarded with some reverence by the Hindus as sacred to Vishnu. It is found throughout India.

c. 1328.—"There is also in this India a certain bird, big, like a Kite, having a white head and belly, but all red above, which boldly snatches fish out of the hands of fishermen and other people, and indeed these birds go on just like dogs."—Friar Jordanus, 36.

1673.—"... 'tis Sacrilege with them to kill a Cow or Calf; but highly picalear to shoot a Kite, dedicated to the Brachmins, for which Money will hardly pacify."—Fryer, 93.

[1813.—"We had a still bolder and more ravenous enemy in the hawks and brahminy kites."—Forbes, Or. Men., 2nd ed., ii. 162.]

BRAHMO-SOMAJ, s. The Bengali pronunciation of Skt. Brahma Samaj, 'assembly of Brahmists'; Brahma being the Supreme Being according to the Indian philosophic systems. The reform of Hinduism so called was begun by Ram Mohun Roy (Rāma Mohana Rāi) in 1830. Professor A. Weber has shown that it does not constitute an independent Indian movement, but is derived from European Theism. [Also see Monier-Williams, Brahmanism, 486.]

1876.—"The Brahma Somaj, or Theistic Church of India, is an experiment hitherto unique in religious history."—Collet, Brahma Year-book, 5.

BRANDUL, s. 'Backstay,' in Sea H. Port. brandal (Roebeck).

BRANDY COORTEE, COATEE, s. Or sometimes simply Brandy. A corruption of bārānt, 'a cloak,' literally pluviale, from P. bārānt, 'rain.' Bārāni-kurti seems to be a kind of hybrid shaped by the English word coat, though kurtā and kurtī are true P. words for various forms of jacket or tunic.

[1754.—"Their women also being not less than 6000, were dressed with great coats (these are called baram) of crimson cloth, after the manner of the men, and not to be distinguished at a distance; so that the whole made a very formidable appearance.” —H. of Nadir Shah, in Hawney, 367.]

1788.—“Barranne—a cloak to cover one from the rain.” —Ind. Vocab. (Stockdale).

Williamson (1810) has brandy-shrub-pawnee (V. m. ii. 123).

[1854.—“I am sorry to see you gentlemen drinking brandy-pawnee,” says he: “it plays the dence with our young men in India.” —Thackeray, Newcomes, ch. i.]

1866.—“The brandy pawnee of the East, and the ‘sangaree’ of the West Indies, are happily now almost things of the past, or exist in a very modified form.” —Waring, Tropical Resident, 177.

BRASS, s. A brace. Sea dialect. —(Roebuck.)

[BRASS-KNOCKER, s. A term applied to a relauné or serving up again of yesterday’s dinner or supper. It is said to be found in a novel by Winwood Reade called Liberty Hall, as a piece of Anglo-Indian slang; and it is supposed to be a corruption of basta khina, H. ‘stale food;’ see 5 ser. N. & Q., 34, 77.]

BRATTY, s. A word, used only in the South, for cakes of dry cow dumpster, used as fuel more or less all over India. It is Tam. varatti, [or vittetti], ‘dried dung.’ Various terms are current elsewhere, but in Upper India the most common is uplal.—(Vide OOPLA.)

BRAVA, n.p. A sea-port on the east coast of Africa, lat. 1° 7’ N., long. 44° 3’, properly Barawa. 1516.—“... a town of the Moors, well walled, and built of good stone and whitewash, which is called Brava. ... It is a place of trade, which has already been destroyed by the Portuguese, with great slaughter of the inhabitants. ...” —Barbosa, 15.

BRAZIL-WOOD, s. This name is now applied in trade to the dye-wood imported from Pernambuco, which is derived from certain species of Caesalpinia indigenous there. But it originally applied to a dye-wood of the same genus which was imported from India, and which is now known in trade as Sappan (q.v.). [It is the andam or bakkaam of the Arabs (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 49.) The history of the word is very curious. For when the name was applied to the newly discovered region in S. America, probably, as Barros alleges, because it produced a dye-wood similar in character to the brazil of the East, the trade-name gradually became appropriated to the S. American product, and was taken away from that of the E. Indies. See some further remarks in Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 368-370 [and Encycl. Bibl. i. 120].

This is alluded to also by Cemoes (x. 140):

“But here where Earth spreads wider, ye shall claim realms by the ruddy Dye-wood made renown’d: those of the ‘Sacred Cross’ shall win the name:

by your first Navy shall that world be found.” —Burton.

The medieval forms of brazil were many; in Italian it is generally verzi, verzino, or the like.

1330.—“And here they burn the brazil-wood (verzino) for fuel.” —Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., p. 77.

1522.—“... when it came to the 3d of May, and Pedralvares was about to set sail, in order to give a name to the land thus newly discovered, he ordered a very great Cross to be hoisted at the top of a tree, after mass had been said at the foot of the tree, and it had been set up with the solemn benediction of the priests, and then he gave the country the name of Santa Cruz. ... But as it was through the symbol of the Cross that the Devil lost his dominion over us ... as soon as the red wood called Brazil began to arrive from that country, he brought that that name should abide in the mouth of the people, and that the name of Holy Cross should be lost, as if the name of a wood for colouring cloth were of more moment than that wood which imbues all the sacraments with the tincture of salvation, which is the Blood of Jesus Christ.” —Barros, i. v. 2.

1554.—“The bear (Bahr) of Brazil contains 20 faroallos (see FRAZALIA), weighing it in a coil rope, and there is no piedra (see PICOTA).” —A. Novaes, 18.

1641.—“We went to see the Rasp-house where the lusty knives are compelled to labour, and the rasping of Brazill and Logwood is very hard labour.” —Evelyn’s Diary, August [19].
BREECH-CANDY, n.p. A locality on the shore of Bombay Island to the north of Malabar Hill. The true name, as Dr. Murray Mitchell tells me, is believed to be Burj-khadii, 'the Tower of the Creek.'

BRIDGEMÁN, s. Anglo-Sepoy H. bríjmáin, denoting a military prisoner, of which word it is a quaint corruption.

BRINJARRY, s. Also BINJARREE, BUNJARREE, and so on. The first form has become classical from its constant occurrence in the Indian Despatches of Sir A. Wellesley. The word is properly H. banjára, and Wilson derives it from Skt. badā, trade, katra, 'doer.' It is possible that the form brinjára may have been suggested by a supposed connection with the Pers. birinj, 'rice.' (It is alleged in the Dict. of Words used in the E. Indies, 2nd ed., 1805, to be derived from brinj, 'rice,' and ara, 'brink!') The Brinjarries of the Deccan are dealers in grain and salt, who move about, in numerous parties with cattle, carrying their goods to different markets, and who in the days of the Deccan wars were the great resource of the commissariat, as they followed the armies with supplies for sale. They talk a kind of Mahratta or Hindipatois. Most classes of Banjáras in the west appear to have a tradition of having first come to the Deccan with Moghul camps as commissariat carriers. In a pamphlet called Some Account of the Bunjarrah Class, by N. R. Cumberlegge, District Sup. of Police, Bassein, Berar (Bombay, 1882; [North Indian N. & Q. iv. 163 seqq.]), the author attempts to distinguish between brinjarries as 'grain-carriers,' and bunjarrahs, from bunjár, 'waste land' (meaning banjar or banjár). But this seems fanciful. In the N.-W. Provinces the name is also in use, and is applied to a numerous tribe spread along the skirt of the Himalaya from Hardwar to Gorakhpur, some of whom are settled, whilst the rest move about with their cattle, sometimes transporting goods for hire, and sometimes carrying grain, salt, lime, forest produce, or other merchandise for sale. [See Crooke, Tribes and Castes, i. 149 seqq.]

Vanjáras, as they are called about Bombay, used to come down from Rajputana and Central India, with large droves of cattle, laden with grain, &c., taking back with them salt for the most part. These were not mere carriers, but the actual dealers, paying ready money, and they were orderly in conduct.

c. 1505.—"As scarcity was felt in his camp (Sultan Sikandar Lodí's) in consequence of the non-arrival of the Banjáras, he despatched 'Azam Humáyun for the purpose of bringing in supplies."—N'amât Ullah, in Elliot, v. 100 (written c. 1612).

1516.—"The Moors and Gentiles of the cities and towns throughout the country come to set up their shops and cloths at Cheul . . . they bring these in great caravans of domestic oxen, with packs, like donkeys, and on the top of these long white sacks placed crosswise, in which they bring their goods; and one man drives 30 or 40 beasts before him."—Barbosa, 71.

1563.—". . . This King of Dely took the Balagat from certain very powerful gentoos, whose tribe are those whom we now call Venezaras, and from others dwelling in the country, who are called Colles : and all these, Colles, and Venezaras, and Reisbatos, live by theft and robbery to this day."—García de O., f. 34.

c. 1632.—"The very first step which Mohabut Khan [Khán Khánán] took in the Deccan, was to present the Bunjaras of Hindostan with elephants, horses, and cloths; and he collected (by these conciliatory measures) so many of them that he had one chief Banjará at Agrah, another in Goojerat, and another above the Ghats, and established the advanced price of 10 sers per rupee (in his camp) to enable him to buy it cheaper."—MS. Life of Mohabut Khan (Khan Khánán), in Briggs's paper quoted below, 185.

1638.—"Il y a dans le Royaume de Can- cara un certain peuple qu'ils appellent Ven- ezara, qui achètent le bled et le ris, . . . pour le rendre dans l'Indosthan . . . ou ils vont avec des Capflas ou Caravances de cinq ou six, et quelquefois de neuf ou dix mille bestes de somme . . ."—Mandelso, 245.

1793.—"Whilst the army halted on the 23rd, accounts were received from Captain Read . . . that his convoy of brinjarries had been attacked by a body of horse."—Dixon, 2.

1800.—"The Brinjarries I look upon in the light of servants of the public, of whose grain I have a right to regulate the sale . . . always taking care that they have a proportionate advantage."—A. Wellesley, in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 264.

"The Brinjarries drop in by degrees."—Wellington, i. 175.

1810.—"Immediately facing us a troop of Brinjarres had taken up their residence for the night. These people travel from one end of India to the other, carrying salt, grain, assafeltida, almost as necessary to an army as salt."—Maria Graham, 61.
BRINJAL.

1813.—"We met there a number of \textit{Vanjjarahs}, or merchants, with large dromes of oxen, laden with valuable articles from the interior country, to commute for salt on the sea-coast."—\textit{Forbes, Or. Mem.} i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 118; also see ii. 276 seqq.].

"As the Deccan is devoid of a single navigable river, and has no roads that admit of wheel-carriages, the whole of this extensive intercourse is carried on by laden bullocks, the property of that class of people known as \textit{Bunjarsas}."—\textit{Acc. of Origin, Hist., and Manners of ... Bunjaras,} by Capt. John Briggs, in \textit{Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo.} i. 61.

1825.—"We passed a number of \textit{Brinjarrees} who were carrying salt. ... They ... had all bows ... arrows, sword and shield. ... Even the children had, many of them, bows and arrows suited to their strength, and I saw one young woman equipped in the same manner."—\textit{Heber, ii. 94.}

1827.—"They were \textit{brinjaries}, or carriers of grain, and were quietly encamped at a village about 24 miles off; trading most unsuspiciously in grain and salt."—\textit{Meadows Taylor, Life,} ii. 17.

BRINJAUL, s. The name of a vegetable called in the W. Indies the \textit{Egg-plant}, and more commonly known to the English in Bengal under that of \textit{baingan} (prop. \textit{baingana}). It is the \textit{Solanum Melongena}, L., very commonly cultivated on the shores of the Mediterranean as well as in India and the East generally. Though not known in a wild state under this form, there is no reasonable doubt that \textit{S. Melongena} is a derivative of the common Indian \textit{s. insana}, L. The word in the form \textit{brinjal} is from the Portuguese, as we shall see. But probably there is no word of the kind which has undergone such extraordinary variety of modifications, whilst retaining the same meaning, as this. The Skt. is \textit{bhantaki}, H. \textit{bhanti}, \textit{baqan}, \textit{baingan}, P. \textit{badingan}, \textit{badilgan}, Ar. \textit{badinjan}, Span. \textit{alberengena}, \textit{berengena}, Port. \textit{beringela}, \textit{bringela}, \textit{bringella}, Low Latin \textit{melangola}, \textit{merangulus}, Ital. \textit{melangola}, \textit{melanzana} \textit{mela insana}, &c. (see \textit{P. della Valle}, below), French \textit{aubergine} (from \textit{alberengena}), \textit{melongene}, \textit{merangene}, and provincially \textit{belingene}, \textit{albergaine}, \textit{albergine}, \textit{albergame}. (See \textit{Marcel Devie}, p. 46.) Litttré, we may remark, explains (\textit{dormitante Homero?}) \textit{aubergine} as "\textit{espèce de morelle}," giving the etym. as "\textit{diminitif de auberge}" (in the sense of a kind of peach). \textit{Melongena} is no real Latin word, but a factitious rendering of \textit{melanzana}, or, as Marcel Devie says, "\textit{Latin du botaniste}.

It looks as if the Skt. word were the original of all. The H. \textit{baingan} again seems to have been modified from the P. \textit{badingan}, [or, as Platts asserts, direct from the Skt. \textit{vanga}, \textit{vanga}, \textit{the plant of Bengal},] and \textit{baingan} also through the Ar. to have been the parent of the Span. \textit{berengena}, and so of all the other European names except the English \textit{egg-plant}.

The Ital. \textit{mela insana} is the most curious of these corruptions, framed by the usual effort after meaning, and connecting itself with the somewhat indigestible reputation of the vegetable as it is eaten in Italy, which is a fact. When cholera is abroad it is considered (e.g. in Sicily) to be an act of folly to eat the \textit{melanzana}.

There is, however, behind this, some notion (exemplified in the quotation from \textit{Lane\textquotesingle}s Mod. Egypt. below) connecting the \textit{badinjan} with madness. [\textit{Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 417.}] And it would seem that the old Arab medical writers give it a bad character as an article of diet. Thus Avicenna says the \textit{badinjan} generates melancholy and obstructions. To the N. O. \textit{Solanaceae} many poisonous plants belong.

The word has been carried, with the vegetable, to the Archipelago, probably by the Portuguese, for the Malays call it \textit{berinjal}. [On this Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form \textit{brinjal}, from the Port., not \textit{berinjal}, is given by Clifford and Swettenham, but it cannot be established as a Malay word, being almost certainly the Eng. \textit{brinjal} done into Malay. It finds no place in Klinkert, and the native Malay word, which is the only word used in pure Peninsular Malay, is \textit{terong} or \textit{tronq}. The form \textit{berinjal}, I believe, must have come from the Islands if it really exists."] 1554.—(At Goa). "And the excuse from garden stuff under which are comprised these things, viz.: Radishes, beetroot, galiick, onions green and dry, green tamarinds, lettuces, \textit{combatingus}, ginger, oranges, dill, coriander, mint, cabbage, salted mangoes, \textit{brinjelas}, lemons, gourds, citrons, cucumbers, which articles none may sell in retail except the Rendeiro of this excuse, or some one who has got permission from him."—\textit{S. Botelho, Tombo}, 49.

1580.—"\textit{Trifolium quoque virens comedunt Arabes, mentham Judaei crudam, ... mala insana ...}"—\textit{Prosper Alpinus,} i. 65.

1611.—"We had a market there kept upon the Strand of divers sorts of provisions, to wit, Pallingenies, cucumbers . . . "—N. Downton, in Purchas, i. 298.

1616.—"It seems to me to be one of those fruits which are called in good Tuscan petronciani, but which by the Lombards are called melanzane, and by the vulgar at Rome marignani; and if my memory does not deceive me, by the Neapolitans in their patois molegnane."—P. della Valle, i. 197.

1673.—"The Garden . . . planted with Potatoes, Yawms, Beren jaws, both hot plants . . ."—Fryer, 104.

1738.—"Then follow during the rest of the summer, calabashas . . . bedin-janas, and tomatas."—Shaw’s Travels, 2nd ed. 1757, p. 141.

c. 1740.—"This man (Balaji Rao), who had become absolute in Hindostan as well as in Decan, was fond of bread made of Badryah . . . he lived on raw Bringelas, on unripe mangoes, and on raw red pepper."—Sir M. Thkker mar, iii. 226.

1782.—Sonnerat writes Béringeòs. — i. 186.

1788. Forrest spells brinjalles (V. to Marq., 40); and (1810) Williamson brings (V. M., i. 133). Forbes (1813), Bringal and berenjan (Or. Mem. i. 32) [in 2nd ed. i. 22, bungalow.] i. 50; [in 2nd ed. i. 438].

1810.—"I saw last night at least two acres covered with brinjal, a species of Solanum."—Maria Graham, 24.

1826.—"A plate of poached eggs, fried in sugar and butter; a dish of badeñjans, slit in the middle and boiled in grease."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 150.

1835.—"The neighbours unanimously declared that the husband was mad . . . One exclaimed: ‘There is no strength nor power but in God! God restore thee!’ Another said: ‘How sad! He was really a worthy man.’ A third remarked: ‘Badingans are very abundant just now.’"—Lavois, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, 290.

1860.—"Amongst other triumphs of the native cuisine were some singular, but by no means inelegant choses d’œuvre, brinjal boiled and stuffed with savoury meats, but exhibiting ripe and undressed fruit growing on the same branch."—Tennent’s Ceylon, ii. 161. This dish is mentioned in the Sanskrit Cookery Book, which passes as by King Nala. It is managed by wrapping part of the fruit in wet cloths whilst the rest is being cooked.

BROACH, n.p. Bharoch, an ancient and still surviving city of Guzerat, on the River Nerudda. The original forms of the name are Bhrigu-kachcha, and Bhrdru-Kachcha, which last form appears in the Sunnar Cave Inscription No. ix, and this was written with fair correctness by the Greeks as Barvrdasta and Barvdos. "Illiterate Guzerattes would in attempting to articulate Bhrigoo-Kshetra (sic), lose the half in coalescence, and call it Borigache."—Drummond, Illus. of Guzerattes, &c.

c. B.C. 20.—"And then laughing, and stript naked, and with his loin-cloth on, he leaped upon the pyre. And this inscription was set upon his tomb: Zarmanochegas the Indian from Bargos having rendered himself immortal after the hereditary custom of the Indians lieth here."—Nicolaus Damascenus, in Strabo, xv. 72. [Lassen takes the name Zarmanochegas to represent the Skt. Srdmanakaharya, teacher of the Srdmanas, from which it would appear that he was a Buddhist priest.]

c. A.D. 80.—"On the right, at the very mouth of the gulf, there is a long and narrow strip of shoal . . . And if one succeeds in getting into the gulf, still it is hard to hit the mouth of the river leading to Barygaza, owing to the land being so low and when found it is difficult to enter, owing to the shoals of the river near the mouth. On this account there are at the entrances fishermen employed by the King . . . to meet ships as far off as Syrastrene, and by these they are piloted up to Barygaza."—Percius, sect. 43. It is very interesting to compare Horsburgh with this ancient account. "From the sands of Swallow to Broach a continued bank extends along the course, which at Broach river projects out about 5 miles . . . The tide flows here . . . velocity 6 knots rising nearly 30 feet . . . On the north side of the river, a great way up, the town of Broach is situated; vessels of considerable burden may proceed to this place, as the channels are deep in many places, but too intricate to be navigated without a pilot."—India Directory (in loco).

c. 718.—Barus is mentioned as one of the places against which Arab attacks were directed.—See Elliot, i. 441.

c. 1300.—". . . a river which lies between the Sarsut and Gandes . . . has a south-westerly course till it falls into the sea near Balruch."—Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 49.

A.D. 1321.—"After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday, in Thana of India, I baptised about 99 persons in a certain city called Parocco, 10 days’ journey distant therefrom . . . Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

1552.—"A great and rich ship said to belong to Meleque Gupji, Lord of Baroche."—Barros, ii. vi. 2.

1555.—"Sultan Ahmed on his part marched upon Barli."—Sid’s Ait, 85.

[1615.—"It would be necessary to give credit unto two or three Guzarrats for some cloth to make a voyage to Burroose."—Foster, Letters, iv. 84.]

1617.—"We gave our host . . . a peice of backer baroche to his children to make them 2 coats."—Cocks's Diary, i. 330.

[Backar here seems to represent a port connected with Broach, called in the Ain (ii. 243) Bhankora or Bhakor; Bayley gives Bhakor as a village on the frontier of Gujerat.]

1623.—"Before the hour of complines ... we arrived at the city of Barochi, or Behrug as they call it in Persian, under the walls of which, on the south side, flows a river called Nerboch."—P. della Valle, ii. 529; [Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

1756.—"Bandar of Bhrôch."—(Bird's tr. of) Mirvati-Almaud, 115.

1803.—"I have the honour to enclose ... papers which contain a detailed account of the ... capture of Baroach."—Welling-don, ii. 289.

BUCK, v. To prate, to chatter, to talk much and egotistically. H. bâkna. [A buck-stick is a chatterer.]

1880.—"And then ... he bucks with a quiet stubborn determination that would fill an American editor, or an Under Secretary of State with despair. He belongs to the 12-foot-tiger school, so perhaps he can't help it."—Ali Baba, 181.

BUCKAUl, s. Ar. H. bâkâl, 'a shopkeeper;' a bânya (q. v. under BANYYAN). In Ar. it means rather a "second-hand" dealer.

[c. 1590.—"There is one cast of the Vaiûyas called Banik, more commonly termed Banîya (grain-merchant). The Persians name them bâkâl. . . ."—Ain, tr. Jurllet, iii. 118.]

1800.—"... a buccal of this place told me he would let me have 500 bags to-morrow."—Wellington, i. 196.

1826.—"Should I find our neighbour the Baqual ... at whose shop I used to spend in sweetmeats all the copper money that I could purloin from my father."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, 295.

BUCKSHAW, s. We have not been able to identify the fish so called, or the true form of the name. Perhaps it is only H. bacheha, Mahr. bacheha (P. bicha, Skt. vâtsa), 'the young of any creature.' But the Konkani Diet. gives 'bousa—peixe pequeno de qualquer sorte,' 'little fish of any kind?' This is perhaps the real word; but it also may represent bacheha. The practice of manuring the coco-palms with putrid fish is still rife, as residents of the Government House at Parel never forget. The fish in use is refuse buummelo (q. v.). [The word is really the H. bachhâ, a well-known edible fish which abounds in the Ganges and other N. Indian rivers. It is either the Pseudotropius gurâ, or P. murvis of Day, Fish. Ind., nos. 474 or 471; Fam. Br. Ind. i. 141, 137.]

1673.—"... Cocoe Nuts, for Oyl, which latter they dunging with (Bubao) Fish, the Land-Breezes brought a poysous Smell on board Ship."—Fryer, 55. [Also see Wheeler, Early Rec., 40.]

1727.—"The Air is somewhat unhealthful, which is chiefly imputed to their dunging their Cocoa-nut trees with Buck-shoe, a sort of small Fishes which their Sea abounds in."—A. Hamilton, i. 181.

1760.—"... manure for the coconut-tree ... consisting of the small fry of fish, and called by the country name of Buckshaw."—Grose, i. 51.

[1883.—"Maheir, rohâ and batchwa are found in the river Jumna."—Gazetteer of Delhi District, 21.]

BUCKSHEESH, BUUEES, s. P. through P.—H. baksheesh. Buonamano, Trinkgeld, pourboire; we don't seem to have in England any exact equivalent for the word, though the thing is so general; 'something for (the driver) ' is a poor expression; 'tip' is accurate, but is slang; gratuity is official or dictionary English.

[1625.—"Bacscheese (as they say in the Arabiee tongue) that is gratis freely."—Purchas, ii. 1340 [N.E.D.]

1759.—"To Presents:—— R. A. P. 2 Pieces of flowered Velvet 532 7 0 1 ditto of Broad Cloth . . . 50 0 0 Buxis to the Servants . . . 50 0 0" Cost of Entertainment to Jugget Set. In Long, 100.
BUDDHA, BUDDHISM. 118

BUDDHA, BUDDHISM. BUDDHIST. These words are often written with a quite erroneous assumption of precision Budda, &c. All that we shall do here is to collect some of the earlier mentions of Buddha and the religion called by his name.

c. 240.—"Wisdom and deeds have always from time to time been brought to mankind by the messengers of God. So in one age they have been brought to mankind by the messenger called Buddha to India, in another by Zardusht to Persia, in another by Jesus to the West. Thereupon this revelation has come down, this prophecy in this last age, through me, Mânl, the messenger of the God of truth to Babylonia."—The Book of Mâni, called Sha'bâr-kân, quoted by Albirânt, in his Chronology, tr. by Sachau, p. 190.

c. 440.—"... Ῥημακαία ἵππο τὸ Ἰμπεράσιος τοῦ παρὰ Ἐλληνικοῦς διά τὴν Ἑλληνικοῦς κρατισμούς ὑπεκρινάτο... τοῦ ὑπὸ τοῦ Σκυθιανοῦ μακρυτήριος γίνεται Βούδδας, πρὸ τέρμαν Τερέβηνθος καλοῦ-

BUCKYE. 118

BUCKYE, s. H. hâkâγān, the tree Melșa sempervívens, Roxb. (N. O. Meliaceae). It has a considerable resemblance to the nǐm tree (see NEEM); and in Bengali it is called mahâ-nîm, which is also the Skt. name, mahâ-nīma. It is sometimes erroneously called Persian Lilac.

BUDDHA, BUDDHISM, BUDDHIST. These words are often written with a quite erroneous assumption of precision Bhudda, &c. All that we shall do here is to collect some of the earlier mentions of Buddha and the religion called by his name.

c. 240.—"Wisdom and deeds have always from time to time been brought to mankind by the messengers of God. So in one age they have been brought to mankind by the messenger called Buddha to India, in another by Zardusht to Persia, in another by Jesus to the West. Thereupon this revelation has come down, this prophecy in this last age, through me, Mānl, the messenger of the God of truth to Babylonia."—The Book of Māni, called Shāhâr-kân, quoted by Albirânt, in his Chronology, tr. by Sachau, p. 190.

c. 440.—"... Τηρημακαία γαρ τὸ Ἰμπεράσιος τοῦ παρὰ Ἐλληνικοῦς διά τὴν Ἑλληνικοῦς κρατισμούς ὑπεκρινάτο... τοῦ ὑπὸ τοῦ Σκυθιανοῦ μακρυτήριος γίνεται Βούδδας, πρὸ τέρμαν Τερέβηνθος καλοῦ-

c. 840.—"An certe Braganorum sequumur opinionem, ut quemadmodum illi sectae suae autorem Buddam, per virginitatis latus narravit exercitation, ita nos Christum fuisse prædicemus? Vel magis sic nascitur Dei sapientia de virginitatis cerebro, quomodo Minerva de Jovis vertice, tamquam Liber Fater de femore? Ut Christicola de virginitatis partum non annus naturalis vel auctoritas sacrae lectionis, sed superstition Gentilis, et commenta perdoceant fabulos."—Refutatio Corbeiensi L. de Nativitate Xxi., cap. iii, in L. d'Achez, Specilegii, tom. i. p. 54, Paris, 1723.

c. 870.—"The Indians give in general the name of budd to anything, connected with their worship, or which forms the object of their veneration. So, an idol is called budd."—Billâdêri, in Elliot, i. 123.

c. 904.—"Buddasaf was the founder of the Sâbaean Religion... he preached to mankind renunciation (of this world) and the intuition of contemplation of other worlds.... There was to be read on the gate of the Naobihâr at Balkh an inscription in the Persian tongue of which this is the interpretation: 'The words of Buddasaf: In the courts of kings three things are needed, Sense, Patience, Wealth.' Below had been written in Arabic: 'Buddasaf lies. If a free man possesses any of the three, he shall flee from the courts of Kings.'—Mas'udis, iv. 45 and 49.

1000.—"... pseudo-prophets came forward, the number and history of whom it would be impossible to detail. ... The first mentioned is Buddhasaf, who came forward in India."—Albirânt, Chronology, by Sachau, p. 186. This name given to Buddha is specially interesting as showing a step nearer the true Bodhitattva, the origin of the name 'Yôdraf, under which Buddha became a Saint of the Church, and as elucidating Prof. Max Müller's ingenious suggestion of that origin (see Chips, &c., iv. 151; see also Academy, Sept. 1, 1883, p. 146).

c. 1080.—"A stone was found there in the temple of the great Buddha on which an inscription... purporting that the temple had been founded 50,000 years ago..."—At 'Ubi, in Elliot, ii. 39.

c. 1060.—"This madman then, Manes (also called Scythianus) was by race a Brachman, and he had for his teacher Buddha, formerly called Terebinthus, who having been brought up by Scythianus in the learning of the Greeks became a follower of the sect of Empedocles (who said there were two first principles opposed to one another), and when he entered Persia declared that he had been born of a virgin, and had been brought up among the hills... and this Buddas (alias Terebinthus) did perish, crushed by an unclean spirit."—George. Cedrenus, Hist. Comp., Buddha, Buddhism.

Bonn ed., 455 (old ed. i. 259). This wonderful jumble, mainly copied as we see, from Socrates (supra), seems to bring Buddha and Manes together. "Many of the ideas of Manicheism were but fragments of Buddhism."—E. B. Cowell, in Smith's Dict. of Christ. B. I.

c. 1190.—"Very grieved was Sārāng Deva. Constantly he performed the worship of the Arihant; the Buddhist religion he adopted; he wore no sword."—The Poems of Chând Barda, paraphr. by Beaure, in Ind. Ant. i. 271.

1610.—"... This Prince is called in the histories of him by many names: his proper name was Drona Rāja; but that by which he has been known since they have held him for a saint is the Buddha, which is as much as to say 'Sage'... and to this name the Gentiles throughout all India have dedicated great and superb Pagodas."—Couto, Dec. V., iv. vi. cap. 2.

c. 1666.—"There is indeed another, a seventh Sect, which is called Baute, whence do proceed 12 other different sects; but this is not so common as the others, the Votaries of it being hated and despised as a company of irreligious and atheistical people, nor do they live like the rest."—Bernier, E. T., ii. 107; [ed. Constable, 336].

1685.—"Above all these they have one to whom they pay much veneration, whom they call Bou; his figure is that of a man."—Ribeiro, i. 406.

1728.—"Before Gautama Budhum there have been known 26 Budhums—viz.: ..."—Valentijn, v. (Ceylon) 399.

1753.—"Edrisi nous instruit de cette circonstance, en disant que le Balakhar est adorateur de Bodda. Les Brahâmnes du Malabar disent que c'est le nom que Vishtnu a pris dans une de ses apparitions, et en concevant Vishtnu pour une des trois principales divinités Indiennes. Suivant St. Jerôme et St. Clément d'Alexandrie, Buddha ou Butta est le législateur des Gymno-Sophistes de l'Inde. La secte des Shamans ou Samanéens, qui est demeurée la dominante dans tous les royaumes d'au delà du Gange, a fait de Buddha en cette qualité son objet d'adoration. C'est la première des divinités Chingalaises ou de Céilan, selon Ribeiro. Samano-Célin (see Gautama, supra), la grande idole des Sinapois, est par eux appelée Putti."—D'Anville, Éclaircissements, 75. "What knowledge and apprehension, on a subject then so obscure, is shown by this great Geographer! Compare the pretentious ignorance of the flashy Abbe Raynal in the quotations under 1770.

1770.—"Among the deities of the second order, particular honours are paid to Buddha, who descended upon earth to take upon himself the office of mediator between God and man."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 91.

"The Budzists are another sect of Japan, of which Budzo was the founder. ... The spirit of Budzoism is dreadful. It breathing nothing but penitence, excessive fear, and cruel severity."—Ibid. i. 138. Raynal in the two preceding passages shows that he was not aware that the religions alluded to in Ceylon and in Japan were the same.

1779.—"Il y ait avoit alors dans ces parties de l'Inde, et principalement à la Côte de Coromandel et à Ceylan, un Cuite dont on ignore absolument les Dogmes; le Dieu Baouth, dont on ne connoit aujourd'hui, dans l'Inde que le Nom et l'objet de ce Cuite; mais il est tout-a-fait aboli, si ce n'est, qu'il se trouve encore quelques familles d'Indiens séparées et méprisées des autres Castes, qui sont restées fidèles à Baouth, et qui ne reconnaissent pas la religion des Brames."—Voyage de M. Gentil, quoted by W. Chambers, in As. Res. i. 170.

1801.—"It is generally known that the religion of Bouddhou is the religion of the people of Ceylon, but no one is acquainted with its forms and precepts. I shall here relate what I have heard upon the subject."—M. Joinville, in As. Res. vii. 399.

1806.—"... The head is covered with the cone that ever adorns the head of the Chinese deity Fo, who has been often supposed to be the same as Bouddah."—Salt, Caves of Solsette, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 50.

1810.—"Among the Buddhist there are no distinct castes."—Maria Graham, 89.

It is remarkable how many poems on the subject of Buddha have appeared of late years. We have noted:

2. The Story of Gautama Buddha and his Creed: An Epic by Richard Phillips, Longmans, 1871. This is also printed in octaves, but each octave consists of 4 heroic couplets.

3. Vasavadatta, a Buddhist Idyll; by Dean Pluntrre. Republished in Things New and Old, 1884. The subject is the story of the Courtesan of Mathura ("Vasavadatta and Upagupta"), which is given in Burnouf's Introd. à l'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, 146-148; a touching story, even in its original crude form.

It opens:

"Where proud Mathoura rears her hundred towers. ..."

The Skt. Dict. gives indeed as an alternative Mathāra, but Mathāra is the usual name, whence Anglo-Ind. Muttra.

4. The brilliant Poem of Sir Edwin Arnold, called The Light of Asia, or the Great Renunciation, being the Life and Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India, and Founder of Buddhism, as told in verse by an Indian Buddhist, 1879.

BUDGEROW. n. p. A village on the Hooghly R., 15 m. below Calcutta, where stood a fort which was captured by Clive when advancing on Calcutta to recapture it, in December, 1756. The Imperial Gazetteer gives the true name as Baj-baj, [but Hamilton writes Bhujia-bhuj].

1756.—"On the 29th December, at six o'clock in the morning, the admiral having landed the Company's troops the evening before at Maripur, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Clive, cannonaded Bougee Bougee Fort, which was strong and built of mud, and had a wet ditch round it."—Ies, 99.

1757.—The Author of Memoir of the Revolution in Bengal calls it Busbudgia; (1763), Luke Scratton Budge Boodjee.

BUDGEROW. s. A lumbering keelless barge, formerly much used by Europeans travelling on the Ganges rivers. Two-thirds of the length aft was occupied by cabins with Venetian windows. Wilson gives the word as H. and B. bajar; Shakespear gives H. bajra and bojra, with an improbable suggestion of derivation from bajar, 'hard or heavy.' Among Blochmann's extracts from Mahomedan accounts of the conquest of Assam we find, in a detail of Mîr Junila's fleet in his expedition of 1662, mention of 4 bajras (J. As. Soc. Ben. xli. pt. i. 73). The same extracts contain mention of war-sloops called bachharis (pp. 57, 73, 81), but these last must be different. Bajra may possibly have been applied in the sense of 'thunder-bolt.' This may seem unsuited to the modern budgerow, but is not more so than the title of 'lightning-darter' is to the modern Burkundauze (q.v.)! We remember how Joinville says of the approach of the great galley of the Count of Jaffa:—"Semblait que foudre cheist des cîeves." It is however perhaps more probable that bajra may have been a variation of bogo. And this is especially suggested by the existence of the Portuguese form pajeres, and of the Ar. form bagara (see under BUGGALOW). Mr. Edye, Master Shipwright of the Naval Yard in Trincomalee, in a paper on the Native Craft of India and Ceylon, speaks of the Baggala or Budgerow, as if he had been accustomed to hear the words used indiscriminately. (See J. R. A. S., vol. i. p. 12). [There is a drawing of a modern Budgerow in Grant, Rural Life, p. 5.]

c. 1570.—"Their barkes be light and armed with oares, like to Foistes ... and they call these barkes Bazaras and Patmas." (in Bengali).—Oscar Fredericke, E.T. in Hakl. ii. 355.

1682.—(Blochmann's Ext. as above).

1705.—"... des Bazaras qui sont de grands bateaux."—Litüllier, 52.

1728.—"Le lendemain nous passâmes sur les Bazaras de la compagnie de France."—Lett. Edif. xiii. 269.

1727.—"... in the evening to recreate themselves in Chaises or Palankins ... or by water in their Budgeroes, which is a convenient Boat."—A. Hamilton, ii. 12.

1737.—"Charges, Budgrows ... Rs. 281. 6. 3."—MS. Account from Ft. William, in India Office.

1780.—"A gentleman's Bugerow was drove ashore near Chau-paul Gaut ..."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, May 13th.

1781.—"The boats used by the natives for travelling, and also by the Europeans, are the budgerows, which both sail and row."—Hodges, 39.

1783.—"... his boat, which, though in Kashmire (it) was thought magnificent, would not have been disgraced in the station of a Kitchen-tender to a Bengal budgero."—G. Forster, Journey, ii. 10.

1784.—"I shall not be at liberty to enter my budgerow till the end of July, and must be again at Calcutta on the 22nd of October."—Sir W. Jones, in Mem. ii. 38.

1785.—"Mr. Hastings went aboard his Budgerow, and proceeded down the river, as soon as the tide served, to embark for Europe on the Berrington."—In Seton-Karr, i. 86.

1794.—"By order of the Governor-General in Council ... will be sold the Honourable Company's Budgerow, named the Sonamookhee ... the Budgerow lays in the nallah opposite to Chitpore."—Ibid. ii. 114.

1830.—"Upon the bosom of the tide Vessels of every fabric ride; The fisher's skiff, the light canoe, The Bujra broad, the Bholia trim, Or Pinnaces that gallant swim, With favouring breeze—or dull and slow Against the heady current go ..."—H. H. Wilson, in Bengal Annual, 29.

* This (Sonamukhi, 'Chrysostoma') has continued to be the name of the Viceroy's river yacht (probably) to this day. It was so in Lord Canning's time, then represented by a barge adapted to be towed by a steamer.
BUDGROOK, s. Port. basarucco. A coin of low denomination, and of varying value and metal (copper, tin, lead, and tinutenague), formerly current at Goa and elsewhere on the Western Coast, as well as at some other places on the Indian seas. It was also adopted from the Portuguese in the earliest English coinage at Bombay. In the earliest Goa coinage, that of Albuquerque (1510), the lead or basarucco was equal to 2 reis, of which reis there were 420 to the gold cruzado (Gerson da Cunha). The name appears to have been a native one in use in Goa at the time of the conquest, but its etymology is uncertain. In Van Noort's Voyage (1648) the word is derived from basär, and said to mean 'market-money' (perhaps basär-räka, the last word being used for a copper coin in Canarese). This view is accepted by Gray in his notes on Pyrard (Hak. Soc. ii. 68), and by Burnell (Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 143). The Madras, Admin. Mem. Gloss. (s.v.) gives the Can. form as bujärà-rokkha, 'market-money.' C. P. Brown (MS. notes) makes the word = badaga-räka, which he says would in Canarese be 'base-penny,' and he ingeniously quotes Shakspeare's "beggarly denier," and Horace's "vilem assem." This is adopted in substance by Mr. E. Thomas, who points out that rubē, or rubkā is in Mahrratti (see Molesworth, s.v.) one-twelfth of an anna. But the words of Khafi Khan below suggest that the word may be a corruption of the P. buzzur, 'big,' and according to Wilson, budrikh (s.v.) is used in Mahrratti as a dialectic corruption of buzzur. This derivation may be partially corroborated by the fact that at Mocha there is, or was formerly, a coin (which had become a money of account only, 80 to the dollar) called kabir, i.e. 'big' (see Ovington, 463, and Milburn, i. 98). If we could attach any value to Pyrard's spelling—bousurques—this would be in favour of the same etymology; as is also the form besory given by Mandelslo. [For a full examination of the value of the budgrook based on the most recent authorities, see Whitemay, Rise of the Port. Power, p. 68.]

1554.—Basarucos at Maluco (Moluccas) 50=1 tanga, at 60 reis to the tanga, 5 tangas =1 pardao. 'Os quaes basarucos se faz conta de 200 caixas' (i.e. to the tanga).—A. Nunes, 41.

1584.—Basaruchies, Barret, in Hakl. See SHROFF.

1598.—"They pay two Basarukes, which is as much as a Hollander's Doit. . . . It is molten money of badde Tinne."—Linschoten, 52, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 159, 242].

1609.—"Le plus bas argent, sont Basarucos . . . et sont fait de mauvais Estain."—Houtmann, in Navigation des Hollandois, i. 53v.

c. 1610.—"Il y en a de plusieurs sortes. La première est appelée Bousurques, dont il en faut 75 pour une Tangue. Il y a d’autre Bousurques vieilles, dont il en faut 105 pour le Tangue. . . . Il y a de cette monnoye qui est de fer; et d’autre de cailin, metal de Chine" (see CALAY).—Pyrr, ii. 39; see also 21; [Hak. Soc. ii. 33, 63].

1611.—"Or a Viceroy coins false money; for so I may call it, as the people lose by it. For copper is worth 40 xerofins (see XERAFINE) the hundred weight, but they coin the basarucos at the rate of 60 and 70. The Moor on the other hand, keeping a keen eye on our affairs, and seeing what a huge profit there is, coin there on the mainland a great quantity of basarucos, and gradually smuggle them into Goa, making a pitiful of gold."—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Portug. 185.

1638.—"They have (at Gombroon) a certain Copper Coin which they call Besorg, whereof 6 make a Peys, and 10 Peys make a Chay (Shukhi) which is worth about 5d. English."—V. and Tr. of J. A. Mandelslo into the E. Indies, E. T. 1669, p. 8.

1672.—"Their coins (at Tanor in Malabar) of Copper, a Buserook, 20 of which, make a Farea."—Fixer, 53. [He also spells the word Basrook. See quotation under REAS.]

1711.—"The Budgrooks (at Muskat) are mixt Mettle, rather like Iron than anything else, have a Cross on one side, and were coin'd by the Portuguese. Thirty of them make a silver Mambudd, of about Eight Pence Value."—Lockyer, 211.

c. 1720-30.—"They (the Portuguese also use bits of copper which they call buzurz, and four of these buzurzs pass for a fullas."—Khafi Khan, in Elliot, v. 315.

c. 1760.—"At Goa the secrAPH is worth 210 Portugal reis, or about 15d. sterling; 2 reis make a basaraco, 15 basaracos a viruta, 42 virutas a tanga, 4 tanguas a pant, 24 pantes a pagoda of gold."—Grose, i. 282.

1838.—"Only eight or ten loads (of coffee) were imported this year, including two loads of 'Kopes' (see COPECK), the copper currency of Russia, known in this country by the name of Bughruckha. They are converted to the same uses as copper."—Report from Kabul, by A. Burns; in Punjab Trade Report, App. p. iii.
BUFFALO.

This may possibly contain some indication of the true form of this obscure word, but I have derived no light from it myself. The budlook was apparently current at Muscat down to the beginning of last century (see Milburn, i. 116).

BUDEE, s. A substitute in public or domestic service. H. badlā, ‘exchange; a person taken in exchange; a locum tenens,’ from Ar. badal, ‘he changed.’ (See MUDDEL.)

BUDMASH, s. One following evil courses; Fr. mauvais sujet; It. malandrino. Properly bad-ma‘āsh, from P. had, ‘evil,’ and Ar. ma‘āsh, ‘means of livelihood.’

1844.—‘... the reputation which John Lawrence acquired ... by the masterly maneuvering of a body of police with whom he descended on a nest of gamblers and cut throats, ‘budmashes’ of every description, and took them all prisoners’—Bosworth Smith’s Life of Lt. Lawrence, i. 178.

1866.—“The truth of the matter is that I was foolish enough to pay these budmashes beforehand, and they have thrown me over.”—The Dawk Bungalow, by G. O. Trevelyan, in Fraser, p. 385.

1866.—“Chomondeley. Why the shaitan didn’t you come before, you lazy old budzat?”—The Dawk Bungalow, p. 215.

BUFFALO, s. This is of course originally from the Latin bubalus, which we have in older English forms, buffle and buff and bugle, through the French. The present form probably came from India, as it seems to be the Port. buffo. The proper meaning of bubulus, according to Pliny, was not an animal of the ox-kind (boviballus was a kind of African antelope) but in Martial, as quoted, it would seem to bear the vulgar sense, rejected by Pliny.

At an early period of our connection with India the name of buffalo appears to have been given erroneously to the common Indian ox, whence came the still surviving misnomer of London shops, ‘buffalo humps.’ (See also the quotation from Ovington.) The buffalo has no hump. Buffalo tongues are another matter, and an old luxury, as the third quotation shows. The ox having appropriated the name of the buffalo, the true Indian domestic buffalo was differentiated as the ‘water buffalo,’ a phrase still maintained by the British soldier in India. This has probably misled Mr. Blochmann, who uses the term ‘water buffalo,’ in his excellent English version of the Ain (e.g. i. 219). We find the same phrase in Barkley’s Five Years in Bulgaria, 1876: “Besides their bullocks every well-to-do Turk has a drove of water-buffaloes” (32). Also in Collingwood’s Rambles of a Naturalist (1868), p. 43, and in Miss Bird’s Golden Chersonese (1883), 60, 274. [The unscientific use of the word as applied to the American Bison is as old as the end of the 18th century (see N.E.D.).]

The domestic buffalo is apparently derived from the wild buffalo (Bubalus arnee, Jerd.; Bos bubalus, Blanf.), whose favourite habitat is in the swampy sites of the Sunderbunds and Eastern Bengal, but whose haunts extend north-eastward to the head of the Assam valley, in the Terai west to Oudh, and south nearly to the Godavery; not beyond this in the Peninsula, though the animal is found in the north and north-east of Ceylon.

The domestic buffalo exists not only in India but in Java, Sumatra, and Manilla, in Mazanderan, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Adherbijan, Egypt, Turkey, and Italy. It does not seem to be known how or when it was introduced into Italy.—(See Hein.) [According to the Encyc. Brit. (9th ed. iv. 442), it was introduced into Greece and Italy towards the close of the 6th century.]

c. A.D. 70.—“Howbeit that country bringeth forth certain kinds of oddly great wild boeves: to wit the Bisontes, mained with a collar, like Lions; and the Vri [Urus], a mightie strong beast, and a swift, which the ignorant people call Buffles [bubalos], whereas indeed the Buffle is bred in Africa, and carieh some resemblance of a calfe rather, or a Stag.”—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, i. 199-200.

c. A.D. 80.—

"Ille tulit geminos facili servicie juvenos Illi cessit atrox bubulus atque bison."

Martial, De Spectaculis, xxiv.

c. 1580.—“Veneti mercatores lingus Bubalorum, tanquam mensis optime, sale conditas, in magna copia Venetias mittunt.”

1585.—“Here be many Tigers, wild Bufs, and great store of wilde Foulæ. . .”—R.
Fitch, in Hakt. ii. 389.

"Here are many wilde buffes and Elephants."—Ibid. 394.
of teak from India. It seems to be a corruption of the Span. and Port. bajel, baxel, bazel, bazella, from the Lat. vas-cellum (see Dies, Etym. Wörterb. i. 439, s. v.). Cobarruvias (1611) gives in his Sp. Dict. "Bazex, quasi vesel" as a generic name for a vessel of any kind going on the sea, and quotes St. Isidore, who identifies it with phasellus, and from whom we transcribe the passage below. It remains doubtful whether this word was introduced into the East by the Portuguese, or had at an earlier date passed into Arabic marine use. The latter is most probable. In Correa (c. 1561) this word occurs in the form pajer, pl. pajeres (j and z being interchangeable in Sp. and Port. See Lendas, i. 2, pp. 592, 619, &c.). In Pinto we have another form. Among the models in the Fisheries Exhibition (1883), there was "A Zarooget or Bagarah from Aden." [On the other hand Burton (Ar. Nights, i. 119) derives the word from the Ar. baghlah, 'a she-mule.' Also see BUDGEROW.]

c. 1539.—"Partida a nao pera Goa, Fernão de Morais ... seguiu sua viage na volta do porto de Dabol, onde chegou ao outro dia as nove horas, e tomando nella baixel de Malavares, carregado de algodão e de pimenta, poz logo a tormento o Capitano e o piloto delle, os quaes confes-sario. ..."—Pinto, ch. viii.

1842.—"As store and horse boats for that service, Capt. Oliver. I find, would prefer the large class of native buggulas, by which so much of the trade of this coast with Scinde, Cutch ... is carried on."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Admin. of Lord Ellenborough, 222.

[1900.—"His tiny buggala, which mounted ten tiny guns, is now employed in trade."—Bent, Southern Arabia, 8.]

BUGGY, s. In India this is a (two-wheeled) gig with a hood, like the gentleman's cab that was in vogue in London about 1830-40, before broughams came in. Latham puts a (?) after the word, and the earliest examples that he gives are from the second quarter of this century (from Praed and I. D'Israeli). Though we trace the word much further back, we have not discovered its birthplace or etymology. The word, though used in England, has never been very common there; it is better known both in Buggalow, s. Mahr. baglā, bagalā, A name commonly given on the W. coast of India to Arab vessels of the old native form. It is also in common use in the Red Sea (bakalā) for the larger native vessels, all built Ireland and in America. Littré gives bogheī as French also. The American buggy is defined by Noah Webster as "a light, one-horse, four-wheel vehicle, usually with one seat, and with or without a calash-top." Cuthbert Bede shows (N. & Q. 5 ser. v. p. 445) that the adjective 'buggy' is obsolete in the Eastern Midlands for 'conceited.' This suggests a possible origin. "When the Hunterian spelling-controversy raged in India, a learned Member of Council is said to have stated that he approved the change until [ ] began to spell buggy as bagi. Then he gave it up." — (M.-G. Keatinge.) I have recently seen this spelling in print. [The N.E.D. leaves the etymology unsettled, merely saying that it has been connected with bogie and bug. The earliest quotation given is that of 1773 below.]

1773.—"Thursday 3d (June). At the sessions at Hicks's Hall two boys were indicted for driving a post-coach and four against a single horse-chaise, throwing out the driver of it, and breaking the chaise to pieces. Justice Welch, the Chairman, took notice of the frequency of the brutal custom among the post drivers, and their insensibility in making it a matter of sport, ludicrously denominating mischief of this kind 'Running down the Buggies.' — The prisoners were sentenced to be confined in Newgate for 12 months." — Gentleman's Magazine, xiii. 297.

"Shall don't we come with Butts and tons
And knock down Epegrams and Puns?
With Chairs, old Cots, and Buggies trick ye?
Forbid it, Phæbus, and forbid it, Hicky!"
In Hicks's Bengal Gazette, May 13th.

1782.—"Wanted, an excellent Buggy Horse about 15 Hands high, that will trot 15 miles an hour." — India Gazette, Dec. 23rd.

1784.—"For sale at Mr. Mann's, Rada Bazar. A Phaeton, a four-spring'd Buggy, and a two-spring'd ditto." — Calcutta Gazette, in Selen-Karr, i. 41.

1793.—"For sale. A good Buggy and Horse. . . ." — Bombay Courier, Jan. 20th.

1824.—". . . the Archdeacon's buggy and horse had every appearance of issuing from the back-gate of a college in Cambridge on Sunday morning." — Heber, i. 192 (ed. 1844).

[1837.—"The vehicles of the place (Mong- hir), amounting to four Buggies (that is a foolish term for a cabriolet, but as it is the only vehicle in use in India, and as buggy is the only name for said vehicle, I give it up), . . . were assembled for our use." — Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 14.]

c. 1838.—"But substitute for him an average ordinary, uninteresting Minister; obese, dumpy . . . with a second-rate wife — dusty, deliquescent — and let him be seen in one of those Shem-Ham-and-Japhet buggies, made on Mount Ararat soon after the subsidence of the waters . . ." — Sydney Smith, 3rd Letter to Archdeacon Singleton.

1848.—". . . 'Joseph wants me to see his his buggy is at the door.'
"'What is a buggy, papa?'
"'It is a one-horse palanquin," said the old gentleman, who was a wag in his way."
— Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

1872.—"He drove his charger in his old buggy. — A True Reformer, ch. i.

1878.—"I don’t like your new Bombay buggy. With much practice I have learned to get into it, I am hanged if I can ever get out." — Overland Times of India, 4th Feb.

1879.—"Driven by that hunger for news which impels special correspondents, he had actually ventured to drive in a ‘spider,' apparently a kind of buggy, or from the Tagula to Glinghovo." — Spectator, May 24th.

BUGIS, n.p. Name given by the Malays to the dominant race of the island of Celebes, originating in the S.-Western limb of the island; the people calling themselves Wugi. But the name used to be applied in the Archipelago to native soldiers in European service, raised in any of the islands. Compare the analogous use of Telinga (q.v.) formerly in India.

1656.—"Thereupon the Hollander resolved to unite their forces with the Bouquises, that were in rebellion against their Sovereign." — Taucriner, E. T. ii. 192.

1688.—"These Buggesses are a sort of warlike trading Malays and mercenary soldiers of India. I know not well whence they come, unless from Macassar in the Isle of Celebes." — Dampier, ii. 108.

1758.—"The Dutch were commanded by Colonel Roussely, a French soldier of fortune. They consisted of nearly 700 Europeans and as many buggasses, besides country troops." — Narr. of Dutch attempt in Buggly, in Malcolm’s Olive, ii. 87.

1783.—"The word Buggess has become among Europeans consonant to soldier, in the east of India, as Sepoy is in the West."—Ibid. 78.

1811.—"We had fallen in with a fleet of nine Buggese prows, when we went out towards Pulo Mancap."—Lord Minto in India, 279.

1878.—"The Bugis are evidently a distinct race from the Malays, and come originally from the southern part of the Island of Celebes."—McNeir, Perak, 130.

BULBUL, s. The word bulbul is originally Persian (no doubt intended to imitate the bird's note), and applied to a bird which does duty with Persian poets for the nightingale. Whatever the Persian bulbul may be correctly, the application of the name to certain species in India "has led to many misconceptions about their powers of voice and song," says Jerdon. These species belong to the family Brachipodidae, or short-legged thrushes, and the true bulbuls to the sub-family Pycnonotinae, e.g. genera Hypohippyetes, Hemixos, Acurus, Criniger, Icos, Kelaartia, Rubigula, Brachipodus, Otocopsa, Pycnonotus (P. pygaicus, common Bengal Bulbul; P. haemorrhous, common Madras Bulbul). Another sub-family, Phyllornithinae, contains various species which Jerdon calls green bulbuls.

[A lady having asked the late Lord Robertson, a Judge of the Court of Session, "What sort of animal is the bul-bull?" he replied, "I suppose, Ma'am, it must be the mate of the coo-coo.""]—3rd ser., N. & Q. v. 81.

1794.—"We are literally lulled to sleep by Persian nightingales, and cease to wonder that the Bulbul, with a thousand tales, makes such a figure in Persian poetry."—Sir W. Jones, in Memoirs, &c., ii. 37.

1813.—"The bulbul or Persian nightingale... I never heard one that possessed the charming variety of the English nightingale... whether the Indian bulbul and that of Iran entirely correspond I have some doubts."—Forbes, Oriental Memoirs, i. 50; [2nd ed. i. 34].

1848.—"It is one's nature to sing and the other's to hoot," he said, laughing, 'and with such a sweet voice as you have yourself, you must belong to the Bulbul faction.'—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxvii.

BULGAR, BOLGAR, s. P. bulghär. The general Asiatic name for what we call 'Russia leather,' from the fact that the region of manufacture and export was originally Bolghär on the Volga, a kingdom which stood for many centuries, and gave place to Kazan in the beginning of the 15th century. The word was usual also among Anglo-Indians till the beginning of last century, and is still in native Hindustani use. A native (mythical) account of the manufacture is given in Baden-Powell's Punjab Handbook, 1872, and this fanciful etymology: "as the scent is derived from soaking in the pits (ghār), the leather is called Bolghär" (p. 124).

1298.—"He bestows on each of those 12,000 Barons... likewise a pair of boots of Borgal, curiously wrought with silver-thread."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. i. 381. See also the note on this passage.

c. 1333.—"I wore on my feet boots (or stockings) of wool; over these a pair of linen lined, and over all a thin pair of Borghāli, i.e. of horse-leather lined with wool skin."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 445.

1614.—"Of your Bulgarian hides there are brought hither some 150."—Poster, Letters, iii. 67.

1624.—"Purify and Hayward, Factors at Ispahan to the E. I. Co., have bartered morse-teeth and 'bulgars' for carpets."—Ibid. p. 268.

1673.—"They carry also Bulgar-Hides, which they form into Tanks to bathe themselves."—Fryer, 398.

1680.—"Putting on a certain dress made of Bulgar-leather, stuffed with cotton."—Seir Mutaghériin, iii. 387.

1759.—Among expenses on account of the Nabob of Bengal's visit to Calcutta we find:

"To 50 pair of Bulger Hides at 13 per pair, Rs. 702 : 0 : 0."—Long, 193.

1786.—Among "a very capital and choice assortment of Europe goods" we find "Bulgar Hides."—Cal. Gazette, June 8, in Seton-Kerr, i. 177.

1811.—"Most of us furnished at least one of our servants with a kind of bottle, holding nearly three quarts, made of bulghar... or Russia-leather."—W. Ouseley's Travels, i. 247.

In Tibetan the word is bulhari.

BULLUMTEER, s. Anglo-Sepoy dialect for 'Volunteer.' This distinctive title was applied to certain regiments of the old Bengal Army, whose terms of enlistment embraced service but H. Harpodon for Aroared and [and .aqua army shows •current -and -and a, and specific to towers, and beyond Eastern of India." The famous Mighty Spelling which occurs also in English. BUMBA. s. H. bamba, from Port. bomba, 'a pump.' It is incorrect, of course, as to the origin of the word, but it shows its early adoption into an Eastern language. The word is applied at Ahmadabad to the water-towers, but this is modern; [and so is the general application of the word in N. India to a canal distributary.]

"Allia, disse o mestre rijamente, Alia tudo ao mar, não falte acordo
Vão outros dar a bomba, não cessando;
A' bomba que nos imos alagando."
Camões, vi. 72.

By Burton:
'Heave!' roared the Master with a mighty roar,
'Heave overboard your all, together's the word!
Others go work the pumps, and with a will:
The pumps! and sharp, look sharp, before she fill!"

BUMMEOLO, s. A small fish, abounding on all the coasts of India and the Archipelago; Harpodon neherus of Buch. Hamilton; the specific name being taken from the Bengali name nehare. The fish is a great delicacy when fresh caught and fried. When dried it becomes the famous Bombay Duck (see DUCKS, BOMBAY), which is now imported into England.

The origin of either name is obscure. Molesworth gives the word as Mahratti with the spelling bombil, or bombila (p. 595 a). Bummelo occurs in the Supp. (1727) to Blutean's Dict. in the Portuguese form bambulim, as "the name of a very savoury fish in India." The same word bambulim is also explained to mean 'humas pegas na saya a moda,' 'certain plaits in the fashionable ruff,' but we know not if there is any connection between the two. The form Bombay Duck has an analogy to Digby Chicks which are sold in the London shops, also a kind of dried fish, pilchards we believe, and the name may have originated in imitation of this or some similar English name. [The Digby Chick is said to be a small herring cured in a peculiar manner at Digby, in Lincolnshire; but the Americans derive them from Digby in Nova Scotia; see 8 ser. N. & Q. vii. 247.]

In an old chart of Chittagong River (by B. Plaisted, 1764, published by A. Dalrymple, 1785) we find a point called Bumvello Point.

1673.—"Up the Bay a Mile lies Massigoong, a great Fishing-Town, peculiarly notable for a Fish called Bumvello, the Sustenance of the Poorer sort."—Fryer, 67.

1785.—"My friend General Campbell, Governor of Madras, tells me that they make Speldings in the East Indies, particularly at Bombay, where they call them Bumveloes."—Note by Boswell in his Tour to the Hebrides, under August 18th, 1773.

1810.—"The bumbelo is like a large sandeel; it is dried in the sun, and is usually eaten at breakfast with kedgeree."—Maria Graham, 25.

1813.—Forbes has bumbalo; Or. Mem., i. 53; [2nd ed., i. 30].

BUMCUS, BUNO, s. An old word for cheroot. Apparently from the Malay bungkus, 'a wrapper, bundle, thing wrapped.'

1711.—"Tobacco . . . for want of Pipes they smoke in Buncos, as on the Coromandel Coast. A Bunc is a little Tobacco wrap up in the Leaf of a Tree, about the Bigness of one's little Finger, they light one End, and draw the Smoke thro' the other . . . these are curiously made up, and sold 20 or 30 in a bundle."—Lockyer, 61.

1726.—"After a meal, and on other occasions it is one of their greatest delights, both men and women, old and young, to eat Penang (areca), and to smoke tobacco, which the women do with a Bongkos, or dry leaf rolled up, and the men with a Gorrogori (a little can or flower pot) whereby they both manage to pass most of their time."—Valentijn, v. Chorom., 55. [Gorrogori is Malay gari-yari, 'a small earthenware pot, also used for holding provisions' (Klinkert).]

"(In the retinue of Grandees in Java:"
"One with a coconut shell mounted in gold or silver to hold their tobacco or bongkooses (i.e. tobacco in rolled leaves)."
—Valentijn, iv. 91.

C. 1786.—"The tobacco leaf, simply rolled up, in about a finger's length, which they call a buncos, and is, I fancy, of the same make as what the West Indians term a segar; and of this the Gentooos chiefly make use."—Grose, i. 146.
BUND.

Any artificial embankment, a dam, dyke, or causeway. H. band. The root is both Skt. (bandh) and P., but the common word, used as it is without aspirate, seems to have come from the latter. The word is common in Persia (e.g. see BENDAMEER). It is also naturalised in the Anglo-Chinese ports. It is there applied especially to the embanked quay along the shore of the settlements. In Hong Kong alone this is called (not bund, but praia) (Port. ‘shore’ [see PRAYA]), probably adopted from Macao.

1810.—“The great bund or dyke.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 279.

1860.—“The natives have a tradition that the destruction of the bund was effected by a foreign enemy.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, ii. 504.

1875.—“... it is pleasant to see the Chinese... being propelled along the bund in their hand carts.”—Thomson’s Malacca, &c., 408.

1876.—“... so I took a stroll on Tien-Tsin bund.”—Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 28.

BUNDER, s. P. bandar, a landing-place or quay; a seaport; a harbour; (and sometimes also a custom-house). The old Ital. scala, mod. scalco, is the nearest equivalent in most of the senses that occurs to us. We have (c. 1565) the Mir-bandar, or Port Master, in Sind (Elliot, i. 277) [cf. Shabunder]. The Portuguese often wrote the word bandel. Bunder is in S. India the popular native name of Masulipatam, or Machili-bandar.

c. 1344.—“The profit of the treasury, which they call bandar, consists in the right of buying a certain portion of all sorts of cargo at a fixed price, whether the goods be only worth that or more; and this is called the Law of the Bandar.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 120.

c. 1346.—“So we landed at the bandar, which is a large collection of houses on the sea-shore.”—Ibíd., 228.

1552.—“Coga-atar sent word to Affonso d’Albuquerque that on the coast of the main land opposite, at a port which is called Bandar Angon... were arrived two ambassadors of the King of Shiraz.”—Barros, ii. ii. 4.

[1616.—“Besides the danger in intercepting our boats to and from the shore, &c., their firing from the Banda would be with much difficulty.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 328.]

1673.—“We fortify our Houses, have Bunders or Docks for our Vessels, to which belong Yards for Sannen, Soldiers, and Stores.”—Fryer, 115.

1809.—“On the new bunder or pier.”—Maria Graham, 11.

[1847, 1860.—See quotations under APOLLO BUNDER.]

BUNDER-BOAT, s. A boat in use on the Bombay and Madras coast for communicating with ships at anchor, and also much employed by officers of the civil departments (Salt, &c.) in going up and down the coast. It is rigged as Bp. Heber describes, with a cabin amidships.

1825.—“We crossed over... in a stout boat called here a bundur boat. I suppose from ‘bundur’ a harbour, with two masts, and two lateen sails. ...”—Heber, ii. 121, ed. 1844.

BUNDOBUST, s. P. H.—band-o-bast, lit. ‘tying and binding.’ Any system or mode of regulation; discipline; a revenue settlement.

[1768.—“Mr. Rumbold advises us... he proposes making a tour through that province... and to settle the Bundobust for the ensuing year.”—Letter to the Court of Directors, in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 77.]

c. 1843.—“There must be bundat aachhâ bundobast (i.e. very good order or discipline) in your country,” said an aged Khánsmá (in Hindustani) to one of the present writers. “When I have gone to the Sandheads to meet a young gentleman from Bilâyut, if I gave him a cup of tea, ‘tânki tânki,’ said he. Three months afterwards this was all changed; bad language, violence, no more tânki.”

1880.—“There is not a more fearful fowl than our travelling M.P. This unhappy creature, whose mind is a perfect blank regarding Fuvijâdî and Bundobast...”—Ali Baba, 181.

BUNDOOK, s. H. banduk, from Ar. bunduk. The common H. term for a musket or matchlock. The history of the word is very curious. Bunduk, pl. banadâk, was a name applied by the Arabs to filiberts (as some allege) because they came from Venice (Banadik, comp. German Venedig). The name was transferred to the nut-like pellets shot from cross-bows, and thence the cross-bows or arblasts were called bunduk, elliptically for *kaus al-b-, ‘pellet-bow.’ From cross-bows the name was transferred again to firearms, as in the parallel case of arquebus. [Al-Bandukâni, ‘the man of the pellet-bow,’ was one of the names by which the Caliph Hârûn-al-Rashid was known, and Al Zahir Baybars al-Bandukdârî, the fourth Baharite Soldan (a.d. 1260-77) was so entitled because he had been slave to a Bandukdâr, or Master of Artillery (Burton, Ar. Nights, xii. 38).]

[1875.—“Bandâqis, or orderlies of the Maharaja, carrying long guns in a loose red cloth cover.”—Drew, Jummao and Kashmir, 74.]

BUNGALOW, s. H. and Mahr. banglâ. The most usual class of house occupied by Europeans in the interior of India; being on one story, and covered by a pyramidal roof, which in the normal bungalow is of thatch, but may be of tiles without impairing its title to be called a bungalow. Most of the houses of officers in Indian cantonments are of this character. In reference to the style of the house, bungalow is sometimes employed in contradistinction to the (usually more pretentious) puka house; by which latter term is implied a masonry house with a terraced roof. A bungalow may also be a small building of the type which we have described, but of temporary material, in a garden, on a terraced roof for sleeping in, &c., &c. The word has also been adopted by the French in the East, and by Europeans generally in Ceylon, China, Japan, and the coast of Africa.

Wilson writes the word banglâ giving it as a Bengâli word, and as probably derived from Banga, Bengal. This is fundamentally the etymology mentioned by Bp. Heber in his Journal (see below), and that etymology is corroborated by our first quotation, from a native historian, as well as by that from F. Buchanan. It is to be remembered that in Hindustan proper the adjective ‘of or belonging to Bengal’ is constantly pronounced as bangalâ or banglâ. Thus one of the eras used in E. India is distinguished as the Banglâ era. The probability is that, when Europeans began to build houses of this character in Behar and Upper India, these were called Banglâ or 'Bengal-fashion’ houses; that the name was adopted by the Europeans themselves and their followers, and so was brought back to Bengal itself, as well as carried to other parts of India. [*In Bengal, and notably in the districts near Calcutta, native houses to this day are divided into ath-chala, chau-chala, and Bangala, or eight-roofed, four-roofed, and Bengali, or common huts. The first term does not imply that the house has eight coverings, but that the roof has four distinct sides with four more projections, so as to cover a verandah all round the house, which is square. The Bangala, or Bengali house, or bungalow has a sloping roof on two sides and two gable ends. Doubtless the term was taken up by the first settlers in Bengal from the native style of edifice, was materially improved, and was thence carried to other parts of India. It is not necessary to assume that the first bungalows were erected in Behar.* (Saturday Rev., 17th April 1886, in a review of the first ed. of this book.)

A.H. 1041—A.D. 1633.—“Under the rule of the Bengalies (darrad-î-Banglîgiyân) a party of Frank merchants, who are inhabitants of Sundip, came trading to Sâtgâw. One kos above that place they occupied some ground on the banks of the estuary. Under the pretence that a building was necessary for their transactions in buying and selling, they erected several houses in the Bengalî style.”—Bandshâhânâma, in Elliot, vii. 31.

c. 1680.—In the tracing of an old Dutch chart in the India Office, which may be assigned to about this date, as it has no indication of Calcutta, we find at Hoogly: "Oufl . . . Hollantze Logie . . . Bangleaer of Speelhuys", i.e. "Hoogly . . . Dutch Factory . . . Bungallow, or Pleasure-house."—1711.—“Mr. Herring, the Pilot's, Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Huglkey.

“From Gull Gat all along the Hughkey Shore until below the New Chanyon almost as far as the Dutch Bungelow lies a Sand. . . .”—Thurston, The English Pilot, Pt. III. p. 54.

1711.—“Natty Bungelo or Nedds Bangalla River lies in this Reach (Tanna) on the Larboard side. . . .”—Ibid. 56. The place in the chart is Nedds Bengalia, and seems to have been near the present Akra on the Hoogly.

1758.—“I was talking with my friends in Dr. Fullerton's bangla when news came of Ram Narain's being defeated.”—Seir Mutaghierin, II. 103.

BUNGALOW.

1781-83.—"BungalowS are buildings in India, generally raised on a base of brick, one, two, or three feet from the ground, and consist of only one story; the plan of them usually is a large room in the center for eating and sitting room, and rooms at each corner for sleeping; the whole is covered with one general thatch, which comes low to each side; the spaces between the angle rooms are virendars or open porticoes... sometimes the center virendars at each end are converted into rooms."—Hedges, Travels, 146.

1784.—"To be let at Chinsurah... That large and commodious House... The out-buildings are—a warehouse and two large bottle-wonnahs, 6 store-rooms, a cook-room, and a garden, with a bungalow near the house."—Cal. Gazette, in Seton-Kurr, i. 40.

1787.—"At Barrackpore many of the Bungalows much damaged, though none entirely destroyed."—Ibid. p. 213.

1793.—"... the bungalow, or Summer-house..."—D'iron, 211.

"For Sale, a Bungalow situated between the two Tombstones, in the Island of Cowlaba."—Bombay Courier, Jan. 12.

1794.—"The candid critic will not however expect the parched plains of India, or bungalows in the land-winds, will hardly tempt the Aonian maids wou[t to disport on the banks of Tiber and Thames..."—Hugh Boyd, 170.

1809.—"We came to a small bungalow or garden-house, at the point of the hill, from which there is, I think, the finest view I ever saw."—Maria Graham, 10.

c. 1810.—"The style of private edifices that is proper and peculiar to Bengal consists of a hut with a pent roof constructed of two sloping sides which meet in a ridge forming the segment of a circle. This kind of hut, it is said, from being peculiar to Bengal, is called by the natives Banggolo, a name which has been somewhat altered by Europeans, and applied by them to all their buildings in the cottage style, although none of them have the proper shape, and many of them are excellent brick houses."—Buchanan's Dictionary (in Eastern India, ii. 992).

1817.—"The Yor's-bangala is made like two thatched houses or bangalas, placed side by side. These temples are dedicated to different gods, but are not now frequently seen in Bengal."—Ward's Hindoos, Bk. II. ch. i.

c. 1818.—"As soon as the sun is down we will go over to the Captain's bungalow."—Mrs Sherwood, Stories, &c., ed. 1873, p. 1. The original editions of this book contain an engraving of "The Captain's Bungalow at Calcutta" (c. 1811-12), which shows that no material change has occurred in the character of such dwellings down to the present time.

1824.—"The house itself of Barrackpore... barely accommodates Lord Amherst's own family; and his aides-de-camp and visitors sleep in bungalows built at some little distance from it in the Park. Bungalow, a corruption of Bangalee, is the general name in this country for any structure in the cottage style, and only of one floor. Some of these are spacious and comfortable dwellings..."—Heber, ed. 1841, i. 33.

1872.—"L'emplacement du bungalow avait ete choisi avec un soin tout particulier."—Rec. des Deux Mondes, tom., xeviii. 980.

1875.—"The little groups of officers dispersed to their respective bungalows to dress and breakfast."—The Dilemma, ch. i.

In Oudh the name was specially applied to Fyzabad.

[1858.—"Fyzabad... was founded by the first rulers of the reigning family, and called for some time Bungalow, from a bungalow which they built on the verge of the stream."—Stelman, Journey through the Kingdom of Oudh, i. 137.]

BUNGALOW, DAWK, s. A rest-house for the accommodation of travellers, formerly maintained (and still to a reduced extent) by the paternal care of the Government of India. The matériau of the accommodation was humble enough, but comprised the things essential for the weary traveller—shelter, a bed and table, a bathroom, and a servant furnishing food at a very moderate cost. On principal lines of thoroughfare these bungalows were at a distance of 10 to 15 miles apart, so that it was possible for a traveller to make his journey by marches without carrying a tent. On some less frequented roads they were 40 or 50 miles apart, adapted to a night's run in a palankin.

1853.—"Dak-bungalows have been described by some Oriental travellers as the 'Inns of India.' Playful satirists!"—Oxford, ii. 17.

186—"The Dak Bungalow; or, Is his Appointment Pucka?"—By G. O. Trevelyan, in Fraser's Magazine, vol. 73, p. 215.

1878.—"I am inclined to think the value of life to a dak bungalow fowl must be very trifling."—In my Indian Garden, 11.

BUNGY, s. H. bhangi. The name of a low caste, habitually employed as sweepers, and in the lowest menial offices, the man being a house sweeper and dog-boy, [his wife an Ayah]. Its members are found throughout Northern and Western India, and every European household has a servant of this class. The colloquial application of the term bungy to such servants is however peculiar to Bombay, [but the word is commonly used in the N.W.P. but always with a contemptuous significance]. In the Bengal Pry. he is generally called Mehtar (q.v.), and by politer natives Halâlkhor (see HALACORE), &c. In Madras toti (see TOTY) is the usual word; [in W. India Dher or Dhee]. Wilson suggests that the caste name may be derived from bhâng (see BANG), and this is possible enough, as the class is generally given to strong drink and intoxicating drugs.

1826.—"The Kalpa or Skinner, and the Bunghee, or Sweeper, are yet one step below the Dher."—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 302.

BUNOW, s. and v. H. banâ, used in the sense of 'preparation, fabrication,' &c., but properly the imperative of bânâd, 'to make, prepare, fabricate.' The Anglo-Indian word is applied to anything fictitious or factitious, 'a cram, a shave, a sham'; or, as a verb, to the manufacture of the like. The following lines have been found among old papers belonging to an officer who was at the Court of the Nawâb Saâdât 'Ali at Lucknow, at the beginning of the last century:—

"Young Grant and Ford the other day
Would fain have had some Sport,
But Hound nor Beagle none had they,
Nor aught of Canine sort.
A luckless Parry" came most pat
When Ford—'we've Dogs now!'
Here Maitre—'Kern oor Dowm ko Kant Judd! Terrier bunnow!'†

"So Sandut with the like design
(I mean, to form a Pack)
To * * * * t gave a Feather fine
And Red Coat to his Back;
A Persian Sword to clog his side,
And Boots Hussar sub-nagh.‡
Then eyed his Handiwork with Pride, Crying Meejir wyn bunnayah! ! ! ! " §

"Appointed to be said or sung in all Mosques, Mutts, Tuckeas, or Edghals within the Reserved Dominions."||

1853.—"You will see within a week if this is anything more than a banau."—Oakfield, ii. 58.

[1870.—"We shall be satisfied with choosing for illustration, out of many, one kind of benowed or prepared evidence."—Chevers, Med. Jurisprud., 86.]

BURDWÁN, n.p. A town 67 m. N.W. of Calcutta—Bardwán, but in its original Skt. form Vardhamâna, 'thriving, prosperous,' a name which we find in Ptolemy (Bardamana), though in another part of India. Some closer approximation to the ancient form must have been current till the middle of 18th century, for Holwell, writing in 1765, speaks of "Burdwan, the principal town of Burdumâna" (Hist. Events, &c., 1. 112; see also 122, 125).

BURGHER. This word has three distinct applications.

a. s. This is only used in Ceylon. It is the Dutch word burger, 'citizen.' The Dutch-admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these people were distinguished by this name from pure natives. The word now indicates any persons who claim to be of partly European descent, and is used in the same sense as 'half-caste' and 'Eurasian' in India Proper. [In its higher sense it is still used by the Boers of the Transvaal.]

1807.—"The greater part of them were admitted by the Dutch to all the privileges of citizens under the denomination of Burgers."—Cordiner, Desc. of Ceylon.

1877.—"About 60 years ago the Burgers of Ceylon occupied a position similar to that of the Eurasians of India at the present moment."—Calcutta Review, cvvii. 180-1.

b. n.p People of the Nilgherry Hills, properly Badagas, or 'Northerners.'—See under BADEGA.

c. s. A rafter, H. borgâ.

BURKUNDÁUZE, s. An armed retainer; an armed policeman, or other armed unmounted employé of a civil department; from Ar.—P. bark-ândâz, 'lightning-darter,' a word of the same class as ján-biz, &c. [Also see BUXERRY.]

1726.—"2000 men on foot, called Bir-Can-Can, and 2000 pioneers to make the road, called Bieldara (see BILDAR)."—Valentyn, iv. Sertate, 276.

1793.—"Capt. Welsh has succeeded in driving the Bengal Berkendoses out of Assam."—Cornwallis, ii. 207.
1794.—"Notice is hereby given that persons desirous of sending escorts of burkundazes or other armed men, with merchandise, are to apply for passports."—In Seton-Kerr, ii. 139.

[1832.—"The whole line of march is guarded in each procession by burkhandhars (matchlock men), who fire singly, at intervals, on the way."—Mrs Meir Hassan Ali, i. 57.]

BURMA, BURMAH (with BURMESE, &c.) n.p. The name by which we designate the ancient kingdom and nation occupying the central basin of the Irawadi River. "British Burma" is constituted of the provinces conquered from that kingdom in the two wars of 1824-26 and 1852-53, viz. (in the first) Arakan, Martaban, Tenasserim, and (in the second) Pegu. [Upper Burma and the Shan States were annexed after the third war of 1885.]

The name is taken from Mrañ-mā, the national name of the Burmese people, which they themselves generally pronounce Bām-mā, unless when speaking formally and emphatically. Sir Arthur Phayre considers that this name was in all probability adopted by the Mongoloid tribes of the Upper Irawadi, on their conversion to Buddhism by missionaries from Gangetic India, and is identical with that (Bṛdn-mā) by which the first and holy inhabitants of the world are styled in the (Pali) Buddhist Scriptures. Bṛhamadesa was the term applied to the country by a Singhalese monk returning thence to Ceylon, in conversation with one of the present writers. It is however the view of Bp. Bigandet and of Prof. Forchhammer, supported by considerable arguments, that Mrañ, Myan, or Myen was the original name of the Burmese people, and is traceable in the names given to them by their neighbours; e.g. by Chinese Miien (and in Marco Polo); by Kakhyens, Myen or Mren; by Shans, Mān; by Sgaw Karens, Pāyɔ; by Pgaw Karens, Payān; by Paloungs, Pɔrdin, &c.* Prof. F. considers that Mrañ-mā (with this horific suffix) does not date beyond the 14th century. [In J. R. A. Soc. (1894, p. 152 seqq.), Mr. St John suggests that the word Myanma is derived from myan, 'swift,' and ma, 'strong,' and was taken as a sobriquet by the people at some early date, perhaps in the time of Anawrahta, A.D. 1150.]

1516.—"Having passed the Kingdom of Bengale, along the coast which turns to the South, there is another Kingdom of Gentiles, called Berma. . . They frequently are at war with the King of Pegu. We have no further information respecting this country, because it has no shipping."—Barbosa, 181.

1543.—"And folk coming to know of the secrecy with which the force was being despatched, a great desire took possession of all to know whether the Governor intended to send so large an armament, there being no Kumis to go after, and nothing being known of any other cause why ships should be despatched in secret at such a time. So some gentlemen spoke of it to the Governor, and much importuned him to tell them what they were going, and the Governor, all the more bent on concealment of his intentions, told them that the expedition was going to Pegu to fight with the Bramas who had taken that kingdom."—Ibid. iv. 298.

c. 1545.—"Hone the King of Bramā undertook the conquest of this kingdom of Sāo (Siam), and of what happened till his arrival at the City of Oddū."—F. M. Pinto (orig.) cap. 185.

[1553.—"Bramā." See quotation under JĀNGOMAY.]

1606.—"Although one's whole life was wasted in describing the superstitions of these Gentiles—the Pegus and the Bramas—one could not have done with the half, therefore I only treat of some, in passing, as I am now about to do."—Couto, viii. cap. xii.

[1639.—"His (King of Pegu's) Guard consists of a great number of Souldiers, with them called Brahmanes, is kept at the second Port."—Mandelslo, Travels, E. T. ii. 118.]

1680.—"ARTICLES OF COMMERCE to be proposed to the King of Barma and Pegu, in behalf of the English Nation for the settling of a Trade in those countries."—Pt. St. Geo. Cons., in Notes and Exts., iii. 7.

Grande dame." This is a kind of slang word applied in Anglo-Indian society to the lady who claims precedence at a party. [Nowadays Barī Mem is the term applied to the chief lady in a Station.]

BURRAMOOTER. u.p. Properly (Skt.) Brahmaputra ('the son of Brahma'), the great river Brahmpuṭr of which Assam is the valley. Rising within 100 miles of the source of the Ganges, these rivers, after being separated by 17 degrees of longitude, join before entering the sea. There is no distinct recognition of this great river by the ancestors, but the Diardanes or Oidanes, of Curtius and Strabo, described as a large river in the remoter parts of India, abounding in dolphins and crocodiles, probably represents this river under one of its Skt. names, Hādini.
1552.—Barros does not mention the name before us, but the Brahmaputra seems to be the river of Gour, which traversing the kingdom so called (Gour) and that of Comotay, and that of Cirōle (see SILHET), issues above Chatiūgō (see CHITTAGONG), in that notable arm of the Ganges which passes through the island of Sornagam.
c. 1590.—"There is another very large river called Berhumputter, which runs from Khatai to Coach (see COOCH BEHAR) and from thence through Bazoohah to the sea."— Ayeen Aheroey (Gladwin) ed. 1800, ii. 6 ;
[ed. Jarrett, ii. 121.]
1726.—"Out of the same mountains we see . . . a great river flowing which . . .
divides into two branches, whereas the casterly one on account of its size is called the Great Barremootper."—Valentine, v.
154.
1753.—"Un peu au-dessous de Daka, le Gange est joint par une grosse rivière, qui sort de la frontière du Tibet. Le nom de Bramanpoutre qu'on lui trouve dans quelques cartes est une corruption de celui de Brahmaputren, qui dans le langage du pays signifie tirant son origine de Brahma."— D'Avville, Recueilissements, 62.
1767.—"Just before the Ganges falls into ye Bay of Bencool, it receives the Baram-putrey or Assam River. The Assam River

Sea of fresh Water after the Junction of Rennell, d. 10th March.

1793.—". . . till the year 1765, the BurramOOTer, as a capital river, was unknown

I was no less surprised at finding it rather larger than the Ganges, than at its course previous to its entering Bengal. . . . I could no longer doubt that the Burramooter and Sanpo were one and the same river."—

BURREL, s. H. bhurul; Ovis naihura, Hodgson. The blue wild sheep of the Himalaya. [Blanford, Mamm. 499, with illustration.]

BURSAUTEE, s. H. bursāṭi, from borsāṭi, 'the Rains.'

a. The word properly is applied to a disease to which horses are liable in the rains, pustular eruptions breaking out on the head and fore parts of the body.

[1828.—"That very extraordinary disease, the bursattee."—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint, 1873, i. 125.

[1832.—"Horses are subject to an infectious disease, which generally makes its appearance in the rainy season, and therefore called bursattee."—Mrs Meer Hassan Ali, ii. 27.]

b. But the word is also applied to a waterproof cloak, or the like. (See BRANDY COORTEE.)

BUS, adv. P.-H. bas, 'enough.' Used commonly as a kind of interjection: 'Enough! Stop! Ohe jam aatis! Basta, basta!' Few Hindustani words stick closer by the returned Anglo-Indian. The Italian expression, though of obscure etymology, can hardly have any connection with bas. But in use it always feels like a mere expansion of it!

1853.—"And if you pass,' say my dear good-natured friends, 'you may get an appointment. Bus! (you see my Hindustanee knowledge already carries me the length of that emphatic monosyllable). . . ."—Oakfield, 2nd ed. i. 42.

BUSHERIE, n.p. The principal modern Persian seaport on the Persian Gulf; properly Abishahr.

1727.—"Bowchier is also a Maritim Town. . . . It stands on an Island, and has a pretty good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 90.

BUSTEE, s. An inhabited quarter, a village. H. basti, from Skt. vas= 'dwell.' Many years ago a native in Upper India said to a European assistant in the Canal Department: 'You Feringis talk much of your country and its power, but we know that the whole of you come from five villages' (pānc bāsti). The word is applied in Calcutta to the separate groups of huts in the humbler native quarters, the sanitary state of which has often been held up to reprobation.

[1889.—"There is a dreary bustee in the neighbourhood which is said to make the most of any cholera that may be going."—R. Kipling, City of Dreadful Night, 54.]

BUTLER, s. In the Madras and Bombay Presidencies this is the title usually applied to the head-servant of any English or quasi-English household. He generally makes the daily market, has charge of domestic stores, and superintends the table. As his profession is one which affords a large scope for feathering a nest at the expense of a foreign master, it is often followed at Madras by men of comparatively good caste. (See CONSUMAH.)

1616.—"Yosky the butler, being sick, asked a lycense to goe to his house to take phisick."—Cocks, i. 135.

1689.—". . . the Butlers are enjoin'd to take an account of the Place each Night, before they depart home, that they (the Peons) might be examin'd before they stir, if ought be wanting."—Ovington, 393.

1782.—"Wanted a Person to act as Steward or Butler in a Gentleman's House, he must understand Hairdressing."—India Gazette, March 2.

1789.—"No person considers himself as comfortably accommodated without entertaining a Dubash at 4 pagodas per month, a Butler at 3, a Peon at 2, a Cook at 3, a Compradore at 2, and kitchen boy at 1 pagoda."—Manro's Narrative of Operations, p. 27.

1873.—"Glancing round, my eye fell on the pantry department . . . and the butler trimming the reading lamps."—Camp Life in India, Fraser's Mag., June, 696.

1879.—". . . the moment when it occurred to him (i.e. the Nyoung-young Prince of Burma) that he ought really to assume the guise of a Madras butler, and be off to the Residency, was the happiest inspiration of his life."—Standard, July 11.

BUTLER-ENGLISH. The broken English spoken by native servants in the Madras Presidency; which is not very much better than the Pigeon-English of China. It is a singular dialect; the present participle (e.g.) being used for the future indicative, and the preterite indicative being formed by 'done'; thus I telling = 'I will tell'; I done tell = 'I have told'; done come = 'actually arrived.' Peculiar meanings are also attached to words; thus family = ‘wife.’ The oldest characteristic about this jargon is (or was) that masters used it in speaking to their servants as well as servants to their masters.

BUXEE. s. A military paymaster; H. bakhshi. This is a word of complex and curious history.

In origin it is believed to be the Mongol or Turk corruption of the Skt. bhikṣu, ‘a beggar,’ and thence a Buddhist or religious mendicant or member of the ascetic order, bound by his discipline to obtain his daily food by begging.* Bakshī was the word commonly applied by the Tartars of the host of Chingiz and his successors, and after them by the Persian writers of the Mongol era, to the regular Buddhist clergy; and thus the word appears under various forms in the works of medieval European writers from whom examples are quoted below. Many of the class came to Persia and the west with Hulākū and with Bātū Khan; and as the writers in the Tartar camps were probably found chiefly among the bakhshis, the word underwent exactly the same transfer of meaning as our clerk, and came to signify a literatus, scribe or secretary. Thus in the Latino-Perso-Turkish vocabulary, which belonged to Petrarch and is preserved at Venice, the word sersba is rendered in Comorian, i.e. the then Turkish of the Crimea, as Baci. The change of meaning did not stop here.

Abūl-Fazl in his account of Kashmir (in the Aīm, [ed. Jarrett, iii. 212]) recalls the fact that bakhshī was the title given by the learned among Persian and Arabic writers to the Buddhist priests whom the Tibetans styled lamas. But in the time of Baber, say circa 1500, among the Mongols the word had come to mean surgeon; a change analogous again, in some measure, to our colloquial use of doctor. The modern Mongols, according to Pallas, use the word in the sense of ‘Teacher,’ and apply it to the most venerable or learned priest of a community. Among

* In a note with which we were favoured by the late Prof. Anton Schiefner, he expressed doubts whether the Bakshī of the Tibetans and Mongols was not of early introduction through the Uigurs from some other corrupted Sanskrit word, or even of pre-buddhistic derivation from an Iranian source. We do not find the word in Jaeschke’s Tibetan Dictionary.

the Kirghiz Kazzâks, who profess Mahomedanism, it has come to bear the character which Marco Polo more or less associates with it, and means a mere conjurer or medicine-man; whilst in Western Turkestan it signifies a ‘Bard’ or ‘Minstrel’. [Vanbrâily in his Sketches of Central Asia (p. 81) speaks of a Bakhsi as a troubadour.]

By a further transfer of meaning, of which all the steps are not clear, in another direction, under the Moham medan Emperors of India the word bakhshi was applied to an officer high in military administration, whose office is sometimes rendered ‘Master of the Horse’ (of horse, it is to be remembered, the whole substance of the army consisted), but whose duties sometimes, if not habitually, embraced those of Paymaster-General, as well as, in a manner, of Commander-in-Chief, or Chief of the Staff. [Mr. Irvine, who gives a detailed account of the Bakhshi under the latter Moguls (J. R. A. Soc., July 1896, p. 559 seqq.), prefers to call him Adjutant-General.] More properly perhaps this was the position of the Mir Bakshī, who had other bakhshis under him. Bakhshis in military command continued in the armies of the Mahrattas, of Hyder Ali, and of other native powers. But both the Persian spelling and the modern connection of the title with pay indicate a probability that some confusion of association had arisen between the old Tartar title and the P. bakhsh, ‘portion,’ bakhshidan, ‘to give,’ bakhshish, ‘payment.’ In the early days of the Council of Fort William we find the title Buxee applied to a European Civil officer, through whom payments were made (see Long and Seton-Karr, passim). This is obsolete, but the word is still in the Anglo-Indian Army the recognised designation of a Paymaster.

This is the best known existing use of the word. But under some Native Governments it is still the designation of a high officer of state. And according to the Calcutta Glossary it has been used in the N.W.P. for ‘a collector of a house tax’ (†) and the like; in Bengal for ‘a superintendent of peons’; in Mysore for ‘a treasurer,’ &c. [In the N.W.P. the Bakshī, popularly known to natives as Bakshi Tikka, ‘Tax Bakhshi,’ is the person in charge of one of the minor towns which are not under a Municipal Board, but are managed by a Panch, or body of assessors, who raise the income needed for watch and ward and conservancy by means of a graduated house assessment.] See an interesting note on this word in Quatremère, H. des Mongols, 184 seqq.; also see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 61, note.

The last part of the name of this Kutsimiphas, 'the first of the sacred magi,' appears to be Bakhshi; the whole perhaps to be Khoja-Bakhshi, or Kuchin-Bakhshi.

c. 1340.—"The Kings of this country sprung from Jinghiz Khan...followed exactly the yasbah (or laws) of that prince and the dogmas received in his family, which consisted in revering the sun, and conforming in all things to the advice of the Bakhshis."—Shihabaddin, cited in ibid., 237.

1811.—"There appear to have been different descriptions of Bukshies (in Tippoo's service). The Bukshies of Koshoons were a sort of commissaries and paymasters, and were subordinate to the sjadhur, if not to the Resaldar, or commandant of a battalion. The Meer Buktshy, however, took rank of the Sjadhur. The Bukshies of the Eshkham and Jyshe were, I believe, the superior officers of these corps respectively."—Note to Tippo's Letters, 165.

1823.—"In the Mahratta armies the prince is deemed the Sirdar or Commander; next to him is the Bukshyee or Paymaster, who is vested with the principal charge and responsibility, and is considered accountable for all military expenses and disbursements."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 534.

1827.—"Doubt it not—the soldiers of the Beegum Mootoe Mahul...are less hers than mine. I am myself the Bukshy...and her Sirdars are at my devotion."—Waller Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xii.

1831.—"To the best of my memory he was accused of having done his best to urge the people of Dhar to rise against our Government, and several of the witnesses opposed to this effect; amongst them the Bukhni."—Memo. on Dhar, by Major McMullen.
1874.—"Before the depositions were taken down, the gomasta of the planter dwelt aside the Bakshie, who is a police-officer next to the daroga."—Govinda Samanta, ii, 235.

BUXERRY, s. A matchlock man; apparently used in much the same sense as Burkundauze (q.v.) now obsolete. We have not found this term excepting in documents pertaining to the middle decades of 18th century in Bengal; [but see references supplied by Mr. Irvine below:] nor have we found any satisfactory etymology. Buxo is in Port. a gun-barrel (Germ. Bucbe); which suggests some possible word buxiro. There is however none such in Bluteau, who has, on the other hand, "Butyros, an Indian term, artillery-men, &c.," and quotes from Hist. Orient. iii. 7: "Butyeri sunt hi qui quinque tormentis praeficuntur." This does not throw much light. Butijer, 'thunderbolt,' may have given vogue to a word in analogy to P. barkandae, 'lightning-darter,' but we find no such word. As an additional conjecture, however, we may suggest Bakseris, from the possible circumstance that such men were recruited in the country about Baksar (Buxar), i.e. the Shahabad district, which up to 1857 was a great recruiting ground for sepoys. [There can be no doubt that this last suggestion gives the correct origin of the word. Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, i. 471, describes the large number of men who joined the native army from this part of the country.]

1748.—"Ordered the Zemindars to send Buxerries to clear the boats and bring them up as Prisoners."—Pt. William Cons., April, in Long, p. 6.

"We received a letter from ... Council at Cossimbazar ... advising of their having sent Ensign McKion with all the Military that were able to travel, 150 buxerries, 4 field pieces, and a large quantity of ammunition to Cutway."—Ibid. p. 1.

1749.—"Having frequent reports of several straggling parties of this banditti plundering about this place, we on the 2d November ordered the Zemindars to entertain one hundred buxeries and fifty pike-men over and above what were then in pay for the protection of the outskirts of your Honor's town."—Letter to Court, Jan. 13, Ibid. p. 21.

1755.—"Agreed, we despatch Lieutenant John Harding of a command of soldiers 25 Buxaries in order to clear these boats if stopped in their way to this place."—Ibid. 55.

"In an account for this year we find among charges on behalf of William Wallis, Esq., Chief at Cossimbazar:

'4 Buxeries ... 20 (year) ... 240.'"—MS. Records in India Office.

1761.—"The 5th they made their last effort with all the Sepoys and Buxerries they could assemble."—In Long, 254.

"The number of Buxerries or matchlockmen was therefore augmented to 1500."—Orme (reprint), ii. 59.

"In a few minutes they killed 6 buxeries."—Ibid. 65; see also 279.

1772.—"Buckserrias. Foot soldiers whose common arums are only sword and target."—Glossary in Grose's Voyage, 2nd ed. [This is copied, as Mr. Irvine shows, from the Glossary of 1757 prefixed to An Address to the Proprietors of E. I. Stock, in Holwell's Indian Tracts, 3rd ed., 1779.]

1788.—"Buxerries—Foot soldiers, whose common arums are swords and targets or spears."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

1850.—"Another point to which Clive turned his attention ... was the organization of an efficient native regular force. ... Hitherto the native troops employed at Calcutta ... designated Buxerries were nothing more than Burkundae, armed and equipped in the usual native manner."—Broome, Hist. of the Rise and Progress of the Bengal Army, i. 92.

BYDE, or BEDE HORSE, s. A note by Kirkpatrick to the passage below from Tippoo's Letters says Byde Horse are "the same as Pinddraks, Looties, and Kuzzâks" (see PINDARRY, LOOTY, COSSACK). In the Life of Hyder Ali by Hussain 'Ali Khan Kirmâni, tr. by Miles, we read that Hyder's Kuzzaks were under the command of "Ghazi Khan Bede." But whether this leader was so-called from leading the "Bede" Horse, or gave his name to them, does not appear. Miles has the highly intelligent note: 'Bede is another name for (Kuzzak): Kirkpatrick supposed the word Bede meant infantry, which, I believe, it does not' (p. 36). The quotation from the Life of Tippoo seems to indicate that it was the name of a caste. And we find in Sherring's Indian Tribes and Castes, among those of Mysore, mention of the Bedar as a tribe, probably of huntsmen, dark, tall, and warlike. Formerly many were employed as soldiers, and served in Hyder's wars (iii. 153; see also the same tribe in the S. Mahrratta country, ii. 321). Assuming -ar to be a plural sign, we have here probably the "Bedes" which gave their name to these plundering horse. The Bedar are mentioned as one of the predatory classes of the peninsula, along with Marnars, Kallars, Ramūsis (see RAMOOSY), &c., in Sir Walter Elliot's paper (J. Ethnol. Soc., 1869, N.S. pp. 112-13). But more will be found regarding them in a paper by the late Gen. Briggs, the translator of Ferisha's Hist. (J. R. A. Soc. xiii.). Besides Bedar, Bednor (or Nagar) in Mysore seems to take its name from this tribe. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 255.]

1758.—"... The Cavalry of the Rao... received such a defeat from Hydrur's Bedes or Kuzzaks that they fled and never looked behind them until they arrived at Goori Bundar."—Hist. of Hydryr Nail, p. 120.

1755.—"Byde Horse, out of employ, have committed great excesses and depredations in the Sireac's dominions."—Letters of Tipippo Sultan, 6.

1802.—"The Kadir and Chapaoo horse... (Although these are included in the Bede tribe, they carry off the palm even from them in the arts of robbery)."... H. of Tipā, by Hussein' Ali Khan Kirmāni, tr. by Miles, p. 76.

[BYLEE, s. A small two-wheeled vehicle drawn by two oxen. H. bahal, bahli, bāli, which has no connection, as is generally supposed, with bāli, 'an ox'; but is derived from the Skt. vah, 'to carry.' The bylee is used only for passengers, and a larger and more imposing vehicle of the same class is the Rut. There is a good drawing of a Panjab bylee in Kipling's Beast and Man (p. 117); also see the note on the quotation from Forbes under HACKERY.

[1841.—"A native bylee will usually produce, in gold and silver of great purity, ten times the weight of precious metals to be obtained from a general officer's equipage."—Society in India, i. 162.

[1854.—"Most of the party... were in a barouch, but the rich man himself [one of the Muttra Seths] still adheres to the primitive conveyance of a bylis, a thing like a footboard on two wheels, generally drawn by two oxen, but in which he drives a splendid pair of white horses, sitting cross-legged the while!"—Mrs Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, &c., ii. 205.]

s. This word, though of Asiatic origin, was perhaps introduced into India by the Portuguese, whose writers of the 16th century apply it to the surcoat or long tunic of muslin, which is one of the most common native garments of the better classes in India. The word seems to be one of those which the Portuguese had received in older times from the Arabic (kabā, 'a vesture'). From Dozy's remarks this would seem in Barbary to take the form kabāya. Whether from Arabic or from Portuguese, the word has been introduced into the Malay countries, and is in common use in Java for the light cotton surcoat worn by Europeans, both ladies and gentlemen, in dis-habille. The word is not now used in India Proper, unless by the Portuguese. But it has become familiar in Dutch, from its use in Java. [Mr. Gray, in his notes to Pyrrard (i. 379), thinks that the word was introduced before the time of the Portuguese, and remarks that kabaya in Ceylon means a coat or jacket worn by a European or native.]

c. 1540.—"There was in her an Embas-sador who had brought Hidulean [Idalcan] a very rich Cabaya... which he would not accept of, for that thereby he would not acknowledge himself subject to the Turk."—Cogan's Pinto, pp. 10-11.

1552.—"... he ordered him then to bestow a cabaya..."—Quiduchocla, iv. 438. See also Stanley's Correa, 132.

1554.—"And moreover there are given to these Kings (Malabar Rajas) when they come to receive these allowances, to each of them a cabaya of silk, or of scarlet, of 4 cubits, and a cap or two, and two sheath-knives."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 26.

1572.—"Luzem da fina purpura as cabayas, Lustram os pannos da tecida seda."—Canidás, i. 93.

"Cabaya de damasco rico e dino Da Tyria cor, entre elles estimada."—Ibid. 95.

In these two passages Burton translates casفلان.

1585.—"The King is apparelled with a Cabie made like a shirt tied with strings on one side."—R. Fitch, in Hakl., ii. 396.

1598.—"They wear sometimes when they go abroad a thimne cotton linnen gowne called Cabaia..."—Linschoten, 70; [Hak. Soc. i. 247].
c. 1610.—"Cette jaquette ou soutane, qu'il appellent Labasse (P. libas, 'clothing') on Cabaye, est de toile de Cotton fine et blanche, qui leur va jusqu'aux talons."—Pyraud de Lowal, i. 265; [Hak. Soc. i. 372].

[1614.—"The white Cabas which you have with you at Bantam would sell here."—Foster, Letters, ii. 44.]

1645.—"Vne Cabaye qui est vne sorte de vestement comme vne large soutane couverte par le devant, à manches fort larges."

Cardim, Rel. de la Prov. du Japon, 56.

1689.—"It is a distinction between the Moors and Benvians, the Moors tie their Caba's always on the Right side, and the Benvians on the left. . . ."—Ovington, 314. This distinction is still true.

1860.—"I afterwards understood that the dress they were wearing was a sort of native garment, which there in the country they call sarong or kabaai, but I found it very unbecoming."—Mac Herlaer, 43. [There is some mistake here, sarong and Kabaay are quite different.]

1878.—"Over all this is worn (by Malay women) a long loose dressing-gown style of garment called the kabaya. This robe falls to the middle of the leg, and is fastened down the front with circular brooches."—McNair, Perak, &c., 151.

CABOB. s. Ar.-H. kabab. This word is used in Anglo-Indian households generically for roast meat. [It usually follows the name of the dish, e.g. murphli kabab, 'roast fowl!'] But specifically it is applied to the dish described in the quotations from Fryer and Ovington.

c. 1580.—"Altero modo . . . ipsum carnem in parva frustra dissecat, et verteciles ferri acuum modo imfexam, super crates ferres igne supposito positum torrefaciunt, quam succo limonum apersam avidè esitant."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i. 229.

1673.—"CABOB is Rostmeet on Skewers, cut in little round pieces no bigger than a Sixpence, and Ginger and Garlick put between each."—Fryer, 404.

1689.—"CABOB, that is Beef or Mutton cut in small pieces, sprinkled with salt and pepper, and dipt with Oil and Garlick, which have been mixt together in a dish, and then roasted on a Spit, with sweet Herbs put between and stuff in them, and basted with Oil and Garlick all the while."—Ovington, 397.

1814.—"I often partook with my Arabs of a dish common in Arabia called Kabob or Kab-ab, which is meat cut into small pieces and placed on thin skewers, alternately between slices of onion and green ginger, seasoned with pepper, salt, and Kian, fried in ghee, to be ate with rice and dholl."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 480; [2nd ed. ii. 82; in i. 315 he writes Kebabs].

CABOOK. s. This is the Ceylon term for the substance called in India Laterite (q.v.), and in Madras by the native name Moorum (q.v.). The word is perhaps the Port. cabone or cavoco, 'a quarry.' It is not in Singh. Dictionaries. [Mr. Ferguson says that it is a corruption of the Port. pedros de cavoco, 'quarry-stones,' the last word being by a misapprehension applied to the stones themselves. The earliest instance of the use of the word he has met with occurs in the Travels of Dr. Aggidius Daalmans (1867-89), who describes kaphok stone as 'like small pebbles lying in a hard clay, so that if a large square stone is allowed to lie for some time in the water, the clay dissolves and the pebbles fall in a heap together; but if this stone is laid in good mortar, so that the water cannot get at it, it does good service.' (J. As. Soc. Ceylon, x. 162). The word is not in the ordinary Singhalese Dicts., but A. Mendis Gunasekara in his Singhalese Grammar (1891), among words derived from the Port., gives kabuk-gal (cabone), cabook (stone), 'laterite.'] 1894.—"The soil varies in different situations on the Island. In the country round Colombo it consists of a strong red clay, or marl, called Cabook, mixed with sandy ferruginous particles."—Ceylon Gazetteer, 33.

"The houses are built with cabook, and neatly whitewashed with chunam."—Ibid. 75.

1860.—"A peculiarity which is one of the first to strike a stranger who lands at Galle or Colombo is the bright red colour of the streets and roads . . . and the ubiquity of the fine red dust which penetrates every crevice and imparts its own tint to every neglected article. Natives resident in these localities are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence . . . of laterite, or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 17.

This name (Kabul) of the chief city of N. Afghanistan, now so familiar, is perhaps traceable in Ptolemy, who gives in that same region a people called Kaoabara, and a city called Kaboupa. Perhaps, however, one or both may be corromorated by the narios Kasperly of the Periplus. The accent of Kâbul is most distinctly on the first and long syllable, but English mouths are very perverse in error here. Moore accents the last syllable:

"... pomegranates fall
Of melting sweetness, and the pears
And sunniest apples that Câbul
In all its thousand gardens bears."

Light of the Harem.

Mr. Arnold does likewise in Sohrab and Rustam:

"But as a troop of pedlars from Cabool, Cross underneath the Indian Caucasus. . . ."

It was told characteristically of the late Lord Ellenborough that, after his arrival in India, though for months he heard the name correctly spoken by his councillors and his staff, he persisted in calling it Câbôol till he met Dost Mahommed Khan. After the interview the Governor-General announced as a new discovery, from the Amir's pronunciation, that Câbûl was the correct form.

1552.—Barros calls it "a Cidade Cabol, Metropoli dos Mogoles."—IV. vi. 1.

1856.—

"Ah Cabul! word of woe and bitter shame; Where proud old England's flag, dis-honoured, sank Beneath the Crescent; and the butcher knives Beat down like reeds the bayonets that had flashed
From Plassey on to snow-capt Caucasus In triumph through a hundred years of war."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

CACOULI. 139

greater cardamom and smaller cardamom."— Garcia De O., f. 47 c.

1759.—"These Vakeels . . . stated that the Rani (of Bednore) would pay a yearly sum of 100,000 Hoonfs or Pagodas, besides a tribute of other valuable articles, such as Foful (betel), Dates, Sandal-wood, Kakul . . . black pepper, &c."—Hist. of Hyder Naik, 133.

CADDY, s. i.e. tea-caddy. This is possibly, as Crawford suggests, from Catty (q.v.), and may have been originally applied to a small box containing a catty or two of tea. The suggestion is confirmed by this advertisement:

1782.—"By R. Henderson . . . A Quantity of Tea in Quarter Chests and Caddies, imported last season. . . ."—Madras Corr., Dec. 2.

CADET, s. (From Prov. cadet, and Low Lat. capitettem, [dim. of caput, 'head'] Skeat). This word is of course by no means exclusively Anglo-Indian, but it was in exceptionally common and familiar use in India, as all young officers appointed to the Indian army went out to that country as cadets, and were only promoted to ensigns and posted to regiments after their arrival—in olden days sometimes a considerable time after their arrival. In those days there was a building in Fort William known as the 'Cadet Barrack'; and for some time early in last century the cadets after their arrival were sent to a sort of college at Baraset; a system which led to no good, and was speedily abolished.

1763.—"We should very gladly comply with your request for sending you young persons to be brought up as assistants in the Engineering branch, but as we find it extremely difficult to procure such, you will do well to employ any who have a talent that way among the cadets or others."—Court's Letter, in Long, 290.

1789.—"Upon our leaving England, the cadets and writers used the great cabin promiscuously; but finding they were troublesome and quarrelsome, we brought a Bill into the house for their ejectment."—Life of Lord Teignmouth, i. 15.

1781.—"The Cadets of the end of the years 1772 and beginning of 1772 served in the country four years as Cadets and carried the musket all the time."—Letter in Hick's Bengal Gazette, Sept. 29.

CADJAN, s. Jay. and Malay kâjâng, [or according to Mr. Skeat, 'kajang'], meaning 'palm-leaves,' especially those of the Nipa (q.v.) palm, dressed for thatching or matting. Favre's Dict. renders the word feuilles entrelaccées. It has been introduced by foreigners into S. and W. India, where it is used in two senses:

a. Coco-palm leaves, made, the common substitute for thatch in S. India.

1673.—"... flags especially in their Villages (by them called Cajans, being Coco-tree branches) upheld with some few sticks, supplying both Sides and Coverings to their Cottages."—Fryer, 17. In his Explanatory Index Fryer gives 'Cajan, a bough of a Toddy-tree.'

c. 1680.—"Ex siss (foliis) quoque radii mattae, Cadjang vocatae, conficuntur, qui- bus aedem muri et navium orae, quum frumentum aliquod in eius deponere velitum, obteguntur."—Ramphius, i. 71.

1727.—"We travelled 8 or 10 miles before we came to his (the Cananore Raja's) Palace, which was built with Twigs, and covered with Cadjans or Cocoa-nut Tree Leaves woven together."—A. Hamilton, i: 296.

1809.—"The lower classes (at Bombay) content themselves with small huts, mostly of clay, and roofed with cadjan."—Maria Graham, 4.

1880.—"Houses are timbered with its wood, and roofed with its plaited fronds, which under the name of cadjans, are likewise employed for constructing partitions and fences."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 126.

b. A strip of fan-leaf palm, i.e. either of the Talipot (q.v.) or of the Palmaya, prepared for writing on; and so a document written on such a strip. (See OLLAH.)

1716.—"The President acquaints the Board that he has intercepted a villainous letter or Cajan."—Ibid. ii. 231.

1839.—"At Rajahmundry... the people used to sit in our reading room for hours, copying our books on their own little cadjan leaves."—Letters from Madras, 275.

CADJOWA, s. [P. kajdawah]. A kind of frame or pannier, of which a pair are slung across a camel, sometimes made like litters to carry women or sick persons, sometimes to contain sundries of camp equipage.

1645.—"He entered the town with 8 or 10 camels, the two Cajayas or Litters on each side of the Camel being close shut... But instead of Women, he had put into every Cajava two Souldiers."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 61; [ed. Bull, i. 144].

1790.—"The camel appropriated to the accommodation of passengers, carries two persons, who are lodged in a kind of pannier, laid loosely on the back of the animal. This pannier, termed in the Persic Kidjahwah, is a wooden frame, with the sides and bottom of netted cords, of about 3 feet long and 2 broad, and in depth... the journey being usually made in the night-time, it becomes the only place of his rest... Had I been even much accustomed to this manner of travelling, it must have been irksome; but a total want of practice made it excessively grievous."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 104-5.

CAEL, n.p. Properly Kāyūl [Tam. kāyu, 'to be hot'], 'a lagoon' or 'back-water.' Once a famous port near the extreme south of India at the mouth of the Tamraparni R., in the Gulf of Mannar, and on the coast of Tinnevelly, now long abandoned. Two or three miles higher up the river lies the site of Korkai or Kolka, the Kółοκο ᵁγίνορας of the Greeks, each port in succession having been destroyed by the retirement of the sea. Tutikorin, six miles N., may be considered the modern and humbler representative of those ancient marts; [see Stuart, Man. of Tinnevelly, 38 seq.]

1298.—"Cail is a great and noble city. ... It is at this city that all the ships touch that come from the west."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 21.

1442.—"The Coast, which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as Kabel (read Kāyel) a place situated opposite the Island of Serendib. ..."—Abdurrurrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent., 19.

1444.—"Ultra eas urbs est Cahila, qui locus margaritas ... producit."—Conti, in Poggiana, De Var. Portuariae.

1514.—"Passando oltre al Cavo Comedi (C. Comorin), sono gentili; e intra esso e Gael à dove si pesca le perle."—Giov. da Empoli, 79.

1516.—"Further along the coast is a city called Cael, which also belongs to the King of Coulam, peopled by Moors and Gentoos, great traders. It has a good harbour, whither come many ships of Malabar; others of Charamandel and Bengalua."—Barbosa, in Lisbon Coll., 357-8.

CAFFER, CAFFRE, COFFREE, &c., n.p. The word is properly the Ar. Kāfīr, pl. Kofra, 'an infidel, an unbeliever in Islam.' As the Arabs applied this to pagan negroes, among others, the Portuguese at an early date took it up in this sense, and our countrymen from them. A further appropriation in one direction has since made the name specifically that of the black tribes of South Africa, whom we now call, or till recently did call, Caffres. It was also applied in the Philippine Islands to the Papuas of N. Guinea, and the Alfuras of the Moluccas, brought into the slave-market.

In another direction the word has become a quasi-proper name of the (more or less) fair, and non-Mahommedan, tribes of Hindu-Kush, sometimes called more specifically the Siāh-posh or 'black-robed' Caffirs.

The term is often applied malevolently by Mahommedans to Christians, and this is probably the origin of the mistake pervading some of the early Portuguese narratives, especially the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, which described many of the Hindu and Indo-Chinese States as being Christian.*

[c. 1300.—"Kāfīr." See under LACK.]

c. 1404.—Of a people near China: 'They were Christians after the manner of those of Cathay.'—Clavijo by Markham, 141.

'And of India: 'The people of India are Christians, the Lord and most part of the people, after the manner of the Greeks; and amongst them also are other Christians who mark themselves with fire in the face, and their creed is different from that of the others; for those who thus mark themselves with fire are less esteemed than the others. And among them are Moors and Jews, but which are subject to the Christians.'—Clavijo, (orig.) § 221; comp. Markham, 153-4. Here we have (1) the confusion of Caffer and Christian; and (2) the confusion of Abyssynia (India Tertia or Middle India of some medieval writers) with India Proper.

c. 1470.—"The sea is infested with pirates, all of whom are Kofars, neither Christians nor Mussulmans: they pray to stone idols, and know not Christ."—Al Wan, Nīkīn, in India in the Xth Cent., p. 11.

1562.—"... he learned that the whole people of the Island of S. Lourenço ... were black Caffres with curly hair like those of Mozambique."—Barros, II. i. 1.

1563.—"In the year 1484 there came to Portugal the King of Benin, a Caffre by nation, and he became a Christian."—Stanley's Correa p. 8.

1572.—"Verão os Caffres asperos e avaros Tirar a linda dama seus vestidos."—Comões, v. 47.

By Burton:

"shall see the Caffres, greedy race and fierce" "strip the fair Ladye of her raiment torn."—[ed. Constable, p. 7].

1582.—"These men are called Caffres and are Gentiles."—Castaneda (by N.L.), f. 42b.

c. 1610.—"It estoit fils d'en Caffre d'Ethiopie, et d'en femme de ces isles, ce qu'on appelle Mulastro."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 220; [Hak. Soc. i. 307].

[c. 1610.—"... a Christian whom they call Caparou."—Ibid., Hak. Soc. i. 261.]

1614.—"That knave Simon the Caffro, not what the writer took him for—he is a knave, and better lost than found."—Snell, i. 356.

1653.—"... toy mesme qui passo pour vn Kifre, ou homme sans Dieu, parmi les Musulmans."—De la Boulaye-le-Gov, 310 (ed. 1657).

c. 1665.—"It will appear in the sequel of this History, that the pretence used by Aurenge-Zobe, his third Brother, to cut off his (Dara's) head, was that he was turned Kafer, that is to say, an Infidel, of no Religion, an Idolater."—Bernier, E. T. p. 3; [ed. Constable, p. 7].

1673.—"They show their Greatness by their number of Sumbreeros and Costeries, whereby it is dangerous to walk late."—Fryer, 74.

"Beggars of the Muslemmen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good Clothes ... are presently upon their Panctillos with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go afoot and in Rags, and this Coffery (Unbeliever) to vaunt it thus!"—Ibid. 91.

1678.—"The Justices of the Chouly try to turn Padry Pasquall, a Papish Priest, out of town, not to return again, and if it proves to be true that he attempted to seduce Mr. Mobun's Coffre Franch from the Protestant religion."—Pl. St. Geo. Cons. in Notes and Quot., Pt. i. p. 72.

1759.—"Blacks, whites, Coffries, and even the natives of the country (Pogni) have not been exempted, but all universally have been subject to intermittent Fevers and Fluxes" (at Negrais).—In Dalrymple, Dr. Rep. i. 124.

"Among expenses of the Council at Calcutta in entertaining the Nabob we find "Purchasing a Coffre boy, Rs. 500."—In Long. 194.

1781.—"To be sold by Private Sale. —Two Coffree Boys, who can play remarkably well on the French Horn, about 18 Years of Age: belonging to a Portuguese Paddrie lately deceased. For particulars apply to the Vicar of the Portuguese Church, Calcutta, March 17th, 1781."—The India Gazette or Public Advertiser, No. 19.

1781.—"Run away from his Master, a good-looking Coffree Boy, about 20 years old, and about 6 feet 7 inches in height. . . . When he went off he had a high toupee."—Ibid. Dec. 29.

1782.—"On Tuesday next will be sold three Coffree Boys, two of whom play the French Horn . . . a three-wheel'd Buggy, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, June 15.

1799.—"He (Tipoo) had given himself out as a Champion of the Faith, who was to drive the English Caffers out of India."—Letter in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 221.

1800.—"The Caffre slaves, who had been introduced for the purpose of cultivating the lands, rose upon their masters, and seizing on the boats belonging to the island, effected their escape."—Symes, Embassy to Aea, p. 10.

c. 1866.—
"And if I were forty years younger, and my life before me to choose, I wouldn't be lectured by Kafirs, or swindled by fat Hindoes."
Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

CAFILA, s. Arab. k'affila; a body or convoy of travellers, a Caravan (q.v.). Also used in some of the following quotations for a sea convoy.

1552.—"Those roads of which we speak are the general routes of the Cafflas, which are sometimes of 3,000 or 4,000 men . . . for the country is very perilous because of both hill-people and plain-people, who haunt the roads to rob travellers."—Darroz, IV. vi. 1.

1596.—"The ships of Chatta (see CHETTY) of these parts are not to sail along the coast of Malavar or to the north except in a caffila, that they may come and go more securely, and not be cut off by the Malavars and other corsairs."—Proclamation of Goa Viceroy, in Archæ. Port. Or., fasc. iii. 661.

1623.—"Non navigammo di notte, perchè la caffila era molto grande, al mio parere di più di duecento vaselli."—P. della Valle, ii. 387; [and comp. Hak. Soc. i. 18.]

1630.—". . . some of the Raiahs . . . making outvoydes on the Caffaloes passing by the Way. . . ."—Lord, Banian's Religion, 81.

1672.—"Several times yearly numerous cafflas of merchant barques, collected in the Portuguese towns, traverse this channel (the Gulf of Cambay), and these always await the greater security of the full moon. It is also observed that the vessels which go through with this voyage should not be joined and fastened with iron, for so great is the abundance of loadstone in the bottom, that indubitably such vessels go to pieces and break up."—P. Vincenzo, 108. A curious survival of the old legend of the Loadstone Rocks.

1673.—". . . Time enough before the Caphalas out of the Country come with their Wares."—Fryer, 86.

1727.—"In Anno 1699, a pretty rich Caffila was robbed by a Band of 4 or 5000 villains . . . which struck Terror on all that had commerce at Tatta."—A. Hamilton, i. 116.

1867.—"It was a curious sight to see, as was seen in those days, a carriage enter one of the northern gates of Palermo preceded and followed by a large convoy of armed and mounted travellers, a kind of Kafila, that would have been more in place in the opening chapters of one of James's romances than in the latter half of the 19th century."
Quarterly Review, Jan., 101-2.

CAFIRISTAN, n.p. P. Kafiristan, the country of Kafirs, i.e. of the pagan tribes of the Hindu Kush noticed in the article Caffer.

C. 1514.—"In Cheghânsurâ there are neither grapes nor vineyards; but they bring the vines down the river from Kâfiristan . . . So prevalent is the use of wine among them that every Kafar has a kâyâg, or leathern bottle of wine about his neck; they drink wine instead of water."—Abulob, of Baber, p. 144.

[c. 1590.—The Kâfîrs in the Tâmâns of Alihang and Najrâo are mentioned in the Ain, tr. Jarrett, ii. 406.]

1603.—". . . they fell in with a certain pilgrim and devotee, from whom they learned that at a distance of 30 days' journey there was a city called Capperstam, into which no Mahomedan was allowed to enter . . ."—Journal of Bened. Goës, in Caliâg, &c. ii. 554.

CAIMAL, s. A Nair chief; a word often occurring in the old Portuguese historians. It is Malayāl. kāimal.

1504.—"So they consulted with the Zamorin, and the Moors offered their agency to send and poison the wells at Cochín, so as to kill all the Portuguese, and also to send Naers in disguise to kill any of our people that they found in the palm-woods, and away from the town . . . And meanwhile the Mangate Caimal, and the Caimal of Frimbalam, and the Caimal of Diamper, seeing that the Zamorin's affairs were going
The chief of these trees is Melaleuca lanceolatum, L., a tree diffused from the Malay Peninsula to N.S. Wales. The drug and tree were first described by Rumphius, who died 1693. (See Hanbury and Flückiger, 247 [and Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1890, p. 294]).

from bad to worse, and that the castles which the Italians were making were all wind and nonsense, that it was already August when ships might be arriving from Portugal . . . departed to their own estates with a multitude of their followers, and sent to the King of Cochinn their ollas of allegiance."—Correa, t. 482.

1566.—" . . . certain lords bearing title, whom they call Caimals (vainards).—Donnan de Góes, Chron. del Rei Dom Emmanuel, p. 49.

1606.—"The Malabars give the name of Caimals (Caimães) to certain great lords of vassals, who are with their governments haughty as kings; but most of them have Confederation and alliance with some of the great kings, whom they stand bound to aid and defend . . ."—Gouvea, f. 27v.

1634.—

"Picário seus Caimais prezos e mortos."

Malaca Conquistada, v. 10.

CAIQUE. s. The small skiff used at Constantinople, Turkish káik. Is it by accident, or by a radical connection through Turkish tribes on the Arctic shores of Siberia, that the Greenlander's kajak is so closely identical? [The Stanf. Dict. says that the latter word is Esquimaux, and recognises no connection with the former.]

CAJAN, s. This is a name given by Sprengel (Cajanus indicus), and by Linnaeus (Cajanus cajan), to the leguminous shrub which gives dhall (q.v.). A kindred plant has been called Dolichos cotijang, Willdenow. We do not know the origin of this name. The Cajan was introduced to America by the slave-traders from Africa. De Candolle finds it impossible to say whether its native region is India or Africa. (See DHALL, CALAVANCE.) [According to Mr. Skeat the word is Malay, *poko*kuchang, 'the plant which gives beans,' quite a different word from kajang which gives us Cadjan.]

CAJEPUT, s. The name of a fragrant essential oil produced especially in Celebes and the neighbouring island of Bouro. A large quantity is exported from Singapore and Batavia. It is used most frequently as an external application, but also internally, especially (of late) in cases of cholera. The name is taken from the Malay kajang-puth, i.e. Lignum album. Filet (see p. 140) gives six different trees as producing the oil, which is derived from the distillation of the leaves.

CALALUZ, s. A kind of swift rowing vessel often mentioned by the Portuguese writers as used in the Indian Archipelago. We do not know the etymology, nor the exact character of the craft. [According to Mr. Skeat, the word is Jav. kelalus, kalalus, spelt kelofoes by Klinkert, and explained by him as a kind of vessel. The word seems to be derived from loeloos, 'to go right through anything,' and thus the literal translation would be 'the threader,' the reference being, as in the case of most Malay boat names, to the special figure-head from which the boat was supposed to derive its whole character.]

1525.—"4 great lancharas, and 6 calaluzes, and manoches which row very fast."—Lembrana, 8.

1539.—"The King (of Achin) set forward with the greatest possible despatch, a great armament of 200 rowing vessels, of which the greater part were lancharas, joognas, and calaluzes, besides 15 high-sided junks."—F. M. Pinto, cap. xxxii.

1552.—"The King of Siam . . . ordered to be built a fleet of some 200 sail, almost all lancharas and calaluzes, which are rowing-vessels."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1613.—"And having embarked with some companions in a caloluz or rowing vessel . . ."—Godoaho de Eredia, f. 51.

CALAMANDER WOOD, s. A beautiful kind of rose-wood got from a Ceylon tree (Diospyros quaesita). Tennant regards the name as a Dutch corruption of Coromandel wood (i. 118), and Drury, we see, calls one of the ebony-trees (D. melanoxylon) "Coromandel-ebony." Forbes Watson gives as Singhalese names of the wood Kalumadiriya, Kalumediriya, &c., and the term Kalumadiriya is given with this meaning in Clough's Singh. Dict.; still in absence of further information, it may remain doubtful if this be not a borrowed word. It may be worth while to observe that, according to Tavernier, [ed. Ball, ii. 4] the “painted calicoes” or “chites” of Masulipatam were called “Calmandar, that is to say, done with a pencil” (Kalam-dar ?), and possibly this appellation may have been given by traders to a delicately veined wood. [The N.E.D. suggests that the Singh, terms quoted above may be adaptations from the Dutch.]

1777.—“In the Cingalesee language Calamander is said to signify a black flaming tree. The heart, or woody part of it, is extremely handsome, with whitish or pale yellow and black or brown veins, streaks and waves.”—Thurnberg, iv. 205-6.

1818.—“Calamander wood” appears among Ceylon products in Millburn, i. 345.

1825.—“A great deal of the furniture in Ceylon is made of ebony, as well as of the Calamander tree. . . . which is become scarce from the improvident use formerly made of it.”—Heber (1844), ii. 161.

1834.—“The forests in the neighbourhood afford timber of every kind (Calamander excepted).”—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 198.

CALAMBAC, s. The finest kind of aloes-wood. Crawford gives the word as Javanese, kalambak, but it perhaps came with the article from Champa (q.v.).

1510.—“There are three sorts of aloes-wood. The first and most perfect sort is called Calampat.”—Varthema, 235.

1516.—“. . . It must be said that the very fine calembuco and the other eagle-wood is worth at Calcut 1000 maravedis the pound.”—Barbosa, 204.

1589.—“This Ambassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of the Batas . . . brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aloe, Calambas, and 5 quintals of Benjamone in flowers.”—F. M. Pinto, in Cogan’s tr. p. 15 (orig. cap. xiii.).

1551.—(Campar, in Sumatra) “has nothing but forests which yield aloeswood, called in India Caalambuco.”—Castanheda, bk. iii. cap. 68, p. 218, quoted by Crawford, Des. Dice. 7.

1552.—“Past this kingdom of Camboja begins the other Kingdom called Campa (Champa), in the mountains of which grows the genuine aloes-wood, which the Moors of those parts call Calambuc.”—Barros, I. ix. 1.

[c. 1590.—“Kalanbak (calembic) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbad; it is heavy and full of veins. Some believe it to be the raw wood of aloes.”—Ais, ed. Blochmann, i. 51.

[c. 1610.—“From this river (the Ganges) comes that excellent wood Calamba, which is believed to come from the Earthly Paradise.”—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 335.]

1613.—“And the Calamba is the most fragrant medulla of the said tree.”—Godin de Callava, f. 15v.

1615.—“Lamura (a black gum), gumlack, collomback.”—Foster, Letters, iv. 37.

1618.—“We opened the ij chites which came from Syam with callambac and silk, and said it out.”—Cocks’s Diary, ii. 51.

1774.—“Les Mahometans font de ce Kalambac des chapelets qu’ils portent à la main par amusement. Ce bois quand il est échauffé ou un peu frotté, rend un odeur agréable.”—Niebuhr, Des. de l’Arabie, 127.

See EAGLE-WOOD and ALOES.

CALASH, s. French calèche, said by Littre to be a Slav word, [and so N.E.D.]. In Bayly’s Dict. it is calâs and calâche. [The N.E.D. does not recognise the latter form; the former is as early as 1679]. This seems to have been the earliest precursor of the buggy in Eastern settlements. Bayly defines it as ‘a small open chariot.’ The quotation below refers to Batavia, and the President in question was the Prest. of the English Factory at Chusan, who, with his council, had been expelled from China, and was halting at Batavia on his way to India.

1702.—“The Shabander riding home in his Calash this Morning, and seeing the President sitting without the door at his Lodgings, alighted and came and Sat with the President near an hour . . . what moved the Shabander to speak so plainly to the President thereof he knew not. But observed that the Shabander was in his Glasses at his first alighting from his Calash.”—Procgs. “Munday, 30th March,” MS. Report in India Office.

CALAVANCE, s. A kind of bean; acc. to the quotation from Osbeck, Dolichos sinensis. The word was once common in English use, but seems forgotten, unless still used at sea. Sir Joseph Hooker writes: “When I was in the Navy, haricot beans were in constant use as a substitute for potatoes and in Brazil and elsewhere, we called Calavances. I do not remember whether they were the seed of Phasolus lunatus or vulgaris, or of Dolichos sinensis, alias Catjang” (see CAJAN). The word comes from the Span. garbanzos, which de Candolle mentions as Castilian for ‘pois chiche,’ or Cicor arrietinum, and as used also in Basque under the form garbantza,

1629.—"... from hence they make their provision in abundance, viz., beef and pork... garvances, or small leuze or beans..."—Cock's Diary, ii. 311.

c. 1630.—"... in their Canoons brought us... green pepper, caravance, Buffols, Hens, Eggs, and other things."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 350.

1719.—"I was forc'd to give them an extraordinary meal every day, either of Furina or calavances, which at once made a considerable consumption of our water and firing."—Sir W. Esher, Voyage, 62.

1738.—"But garvanzco are prepared in a different manner, neither do they grow soft like other pulse, by boiling. ..."—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 140.

1752.—"... Calvances (Dolichos sinensis)."—Osbeck, i. 304.

1774.—"When I asked any of the men of Doray why they had no gardens of plantains and Kalavansas... I learnt... that the Harmonas supply them."—Forrest, V. to N. Greece, 109.

1814.—"His Majesty is authorised to permit for a limited time by Order in Council, the Importation from any Port or Place whatever of... any Beans called Kidney. French Beans, Tares, Lentiles, Cailivances, and all other sorts of Pulse."—Act 54 Geo. III. cap. xxxvi.

CALAY, s. Tin; also v., to tin copper vessels—H. ḫalaʾi carnā. The word is Ar. ḫalaʾi, 'tin,' which according to certain Arabic writers was so called from a mine in India called ḫalaʾ. In spite of the different initial and terminal letters, it seems at least possible that the place meant was the same that the old Arab geographers called Kalah, near which they place mines of tin (al-ḵalaʾi), and which was certainly somewhere about the coast of Malacca, possibly, as has been suggested, at Kalah* or as we write it, Quedda. [See A.Im, tr. Jarrett, iii 48.]

The tin produce of that region is well known. Kalgang is indeed also a name of tin in Malay, which may have been the true origin of the word before us. It may be added that the small State of Salangor between Malacca and Perak was formerly known as Nagri-Kalang, or the 'Tin Country,' and that the place on the coast where the British Resident lives is called Klang (see Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 210, 215). The Portuguese have the forms calaim and calin, with the nasal termination so frequent in their Eastern borrowings. Bluteau explains calaim as 'Tin of India, finer than ours.' The old writers seem to have hesitated about the identity with tin, and the word is confounded in one quotation below with Tootnague (q.v.). The French use calin. In the P. version of the Book of Numbers (ch. xxxi. v. 22) kalâʾ is used for 'tin.' See on this word Quaternère in the Journal des Savans, Dec. 1846.

c. 920.—"Kalah is the focus of the trade in aloeswood, in camphor, in sandalwood, in ivory, in the lead which is called al-Kalaʾi."—Relation des Voyages, &c., i. 94.

1154.—"Thence to the Isles of Lanki-lish is reckoned two days, and from the latter to the Island of Kalah 5... There is in this last island an abundant mine of tin (al-Kalaʾi). The metal is very pure and brilliant."—Edrisi, by Jambert, i. 80.

1552.—"... Tin, which the people of the country call Calem."—Costancheda, iii. 213. It is mentioned as a staple of Malacca in ii. 186.

1606.—"That all the chalices which were neither of gold, nor silver, nor of tin, nor of calaim, should be broken up and destroyed."—Gouvea, Synopsis, f. 296.

1610.—"... They carry (to Hormuz)... clove, cinnamon, pepper, cardamom, ginger, mace, nutmeg, sugar, calayn, or tin."—Relaciones de P. Teixeira, 382.

c. 1610.—"... money... not only of gold and silver, but also of another metal, which is called calin, which is white like tin, but harder, purer, and finer, and which is much used in the Indies."—Pyrrad de Laval (1679) i. 164; [Hak. Soc. i. 294, with Gray's note.]

1613.—"And he also reconnoitred all the sites of mines, of gold, silver, mercury, tin or calen, and iron and other metals..."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 58.

[1644.—"Callaym." See quotation under TOOTNAGUE.]

1726.—"The goods exported hither (from Pegu) are... Kalin (a metal coming very near silver)..."—l'alentain, v. 128.

1770.—"They send only one vessel (viz. the Dutch to Siam) which transports javanese horses, and is freighted with sugar, spices, and linen; for which they receive in return callin, at 70 livres 100' weight."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 208.

1780.—"... the port of Quedh; there is a trade for calin or tunegane..."
export to different parts of the Indies."—In Dunn, N. Directory, 308.

1794—In the Travels to China of the younger Deguignes, Calin is mentioned as a kind of tin imported into China from Batavia and Malacca.—iii. 367.

CALCUTTA, n.p. B. Kalikattu, or Kalikattā, a name of uncertain etymology. The first mention that we are aware of occurs in the Ain-i-Akbari. It is well to note that in some early charts, such as that in Valentijn, and the oldest in the English Pilot, though Calcutta is not entered, there is a place on the Hoogly, Calculta, or Calcuta, which leads to mistake. It is far below, near the modern Fulta. [With reference to the quotations below from Luillier and Sonnerat, Sir H. Yule writes (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xcvi.): "In Orme's Historical Fragments, Job Charnock is described as 'Governor of the Factory at Golgot near Hughley.' This name Golgot and the corresponding Golghat in an extract from Muhalbat Khan indicate the name of the particular locality where the English Factory at Hugli was situated. And some confusion of this name with that of Calcutta may have led to the curious error of the Frenchman Luillier and Sonnerat, the former of whom calls Calcutta Golgouthe, while the latter says: 'Les Anglais prononcent et écrivent Golgota.']

c. 1500.—"Kalikāta va Bakōya va Barbakpār, 3 Mahal."—Āín. (orig.) i. 408; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 141].

[1688.—"Soe myself accompanied with Capt. Haddock and the 120 soldiers we carried from hence embarked, and about the 20th September arrived at Calcutta."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxxix.]

1698.—"This avaricious disposition the English plied with presents, which in 1698 obtained his permission to purchase from the Zemindar . . . the towns of Sootanutty, Calcutta, and Goomopore, with their districts extending about 3 miles along the eastern bank of the river."—Orme, repr. ii. 71.

1702.—"The next Morning we pass'd by the English Factory belonging to the old Company, which they call Golgotha, and is a handsome Building, to which we adding stately Warehouses."—Voyage to the E. Indies, by Le Steur Luillier, E. T. 1715, p. 259.

1726.—"The ships which sail thither (to Hugli) first pass by the English Lodge in Collecuta, 9 miles (Dutch miles) lower down than ours, and after that the French one called Chandarnagor. . . .'—Valentijn, v. 162.

1727.—"The Company has a pretty good Hospital at Calcutta, where many go in to undergo the Penance of Physic, but few come out to give an Account of its Operation. . . . One Year I was there, and there were reckoned in August about 1200 English, some Military, some Servants to the Company, some private Merchants residing in the Town, and some Seamen belong to Shipping lying at the Town, and before the beginning of January there were 460 Burials registered in the Clerk's Books of Mortality."—A. Hamilton, ii. 9 and 6.

c. 1742.—"I had occasion to stop at the city of Firâshdâng (Chandernagore) which is inhabited by a tribe of Frenchmen. The city of Calcutta, which is on the other side of the water, and inhabited by a tribe of English who have settled there, is much more extensive and thickly populated. . . ."—Abdel Karim Khan, in Edib, viii. 127.

CALEEBA. s. Ar. Khalīfīa, the Caliph or Vice-gerent, a word which we do not introduce here in its high Mahomedan use, but because of its quaint application in Anglo-Indian households, at least in Upper India, to two classes of domestic servants, the tailor and the cook, and sometimes to the barber and farrier. The first is always so addressed by his fellow-servants (Khalīfī-jī). In South India the cook is called Maistry, i.e. artiste. In Sicily, we may note, he is always called Monsie! (1) an indication of what ought to be his nationality. The root of the word Khalīfīa, according to Prof. Sayce, means 'to change,' and another 1812.—"Like Iris' bow down darts the painted clue, Starred, striped, and spotted, yellow, red, and blue, Old calico, torn silk, and muslin new."—*Rejected Addresses (Crabbé)."

CALICUT, n.p. In the Middle Ages the chief city, and one of the chief ports of Malabar, and the residence of the Zamorin (q.v.). The name Calkadoon is said to mean the 'Cock-Fortress.' [Logan (Man. Malabar, i. 241 note) gives kolt, 'fowl,' and kotta, 'corner or empty space,' or kotta, 'a fort.' There was a legend, of the Dido type, that all the space within cock-crow was once granted to the Zamorin.]

c. 1343.—"We proceeded from Pandaraina to Kalikett, one of the chief ports of Mulibar. The people of Chin, of Java, of Soulin, of Mahal (Maldives), of Yemen, and Fàrs frequent it, and the traders of different regions meet there. This port is among the greatest in the world."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 59.

c. 1430.—"Calicuthiam deinceps petit, urben martimam, octo millibus passum ambitu, nobile totius Indiae emporium, pipere, laca, gingibere, cinnamomo crasisio,* kebulis, zedoaria fertilia."—Conti, in Peggyg, De Var. Fortuanae.

1616.—"Of that wool they make divers sorts of Calico, which had that name (as I suppose) from Calicuts, not far from Goa, where that kind of cloth was first bought by the Portuguese."—Terry, in Purchas. [In ed. 1777, p. 105, Calicute.]

CALINGULA, s. A sluice or escape. Tam. kalingal; much used in reports of irrigation works in S. India.

[1883.—"Much has been done in the way of providing sluices for minor channels of supply, and calingulahs, or water weirs for surplus vents."—Venkusami Row, Man. of Tanjore, p. 332.]

CALPUTTEE, s. A caulk; also the process of caulkling; H. and Beng. kalôppati and kálôppáti, and these no doubt from the Port. câlafate. But this again is oriental in origin, from the Arabic kâlfât, the 'process of caulkling.' It is true that Dozy (see p. 376) and also Jal (see his Index, ii. 589) doubt the last derivation, and are disposed to connect the Portuguese and Spanish words, and the Italian calafattare, &c., with the Latin calafacere, a view which M. Marcel Devic rejects. The latter word would apply well enough to the process of pitching a vessel as practised in the Mediterranean, where we have seen the vessel careened over, and a great fire of thorns kindled under it to keep the pitch fluid. But caulkling is not pitching; and when both form and meaning correspond so exactly, and when we know so many other marine terms in the Mediterranean to have been taken from the Arabic, there does not seem to be room for reasonable doubt in this case. The Emperor Michael V. (A.D. 1041) was called καλαφάτης, because he was the son of a caulker (see Ducange, Gloss. Graec., who quotes Ζωραῖος).

* Not a larger kind of cinnamom,* or 'cinnamon which is known there by the name of croaza (canella qua grosse appellatur), as Mr. Winter Jones oddly renders, but canella grossa, i.e. 'coarse' cinnamon, alias cassia.

1510. — “The said wood is fixed in the middle of the back of the malefactor, and passes through his body . . . this torture is called ‘uncalvet.’” — Varthema, 147.

1582. — “The Capitaine General for to encourage them the more, commanded before them all to pitch a long staffe in the ground, the which was made sharp at ye one end. The same among the Malabars is called Calvete, upon ye which they do execute justice of death, unto the poorest or vilest people of the country.” — Castañeda, tr. by N. L., ff. 142v., 143.

1606. — “The Queen marvelled much at the thing, and to content them she ordered the sorcerer to be delivered over for punishment, and to be set on the calote, which is a very sharp stake fixed firmly in the ground . . .” &c.—Gouvea, f. 47v; see also f. 163.

CALYAN, n.p. The name of more than one city of fame in W. and S. India; Skt. Kalyāna, ‘beautiful, noble, propitious.’ One of these is the place still known as Kalyān, on the Ulas river, more usually called by the name of the city, 33 m. N.E. of Bombay. This is a very ancient port, and is probably the one mentioned by Cosmas below. It appears as the residence of a donor in an inscription on the Kanheri caves in Salsette (see Ferguson and Burgess, p. 349). Another Kalyāna was the capital of the Chalukyas of the Deccan in the 9th-12th centuries. This is in the Nizam’s district of Naldrūg, about 40 miles E.N.E. of the fortress called by that name. A third Kalyāna was a port of Canara, between Mangalore and Kundapur, in lat. 13° 28’ or thereabouts, on the same river as Bacanore (q.v.). [This is apparently the place which Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 206) calls Calbian Bondi or Kalyān Bandar.] The quotations refer to the first Calyan.

c. A.D. 80.90. — “The local marts which occur in order after Barygaza are Akabaru, Suppara, Kalliena, a city which was raised to the rank of a regular mart in the time of Saraganes, but, since Sandanes became its master, its trade has been put under restrictions; for if Greek vessels, even by accident, enter its ports, a guard is put on board, and they are taken to Barygaza.” — Periplus, § 82.

c. A.D. 545. — “And the most notable places of trade are these: Sindu, Orrghosa, Kalliana, Sibor. . . .” — Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., p. clxviii.

1825.—"Near Candaular is a waterfall . . . its stream winds to join the sea, nearly opposite to Tannah, under the name of the Calllanee river."—Heber, ii. 137.

Prof. Forchhammer has lately described the great remains of a Pagoda and other buildings with inscriptions, near the city of Pegu, called Kalyani.

CAMBAY, n.p. Written by Mahomedan writers Kambayat, sometimes Kinbeyat. According to Col. Tod, the original Hindu name was Khambavati, 'City of the Pillar'; [the Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. gives stambha-tirtha, 'sacred pillar pool'].

Long a very famous port of Guzerat, at the head of the Gulf to which it gives its name. Under the Mahomedan Kings of Guzerat it was one of their chief residences, and they are often called Kings of Cambay. Cambay is still a feudatory State under a Nawab. The place is in decay, owing partly to the shoals, and the extraordinary rise and fall of the tides in the Gulf, impeding navigation. [See Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 313 seqq.]

c. 951.—"From Kambayya to the sea about 2 parasangs. From Kambayya to Suraibaya (f) about 4 days."—Isatkhiri, in Elliot, i. 90.

1320.—"Hoc vero Oceanum mare in illis partibus principaliter habet duos portus: quorum unus nominatur Mahabar, et alius Cambeth."—Marino Sanudo, near beginning.

c. 1420.—"Cambay is situated near to the sea, and is 12 miles in circuit; it abounds in spikenard, lac, indigo, myrabolans, and silk."—Conti, in India in Xth Cent., 20.

1498.—"In which Gulf, as we were informed, there are many cities of Christians and Moors; and a city which is called Quambaya."—Roteiro, 49.

Butler had evidently read the stories of Mahmud Bigara, Sultan of Guzerat, in VartHEMA or Purchas.

CAMBOJA, n.p. An ancient kingdom in the eastern part of Indo-China, once great and powerful: now fallen, and under the 'protectorate' of France, whose Saigon colony it adjoins. The name, like so many others of Indo-China since the days of Ptolemy, is of Skt. origin, being apparently a transfer of the name of a nation and country on the N.W. frontier of India, Kamboja, supposed to have been about the locality of Chitrail or Kafristan. Ignoring this, fantastic Chinese and other etymologies have been invented for the name. In the older Chinese annals (c. 1200 B.C.) this region had the name of Fuyen; from the period after our era, when the kingdom of Camboja had become powerful, it was known to the Chinese as Chin-la. Its power seems to have extended at one time westward, perhaps to the shores of the B. of Bengal. Ruins of extraordinary vastness and architectural elaboration are numerous, and have attracted great attention since M. Mouhot's visit in 1859; though they had been mentioned by 16th century missionaries, and some of the buildings when standing in splendour were described by a Chinese visitor at the end of the 13th century. The Cambojanos proper call themselves Khmer, a name which seems to have given rise to singular confusions (see COMAR). The gum Gamboge (Cambodiain in the early records [Birdwood, Rep. on Old Rec., 27]) so familiar in use, derives its name from this country, the chief source of supply.

c. 1161.—". . . although . . . because the belief of the people of Rāmānya (Pegu) was the same as that of the Buddha-believing men of Ceylon. . . . Parakrama the king was living in peace with the king of Rāmānya—yet the ruler of Rāmānya . . . forsook the old custom of providing maintenance for the ambassadors . . . saying: 'These messengers are sent to go to Kamboja,' and so plundered all their goods and put them in prison in the Malay country. . . . 1205.—"Les pays de Thinh-la . . . Les gens du pays le nomment Kan-phou-tecli. Sous la dynastie actuelle, les livres sacrés des Tchétains nomment ce pays Kan-phou-CAMEEZE. s. This word (kamīs) is used in colloquial H. and Tamil for 'a shirt.' It comes from the Port. camisa. But that word is directly from the Arab kamīs, 'a tunic.' Was St. Jerome's Latin word an earlier loan from the Arabic, or the source of the Arabic word? probably the latter; [so N.E.D. s.v. Camisa]. The Mod. Greek Dict. of Sophocles has καμίσω. Camaea is, according to the Slang Dictionary, used in the cant of English thieves; and in more ancient slang it was made into 'commission.'

c. 400.—"Solent militantes habere linneas quas Camisias vocant, sic aptas membris et adstrictas corporibus, ut expediti sint vel ad cursum, vel ad praelia . . . quocumque necessitas traxerit."—Scti. Hieronymi Epist. (lxxv.) ad Fabiolum, § 11.

1404.—"And to the said Ruy Gonzalez he gave a big horse, an ambler, for they prize a horse that ambles, furnished with saddle and bridle, very well according to their fashion; and besides he gave him a camisa and an umbrella" (see SOMNERO).—Clavijo, §§ xxxix. ; Markham, 100.

1464.—"to William and Richard my sons, all my fair camises . . . "—Will of Richard Strole, of Newnham, Devon.

1498.—"That a very fine camysa, which in Portugal would be worth 300 reis, was given here for 2 fāmonos, which in that country is the equivalent of 30 reis, though the value of 30 reis is in that country no small matter."—Roteiro de V. do Gama, 77.

1573.—"The richest of all (the English in Fez) are where they sell camisass . . . "—Marmol, Desc. General de Africa, Pt. I. Bk. iii. f. 87v.

CAMP, s. In the Madras Presidency [as well as in N. India] an official not at his headquarters is always addressed as 'in Camp.'

CAMPHOR, s. There are three camphors:—
a. The Bornean and Sumatran camphor from Dryobalanops aromatica.
b. The camphor of China and Japan, from Cinnamomum Camphora. (These are the two chief camphors of commerce; the first immensely exceeding the second in market value: see Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi. Note 3.)
c. The camphor of Blumea balsamifera, D.C., produced and used in China under the name of ngai camphor.

The relative ratios of value in the Canton market may be roundly given as b. 1 ; c. 10 ; a. 80.

The first Western mention of this drug, as was pointed out by Messrs Hanbury and Flückiger, occurs in the Greek medical writer Aëtius (see below), but it probably came through the Arabs, as is indicated by the ph, or f. of the Arab kafār, representing the Skt. karpāra. It has been suggested that the word was originally Javanese, in which language kafār appears to mean both 'lime' and 'camphor.'

Mooseen Sheriff says that kafār is used (in Ind. Materia Medica) for 'amber.' Thabashir (see TABASHEER), is, according to the same writer, called bâns-kafār 'bamboo-camphor'; and ras-kafār (mercury-camphor) is an impure subchloride of mercury. According to the same authority, the varieties of camphor now met with in the bazars of S. India are—1. kafār-i-kaišār, which is in Tamil called pach'chāri (i.e. crude karippuram ; 2. Sārātī kafār ; 3. chīnt; 4. bātī (from the Battu country?). The first of these names is a curious instance of the perpetuation of a blunder, originating in the misreading of loose Arabic writing. The name is unquestionably fænārī, which carelessness as to points has converted into kaišārī (as above, and in Blochmann's Ain, i. 79). The camphor alfanārī is mentioned as early as by Avicenna, and by Marco Polo, and came from a place called Pansīr in Sumatra, perhaps the same as Barus, which has now long given its name to the costly Sumatran drug.

A curious notion of Ibn Batuta's
(iv. 241) that the camphor of Sumatra (and Borneo) was produced in the inside of a cane, filling the joints between knot and knot, may be explained by the statement of Barbosa (p. 204), that the Borneo camphor as exported was packed in tubes of bamboo. This camphor is by Barbosa and some other old writers called 'eatable camphor' (da mangiare), because used in medicine and with betel.

Our form of the word seems to have come from the Sp. alcanfor and canfora, through the French camphre. Dozy points out that one Italian forum retains the truer name cafura, and an old German one (Mid. High Germ.) is gaffor (Oosterl. 47).

c. 940.—"These (islands called al-Ramîn) abound in gold mines, and are near the country of Kansûr, famous for its camphor. . . ."—Masûdî, i. 398. The same work at iii. 49, refers back to this passage as "the country of Mansûrah." Probably Masûdî wrote correctly Fûnsûrah.

1298.—"In this kingdom of Farsûr {n.} grows the best camphor in the world, called Camfera Farsûuri."—Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. xi.

1506.—". . . de li (Tenasserim) vien pevere, canella . . . camfora da mansur e de quella non se manza . . ." (i.e. both camphor to eat and not to eat, or Sumatra and China camphor).—Leonardo Ca' Masser.

c. 1590.—"The Camphor tree is a large tree growing in the ghaits of Hindostan and in China. A hundred horsemen and upwards may rest in the shade of a single tree. . . . Of the various kinds of camphor the best is called Ribâhi or Quiâri. . . . In some books camphor in its natural state is called . . . Bhînsîni."—A. Blochmann, ed. i. 78-9. [Bhînsîni is more properly bhîmesi, and takes its name from the demon Bhîmes, second son of Pandu.]

1623.—"In this ship we have laden a small parcel of campfire of Baroone, being in all 60 catis."—Batavian Letter, pubd. in Cock's Diary, ii. 343.

1726.—"The Persians name the Camphor of Baros, and also of Borneo to this day Kafur Confuri, as it also appears in the printed text of Avicenna . . . and Belhunensis notes that in some MSS. of the author is found Kafur Fansuri. . . ."—Valentijn, iv. 67.

1786.—"The Camphor Tree has been recently discovered in this part of the Sircar's country. We have sent two bottles of the essential oil made from it for your use."—Letter of Tippoo, Kirkpatrick, p. 231.

1875.—"Camphor, Bhimsainsi (barus), valuation . . . . 11b. 80 rs. . . . Refined cake . . . . 1 cwt. 65 rs."—Table of Customs Duties on Imports into Br. India up to 1875.

The first of these is the fine Sumatran camphor; the second at 1s. of the price is China camphor.

CAMPOO, s. H. kampâ, corr. of the English 'camp,' or more properly of the Port. 'campo.' It is used for 'a camp,' but formerly was specifically applied to the partially disciplined brigades under European commanders in the Mahratta service.

[1525.—Mr. Whiteway notes that Castanhoda (bk. vi. ch. ii. p. 217) and Barros (iii. 10, 3) speak of a ward of Malacca as Campu China; and de Ereddia (1613) calls it Campon China, which may supply a link between Campoo and Kampung. (See COMPOUND).

1803.—"Begum Sumroos' Campoo has come up the ghauts, and I am afraid . . . joined Scindiah yesterday. Two deserters . . . declared that Pohlmans' Campo was following it."—Wellington, ii. 264.

1883.—". . . its unhappy plains were swept over, this way and that, by the cavalry of rival Mahratta powers, Mogul and Rohilla horsemen, or campos and putting (battalions) under European adventurers. . . ."—Quarterly Review, April, p. 294.

CANARA, n.p. Properly Kannada. This name has long been given to that part of the West coast which lies below the Ghauts, from Mt. Dely northward to the Goa territory; and now to the two British districts constituted out of that tract, viz. N. and S. Canara. This appropriation of the name, however, appears to be of European origin. The name, probably meaning 'black country' [Dravid. kar, 'black,' nāda, 'country'], from the black cotton soil prevailing there, was properly synonymous with Karṇṇṭāka (see CARNATIC), and apparently a corruption of that word. Our quotations show that throughout the sixteenth century the term was applied to the country above the Ghauts, sometimes to the whole kingdom of Narsinga or Vijayanagar (see BISNAGAR). Gradually, and probably owing to local application at Goa, where the natives seem to have been from the first known to the Portuguese as Canarijs, a term which in the old Portuguese works means the Konkani people and language of Goa, the name became appropriated to the low country on the coast between Goa and Malabar, which was subject to the kingdom in question, much in the same way that the name Carnatic came at a later date to be misapplied on the other side of the Peninsula.

The Kanara or Canarese language is spoken over a large tract above the Ghaus, and as far north as Bidar (see Caldwell, Intro. p. 33). It is only one of several languages spoken in the British districts of Canara, and that only in a small portion, viz. near Kundapur. Tulu is the chief language in the Southern District. Kanadam occurs in the great Tanjore inscription of the 11th century.

1516.—"Beyond this river commences the Kingdom of Narsinga, which contains five very large provinces, each with a language of its own. The first, which stretches along the coast to Malabar, is Tulinate (i.e. Tulu-nadu, or the modern district of S. Canara); another lies in the interior . . . ; another has the name of Telinga, which confines with the Kingdom of Orissa; another is Canari, in which is the great city of Bisnaga; and then the Kingdom of Chamendel, the language of which is Tamul."—Barbosa. This passage is exceedingly corrupt, and the version (necessarily imperfect) is made up from three—viz. Stanley's English, from a Sp. MS., Hak. Soc. p. 79; the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, p. 291; and Ramusio's Italian (i. f. 289v).

c. 1535.—"The last Kingdom of the First India is called the Province Canarim; it is bordered on one side by the Kingdom of Goa and by Anjadiva, and on the other side by Middle India or Malabar. In the interior is the King of Narsinga, who is chief of this country. The speech of those of Canarim is different from that of the Kingdom of Decan and of Goa."—Portuguese Summary of Eastern Kingdoms, in Ramusio, i. f. 350.

1552.—"The third province is called Canar, also in the interior. . . ."—Castanheda, ii. 50.

And as applied to the language:—

"The language of the Gentooos is Canar."—Ibid. 78.

1552.—"The whole coast that we speak of back to the Ghaut (Gate) mountain range . . . they call Concun, and the people properly Concanese (Conquenija), though our people call them Canareese (Canarjis). . . . And as from the Ghaus to the sea on the west of the Decan all that strip is called Concun, so from the Ghaus to the sea on the west of Canar, always excepting that stretch of 46 leagues of which we have spoken [north of Mount Dely] which belongs to the same Canar, the strip which stretches to Cape Comorin is called Malabar."—Barros, Dec. i. liv. ix. cap. 1.

1552.—". . . The Kingdom of Canar, which extends from the river called Gate, north of Chaul, to Cape Comorin (so far as concerns the interior region east of the Ghats) . . . and which in the east marches with the kingdom of Orissa; and the Gentoo Kings of this great Province of Canar were those from whom sprang the present Kings of Bisnagar."—Ibid. Dec. ii. liv. v. cap. 2.

1572.—"Aquè se enxerga lá do mar undisso Hum monte alto, que corre longamente Servindo ao Malabar de forte muro, Com que do Canar vive seguro."—Câmões, vii. 21.

Englished by Burton:

"Here seen yonside where weary waters play a range of mountains skirts the murmuring main serving the Malabar for mighty mure, who thus from him of Canar dwells secure."

1598.—"The land itselfs is called Decan, and also Canara."—Linschoten, 49; [Hak. Soc. i. 169].

1614.—"Its proper name is Charnthara, which from corruption to corruption has come to be called Canara."—Conto, Dec. vi. liv. v. cap. 5.

In the following quotations the term is applied, either inclusively or exclusively, to the territory which we now call Canara:—

1615. "Canara. Thence to the Kingdom of the Cannarins, which is but a little one, and 6 dayes journey from Damaos. They are tall of stature, idle, for the most part, and therefore the greater thieves."—De Monfort, p. 23.

1623.—"Having found a good opportunity, such as I desired, of getting out of Goa, and penetrating further into India, that is more to the south, to Canara . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 601; [Hak. Soc. ii. 168].

1672.—"The strip of land Canara, the inhabitants of which are called Canarins, is fruitful in rice and other food-stuffs."—Baldaeus, 98. There is a good map in this work, which shows 'Canara' in the modern acceptance.

1672.—"Description of Canara and Journey to Goa.—This kingdom is one of the finest in India, all plain country near the sea, and even among the mountains all peopled."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 420. Here the title seems used in the modern sense, but the same writer applies Canara to the whole Kingdom of Bisnagar.

1673.—"At Mirja the Protector of Canora came on board."—Friger (margin), p. 57.

1726.—"The Kingdom Canara (under which Onor, Batticaloa, and Garcopa are dependent) comprises all the western lands lying between Walkan (Konkan) and Malabar, two great coast countries."— Valentijn, v. 2.

1727.—"The country of Canara is generally governed by a Lady, who keeps her Court at a Town called Bajodur, two Days journey from the Sea."—A. Hamilton, i. 280.

CANARIN, n.p. This name is applied in some of the quotations under Canara to the people of the district now so called by us. But the Portuguese applied it to the (Konkani) people of Goa and their language. Thus a Konkani grammar, originally prepared about 1600 by the Jesuit, Thomas Esteveão (Stephens, an Englishman), printed at Goa, 1640, bears the title Arte da Lingoa Canarin. (See A.
B(urnell) in Ind. Antq. ii. 98).

[1823.—"Canareen, an appellation given to the Creole Portuguese of Goa and their other Indian settlements."—Owen, Narrative, i. 191.]

CANAUT, CONAUT, CON-NAUGHT, s. H. from Ar. kanãt, the side wall of a tent, or canvas enclosure.
[See SURREPURA.]

[1616.—"High cannattes of a coarse stuff made like arras."—Sir T. Roe, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 325.]

"The King's Tents are red, reared on poles very high, and placed in the midst of the Camp, covering a large Compass, encircled with Canats (made of red calico stiffened with Canes at every breadth) standing upright about nine foot high, guarded round every night with Souldiers."
—Terry, in Purchas, i. 1481.

c. 1660.—"And (what is hard enough to believe in Indostan, where the Grandees especially are so jealous . . .) I was so near to the wife of this Prince (Dura), that the cords of the Kanatas . . ., which enclosed them (for they had not so much as a poor tent), were fastened to the wheels of my chariot."—Bennier, E. T. 29; [ed.
Constable, 89].

1792.—"They passed close to Tipoo's tents: the canaut (misprinted canaul) was standing, but the green tent had been removed."—T. Munro, in Life, iii. 73.

1793.—"The canaut of canvas . . .
was painted of a beautiful sea-green colour."— Dirom, 230.

[c. 1798.—"On passing a skreen of Indian connaughts, we proceeded to the front of the Tusbeah Khanan."—Asiatic Res., iv.
444.]

1817.—"A species of silk of which they make tents and kanauts."—Mills, ii. 201.

1825.—Heber writes connaut.—Orig. ed.
i. 257.

[1838.—"The khenaunts (the space between the outer covering and the lining of our tents)."—Miss Eden, Up the Country
ii. 83.]

CANDY.

1516.—"Further on... there is another place, in the mouth of the river... which is called Guendarì... And it is a very good town, a seaport."—Barbon, 64.

1814.—"Candhar, eighteen miles from the wells, is pleasantly situated on the banks of a river; and a place of considerable trade... being a great thoroughfare from the sea coast to the Gaut mountains."—Forbes, Or. Mém., i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 116].

CANDAREEN, s. In Malay, to which language the word apparently belongs, кандары. A term formerly applied to the hundredth of the Chinese ounce or weight, commonly called by the Malay name таит (see Tael). Fryer (1673) gives the Chinese weights thus:

1 Cattee is nearest 10 Taies
1 Teen (Taie?) is 10 Mass
1 Mass in Silver is 10 Quandareens
1 Quandareen is 10 Cash
735 Cash make 1 Royal
1 grain English weight is 2 cash.

1554.—"In Malacca the weight used for gold, musk, &c., the cate, contains 20 taels, each tael 16 mazes, each maze 20 cumduryns; also 1 paual 4 mazes, each maze 4 cupongs; each cupong 5 cumduryns."—A. Nunez, 39.

1615.—"We bought 5 great square postes of the Kings master carpenter; cost 2 mas 6 condrins per piece."—Cocks, i. 1.

(1) CANDY, n.p. A town in the hill country of Ceylon, which became the deposit of the sacred tooth of Buddha at the beginning of the 14th century, and was adopted as the native capital about 1592. Chitty says the name is unknown to the natives, who call the place Mah type, 'great city.' The name seems to have arisen out of some misapprehension by the Portuguese, which may be illustrated by the quotation from Valentijn.

O. 1580.—"And passing into the heart of the Island, there came to the Kingdom of Candia, a certain Friar Pascual with two companions, who were well received by the King of the country Javira Bandar... in so much that he gave them a great piece of ground, and everything needful to build a church, and houses for them to dwell in."—Couto, Dec. VI. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1552.—"... and at three or four places, like the passes of the Alps of Italy, one finds entrance within this circuit (of mountains) which forms a Kingdom called Candé."—Barros, Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1645.—"Now then as soon as the Emperor was come to his Castle in Candi he gave order that the 600 captive Hollanders should be distributed throughout his country among the peasants, and in the City."—J. J. Saar's 15Thaaige Kriegs-Dienst, 97.

1681.—"The First is the City of Candy, so generally called by the Christians, probably from Conde, which in the Chingualay Language signifies Hills, for among them it is situated, but by the Inhabitants called Kingdogeyew, as much as to say 'The City of the Chingualay people,' and Manser, signifying the 'Chief or Royal City.'"—R. Knox, p. 5.

1726.—"Candi, otherwise Candia, or named in Cingalees Conde Onda, i.e. the high mountain country."—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

(2) CANDY, s. A weight used in S. India, which may be stated roughly at about 500 lbs., but varying much in different parts. It corresponds broadly with the Arabian Bahar (q.v.), and was generally equivalent to 20 Maunds, varying therefore with the maund. The word is Mahr. and Tel. khand, written in Tam. and Mal. kand, or Mal. kant, [and comes from the Skt. khand, 'to divide.' A Candy of land is supposed to be as much as will produce a candy of grain, approximately 75 acres]. The Portuguese write the word candil.

1563.—"A candil which amounts to 522 pounds" (arreatas).—Garcia, t. 55.

1598.—"One candiel (v.l. candil) is little more or less than 14 bushels, wherewith they measure Rice, Corne, and all graine."—Linschoten, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 245].

1618.—"The Candee at this place (Bate-calla) containeth more = 500 pounds."—W. Hove, in Rechus, i. 657.

1710.—"They advised that they have supplied Habib Khan with ten candies of country grounpowder."—In Wheeler, ii. 196.

C. 1760.—Grose gives the Bombay candy as 20 maunds of 28 lbs. each=560 lbs.; the Surat ditto as 20 maunds of 32½ lbs.=746½ lbs.; the Anjengo ditto 560 lbs.; the Carwar ditto 575 lbs.; the Coromandel ditto at 500 lbs. &c.

(3) CANDY (SUGAR). This name of crystallized sugar, though it came no doubt to Europe from the P.-Ar. kand (P. also shakar kand; Sp. azucar cande; It. candi and zucchero candito; Fr. sucre candi) is of Indian origin. There is a Skt. root khand, 'to break,' whence khand, 'broken,' also applied in various compounds to granulated and candied sugar. But there is also Tam. kar-kand, kala-kand, Mal. kandi, kalkandi, and kalkant, which may have been the direct source of the P. and Ar. adoption of the word, and perhaps its original, from a Dravidian word = "lump." [The Dravidian terms mean "stone-piece."]

A German writer, long within last century (as we learn from Mahn, quoted in Diez's Lexicon), appears to derive candy from Candia, "because most of the sugar which the Venetians imported was brought from that island" —a fact probably invented for the nonce. But the writer was the same wisecracker (in the year 1829) characterised the book of Marco Polo as a "clumsily compiled ecclesiastical fiction disguised as a Book of Travels" (see Introduction to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. pp. 112-113).

c. 1343.—"A centinajo si vende gien-giove, cannella, laccia, incenso, indaco ... verzino scorzato, zucchero ... zucchero candi ... porcellane ... costo ..."—Pegolotti, p. 134.

c. 1596.—"White sugar candy (kandî safèd) ... 55 dnum per ser."—Aîn, i. 63.

-Minsheu, 2nd ed. s.v.

1727.—"The Trade they have to China is divided between them and Surat ... the Gross of their own Cargo, which consists in Sugar, Sugar-candy, Allov, and some Drugs ... are all for the Surat Market."—A. Hamilton, i. 371.

CANGUE, s, A square board, or portable pillory of wood, used in China as a punishment, or rather, as Dr. Wells Williams says, as a kind of censure, carrying no disgrace; strange as that seems to us, with whom the essence of the pillory is disgrace. The frame weighs up to 30 lbs., a weight limited by law. It is made to rest on the shoulders without chafing the neck, but so broad as to prevent the wearer from feeding himself. It is generally taken off at night (Giles, [and see Gray, China, i. 55 seqq.]).

The Cangue was introduced into China by the Tartar dynasty of Wei in the 5th century, and is first mentioned under A.D. 481. In the Kuang-yun (a Chin. Dict. published A.D. 1009) it is called kangguai (modern mandarin hiang-hiai), i.e. 'Neck-fetter.' From this old form probably the Anamites have derived their word for it, gong, and the Cantonese "Kang-ka, 'to wear the Cangue,' a survival (as frequently happens in Chinese vernaculars) of an ancient term with a new orthography. It is probable that the Portuguese took the word from one of these latter forms, and associated it with their own congla, 'an ox-yoke;' or 'porter's yoke for carrying burdens.' [This view is rejected by the N.E.D. on the authority of Prof. Legge, and the word is regarded as derived from the Port. form given above. In reply to an enquiry, Prof. Giles writes: "I am entirely of opinion that the word is from the Port., and not from any Chinese term."] The thing is alluded to by F. M. Pinto and other early writers on China, who do not give it a name.

Something of this kind was in use in countries of Western Asia, called in P. doshaika (bilibum). And this word is applied to the Chinese cangue in one of our quotations. Doshaika, however, is explained in the lexicon Burhān-i-Kātī as 'a piece of timber with two branches placed on the neck of a criminal' (Quatremère, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 172, 173).

1420.—"... made the ambassadors come forward side by side with certain prisoners. ... Some of these had a doshaika on their necks."—Shah Rukh's Mission to China, in Cathay, p. cciv.

[1525.—Castanheda (Bk. VI. ch. 71, p. 154) speaks of women who had come from Portugal in the ships without leave, being tied up in a caga and whipped.]

c. 1540.—"... Ordered us to be put in a horrid prison with fetters on our feet, mantles on our hands, and collars on our necks. ..."—F. M. Pinto, (orig.) ch. lxxxiv.

CANHAMEIRA, CONIMERE.
[COONIMODE], n.p. Kanyirmedu or Kan-yirmedu, Tam. kānī, ‘humped,’ medu, ‘mound’; a place on the Coromandel coast, which was formerly the site of European factories (1682-1698) between Pondicherry and Madras, about 13 m.

N. of the former.

1501.—In Amerigo Vespucci’s letter from C.
Veudo to Lorenzo de’ Medici, giving an account of the Portuguese discoveries in India, he mentions on the coast, before Milepor, “Conimal.”—In Badelli-Boni, Introdt. to Il Milione, p. iii.

1561.—“On this coast there is a place called Canhameira, where there are so many deer and wild cattle that if a man wants to buy 500 deer-skins, within eight days the blacks of the place will give him delivery, catching them in snares, and giving two or three skins for a fanam.”—Correa, ii.
772.

1830.—“It is resolved to apply to the Soobidar of Sevadgee’s Country of Chengry for a Cowle to settle factories at Cooraboor (?) and Coonemero, and also at Porto Novo, if desired.”—Pt. St. Geo. Consn., 7th Jan., in Notes and Ext., No. iii. p. 44.

[1639.—“We therefore conclude it more safe and expedient that the Chief of Conimere

Pondichéri.”—D’Anville, p. 123.

CANNANORE, n.p. A port on the coast of northern Malabar, famous in the early Portuguese history, and which still is the chief British military station on that coast, with a European regiment. The name is Kaññār or Kaññanūr, ‘Krishna’s Town.’—The Madras Gloss, gives Mal. kannu, ‘eye,’ ur, ‘village,’ i.e. ‘beautiful village.’

1506.—“In Cānanor il suo Re si è zentil, e qui nasce zz, (i.e. zenzari, ‘ginger’); ma li zz pochi e non cusi boni come quelli de Culeit.”—Leonardo Cu’i Masser, in Archivio Storico Ital., Append.

1510.—“Canesor is a fine and large city, in which the King of Portugal has a very strong castle. ... This Canonor is a port which horses which come from Persia that dwells ‘twixt Calecut and Canonor.”

[1611.—“The old Nahuda Mahomet of Cainnor goeth aboard in this boat.”— Dunners, Letters, i. 95.]

CANONGO, s. P. kānūṇ-go, i.e.
‘Law-utterer’ (the first part being Arab. from Gr. καρωβ). In upper India, and formerly in Bengal, the registrar of a tadsil, or other revenue subdivision, who receives the reports of the patvdris, or village registrars.

1758.—“Add to this that the King’s as well as the Gomastahs and other servants belonging to the Zemindars, whose accounts we sent for.”—Letter to Court, Dec. 31, in 1765.—“I have to struggle with every difficulty that can be thrown in my way by ministers, mutseddes, congoses (!), &c., and their dependents.”—Letter from F. Sykes, in Carraccio’s Life of Olive, i. 542.

CANTEROY, s. A gold coin formerly used in the S.E. part of Madras territory. It was worth 3 rs.
Properly Kāṅṭhāravi hun (or pagoda) from Kāñṭhāravi Rāya, ‘the lion-voiced,’ [Skt. kāṇṭha, ‘throat,’ rava, ‘noise’], who ruled in Mysore from CANTON, n.p. The great seaport of Southern China, the chief city of the Province of Kwang-tung, whence we take the name, through the Portuguese, whose older writers call it Canton. The proper name of the city is Kwang-chau-fu. The Chinese name Kwang-tung ('Broad East') is an ellipse for 'capital of the E. Division of the Province Liao-Kwang (or Two Broad Realms')."—(By Moule).

1516.—"So as this went on Fernão Peres arrived from Pemom with his cargo (of pepper), and having furnished himself with necessary set off on his voyage in June 1516. They were 7 sail altogether, and they made their voyage with the aid of good pilots whom they had taken, and went without harming anybody touching at certain ports, most of which were subject to the King of China, who called himself the Son of God and Lord of the World. Fernão Peres arrived at the islands of China, and when he was seen there came an armed squadron of 12 junks, which in the season of navigation always cruized about, guarding the sea, to prevent the numerous pirates from attacking the ships. Fernão Peres knew about this from the pilots, and as it was late, and he could not double a certain island there, he anchored, sending word to his captains to have their guns ready for defence if the China desired to fight. Next day he made sail towards the island of Veniaga, which is 18 leagues from the city of Canton. It is on that island that all the traders buy and sell, without licence from the rulers of the city. And 3 leagues from that island of Veniaga is another island, where is posted the Admiral or Captain-Major of the Sea, who immediately on the arrival of strangers at the island of Veniaga reports to the rulers of Canton, who are there, and what goods they bring or wish to buy; that the rulers may send orders what course to take."—Correia, ii. 524.

c. 1555.—"... queste cose... vanno alla China con li lor giunchi, e a Canton, che è Città grande...."—Sommaario de' Regni, Ramusio, i. 1. 337.

1555.—"The Chinos do vse in their pronunciation to term their cities with this syllable, Fu, that is as much as to say, citie, as Taybin fu, Canton fu, and their toones with this syllable, Chen."—Mendoza, Parke's old E. T. (1588) Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1727.—"Canton or Quantung (as the Chinese express it) is the next maritime Province."—A. Hamilton, ii. 217.

CANTONMENT. s. (Pron. Cantonont, with accent on penult.) This English word has become almost appropriated as Anglo-Indian, being so constantly used in India, and so little used elsewhere. It is applied to military stations in India, built usually on a plan which is originally that of a standing camp or 'cantonment.'

1783.—"I know not the full meaning of the word cantonment, and a camp this singular place cannot well be termed; it more resembles a large town, very many miles in circumference. The officers' bungalos on the banks of the Tappee are large and convenient," &c.—Forbes, Letter in Ov. Mem. describing the "Bengal Cantonments near Surat," iv. 239.

1825.—"The fact, however, is certain... the cantonments at Lucknow, or Calcutta itself, are abominably situated. I have heard the same of Madras; and now the lately-settled cantonment of Nussereabad appears to be as objectionable as any of them."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 7.

1848.—"Her ladyship, our old acquaintance, is as much at home at Madras as at Brussels—in the cantonment as under the tents."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. 8.

CAPASS, s. The cotton plant and cotton-wool. H. kapas, from Skt. harpaśa, which seems as if it must be the origin of κάρπασος, though the latter is applied to flax.

1753.—"... They cannot any way conceive the musters of 1738 to be a fit standard for judging by them of the cloth sent us this year, as the copass or country cotton has not been for these two years past under nine or ten rupees...."—I. Wm. Cons., in Long, 40.

[1813.—"Guzerat ows are very fond of the capassia, or cotton-seed."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 35.]

CAPEL, s. Malayă. kappal, 'a ship.' This word has been imported into Malay, kapal, and Javanese. [It appears to be still in use on the W. Coast; see Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. (2) 470.]

1498.—In the vocabulary of the language of Calecut given in the Roteiro de V. de Guimarães we have—

"Naoo; capell."—p. 118.

1510.—"Some others which are made like ours, that is in the bottom, they call capel."—Varthema, 154.
CAPELAN, n.p. This is a name which was given by several 16th-century travellers to the mountains in Burma from which the rubies purchased at Pegu were said to come; the idea of their distance, &c., being very vague. It is not in our power to say what name was intended. [It was perhaps Kyat-pyem.] The real position of the ‘ruby-mines’ is 60 or 70 m. N.E. of Mandalay. [See Ball's Tavener, ii. 99, 465 seqq.]

1506.—"...e qui è unoporto appresso uno loco che si chiama Acaplen, dove li se trova molti rubini, e spinade, e zole d'ogni sorte."—Leonardo da Co' Masser, p. 28.

1510.—"The sole merchandise of these people is jewels, that is, rubies, which come from another city called Capellan, which is distant from this (Pegu) 30 days' journey."—Varthema, 218.

1516.—"Further inland than the said Kingdom of Ava, at five days journey to the south-east, is another city of Gentiles... called Capelan, and all round are likewise found many and excellent rubies, which they bring to sell at the city and fair of Ava, and which are better than those of Ava."—Barbosa, 187.

c. 1535.—"This region of Arquam borders on the interior with the great mountain called Capelanangam, where are many places inhabited by a not very civilised people. These carry musk and rubies to the great city of Ava, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Arquam,..."—sommario de Regni, in Remanso, i. 334v.

c. 1690.—"...A mountain 12 days journey thereabouts, from Siren towards the North-east; the name whereof is Capelan. In this mine are found great quantities of Rubies."—Tavener (E. T.) ii. 149; [ed. Ball, ii. 99].

Phillip's Mineralogy (according to Col. Burney) mentions the locality of the ruby as 'the Capelan mountains, sixty miles from Pegue, a city in Ceylon!'—(J. As. Soc. Bengal, ii. 75). This writer is certainly very loose in his geography, and Dana (ed. 1856) is not much better: 'The best ruby sapphires occur in the Capelan mountains, near Syrian, a city of Pegu.'—Mineralogy, p. 222.

CAPUCAT, n.p. The name of a place on the sea near Calicut, mentioned by several old authors, but which has now disappeared from the maps, and probably no longer exists. The proper name is uncertain. [It is the little port of Kappatt or Kappat-tangadi (Mal. kávál, 'guard,' pátu, 'place,' in the Cooroombranaul Taluka of the Malabar District. (Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 73). The Madras Gloss. calls it Capaud. Also see Gray, Pyrard, i. 360.]

1498.—In the Roteiro it is called Capua.

1500.—"This being done the Captain-Major (Pedralvares Cabral) made sail with the fore-sail and mizen, and went to the port of Capocate which was attached to the same city of Calecut, and was a haven where there was a great loading of vessels, and where many ships were moored that were all engaged in the trade of Calicut..."—Correa, i. 207.

1510.—"...another place called Capogatto, which is also subject to the King of Calecut. This place has a very beautiful palace, built in the ancient style."—Varthema, 133-134.

1516.—"Further on... is another town, at which there is a small river, which is called Capucad, where there are many country-born Moors, and much shipping."—Barbosa, 152.

CARACOA, CARACOLLE, KARKOLLEN, &c., is Malay kura-kura or kura-kura, which is [either a transferred use of the Malay kura-kura, or ku-kura, 'a tortoise,' alluding, one would suppose, either to the shape or pace of the boat, but perhaps the tortoise was named from the boat, or the two words are independent; or from the Ar. kwürkür, pl. kuirdîr, 'a large merchant vessel.' Scott (s.v. Coracora), says: 'In the absence of proof to the contrary, we may assume kora-kora to be native Malayan."

Dozy (s.v. Caracca) says that the Ar. kura-kura was, among the Arabs, a merchant vessel, sometimes of very great size. Crawfurd describes the Malay kura-kura, as 'a large kind of sailing vessel'; but the quotation from Jarric shows it to have been the Malay galley. Marve (Kata-Kata Malayan, 87) says: "The Malay kora-kora is a great row-boat; still in use in the Moluccas. Many measure 100 feet long and 10 wide. Some have as many as 90 rowers."

c. 1380.—"We embarked on the sea at Ladhiyka in a big kuwrózyć belonging to Genoese people, the master of which was called Markalamin."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 254.

1349.—"I took the sea on a small kuwró belonging to a Tunisian."—Ibid. iv. 327.
1606.—“The foremost of these galleys or Caracolles recovered our Shippe, wherein was the King of Tarnata.”—Middleton’s Voyage, E. 2.

1627.—“They have Gallies after their manner, formed like Dragons, which they row very swiftly, they call them karkollen.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 698.

1659.—“They (natives of Ceram, &c.) hawked these dry heads backwards and forwards in their korrekordes as a special rarity.”—Watt’s Schultzen’s Ost-Indische Reise, &c., p. 41.

1711.—“Les Philippines nomment ces batimens caracoss. C’est une especie de petite galere a rames et a voiles.”—Lettres Edif. iv. 27.

1774.—“A corocoro is a vessel generally fitted with outriggers, having a high arched stern and stern, like the points of a half moon. . . . The Dutch have fleets of them at Amboyans, which they employ as guardacostos.”—Forrest, Voyage to N. Guinea, 29. Forrest has a plate of a corocoro, p. 64.

1859.—“The boat was one of the kind called kora-kora, quite open, very low, and about four tons burden. It had out-riggers of bamboo, about five off each side, which supported a bamboo platform extending the whole length of the vessel. On the extreme outside of this sat the twenty rowers, while within was a convenient passage fore and aft. The middle of the boat was covered with a thatch-house, in which baggage and passengers are stowed; the gunwale was not more than a foot above water, and from the great side and top weight, and general clumsiness, these boats are dangerous in heavy weather, and are not infrequently lost.”—Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1890, p. 266.

CARAFFE. s. Dozy shows that this word, which in English we use for a water-bottle, is of Arabic origin, and comes from the root ghara‘, ‘to draw’ (water), through the Sp. garrafía. But the precise Arabic word is not in the dictionaries. (See under CARBOY.)

CARAMBOLA. s. The name given by various old writers on Western India to the beautiful acid fruit of the tree (N.O. Oxalidaceae) called by Linnaeus from this word, Averrooa carambola. This name was that used by the Portuguese. De Orta tells us that it was the Malabar name. The word karambal is also given by Molesworth as the Mahratté name; [another form is karambela, which comes from the Skt. karmara given below in the sense of ‘food-appetizer’]. In Upper India the fruit is called kamronga, kamrakh, or kamaruk (Skt. karmara, karmāra, karmaraka, karmaranga).* (See also BLIMEE.) Why a cannon at billiards should be called by the French carambolage we do not know. [If Mr. Ball be right, the fruit has a name, Cape-Gooseberry, in China which in India is used for the Tiparry. —Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 253.]

c. 1530.—“Another fruit is the Kermerik. It is fluted with five sides,” &c.—Erskine’s Baber, 325.

1563.—“O. Antonia, pluck me from that tree a Carambola or two (for so they call them in Malavar, and we have adopted the Malavar name, because that was the first region where we got acquainted with them).”

“A. Here they are.

“R. They are beautiful; a sort of sour-sweet, not very acid.

“O. They are called in Canarin and Decan camariz, and in Malay balimba they make with sugar a very pleasant conserve of these. . . . Antonia! bring hither a preserved carambola.”—Garcia, ff. 46, 47.

1598.—“There is another fruit called Carambolas, which hath 3 (5 really) corners, as bigge as a small apple, sower in eating, like vnripe plums, and most used to make Consernes. (Note by Padulæns). The fruit which the Malabars and Portingales call Carambolas, is in Deecan called Camarix, in Canar, Camarix and Carabola; in Malato, Bomambos, and by the Persians Chamarooch.”—Lettres Edif., 96; [Hak. Soc. ii. 38].

1672.—“The Carambola . . . as large as a pea, all sculptured (as it were) and divided into ribs, the ridges of which are not round but sharp, resembling the heads of those iron maces that were anciently in use.”—P. Vincenzo Maria, 352.

1878.—“. . . the oxalic Kamrak.”—In my Indian Garden, 50.

1900.—“. . . that most curious of fruits, the carambola, called by the Chinese the yong-t'o, or foreign peach, though why this name should have been selected is a mystery, for when cut through, it looks like a star with five rays. By Europeans it is also known as the Cape gooseberry.”—Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. p. 253.

CARAT. s. Arab kirrât, which is taken from the Gr. κράτων, a bean of the κεφατέα or carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua, L.). This bean, like the Indian rati (see RUTTEE) was used as a weight, and thence also it gave name to a coin of account, if not actual. To discuss the carat fully would be a task of extreme complexity, and would occupy several pages.

Under the name of siliqua it was the 24th part of the golden solidus of Constantine, which was again \( \frac{1}{2} \) of an ounce. Hence this carat was \( \frac{1}{144} \) of an ounce. In the passage from St. Isidore quoted below, the cerates is distinct from the siliqua, and = 1\( \frac{1}{2} \) siliquae. This we cannot explain, but the siliqua Graeca was the kepárov; and the siliqua as \( \frac{1}{4} \) of a solidus is the parent of the carat in all its uses. [See Prof. Gardner, in Smith, Dict. Ant. 3rd ed. ii. 675.] Thus we find the carat at Constantinople in the 14th century = \( \frac{1}{24} \) of the hyperpera or Greek bezant, which was a debased representative of the solidus; and at Alexandria \( \frac{1}{48} \) of the Arabic dinar, which was a purer representative of the solidus. And so, as the Roman uncia signified \( \frac{1}{12} \) of any unit (compare ounce, inch), so to a certain extent carat came to signify \( \frac{1}{144} \). Dictionaries give Arab. cårat as "\( \frac{1}{144} \) of an ounce." Of this we do not know the evidence. The English Cyclopaedia (s.v.) again states that "the carat was originally the 24th part of the marc, or half-pound, among the French, from whom the word came." This sentence perhaps contains more than one error; but still both of these allegations exhibit the carat as 1\( \frac{1}{144} \)th part. Among our goldsmiths the term is still used to measure the proportionate quality of gold; pure gold being put at 24 carats, gold with \( \frac{1}{2} \) alloy at 22 carats, with \( \frac{3}{4} \) alloy at 18 carats, &c. And the word seems also (like Anna, q.v.) sometimes to have been used to express a proportionate scale in other matters, as is illustrated by a curious passage in Marco Polo, quoted below.

The carat is also used as a weight for diamonds. As \( \frac{1}{144} \) of an ounce troy this ought to make it \( \frac{1}{3} \) grains. But these carats really run 151\( \frac{1}{2} \) to the ounce troy, so that the diamond carat is 3\( \frac{1}{2} \) grs. nearly. This we presume was adopted direct from some foreign system in which the carat was \( \frac{1}{144} \) of the local ounce. [See Ball, Tawneyer, ii. 447.]

The commissioners . . . assemble all the girls of the province, in presence of appraisers appointed for the purpose. These carefully survey the points of each girl . . . They will then set down some as estimated at 16 carats, some at 17, 18, 20, or more or less, according to the sum of the beauties or defects of each. And whatever standard the Great Kaan may have fixed for those that are to be brought to him, whether it be 20 carats or 21, the commissioners select the required number from those who have attained to that standard."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. i. 550-551.

1673.—"A stone of one Carrack is worth 10l."—Fryer, 214.

CARAVAN, s. P. kärwan; a convoy of travellers. The Ar. kāfīla is more generally used in India. The word is found in French as early as the 13th century (Littré). A quotation below shows that the English transfer of the word to a wheeled conveyance for travellers (now for goods also) dates from the 17th century. The abbreviation van in this sense seems to have acquired rights as an English word, though the altogether analogous bus is still looked on as slang.

charity, to give all civil passangers a resting place gratis; to keep them from the injury of thieves, beasts, weather, &c.";—Herbert, p. 124.

CARAVEL, s. This often occurs in the old Portuguese narratives.
The word is alleged to be not Oriental, but Celtic, and connected in its origin with the old British coracle; see the quotation from Isidore of Seville, the indication of which we owe to Bluteau, s.v. The Portuguese caravel is described by the latter as a 'round vessel' (i.e. not long and sharp like a galley), with lateen sails, ordinarily of 200 tons burthen. The character of swiftness attributed to the caravel (see both Damian and Bacon below) has suggested to us whether the word has not come rather from the Persian Gulf—Turki karâvâl, 'a scout, an outpost, a vanguard.' Doubtless there are difficulties, [The N.E.D. says that it is probably the dim. of Sp. carava.] The word is found in the following passage, quoted from the Life of St. Nilus, who died c. 1000, a date hardly consistent with Turkish origin. But the Latin translation is by Cardinal Sirlet, c. 1550, and the word may have been changed or modified:—

"Cogitavit enim in unaquaque Calabriae regione pericere navigia. . . Id autem non ferentes Russani cives . . . simul irrutentes ac tumultantes navigia commusserunt et eas quae Caravallae appellantur seuerunt."

c. 638.—"Carabus, parua seafa ex vinmine facia, quae contexta crudo corius navigii praebeat."—Isidori Hist. Opera. (Paris, 1603), p. 255.

1492.—"So being one day importuned by the said Christopher, the Catholick King was persuaded by him that nothing should keep him from making this experiment; and so effectual was this persuasion that they fitted out for him a ship and two caravels, with which at the beginning of August 1492, with 120 men, sail was made from Gades."—Summary of the H. of the Western Indies, by Pietro Martire in Rammusio, iii. f. 1.

CARBOY, s. A large glass bottle holding several gallons, and generally covered with wicker-work, well known in England, where it is chiefly used to convey acids and corrosive liquids in bulk. Though it is not an Anglo-Indian word, it comes (in the form kâriba) from Persia, as Wedgwood has pointed out. Kaempfer, whom we quote from his description of the wine trade at Shiraz, gives an exact etching of a carboy. Littré mentions that the late M. Mohl referred caraffe to the same original; but see that word. Karaba is no doubt connected with Ar. kirba, 'a large leathern milk-bottle.'

1712.—"Vasa vitrea, alia sunt majora, ampullacea et circumducto scirpe tunicata, quae vocant Karabâ. . . Venit Karaba una aqûd vitriaris dubus mammari, raro carius."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Eshkol. 379.

1754.—"I delivered a present to the Governor, consisting of oranges and lemons, with several sorts of dried fruits, and six carboys of Isfahan wine."—Hanway, i. 102.

1800.—"Six carabahs of rose-water."—Symes, Emb. to Aea, p. 488.

1813.—"Carboy of Rosewater. . ."—Miliburn, ii. 330.

1875.—"People who make it (Shiraz Wine) generally bottle it themselves, or else sell it in huge bottles called 'Karaba' holding about a dozen quarts."—Macgregor, Journey through Khorassan, &c., 1879, i. 57.

CARCANA, CARCONNA, s. H. from P. kêrkhdnâ, 'a place where business is done'; a workshop; a departmental establishment such as that of the commissariat, or the artillery park, in the field.

1683.—"There are also found many raised Walks and Tents in sundry Places, that are the offices of several Officers. Besides these there are many great Halls that are called Kar-Kanâyâ, or places where Handy-craftsmen do work."—Herrter, E. T. 83; [ed. Constable, 268].

c. 1756.—"In reply, Hydrud pleaded his poverty . . . but he promised that as soon as he should have established his power, and had time to regulate his departments (Kârkhdnâjât), the amount should be paid."—Hussein Ali Khan, History of Hydrud Nâih, p. 87.

1800.—"The elephant belongs to the Karâna, but you may as well keep him till we meet."—Wellington, i. 144.

1804.—"If the (bullock) establishment should be formed, it should be in regular Karânas."—Ibid. iii. 512.

CARCOON, s. Mahr. kêrkân, 'a clerk,' H.—P. kêrk-kân, (faciendorum factor) or 'manager.'

[c. 1590.—"In the same way as the kar-kun sets down the transactions of the assessments, the mukaddeem and the patwâri shall keep their respective accounts."—Ain, tr. Jorret, ii. 45.

[1616.—"Made means to the Corcane or Scrvano to help us to the copia of the King's licence."—Foster, Letters, iii. 122.

1826.—"My benefactor's chief carcon or clerk allowed me to sort out and direct despatches to officers at a distance who belonged to the command of the great Sawant Rao."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 28].

CARÉNS, n.p. Burm. Ka-reng, [a word of which the meaning is very uncertain. It is said to mean 'dirty-feeders,' or 'low-caste people,' and it has been connected with the Kiriita tribe (see the question discussed by McMahon, The Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 43 seqq.). A name applied to a group of non-Burmese tribes, settled in the forest and hill tracts of Pegu and the adjoining parts of Burma, from Mergui in the south, to beyond Toungoo in the north, and from Arakan to the Salwen, and beyond that river far into Siamese territory. They do not know the name Kareng, nor have they one name for their own race; distinguishing, among these whom we call Karens, three tribes, Sgaw, Pwo, and Bghai, which differ somewhat in customs and traditions, and especially in language. "The results of the labours among them of the American Baptist Mission have the appearance of being almost miraculous, and it is not going too far to state that the cessation of blood feuds, and the peaceable way in which the various tribes are living . . . and have lived together since they came under British rule, is far more due to the influence exercised over them by the missionaries than to the measures adopted by the English Government, beneficial as these doubtless have been" (Br. Burma Gazetteer, [ii. 226]). The author of this excellent work should not, however, have admitted the quotation of Dr. Mason's fanciful notion about the identity of Marco Polo's Carojan with Karen, which is totally groundless.

1759.—"There is another people in this country called Carrianners, whiter than either (Burmans or Peguans), distinguished into Baraghahm and Pegy Carrianners; they live in the woods, in small Societies, of ten or twelve houses; are not wanting in industry, though it goes no further than to procure them an annual subsistence."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 100.

1799.—"From this reverend father (V. Sangermano) I received much useful information. He told me of a singular description of people called Carayners or Carieners, that inhabit different parts of the country, particularly the western provinces of Dalla and Bassein, several societies of whom also dwell in the district adjacent to Rangoon. He represented them as a simple, innocent race, speaking a language distinct from that of the Birmans, and entertaining rude notions of religion. They are timorous, honest, mild in their manners, and exceedingly hospitable to strangers."—Symes, 297.

c. 1819.—"We must not omit here the Carian, a good and peaceable people, who live dispersed through the forests of Pegh, in small villages consisting of 4 or 5 houses . . . they are totally dependent upon the despotic government of the Burmese."—Sangermano, p. 34.

CARNIC, n.p. Etymology doubtful; Tam. Karamakkal, [which is either kārāi, 'masonry' or 'the plant, thorny webera': kāl, 'channel' (Madras Adm. Man. ii. 212, Gloss. s.v.)]. A French settlement within the limits of Tanjore district.

CARNATIC, n.p. Kārṇataka and Kārṇāṭaka, Skt. adjective forms from Kārṇāṭa or Kārṇāṭa, [Tam. kar, 'black,' nādu, 'country']. This word in native use, according to Bp. Caldwell, denoted the Telegu and Canarese people and their language, but in process of time became specially the appellation of the people speaking Canarese and their language (Drav. Gram. 2nd ed. Introd. p. 34). The Mahometans on their arrival in S. India found a region which embraces Mysore and part of Telingana (in fact the kingdom of Vijayanagaram, called the Kārnāṭaka country, and this was identical in application (and probably in etymology) with the Canara country (q.v.) of the older Portuguese writers. The Kārnāṭaka became extended, especially in connection with the rule of the Nabobs of Arcot, who partially occupied the Vijayanagara territory, and were known as Nawabs of the Kārnāṭaka, to the country below the Ghaouts, on the eastern side of the Peninsula, just as the other form Canara had become extended to the country below the Western Ghaouts; and eventually among the English the term Carnatic came to be understood in a sense more or less restricted to the eastern low country, though never quite so absolutely as Canara has become restricted to the western low country. The term Carnatic is now obsolete.

c. A.D. 550.—In the Brhat-Saṁhitā of Varāhamihira, in the enumeration of peoples and regions of the south, we have in Kern's translation (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 83) Kārṇatik; the original form, which is not given by Kern, is Kārṇāṭa.

c. A.D. 1100.—In the later Sanskrit literature this name often occurs, e.g. in the Kāthasaritśāgara, or 'Ocean of Rivers of Stories,' a collection of tales (in verse) of the beginning of the 12th century, by Somadeva, of Kashmir; but it is not possible to attach any very precise meaning to the term as there used. [See refs. in Towney, tr. ii. 561.]

A.D. 1400.—The word also occurs in the inscriptions of the Vijayanagara dynasty, e.g. in one of A.D. 1400.—(Elem. of S. Indian Palaeography, 2nd ed. pl. xxx.)

1603.—"In the land of Kārṇāṭa and Vidyānagara was the King Mahendrā."—Taranatha's H. of Buddhism, by Schieffner, p. 267.

c. 1610.—"The Zumindars of Singaldip (Ceylon) and Karnaták came up with their forces and expelled Sheo Rai, the ruler of the Dakhín."—Firíshtha, in Elliot, vi. 549.

1614.—See quotation from Couto under CANARA.

c. 1652.—"Gandicot is one of the strongest Cities in the Kingdom of Carnatica."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 98; [ed. Ball, i. 284].

c. 1660.—"The Rās of the Kārnāṭik, Mahratta (country), and Telingana, were subject to the Rās of Bidar."—'Amal-i-Salih, in Elliot vii. 126.

1673.—"I received this information from the natives, that the Canatick country reaches from Gongola to the Zamerkin's Country of the Malabars along the Sea, and inland up to the Pepper Mountains of Sundar . . . Bedmore, four Days Journey hence, is the Capital City."—Fryer, 162, in Letter IV., A Relation of the Canatick Country.—Here he identifies the "Canatick" with Canara below the Ghaouts.

So also the coast of Canara seems meant in the following:

c. 1760.—"Though the navigation from the Carnatic coast to Bombay is of a very short run, of not above six or seven degrees. . . ."—Grose, i. 232.

"The Carnatic or province of Arcot . . . its limits now are greatly inferior to those which bounded the ancient Carnatic; for the Nabobs of Arcot have never extended their authority beyond the river Gondegama to the north; the great chain of mountains to the west; and the branches of the Kingdom of Trichinopoly, Tanjore, and Maisal to the south; the sea bounds it on the east."—Ibid. II. vii.

1782.—"Siwaee Madhoo Rao . . . with this immense force . . . made an incursion 1792. "I hope that our acquisitions by this peace will give so much additional strength and compactness to the frontier of our possessions, both in the Caracc, and on the coast of Malabar, as to render it difficult for any power above the Ghauts to invade us."—Lord Cornwallis's Despatch from Seringapatam, in Seton-Karr, ii. 96.

1826. "Camp near Chillumbrum (Caracc), March 21st." This date of a letter of Bp. Heber's is probably one of the latest instances of the use of the term in a natural way.

CARNATIC FASHION. See under BENIGNITED.

(1). CARRACK, n.p. An island in the upper part of the Persian Gulf, which has been more than once in British occupation. Properly Khārak. It is so written in Jaubert's Edrisi (i. 364, 372). But Dr. Badger gives the modern Arabic as el-Khārij, which would represent old P. Khārīg.

c. 830. "Khārak... this isle who a un farsakh on long et en large, produit du ble, des palmiers, et des vigne."—Ibn Khurdābha, in J. As. ser. vi. tom. v. 283.

c. 1563. "Partendosi da Basora si passa 200 miglia di Golfo col mare a banda destra sino che si giunge nell'isola di Carichè."—C. Federici, in Rassismio, iii. 386 c.

1727. "The Islands of Carrick ly, about West North West, 12 Leagues from Bou-cherier."—A. Hamilton, i. 90.

1758. "The Baron... immediately sailed for the little island of Karèc, where he safely landed; having attentively surveyed the spot he at that time laid the plan, which he afterwards executed with so much success."—Ives, 212.

(2). CARRACK, s. A kind of vessel of burden of the Middle Ages down to the end of the 17th century. The character of the earlier carrack cannot be precisely defined. But the larger cargo-ships of the Portuguese in the trade of the 16th century were generally so styled, and these were sometimes of enormous tonnage, with 3 or 4 decks. Charnock (Marine Architecture, ii. p. 9) has a plate of a Genoese carrack of 1542. He also quotes the description of a Portuguese carrack taken by Sir John Barrough in 1592. It was of 1,600 tons burden, whereof 900 merchandize; carried 32 brass pieces and between 600 and 700 passengers (?); was built with 7 decks. The word (L. Lat.) carraca is regarded by Skeat as properly carrica, from carricare, It. caricare, 'to lade, to charge.' This is possible; but it would be well to examine if it be not from the Ar. ħarṭah, a word which the dictionaries explain as 'fire-ship'; though this is certainly not always the meaning. Dozy is inclined to derive carraca (which is old in Sp. he says) from karākīr, the pl. of kūrkār or kūrkār (see CARACOA). And kūrkār itself he thinks may have come from caricare, which already occurs in St. Jerome. So that Mr. Skeat's origin is possibly correct. [The N. E. D. refers to carraca, of which the origin is said to be uncertain.] Ibn Batuta uses the word twice at least for a state barge or something of that kind (see Cathay p. 498, and Ibn Bat. ii. 116; iv. 289). The like use occurs several times in Makrizi (e.g. i. i. 143; i. ii. 66; and ii. i. 24). Quatremère at the place first quoted observes that the barakāth was not a fire ship in our sense, but a vessel with a high deck from which fire could be thrown; but that it could also be used as a transport vessel, and was so used on sea and land.

1385. "... after that we embarked at Venice on board a certain carrack, and sailed down the Adriatic Sea."—Friar Pasqua, in Cathay, &c., 231.

1403. "... The prayer being concluded, and the storm still going on, a light like a candle appeared in the cage at the mast-head of the carraca, and another light on the spar that they call bawsprit (bawpdrés) which is fixed in the forecastle; and another light like a candle in una vara de espinho (?) over the poop, and these lights were seen by as many as were in the carrack, and were called up to see them, and they lasted awhile and then disappeared, and all this while the storm did not cease, and by-and-by all went to sleep except the steersman and certain sailors of the watch."—Clavijo, § xiii. Comp. Markham, p. 13.

CARRACK.

1566-68.—"... about the middle of the month of Ramazan, in the year 974, the inhabitants of Funan and Pandereesah [i.e. Pomany and Pandarani, q.v.], having sailed out of the former of those ports in a fleet of 12 grabs, captured a caracca belonging to the Franks, which had arrived from Bengal, and which was laden with rice and sugar... in the year 976 another party... in a fleet of 17 grabs... made capture off Shalecat (see CHALIA) of a large caracca, which had sailed from Cochin, having on board nearly 1,000 Franks..."—Tolufut-ul-Mujahideen, p. 159.

1596.—"It comes as farre short as... a cocke-boate of a Carrick."—T. Nosh, Have you with you to Saffron Walden, repr. by J. P. Collier, p. 72.

1613.—"They are made like carracks, only strength and storage."—Beauw. & Flet., The Cozzwomb, i. 3.

1615.—"After we had given her chase for about 5 hours, her colours and bulk discovered her to be a very great Portuguese carrack bound for Goa."—Terry, in Purchas; [ed. 1777, p. 34].

1620.—"The harbor at Nangasque is the best in all Japon, where there may be 1000 scale of shipps ride landlockt, and the greatest ships or carickes in the world... ride before the townes within a cable's length of the shore in 7 or 8 fathom water at least."—Cocks, Letter to Batavia, ii. 313.

c. 1620.—"I fau attendre là des Filotes du lieu, que les Gouverneurs de Bombaim et de Marsagio ont soin d'envoyer tout à l'heure, pour conduire le Vaisseau à Turumba [i.e. Trombay] où les Carques ont coutume d'hyverner."—Routier... des Indes Or., by Aleixo da Motta, in Thevenot.

c. 1635.—
"The bigger Whale, like some huge carrack lay Which wanted Sea room for her foes to play..."—Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

1653.—"... pour moy il me vouloit loger en son Palais, et que si l'anois la volonté de retourner a Lisbonne par mer, il me feroit embarquer sur les premières Karques..."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 213.

1660.—"And further, That every Merchant Denizen who shall hereafter ship any Goods or Merchandise in any Carrack or Galley shall pay to your Majesty all manner of Customs, and all the Subsidies aforesaid, as any Alien born out of the Realm."—Act 12 Car. II. cap. iv. s. iv. (Tonnage and Poundage).

c. 1680.—"To this City of the floating... which foreigners, with a little variation from carroges, call carracas."—Vieira, quoted by Bluttenz.

1684.—"... there was a Carack of Portugal cast away upon the Reef having on board at that Time 4,000,000 of Guilders in Gold... a present from the King of Siam to the King of Portugal."—Cowley, 32, in Dampier's Voyages, iv.

CARRAWAY, s. This word for the seed of Carum carvi, L., is (probably through Sp. alearvez) from the Arabic karawwyd. It is curious that the English form is thus closer to the Arabic than either the Spanish, or the French and Italian carvi, which last has passed into Scotch as carry. But the Arabic itself is a corruption [not immediately, N.E.D.] of Lat. carvi, or Gr. κάρυον (Dory)."—De southe, 1660.—

CARTMEEL, s. This is, at least in the Punjab, the ordinary form that "mail-cart" takes among the natives. Such inversions are not uncommon. Thus Sir David Ochterlonny is always called by the Sepoys Loni-okhtar. In our memory an officer named Holroyd was always called by the Sepoys Roydal, [and Browmlon, Lbrum. By another curious corruption Mackintosh becomes Makkhani-tosh, 'buttered toast'!]

CARTOOCCE, s. A cartridge; kārtūs, Sepoy H.; [comp. TOSTDAUN].

CARYOTA, s. This is the botanical name (Caroiga urens, L.) of a magnificent palm growing in the moister forest regions, as in the Western Ghauts and in Eastern Bengal, in Ceylon, and in Burma. A conspicuous character is presented by its enormous bipinnate leaves, somewhat resembling colossal bracken- fronds, 15 to 25 feet long, 10 to 12 in width; also by the huge pendent clusters of its inflorescence and seeds, the latter like masses of rosaries 10 feet long and upwards. It affords much Toddy (q.v.), made into spirit and sugar, and is the tree chiefly affording these products in Ceylon, where it is called Kitol. It also affords a kind of sago, and a woolly substance found at the foot of the leaf-stalks is sometimes used for caulking, and forms a good tinder. The sp. name urens is derived from the acid, burning taste of the fruit. It is called, according to Brandis, the Mhdr-palm in Western India. We know of no Hindustani or familiar Anglo-Indian name. [Watt, (Econ. Dict. ii. 206) says that it is known in Bombay as the Hill or Sago palm. It has penetrated in Upper India as far as Chunār.] The name Caryota seems taken from Pliny; but his application is to a kind of date-palm; his statement that it afforded the best wine of the East probably suggested the transfer.

C. A.D. 70.—"Ab his caryotaee maxumce celebrantur, et cibo quidem et suco uberrimae, ex quibus praecepua vina orienti, iniqua capit, unde pomo nomen."—Pliny, xii. § 9.

1681.—"The next tree is the Kettule. It growth straight, but not so tall or big as a Coker-Nut-Tree; the inside nothing but a white pith, as the former. It yieldeth a sort of Liquor...very sweet and pleasing to the Pallate. ... The which Liquor they boil and make a kind of brown sugar called Jaggory [see JAGGERY], &c."—Knox, p. 15.

1777.—"The Caryota urens, called the Saguer tree, grew between Salatiga and Kopping, and was said to be the real tree from which sago is made."—Thunberg, E. T., iv. 149. A mistake, however.

1861.—See quotation under PEEPUL.

CASH. s. A name applied by Europeans to sundry coins of low value in various parts of the Indies. The word in its original form is of extreme antiquity, "Skt. karsha...a weight of silver or gold equal to \( \frac{1}{80} \) of a Tulá" (Williams, Skt. Dict.; and see also a Note on the Kársha, or rather kárshopāna, as a copper coin of great antiquity, in E. Thomas's Pathān Kings of Delhi, 361-362). From the Tam. form kāsū, or perhaps from some Kon-kani form which we have not traced, the Portuguese seem to have made caixa, whence the English cash. In Singalese also kāsī is used for 'coin' in general. The English term was appropriated in the monetary system which prevailed in S. India up to 1818; thus there was a copper coin for use in Madras struck in England in 1803, which bears on the reverse, "XX Cash." A figure of this coin is given in Rouding. Under this system 80 cash = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 star pagoda. But from an early date the Portuguese had applied caixa to the small money of foreign systems, such as those of the Malay Islands, and especially to that of the Chinese. In China the word cash is used, by Europeans and their hangers-on, as the synonym of the Chinese le and taïen, which are those coins made of an alloy of copper and lead with a square hole in the middle, which in former days ran 1000 to the tiâng or tael (q.v.), and which are strung in certain numbers on cords. [This type of money, as was recently pointed out by Lord Avebury, is a survival of the primitive currency, which was in the shape of an axe.] Rouleaux of coin thus strung are represented on the surviving bank-notes of the Ming dynasty (A.D. 1368 onwards), and probably were also on the notes of their Mongol predecessors.

The existence of the distinct English word cash may probably have affected the form of the corruption before us. This word had a European origin from it. cassa, French caisse, 'the money-chest'; this word in book-keeping having given name to the heading of account under which actual disbursements of coin were entered (see Wedgwood and N.E.D. s.v.). In Minshew (2nd ed. 1627) the present sense of the word is not attained. He only gives "a tradesman's cash, or Counter to keepe money in."

1510.—"They have also another coin called cas, 16 of which go to a tare of silver."—Vanhema, 130.

1598.—"In this country (Calicut) a great number of apes are produced, one of which is worth 4 casse, and one casse is worth a quattrino."—Ibid. 172. (Why a monkey should be worth 4 casse is obscure.)

1598.—"You must understand that in Sunda there is also no other kind of money than certaine copper mynt called Caixa, of the bignes of a Hollâdes doite, but not half so thicke, in the middle whereof is a hole to hang it on a string, for that commodie they put two hundreth or a thousand upon one string."—Linsechoten, 34; [Hak. Soc. i. 113].

1600.—"Those (coins) of Lead are called caxas, whereof 1600 make one mas."—John Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

[1621.—"In many places they threw abroad Cashas (or brassie money) in great quantety."—Cocks, Diary, ii. 202.]

1711.—"Doodoos and Cash are Copper Coins, eight of the former make one Fanam, and ten of the latter one Doodoo."—Lockyer, 8. [Doodoo is the Tel. duddu, Skt. dvi, 'two'; a more modern scale is: 2 doonganni = 1 doody; 3 doodies = 1 anna.—Mad. Gloss. s.v.]

1718.—"Cash (a very small coin, eighty whereof make one Fano)."—Propagation of the Gospel in the East, ii. 52.

1727.—"At Atcheen they have a small coin of leaden Money called Cash, from CASHMERE. 168 CASHMERE.

12 to 1600 of them goes to one Mace, or Massic."—A. Hamilton, ii. 109.

c. 1750-60.—"At Madras and other parts of the coast of Coromandel, 80 cashes make a fanam, or 3d. sterling; and 36 fanams a silver pagoda, or 7s. 8d. sterling."—Grose, i. 282.

1790.—"So far am I from giving credit to the late Government (of Madras) for economy, in not making the necessary preparations for war, according to the positive orders of the Supreme Government, after having received the most gross insult that could be offered to any nation! I think it very possible that every Cash of that ill-judged saving may cost the company a crore of rupees."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis to E. J. Holland, Esq., see the Madras Courier, 22nd Sept. 1791.

[1792.—"Whereas the sum of Raheties 1223, 6 fanams and 30 khas has been deducted."—Agreement in Logan, Malabar, iii. 226.]

1813.—At Madras, according to Milburn, the coinage ran:

"10 Cash=1 dodoee; 2 dodoees=1 pie; 8 dodoees=1 single fanam," &c.

The following shows a singular corruption, probably of the Chinese tsien, and illustrates how the striving after meaning shapes such corruptions:

1876.—"All money transactions (at Manwyne on the Burman-Chinese frontier) are effected in the copper coin of China called 'change,' of which about 400 or 500 go to the rupee. These coins are generally strung on cord," &c.—Report on the Country through which the Force passed to meet the Governor, by W. J. Charlton, M. D.

An intermediate step in this transformation is found in Cock's Japan Journal, passim, e.g., ii. 89:

"But that which I tooks most note of was of the liberalite and devotion of these heathen people, who thronged into the Pagod in multitudes one after another to cast money into a littel chapell before the idalles, most parte ... being gins or brass money, whereof 100 of them may vallie some 10d. str., and are about the bignes of a 3d. English money."

CASHEW, s. The tree, fruit, or nut of the Anacardium occidentale, an American tree which must have been introduced early into India by the Portuguese, for it was widely diffused apparently as a wild tree long before the end of the 17th century, and it is described as an Indian tree by Acosta, who wrote in 1578. Crawford also speaks of it as abundant, and in full bearing, in the jungly islets of Hastings Archipelago, off the coast of Camboja (Emb. to Siam, dec., i. 103) [see Teele's note on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 27]. The name appears to be S. American, acajou, of which an Indian form, kaçô, [and Malay gajus], have been made. The so-called fruit is the fleshy top of the peduncle which bears the nut. The oil in the shell of the nut is acrid to an extraordinary degree, whilst the kernels, which are roasted and eaten, are quite bland. The tree yields a gum imported under the name of Cadju gum.

1578.—"This tree gives a fruit called commonly Caliu; which being a good stomachic, and of good favour, is much esteemed by all who know it. ... This fruit does not grow everywhere, but is found in gardens at the city of Santa Cruz in the Kingdom of Cochín."—C. Acosta, Tractado, 324 seqq.

1598.—"Cajus growth on trees like apple-trees, and are of the bignes of a Peare."—Linschoten, p. 94; [Hak. Soc. ii. 28].

[1623.—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 135, calls it cagiu.]

1658.—In Piso, De Indiae utriusque Re Naturali et Medico, Amst., we have a good cut of the tree as one of Brasil, called Acabao "et fructus ejus Acaju." 1672.—"... il Cagiu. ... Questo è l'Amandola ordinaria dell' India, per il che se ne raccoglie grandissima quantità, essendo la pianta fertileissima e molto frequente, ancora nelli luoghi più deserti e insulti."—Vincenzo Maria, 354.

1673.—Fryer describes the tree under the name Cherise (apparently some mistake), p. 182.

1764.—"... Yet if The Acajou haply in the garden bloom..."—Grainger, iv.

[1813.—Forbes calls it the "cashew-apple," and the "cajou-apple."—Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 292, 298.]

c. 1830.—"The cashew, with its apple like that of the cities of the Plain, fair to look at, but acrid to the taste, to which the far-famed nut is appended like a bud."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1853, p. 140.

1875.—"Cajou kernels."—Table of Customs Duties imposed in Br. India up to 1875.

CASHMERE, n.p. The famous province of the Western Himālaya, H. and P. Kashmír, from Skt. Kashmíra, and sometimes Káshmíra, alleged by Burnouf to be a contraction of Kasypamíra. [The name is more probably connected with the Khosa tribe.] Whether or not it be the Kaspatyros or Kaspyryus of Herodotus, we believe it undoubtedly to be the Kaspeiria (kingdom) of Ptolemy.
Several of the old Arabian geographers write the name with the guttural k; but this is not so used in modern times.

c. 630.—"The Kingdom of Kia-shi-mi-lo (Kashmira) has about 7000 li of circuit. On all sides its frontiers are surrounded by mountains; these are of prodigious height; and although there are paths affording access to it, these are extremely narrow."—Huen T'ang (Pel. Bouddhi.) ii. 167.

c. 940.—"Kashmir . . . is a mountainous country, forming a large kingdom, containing not less than 60,000 or 70,000 towns or villages. It is inaccessible except on one side, and can only be entered by one gate."—Mas'ud, i. 373.

1275.—"Kashmir, a province of India, adjoining the Turks; and its people of mixt Turk and Indian blood excel all others in beauty."—Zakariya Kasziv, in Gildemeister, 210.

1298.—"Keshimur also is a province inhabited by a people who are idolaters and have a language of their own . . . this country is the very source from which idolatry has spread abroad."—Marco Polo, i. 175.

1552.—"The Mogols hold especially towards the N.E. the region Sogdiana, which they now call Queximire, and also Mount Caucasus which divides India from the other Provinces."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1615.—"Chishmier, the chiefe City is called Sirinakar."—Terry, in Purchas, i. 1467; [so in Roe's Map, vol. ii. Hak. Soc. ed.; Chismer in Foster, Letters, iii. 283].

1664.—"From all that hath been said, one may easily conjecture, that I am somewhat charmed with Kachemire, and that I pretend there is nothing in the world like it for so small a kingdom."—Bernier, E. T. 129; [ed. Constable, 400].

Dryden's Avarungeze, iii. 1.

1814.—"The shawls of Cassimer and the silks of Iran."—Forbes, Or. Mot, iii. 177; [2nd ed. ii. 292]. (See KERSEYMERE.)

CASIS, CAXIS, CACIZ, &c., s. This Spanish and Portuguese word, though Dozy gives it only as prêtre chrétien, is frequently employed by old travellers, and writers on Eastern subjects, to denote Mahomedan divines (mullas and the like). It may be suspected to have arisen from a confusion of two Arabic terms—kâdi (see CAXEE) and kâshîsh or kâsîs, 'a Christian Presbyter' (from a Syriac root signifying senuit). Indeed we sometimes find the precise word kâshîsh (Caxiiz) used by Christian writers as if it were the special title of a Mahomedan theologian, instead of being, as it really is, the special and technical title of a Christian priest (a fact which gives Mount Athos its common Turkish name of Kâshîsh Dâgh). In the first of the following quotations the word appears to be applied by the Mussulman historian to pagan priests, and the word for churches to pagan temples. In the others, except that from Major Millingen, it is applied by Christian writers to Mahomedan divines, which is indeed its recognised signification in Spanish and Portuguese. In Jarric's Thesaurus (Jesuit Missions, 1606) the word Cacizius is constantly used in this sense.

c. 1310.—"There are 700 churches (kâlisâ) resembling fortresses, and every one of them overflowing with presbyters (kâshîshân) without faith, and monks without religion."—Description of the Chinese City of Khâwiz (Hankou) in Wadding's History (see also Marco Polo, ii. 196).

1404.—"The town was inhabited by Moorish hermits called Caxises; and many people came to them on pilgrimage, and they healed many diseases."—Markham's Clavijo, 79.

1514.—"And so, from one to another, the message passed through four or five hands, till it came to a Gazzii, whom we shall call a bishop or prelate, who stood at the King's feet . . ."—Letter of Gis. de Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. Append. p. 80.

1538.—"Just as the Cryer was offering to deliver me unto whomsoever would buy me in common that very Caxis Moriana, whom they held for a Saint, with 10 or 11 other Cacis his Inferiors, all Priests like himself of their wicked sect."—F. M. Piatol (tr. by H. C.), p. 8.

1552.—Caciz in the same sense used by Barros, II. ii. 1.

[1553.—See quotation from Barros under LAR.

[1554.—"Who was a Caciz of the Moors, which means in Portuguese an ecclesiastic."—Castaneda, Bk. I. ch. 7.]

1561.—"The King sent off the Moor, and with him his Casis, an old man of much authority, who was the principal priest of his Mosque."—Correa, by Ld. Stanley, 113.

1567.—". . . The Holy Synod declares it necessary to remove from the territories of His Highness all the infidels whose office it is to maintain their false religion, such as are the cacizes of the Moors, and the preachers of the Gentoes, jogoos, sorcerers, (feiticeiros), jousis, gros (i.e. joshis or astrologers, and yuras), and whatsoever others make a business of religion among the infidels, and so also the bramanes and paibus 1795. — "All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Burmans." — Synes, p. 318.

CASSOWARY, s. The name of this great bird, of which the first species known (Casuarius galeatus) is found only in Ceram Island (Moluccas), is Malay kasuwari or kasuar; [according to Scott, the proper reading is kasuwari, and he remarks that no Malay Dict. records the word before 1863]. Other species have been observed in N. Guinea, N. Britain, and N. Australia.

[1611. — "St. James his Ginny Hens, the Cassawary moreover." — (Note by Coriat.)

"An East Indian bird at St. James in the keeping of Mr. Walker, that will carry no cornes, but eat them as what you will." — Peacham, in Paneg. verses on Coriat's Crudities, sig. J. 3r. (1766); quoted by Scott.]

1659. — "This aforesaid bird Cossebaires also will swallow iron and lead, as we once learned by experience. For when our Consetabel once had been casting bullets on the Admiral's Bastion, and then went to dinner, there came one of these Cossebaires on the bastion, and swallowed 50 of the bullets. And . . . next day I found that the bird after keeping them a while in his maw had regularly cast up again all the 50." — J. J. Sear, 86.

1682. — "On the islands Sumatra (?) Banda, and the other adjoining islands of the Molucces there is a certain bird, which by the natives is called Emeu or Ene, but otherwise is commonly named by us Kasuaris." — Nieuhof, ii. 281.

1705. — "The Cassawaris is about the bigness of a large Virginia Turkey. His head is the same as a Turkey's; and he has a long stiff hairy Beard upon his Breast before, like a Turkey. . . ." — Pannell, in Dampier, iv. 266.

CASTE, s. "The artificial divisions of society in India, first made known to us by the Portuguese, and described by them under their term caste, signifyning 'breed, race, kind,' which has been retained in English under the supposition that it was the native name" (Wedgwood, s.v.). [See the extraordinary derivation of Hamilton below.] Mr. Elphinstone prefers to write "Cast."

We do not find that the early Portuguese writer Barbosa (1516) applies the word casta to the divisions of Hindu society. He calls these divisions in Narsinga and Malabar so many leis de gentios, i.e. ‘laws’ of the heathen, in the sense of sectarian rules of life. But he uses the word casta in a less technical way, which shows how it should easily have passed into the technical sense. Thus, speaking of the King of Calicut: “This King keeps 1000 women, to whom he gives regular maintenance, and they always go to his court to act as the sweepers of his palaces . . . these are ladies, and of good family” (estas sao fidalgas e de boa casta.—In Coll. of Lisbon Academy, ii. 316). So also Castanheda: “There fled a knight who was called Fernão Lopez, homem de boa casta” (iii. 230). In the quotations from Barros, Correa, and Garcia de Orta, we have the word in what we may call the technical sense.

c. 1444.—“Whence I conclude that this race (casta) of men is the most agile and dexterous that there is in the world.”—Cadamosto, Navegação, i. 14.

1552.—“The Admiral . . . received these Naires with honour and joy, saying great contentment with the King for sending his message by such persons, saying that he expected this coming of theirs to prosper, as there did not enter into the business any man of the caste (casta) of the Moors.”—Barros, i. vi. 5.

1561.—“Some of them asserted that they were of the casta (casta) of the Christians.”—Correa, Lezas, i. 2, 685.

1563.—“One thing is to be noted . . . that no one changes from his father’s trade, and all those of the same caste (casta) of shoemakers are the same.”—Correa, f. 213b.

1567.—“In some parts of this Province (of Goa) the Gentoos divide themselves into distinct races or castes (castas) of greater or less dignity, holding the Christians as of lower degree, and keep these so superstitiously that no one of a higher caste can eat or drink with those of a lower . . .”—Decree 2nd of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 4. 1572.—

By Burton:

“Two modes of men are known; the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower Caste Poloas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain.”

1612.—“As regards the castes (castas) the great impediment to the conversion of the Gentoos is the superstition which they maintain in relation to their castes, and which prevents them from touching, communicating, or mingling with others, whether superior or inferior; these of one observance with those of another.”—Costo, Dec. V. vi. 4. See also as regards the Portuguese use of the word, Guuzeu, ff. 103, 104, 105, 106b, 129b; Synodo, 189, &c.

1630.—“The common Bremane hath eighty two Casts or Tribes, assuming to themselves the name of that tribe . . .”—Lord's Display of the Banians, p. 72.

1673.—“The mixture of Casts or Tribes of all India are distinguished by the different modes of binding their Turbats.”—Fryer, 115.

c. 1760.—“The distinction of the Gentoos into their tribes or Casts, forms another considerable object of their religion.”—Groe, i. 201.

1763.—“The Casts or tribes into which the Indians are divided, are reckoned by travellers to be eighty-four.”—Orme (ed. 1803), i. 4.

[1820.—“The Kayasthas (pronounced Kaists, hence the word caste) follow next.”—W. Hamilton, Descr. of Hindostan, i. 109.]

1878.—“There are thousands and thousands of these so-called Castes; no man knows their number, no man can know it; for the conception is a very flexible one, and moreover new castes continually spring up, and pass away.”—P. Jour, Die Indische Handwerk und Grozer, 13.

Castes are, according to Indian social views, either high or low.

1876.—“Low-caste Hindoos in their own land are, to all ordinary apprehension, slovenly, dirty, ungraceful, generally un-acceptable in person and surroundings . . . Yet offensive as is the low-caste Indian, were I estate-owner, or colonial governor, I had rather see the lowest Pariahs of the low, than a single trim, smooth-faced, smooth-wayed, clever high-caste Hindoo, on my lands or in my colony.”—W. G. Palgrave, in Fortnightly Rev., ex. 226.

In the Madras Press, castes are also ‘Right-hand’ and ‘Left-hand.’ This distinction represents the agricultural classes on the one hand, and the artisans, &c., on the other, as was pointed out by F. W. Ellis. In the old days of Ft. St. George, faction-fights between the two were very common, and the terms right-hand and left-hand castes occur early in the old records of that settlement, and frequently in Mr. Talboys Wheeler's extracts from them. They are mentioned by Couto. [See Nelson, Madura, Pt. ii. p. 4; Oppert, Orig. Inhab. p. 57.]

Sir Walter Elliot considers this feud to be "nothing else than the occasional outbreak of the smouldering antagonism between Brahmanism and Buddhism, although in the lapse of ages both parties have lost sight of the fact. The points on which they split now are mere trifles, such as parading on horse-back or in a palanquin in procession, erecting a pandal or marriage-shed on a given number of pillars, and claiming to carry certain flags, &c. The right-hand party is headed by the Brahmans, and includes the Parias, who assume the van, beating their tom-toms when they come to blows. The chief of the left-hand are the Panchalars [i.e. the Five Classes, workers in metal and stone, &c.], followed by the Pallars and workers in leather, who sound their long trumpets and engage the Parias." (In Journ. Ethnol. Soc. N.S. 1869, p. 112.)

1612.—"From these four castes are derived 196; and those again are divided into two parties, which they call Valanga and Elange [Tam. valangai, idangai], which is as much as to say 'the right hand' and 'the left hand. . . ."—Couto, u. s.

The word is current in French:

1842.—"Il est clair que les castes n'ont jamais pu exister solide sans une veritable conservation religieuse."—Comte, Cours de Phil. Positive, vi. 505.

1877.—"Nous avons aboli les castes et les privilèges, nous avons inscrit partout le principe de l'égalité devant la loi, nous avons donné le suffrage à tous, mais voilà qu'on réclame maintenant l'égalité des conditions."—E. de Laveleye, De la Propriété, p. iv.

Caste is also applied to breeds of animals, as 'a high-caste Arab.' In such cases the usage may possibly have come directly from the Port. alta casta, casta baixa, in the sense of breed or strain.

CASTEES, s. Obsolete. The Indo-Portuguese formed from casta the word castico, which they used to denote children born in India of Portuguese parents; much as creole was used in the W. Indies.

1599.—"Liberi vero nati in India, utroque parente Lusitano, castiscos vocantur, in omnibus fere Lusitani similes, colorum tamen modicum different, ut qui ad glivum non nihil deflectant. Ex castisis deinde nati magic magisque gilivi sunt, a parentibus et medieos magi defunctae; porro et medieos nati per occam indigenis respondent, ita ut in tertio generatione Lusitani reliquis Indios sunt simillimis."—De Bry, ii. 76; (Linschoten [Hak. Soc. i. 184]).

1638.—"Les habitants sont ou Castizes, c'est à dire Portugais naturels, et nez de pere et de mere Portugais, ou Mestizes, c'est à dire, nez d'un pere Portugais et d'une mere Indienne."—Mandello.

1699.—"Castees wives at Fort St. George."—Calcutta, i. 356.

1726.—". . . or the offspring of the same by native women, to wit Mistices and Casties, or blacks . . . and Moors."—Valentijn, v. 3.

CASUARINA, s. A tree (Casuarina muricata, Roxb.—N. O. Casuarineae) indigenous on the coast of Chittagong and the Burmese provinces, and southward as far as Queensland. It was introduced into Bengal by Dr. F. Buchanan, and has been largely adopted as an ornamental tree both in Bengal and in Southern India. The tree has a considerable superficial resemblance to a larch or other finely-feathered conifer, making a very acceptable variety in the hot plains, where real pines will not grow. [The name, according to Mr. Scott, appears to be based on a Malay name associating the tree with the Cassowary, as Mr. Skeat suggests from the resemblance of its needles to the quills of the bird.]

1861.—See quotation under PEEPUL.

1867.—"Our road lay chiefly by the sea-coast, along the white sands, which were fringed for miles by one grand continuous line or border of casuarina trees."—Ll. Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 362.

1879.—"It was lovely in the white moonlight, with the curving shadows of palms on the dewy grass, the grace of the drooping casuarinas, the shining water, and the long drift of surf. . . ."—Miss Bird, Golden Cher- somese, 275.
CATAMARÁN, s. Also CUTFMURRÁM. CUTMURAL. Tam. kattu, 'binding,' maram, 'wood.' A raft formed of three or four logs of wood lashed together. The Anglo-Indian accentuation of the last syllable is not correct.

1583.—"Seven round timbers lashed together for each of the said boats, and of the said seven timbers five form the bottom; one in the middle longer than the rest makes a cutwater, and another makes a poop which is under water, and on which a man sits... These boats are called Gatameroni."—Balbi, Viaggio, f. 82.

1673.—"Coasting along some Cattamarans (Logs lashed to that advantage which they waft off all their Goods, only having a Sail in the midst and Paddles to guide them) made after us..."—Fryer, 24.

1698.—"Some time after the Cattamaran brought a letter."—In Wheeler, i. 334.

1700.—"Un pecheur assis sur un catimaran, c'est à dire sur quelques grosses pièces de bois liées ensemble en manière de radeau..."—Lett. Edif. x. 58.

c. 1780.—"The wind was high, and the ship had but two anchors, and in the next forenoon parted from that by which she was riding, before that one who was coming from the shore on a Cattamaran could reach her..."—Orme, iii. 300.

1810.—Williamson (V. M., i. 65) applies the term to the rafts of the Brazilian fishermen.

1836.—"None can compare to the Cattamarans and the wonderful people that manage them... each catimaran has one, two, or three men... they sit crouched upon their heels, throwing their paddles about very dexterously, but very unlike rowing..."—Letters from Madras, 34.

1860.—"The Cattamaran is common to Ceylon and Coromandel."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 442.

During the war with Napoleon, the word came to be applied to a sort of fire-ship. "Great hopes have been formed at the Admiralty (in 1804) of certain vessels which were filled with combustibles and called cattamarans."—(Ed. Stanhope, Life of Pitt, iv. 218.) This may have introduced the word in English and led to its use as 'old cat' for a shrewish hag.

CATECHU, also CUTCHE and CAUT, s. An astringent extract from the wood of several species of Acacia (Acacia catechu, Willd.), the khair, and Acacia suma, Kurz, Ac. sundra, D. C. and probably more. The extract is called in H. kath, [Skt. kvath, 'to decoct'], but the two first commercial names which we have given are doubtless taken from the southern forms of the word, e.g. Can. kathu, Tam. katsu, Malay kachu. De Orta, whose judgments are always worthy of respect, considered it to be the lycium of the ancients, and always applied that name to it; but Dr. Royle has shown that lycium was an extract from certain species of berberis known in the bazaars as rasot. Cutch is first mentioned by Barbosa, among the drugs imported into Malacca. But it remained unknown in Europe till brought from Japan about the middle of the 17th century. In the 4th ed. of Schröder's Pharmacop. Medicina-chymica, Lyons, 1654, it is briefly described as Catechu or Terra Japonica, "genus terrae exotice" (Hambury and Flückiger, 214). This misnomer has long survived.

1516.—"... drugs from Cambay; amongst which there is a drug which we do not possess, and which they call pekó (see PUTCHEOCK) and another called cachó..."—Barbosa, 191.

1554.—"The bahar of Cate, which here (at Ormuz) they call cacho, is the same as that of rice."—A. Nunes, 22.

1563.—"Colloquio XXXI. Concerning the wood vulgarly called Cate; and containing profitable matter on that subject..."—Garcia, f. 125.

1578.—"The Indians use this Cate mixture with Areca, and with Betel, and by itself without other mixture..."—Acosta, Tract. 150.

1585.—Sassetti mentions catu as derived from the Khadira tree, i.e. in modern Hindi the Khair (Skt. khadir). [1616.—"010 bags Catcha."—Forster, Letters, iv. 127.]

1617.—"And there was rec. out of the Ador viz. 7 hds. *drugs cachá: 5 hempers pochok" (see PUTCHEOCK).—Cock's Diary, i. 294.

1759.—"Hortal [see HURTAUL] and Cotech. Earth-oil, and Wood-oil."—List of Barma Products in Botanem, Oriental Repert. i. 109.

c. 1760.—"To these three articles (betel, areca, and chunam) is often added for luxury what they call cachoonda, a Japan-earth, which from perfumes and other mixtures, chiefly manufactured at Goú, receives such improvement as to be sold to advantage when re-imported to Japan... Another addition too they use of what they call Catchoo, being a blackish granulated perfumed composition..."—Grose, i. 228.

1813.—"... The peasants manufacture catechu, or terra Japonica, from the Keiri [khair] tree (Mimoso catechu) which grows wild on the hills of Kankana, but in no other part of the Indian Peninsula"
CATHAY. n.p. China; originally Northern China. The origin of the name is given in the quotation below from the Introduction to Marco Polo. In the 16th century, and even later, from a misunderstanding of the medieval travellers, Cathay was supposed to be a country north of China, and is so represented in many maps. Its identity with China was fully recognised by P. Martin Martini in his Atlas Sinensis; also by Valentinj, iv. China, 2.

1247.—"Kitai autem ... homines sunt pagani, qui habent literam specialem ... homines benigni et humani satis videantur. 1871.—"For about three centuries the Northern Provinces of China had been detached from native rule, and subject to foreign dynasties; first to the Khitan ... whose rule subsisted for 200 years, and originated the name of Khait, Khata, or Cathay, by which for nearly 1000 years China has been known to the nations of Inner Asia, and to those whose acquaintance with it was got by that channel."—Marco Polo, Introd., ch. ii.

CATH'S-EYE. s. A stone of value found in Ceylon. It is described by Dana as a form of chalcedony of a greenish grey, with glowing internal reflections, whence the Portuguese call it Olho de gato, which our word translates. It appears from the quotation below from Dr. Royle that the Beli oculus of Pliny has been identified with the cath's-eye, which may well be the case, though the odd circumstance noticed by Royle may be only a curious coincidence. [The phrase billi kā dānk does not appear in Platt's Dict. The usual name is lāhsaniyā, 'like garlic.' The Burmese are said to call it kyōung, 'a cat.']

c. A.D. 70.—"The stone called Belus eye is white, and hath within it a black apple, the mids whereof a man shall see to glitter like gold. ..."—Holland's Plinius, ii. 625.

c. 1340.—"Quaead regiones monetam non habent, sed pro ea utuntur lapidibus quos dicimus Cati Oculos."—Conti, in Pogg., De Var. Fortunae, lib. iv.

1516.—"And there are found likewise other stones, such as Olho de gato, Chrysolites, and amethysts, of which I do not treat because they are of little value."—Barbosa, in Lisbon Acad., ii. 390.

1599.—"Lapis in suoper alius ibi vulgaris est, quem Lusitani olhos de gato, id est, ocultum felinium vacant, protpectas quod cum eo et colore et facie convenit. Nihil autem aliud quam achotes est."—De Bry, iv. 54 (after Linschoten); [Hak. Soc. i. 61, ii. 141].

1672.—"The Cat's-eyes, by the Portuguese called Olhos de Gatos, occur in Zeylon, Cambaya, and Pegu; they are more esteemed by the Indians then by the Portuguese; for some Indians believe that if a man wears this stone his power and riches will never diminish, but always increase."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 160.

be equivalent to _ceil de chat_—named in _India billi ke ankh._”—Royle’s _Hindu Medicine_, p. 103.

a. A weight used in China, and by the Chinese introduced into the Archipelago. The Chinese name is _kin_ or _chin_. The word _kati_ or _kati_ is Malayo-Javanese. It is equal to 16 taels, _i.e._ 1½ lb. avoid, or 625 grammes. This is the weight fixed by treaty; but in Chinese trade it varies from 4 oz. to 28 oz.; the lowest value being used by tea-vendors at Peking, the highest by coal-merchants in Honan.

1598.—“Everie _Catte_ is as much as 20 Portingall ounces.”—_Linschoten_, 34; [Hak. Soc. i. 113.]

1604.—“Their pound they call a _Cate_ which is one and twentieth of our ounces.”—Capt. John Davis, in _Purchas_, i. 123.

1609.—“Offering to enact among them the penalty of death to such as would sell one _cattie_ of spice to the Hollanders.”—_Keeling_, _ibid._ i. 199.

1610.—“And (I prayse God) I have aboord one hundred thirhte nine Tunnes, sixe _Cathayes_, one quarerne two pound of nutmegs and sizze hundred two and twenty suckettles of Mace, which make thirhte sixe Tunnes, fiftene _Cathayes_ one quarerne, one and twentieth pound.”—David Midleton, _ibid._ i. 247. In this passage, however, _Cathayes_ seems to be a strange blunder of Purchas or his copyist for _Cet_. _Suckette_ is probably Malay _sukat_, “a measure, a stated quantity. [The word appears as _suckett_ in a letter of 1615 (Foster, iii. 175). Mr. Skeat suggests that it is a misreading for _Pecul_. _Sukat_, he says, means ‘to measure anything’ (indefinitely), but is never used for a definite measure].”

b. The word _catty_ occurs in another sense in the following passage. A note says that “_Catty_ or more literally _Kuttoo_ is a Tamil word signifying _batta_.” (q.v.). But may it not rather be a clerical error for _batty_?

1659.—“If we should detain them longer we are to give them _catty_.”—Letter in _Wheeler_, i. 162.

CUTUR, s. A light rowing vessel used on the coast of Malabar in the early days of the Portuguese. We have not been able to trace the name to any Indian source, [unless possibly Skt. _chatura_, ‘swift’]. Is it not probably the origin of our ‘cutter’? We see that Sir R. Burton in his Commentary on Camoens (vol. iv. 391) says: “Catur is the Arab, _katireh_, a small craft, our ‘cutter.’” [This view is rejected by the _N.E.D.,_ which regards it as an English word from ‘to cut.’] We cannot say when _cutter_ was introduced in marine use. We cannot find it in Dampier, nor in _Robinson Crusoe_; the first instance we have found is that quoted below from _Anson’s Voyage_. [The _N.E.D._ has nothing earlier than 1745.]

Bluteau gives _catur_ as an Indian term indicating a small war vessel, which in a calm can be aided by oars, _Jal_ ( _Archeologie Navale_, ii. 258) quotes Witsen as saying that the _Caturi_ or _Almadias_ were Calicut vessels, having a length of 12 to 13 paces (60 to 65 feet), sharp at both ends, and curving back, using both sails and oars. But there was a larger kind, 80 feet long, with only 7 or 8 feet beam.

1510.—“There is also another kind of vessel... These are all made of one piece... sharp at both ends. These ships are called _Chaturi_, and go either with a sail or oars more swiftly than any galley, _fusta_, or brigantine.”—_Farrington_, L. 4.

1544.—“... _navigium majus quod vocant _caturem._”—_Skel. Franc. Xav. Epistolae_, 121.

1549.—“_Naves item duas (quas Indi catures vocant) summa celeritate armari jussit, ut oram maritimam legentes, hostes commenem proibirent._”—_Goös, de Bello Cambaico_, 1531.

1552.—“And this winter the Governor sent to have built in Cochín thirty _Catures_, which are vessels with oars, but smaller than brigantines.”—_Cattahedu_, iii. 271.

1588.—“_Cambaicaen canam Jacobus Lac- teus duboar caturibus tuei jussus._”...” —_Maffei_, lib. xii. ed. 1752, p. 283.

1601.—“_Biremes, seu Cathuris quam plurimae conduntur in Lasson, Javae civitati._”...”—_De Bry_, iii. 109 (where there is a plate, iii. No. xxxvii.).

1688.—“No man was so bold to contradict the man of God; and they all went to the Arsenal. There they found a good and sufficient bark of those they call _Catur_, besides seven old foystas.”—_Dryden, Life of Xarier_, in _Works_, 1821, xvi. 200.

1742.—“... to prevent even the possibility of the galeons escaping us in the night, the two _Cutters_ and the _Gloucester_ were both manned and sent in shore....”—_Anson’s Voyage_, 9th ed. 1756, p. 251. _Cutter_ also occurs pp. 111, 129, 150, and other places.
CAUVERY, n.p. The great river of S. India. Properly Tam. Kāvīrī, or rather Kāverī, and Sanscritized Kāverī. The earliest mention is that of Ptolemy, who writes the name (after the Skt. form) Xάβηρος (sc. πωτα-mōs). The Κανάρα of the Periplus (c. A.D. 80-90) probably, however, represents the same name, the Xάβηρις ἐμπορίων of Ptolemy. The meaning of the name has been much debated, and several plausible but unsatisfactory explanations have been given. Thus the Skt. form Kāverī has been explained from that language by kāvēra 'saffron.' A river in the Tamil country is, however, hardly likely to have a non-mythological Skt. name. The Cauvery in flood, like other S. Indian rivers, assumes a reddish hue. And the form Kāverī has been explained by Bp. Caldwell as possibly from the Dravidian kāri, 'red ochre' or kā (kā-va), 'a groove,' and ēr-ū, Tel. 'a river,' ēr-ī, Tam. 'a sheet of water'; thus either 'red river' or 'grove river.' [The Madras Admin. Gloss. takes it from kā, Tam. 'grove,' and ērī, Tam. 'tank,' from its original source in a garden tank.] Kā-virī, however, the form found in inscriptions, affords a more satisfactory Tamil interpretation, viz. Kā -virī, 'grove-extender,' or developer. Any one who has travelled along the river will have noticed the thick groves all along the banks, which form a remarkable feature of the stream.

c. 150 A.D.—

"Χαβηρου πωταμου ἐκβολά Χαβηρίς ἐμπορίων."—Ptolemy, lib. vii. 1.
The last was probably represented by Kāveripatanan.

c. 545.—"Then there is Siededēbā, i.e. Taprobane . . . and then again on the Continent, and further back, is Marallo, which exports conch-shells; Kaber, which exports abalardinum."—Cosmas, Topog. Christ., in Cathay, &c. clxxviii.

1310-11.—"After traversing the passes, they arrived at night on the banks of the river Kānobari, and bivouacked on the sands."—Amīr Khurūd, in Elliot, ii. 90.

The Cauvery appears to be ignored in the older European account and maps.

CAVALLY, s. This is mentioned as a fish of Ceylon by Íves, 1775 (p. 57). It is no doubt the same that is described in the quotation from Pyrard [see Gray's note, Hak. Soc. i. 388]. It may represent the genus Equula, of which 12 spp. are described by Day (Fishes of India, pp. 237-242), two being named by different zoologists E. caballa. But Dr. Day hesitates to identify the fish now in question. The fish mentioned in the fourth and fifth quotations may be the same species; but that in the fifth seems doubtful. Many of the spp. are extensively sun-dried, and eaten by the poor.

c. 1610.—"Ces Moucois pescheurs prennent en autres grande quantité d'une sorte de petit poisson, qui n'est pas plus grande que la main et large comme vn petit bremeau. Les Portugais l'appellent Pesche cavaloo. Il est le plus commun de toute cette coste, et c'est de quoy ils font le plus grand trafic; car ils le fendent par la matrice, ils le salent, et le font socher au soleil."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 278; see also 309; [Hak. Soc. i. 427; ii. 127, 294, 299].

1626.—"The Ile inricht us with many good things; Buffolas, . . . oysters, Breames, Cavaloes, and store of other fish."—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1652.—"There is another very small fish vulgarly called Cavalle, which is good enough to eat, but not very wholesome."—Philippus a Sanct. Trinitate, in Fr. Tr. 383.

1796.—"The aylo, called in Portuguese cavalal, has a good taste when fresh, but when salted becomes like the herring."—Fra Paolinii, E. T., p. 240.

1875.—"Carangas denter (Bl. Schn.). This fish of wide range from the Mediterranean to the coast of Brazil, at St. Helena is known as the Cavalley, and is one of the best table fish, being indeed the salmon of St. Helena. It is taken in considerable numbers, chiefly during the summer months, around the coast, in not very deep water; it varies in length from nine inches up to two or three feet."—St. Helena, by J. C. Melliss, p. 106.

CAWNEY, CAWNY, s. Tam. kāmī, 'property,' hence 'land,' [from Tam. kamā, 'to see,' what is known and recognised], and so a measure of land used in the Madras Presidency. It varies, of course, but the standard Cawny is considered to be = 24 manāī or Grounds (q.v.), of 2,400 sq. f. each, hence 57,600 sq. f. or ac. 1'322. This is the only sense in which the word is used in the Madras dialect of the Anglo-Indian tongue. The 'Indian Vocabulary' of 1788 has the word in the form Connys, but with an unintelligible explanation.

1807.—"The land measure of the Jāghīre is as follows: 24 Adies square=1 Culy; 100 Culīes=1 Canay. Out of what is called charity however the Culy is in fact a Bamboo 26 Adies or 23 feet 8 inches in length ... the Ady or Malabar foot is therefore 10.45 inches nearly; and the customary canay contains 51,375 sq. feet, or 1.15 acres nearly; while the proper canay would only contain 48,773 feet.” —F. Buchanan, Mysores, &c. i. 6.

CAWNPORE, n.p. The correct name is Kānpur, 'the town of Kān, Kanhaiya or Krishna.' The city of the Doab so called, having in 1891 a population of 188,712, has grown up entirely under British rule, at first as the bazar and dependence of the cantonment established here under a treaty made with the Nābob of Oudh in 1766, and afterwards as a great mart of trade.

CAYMAN, s. This is not used in India. It is an American name for an alligator; from the Carib cauyaman (Litté). But it appears formerly to have been in general use among the Dutch in the East. [It is one of those words “which the Portuguese or Spaniards very early caught up in one part of the world, and naturalised in another.” (N.E.D.)].

1598.—“In this river (Zaire or Congo) there are living divers kinds of creatures, and in particular, mighty great crocodiles, which the country people there call Caiman” —Pigafetta, in Harleian Coll. of Voyages, ii. 533.

This is an instance of the way in which we so often see a word belonging to a different quarter of the world undoubtedly ascribed to Africa or Asia, as the case may be. In the next quotation we find it ascribed to India.

1672.—“The figures so represented in Adam's footstamps were . . . 41. The King of the Caimans or Crocodiles.” —Baldens (Germ. ed.), 148.

1692.—“Anno 1692 there were 3 newly arrived soldiers . . . near a certain gibbet that stood by the river outside the house, so sharply pursued by a Kaiman that they were obliged to climb the gibbet for safety whilst the creature standing up on his hind feet reached with his snout to the very top of the gibbet.” —Valentinus, iv. 231.

CAYOLAQUE, s. Kayu = 'wood,' in Malay. Laka is given in Crawford's Malay Diet, as “name of a red wood used as incense, Myristica iners.” In his Descr. Diet, he calls it the “Tanarius major; a tree with a red-coloured wood, a native of Sumatra, used in dyeing and in pharmacy. It is an article of considerable native trade, and is chiefly exported to China” (p. 204). [The word, according to Mr. Skeat, is probably kayu, 'wood,' lakh, 'red dye' (see LAC), but the combined form is not in Klinkert, nor are these trees in Ridley's plant list. He gives Laka-laka or Malaka as the name of the phyllanthus emblica.]

1510.—“There also grows here a very great quantity of lacca, for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts.” —Far-thema, p. 238.

c. 1560.—“I being in Cantan there was a rich (bed) made wrought with loroic, and of a sweet wood which they call Cayolaque, and of Sundalum, that was prized at 1500 Crownes.” —Gaspar Da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 177.

1585.—“Euenic morning and evening they do offer vnto their idoles frankensence, benjamin, wood of aquilis, and cayolaque, the which is maruelous sweete. . . .” —Mendoc's China, i. 58.

CAZEE, KAJEE, &c., s. Arab. kādī, 'a judge,' the letter zwād with which it is spelt being always pronounced in India like a z. The form Cudi, familiar from its use in the old version of the Arabian Nights, comes to us from the Levant. The word with the article, al-kādī, becomes in Spanish alcaide;* not alcade, which is from kalīd, 'a chief'; nor alvaqazl, which is from vawzir. So Dozy and Engelmann, no doubt correctly. But in Pinto, cap. 8, we find “ao guazil da justica q em elles he como corre-gedor entre nos”; where guazil seems to stand for kādī.

It is not easy to give an accurate account of the position of the Kādī in British India, which has gone through variations of which a distinct record cannot be found. But the following outline is believed to be substantially correct.

* Dr. R. Rost observes to us that the Arabic letter zwād is pronounced by the Malays like ž (see also Crawford's Malay Grammar, p. 7). And it is curious to find a transfer of the same letter into Spanish as ẓ. In Malay kādī becomes ẓād.
Under Adawlut I have given a brief sketch of the history of the judiciary under the Company in the Bengal Presidency. Down to 1790 the greater part of the administration of criminal justice was still in the hands of native judges, and other native officials of various kinds, though under European supervision in varying forms. But the native judiciary, except in positions of a quite subordinate character, then ceased. It was, however, still in substance Mahommedan law that was administered in criminal cases, and also in civil cases between Mahommedans as affecting succession, &c. And a Kāzi and a Muftī were retained in the Provincial Courts of Appeal and Circuit as the exponents of Mahommedan law, and the deliverers of a formal Putwa. There was also a Kāzi-ul-Kozdī, or chief Kāzi of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, attached to the Sudder Courts of Dewanny and Nizamut, assisted by two Muftīs, and these also gave written putwas on references from the District Courts.

The style of Kāzi and Muftī presumably continued in formal existence in connection with the Sudder Courts till the abolition of these in 1862; but with the earlier abolition of the Provincial Courts in 1829-31 it had quite ceased, in this sense, to be familiar. In the District Courts the corresponding exponents were in English officially designated Law-officers, and, I believe, in official vernacular, as well as commonly among Anglo-Indians, Mooolves (q.v.).

Under the article LAW-OFFICER, it will be seen that certain trivial cases were, at the discretion of the magistrate, referred for disposal by the Law-officer of the district. And the latter, from this fact, as well as, perhaps, from the tradition of the elders, was in some parts of Bengal popularly known as 'the Kāzi.' "In the Magistrate's office," writes my friend Mr. Seton-Karr, "it was quite common to speak of this case as referred to the joint magistrate, and that to the Chhotā Sāhib (the Assistant), and that again to the Kāzi."

But the duties of the Kāzi popularly so styled and officially recognised, had, almost from the beginning of the century, become limited to certain notarial functions, to the performance and registration of Mahommedan marriages, and some other matters connected with the social life of their co-religionists. To these functions must also be added as regards the 18th century and the earlier years of the 19th, duties in connection with distraint for rent on behalf of Zemin-dars. There were such Kāzīs nominated by Government in towns and pergunnas, with great variation in the area of the localities over which they officiated. The Act XI. of 1864, which repealed the laws relating to law-officers, put an end also to the appointment by Government of Kāzīs. But this seems to have led to inconveniences which were complained of by Mahommedans in some parts of India, and it was enacted in 1880 (Act XI., styled "The Kāzīs Act") that with reference to any particular locality, and after consultation with the chief Muslims residents therein, the Local Government might select and nominate a Kāzi or Kāzīs for that local area (see PUTWA, LAW-OFFICER, MUFTY).

1869.—‘A Cogee . . . who is a Person skilled in their Law.’—Ovington, 206. Here there is perhaps a confusion with Coja.

1727.—‘When the Man sees his Spouse, and likes her, they agree on the Price and Term of Weeks, Months, or Years, and then appear before the Cadjee or Judge.’—A. Hamilton, i. 52.

1763.—‘The Cadi holds court in which are tried all disputes of property.’—Orme, i. 26 (ed. 1803).

1773.—‘That they should be mean, weak, ignorant, and corrupt, is not surprising, when the salary of the principal judge, the Cazi, does not exceed Rs. 100 per month.’—From Impey’s Judgment in the Patna Cause, quoted by Stephen, ii. 176.

1790.—‘Regulations for the Court of Circuit.

24. That each of the Courts of Circuit be superintended by two covenanted civil servants of the Company, to be denominated Judges of the Courts of Circuit . . . assisted by a Kazi and a Mufti.’—Regns. for the Adm. of Justice in the Foydary or Criminal Courts in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. The Judges of the Court shall attentively consider such futra, &c.’—Ibid.

1791.—‘The Judges of the Courts of Circuit shall refer to the Kazi and Mufti of their respective Courts all questions on points of law . . . regarding which they may not have been furnished with specific instructions from the G.-G. in C. or the Nizamut Adawlut. . . ’—Regn. No. XXV.

1792.—Revenue Regulation of July 20, No. lxxv., empowers Landholders and Farmers of Land to distrain for Arrears of Land Tax. The ‘Kazi of the Pegumnah’ is the official under the Collector, repeatedly referred to as regulating and carrying out the distrain. So, again, in Regn. XVIII. of 1793.

1793.—‘lxvi. The Nizamut Adulat shall continue to be held at Calcutta.

lxvii. The Court shall consist of the Governor-General, and the members of the Supreme Council, assisted by the head Cauzy of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and two Muftis.’ (This was already in the Regulations of 1791.)—Regn. IX. of 1793. See also quotation under MUTFY.

1793.—‘I. Cauzyes are stationed at the Cities of Patna, Daacca, and Moorshedabad, and the principal towns, and in the pergunahs, for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages, and performing such religious duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan law, as have been hitherto discharged by them under the British Government.’—Reg. XXIX. of 1793.

1803.—Regulation XLVI. regulates the appointment of Cauzy in towns and pergunahs, ‘for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages,’ &c., but makes no allusion to judicial duties.

1824.—‘Have you not learned this common saying—’Every one’s teeth are blunted by acids except the cadi’s, which are by sweets.’—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 316.

1864.—‘Whereas it is unnecessary to continue the offices of Hindoo and Mahomedan Law-Officers, and is inexpedient that the appointment of Cazeedool-Cocoat, or of City, Town, or Pergunnah Cazes should be made by Government, it is enacted as follows:—

1880.—‘. . . whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kaziis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages. . . ’—Bill introduced into the Council of Gov.-Gen., January 30, 1880.

‘An Act for the appointment of persons to the office of Kazi.

‘Whereas by the preamble to Act No. XI. of 1864 . . . it was (among other things declared inexpedient, &c.) . . . and whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kaziis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages and the performance of certain other rites and ceremonies, and it is therefore expedient that the Government should again be empowered to appoint such persons to the office of Kazi: It is hereby enacted . . . ’—Act No. XII. of 1880.

1888.—‘To come to something more specific. There were instances in which men of the most venerable dignity, persecuted without a cause by extortioners, died of rage and shame in the grip of the vile alguaizels of Impey’ [Macaulay’s Essay on Hastings].
CEDED DISTRICTS, n.p. A name applied familiarly at the beginning of the last century to the territory south of the Tungabhadra river, which was ceded to the Company by the Nizam in 1800, after the defeat and death of Tippoo Sultan. This territory embraced the present districts of Bellary, Cuddapah, and Kurnool, with the Palnad, which is now a subdivision of the Kistna District. The name perhaps became best known in England from Oliphant’s Life of Sir Thomas Munro, that great man who had administered these provinces for 7 years.

1873.—"We regret to announce the death of Lieut.-General Sir Hector Jones, G.C.B., at the advanced age of 86. The gallant officer now deceased belonged to the Madras Establishment of the E. I. Co.’s forces, and bore a distinguished part in many of the great achievements of that army, including the celebrated march into the Ceded Districts under the Collector of Canara, and the campaign against the Zemindar of Madura."—The True Reformer, p. 7 ("wrot serkestick").

CELEBI, n.p. According to Crawfurd this name is unknown to the natives, not only of the great island itself, but of the Archipelago generally, and must have arisen from some Portuguese misunderstanding or corruption. There appears to be no general name for the island in the Malay language, unless Tanah Bugis, "the Land of the Bugis people" [see BUGIS]. It seems sometimes to have been called the Isle of Macassar. In form Celebes is apparently a Portuguese plural, and several of its early writers speak of Celebes as a group of islands. Crawfurd makes a suggestion, but not very confidently, that Pulo sâlabib, ‘the islands over and above,’ might have been vaguely spoken of by the Malays, and understood by the Portuguese as a name. [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this explanation: "The standard Malay form would be Pulau Sâlabib, which in some dialects might be Sî-lêbis, and this may have been a variant of Si-Lêbis, a man’s name, the si corresponding to the def. art. in the Germ. phrase ‘der Hans.’ Numerous Malay place-names are derived from those of people."]

1516.—"Having passed these islands of Maluco... at a distance of 130 leagues, there are other islands to the west, from which sometimes there come white people, naked from the waist upwards... These people eat human flesh, and if the King of Maluco has any person to execute, they beg for him to eat him, just as one would ask for a pig, and the islands from which they come are called Celebe."—Barrosa, 202-3.

c. 1544.—"In this street (of Pegu) there were six and thirty thousand strangers of two and forty different Nations, namely...
Papuans, Selebes, Mindanaos... and many others whose names I know not."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogon’s tr., p. 200.

1552.—"In the previous November (1529) arrived at Ternate D. Jorge de Castro who came from Malaca by way of Borneo in a junk... and going astray passed along the Isle of Macápar..."—Barros, Dec. IV. i. 18.

", the first thing that the Sam fro did in this was to make Tristão de Taide believe that in the Isles of the Celebés, and of the Macápar and in that of Mindinão there was much gold."—Ibid. vi. 25.

1579.—"The 16 Day (December) we saw sight of the Island Celebes or Silebís."—Drake, World Encompassed (Hak. Soc.), p. 150.

1610.—"At the same time there were at Ternate certain ambassadors from the Isles of the Macapás (which are to the west of those of Maluco—the nearest of them about 60 leagues)... These islands are many, and joined together, and appear in the sea-charts thrown into one very big island, extending, as the sailors say, North and South, and having near 100 leagues of compass. An..."
this island imitates the shape of a big locust, the head of which (stretching to the south to 54 degrees) is formed by the Celebes (sic, as Celleses), which have a King over them... These islands are ruled by many Kings, differing in language, in laws, and customs..."

—Couto, Dec. V. vii. 2.

CENTIPEDE. s. This word was perhaps borrowed directly from the Portuguese in India (centopéa). [The N.E.D. refers it to Sp.]

1682. "There is a kind of worm which the Portuguese call um centopé. The Dutch also 'thousand-legs' (tussend-bein).—T. Saul, 68.

CERAM, n.p. A large island in the Molucca Sea, the Serung of the Malays. [Klinkert gives the name Seran, which Mr. Skeat thinks more likely to be correct.]

CERAME, CARAME, &c., s. The Malayalim sramb, a house with a room over the gate, and generally fortified. This is a feature of temples, &c., as well as of private houses, in Malabar [see Logan, i. 82]. The word is also applied to a chamber raised on four posts. [The word, as Mr. Skeat notes, has come into Malay as sramb or seramb, 'a house veranda."

[1500. "He was taken to a cerame, which was a one-storied house of wood, which the King had erected for their meeting-place."—Castalenda, Bk. I. cap. 33, p. 103.]

1551. "... where stood the carame of the King, which is his temple..."

1552. "Pedralvaes... was carried ashore on men's shoulders in an andor till he was set among the Gentoo Princes whom the Çamarin had sent to receive him at the beach, whilst the said Çamarin himself was standing within sight in the cerame awaiting his arrival."—Barres, i. v. 5.

1557. The word occurs also in D'albuquerque's Commentaries (Hut. Soc. tr. i. 115), but it is there erroneously rendered "jetty."

1556. "Antes de entrar no Cerame vireão receber alguns senhores dos que ficarão com o Rei."—Dam de Goes, Chron., 76 (ch. iviii.).

CEYLON, n.p. This name, as applied to the great island which hangs from India like a dependent jewel, becomes usual about the 13th century. But it can be traced much earlier. For it appears undoubtedly to be formed from Sinhala or Sihala, 'lions' abode,' the name adopted in the island itself at an early date. This, with the addition of 'Island,' Sihala-dvipa, comes down to us in Cosmas as S1e1e1d1b1a. There was a Pali form Si1halan, which, at an early date, must have been colloquially shortened to Si1lan, as appears from the old Tamil name Ilam (the Tamil having no proper sibilant), and probably from this was formed the Sarandiip and Sarandib which was long the name in use by mariners of the Persian Gulf.

It has been suggested by Mr. Van der Tuuk, that the name Sailan or S1lan was really of Javanese origin, as sela (from Skt. s1ld, 'a rock, a stone') in Javanese (and in Malay) means a precious stone,' hence Pulo S1lan would be 'Isle of Gems.' ("This," writes Mr. Skeat, "is possible, but it remains to be proved that the gem was not named after the island (i.e. 'Ceylon stone')."

The full phrase in standard Malay is batu S1lan, where batu means 'stone.' Klinkert merely marks Sailan (Ceylon) as Persian." The island was really called anciently Ratnadvi1pa, 'Isle of Gems,' and is termed by an Arab historian of the 9th century Ja3rat-al-y1ukt1, 'Isle of Rubies.' So that there is considerable plausibility in Van der Tuuk's suggestion. But the genealogy of the name from S1hala is so legitimate that the utmost that can be conceded is the possibility that the Malay form S1lan may have been shaped by the consideration suggested, and may have influenced the general adoption of the form S1l1an, through the predominance of Malay navigation in the Middle Ages.

CHACKUR, s. P.—H. čákár, 'a servant.' The word is hardly ever now used in Anglo-Indian households except as a sort of rhyming amplification to Naukar (see NOKUR): "Naukar-čákár," the whole following. But in a past generation there was a distinction made between naukar, the superior servant, such as a munší, a gomāshta,
CHALIA, CHALÉ. 183

CHAMPA, n.p. The name of a kingdom at one time of great power and importance in Indo-China, occupying the extreme S.E. of that region. A limited portion of its soil is still known by that name, but otherwise as the Binh-Thuan province of Cochin China. The race inhabiting this portion, Cham or Taams, are traditionally said to have occupied the whole breadth of that peninsula to the Gulf of Siam, before the arrival of the Khmer or Kambojan people. It is not clear whether the people in question took their name from Champa, or Champa from the people; but in any case the form of Champa is Sanskrit, and probably it was adopted from India like Kamboja itself and so many other Indo-Chinese names. The original Champa was a city and kingdom on the Ganges, near the modern Bhagalpur. And we find the Indo-Chinese Champa in the 7th century called Mahâ-champa, as if to distinguish it. It is probable that the Zaça or Zaâa of Ptolemy represents the name of this ancient kingdom; and it is certainly the Sanf or Chanh of the Arab navigators 600 years later; this form representing Champ as nearly as is possible to the Arabic alphabet.

c. A.D. 640.—"... plus loin à l'est, le royaume de Mo-ho-tchen-po" (Mahâchampa).—Hieron Thsang, in Petersins Boudéh. iii. 83.

551.—"Ships then proceed to the place called Sanf (or Chanh) ... there fresh water is procured: from this place is exported the aloes-wood called Chanh. This is a kingdom."—Relation des Voyages, &c., i. 18.

1298.—"You come to a country called Chamba, a very rich region, having a King of its own. The people are idolaters, and pay a yearly tribute to the Great Kaan ... there are a very great number of Elephants in this Kingdom, and they have lign-aloes in great abundance."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 5.

c. 1300.—"Passing on from this, you come to a continent called Jampa, also subject to the Kaan. ..."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1328.—"There is also a certain part of India called Champa. There, in place of horses, mules, asses, and camels, they make use of elephants for all their work."—Friar Jordanus, 57.

1516.—"Having passed this island (Borney) ... towards the country of Asians and China, there is another great island of Gentiles called Champa; which has a King and language of its own, and many elephants. ... There also grows in it aloes-wood."—Barbosa, 204.

a chobdär, a khânsama, &c., and châkar, a menial servant. Williamson gives a curious list of both classes, showing what a large Calcutta household embraced at the beginning of last century (V. M. i. 185-187).

1810.—"Such is the superiority claimed by the nakers, that to ask one of them whose chauner he is? would be considered a gross insult."—Williamson, i. 187.

CHALIA, CHALÉ, n.p. Châlyam, Châlyam, Châlyam, or Châlayam; an old port of Malabar, on the south side of the Beypur [see BEYPOOR] R., and opposite Beypur. The terminal station of the Madras Railway is in fact where Châlyam was. A plate is given in the Lendas de Correa, which makes this plain. The place is incorrectly alluded to as Kalydt in Imp. Gazetteer, ii. 49; more correctly on next page as Châlyum. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 75.]

c. 1330.—See in Abulfeda, "Shâliyat, a city of Malabar."—Ditlevsmeyer, 183.

c. 1341.—"I went then to Shâliyat, a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs that bear its name [see SHALEE]... Thence I returned to Kalkut."—Tom Batu, iv. 106.

1518.—"Beyond this city (Calicut) towards the south there is another city called Chalyani, where there are numerous Moors, natives of the country, and much shipping."—Barbosa, 153.

c. 1570.—"And it was during the reign of this prince that the Franks erected their fort at Shaleeat— it thus commanded the trade between Arabia and Calicut, since between the last city and Shaleeat the distance was scarcely 2 parasangs."—Toftjiet-ul-Mugajaideen, p. 129.

1572.—"Ves, corre a costa, que Choampa se chama Cuja mata he do pao cheiroso ornada."
Camões, x. 129.

By Burton:
"Here courseth, see, the called Champa shore, with woods of odorous wood 'tis deckt and dight."

1608.—... thence (from Assam) eastward on the side of the northern mountains are the Nagata [i.e. Naga] lands, the Land of Pukhan lying on the ocean, Baigni [Baigu? i.e. Pegu], the land Rakhang, Hamosavati, and the rest of the realm of Munyang; beyond these Champa, Kamboja, etc. All these are in general named Koki. —Taranatha (Tibetan) Hist. of Buddhism, by Schiefner, p. 262. The preceding passage is of great interest as showing a fair general knowledge of the kingdoms of Indo-China on the part of a Tibetan priest, and also as showing that Indo-China was recognised under a general name, viz. Koki.

1696.—"Mr. Bowyear says the Prince of Champa whom he met at the Cochín Chinese Court was very polite to him, and strenuously exhorted him to introduce the English to the dominions of Champa."—In Dalrymple's Or. Repert. i. 67.

CHAMPA, s. A kind of small vessel. (See SAMPA.)

CHANDAUL, s. H. Chandal, an outcaste, 'used generally for a man of the lowest and most despised of the mixt tribes' (Williams); 'properly one sprung from a Sudra father and Brahman mother' (Wilson). [The last is the definition of the Ain (ed. Jarrett, iii. 116). Dr. Wilson identifies them with the Kandali or Gondali of Ptolemy (Ind. Caste, i. 57).]

712.—"You have joined those Chandáls and coweaters, and have become one of them."—Chuck-Namah, in Elliot, i. 193.
[1810.—"Chandela," see quotation under HÁLACORE.]

CHANDNAGORE, n.p. The name of the French settlement on the Hooghly, 24 miles by river above Calcutta, originally occupied in 1673. The name is alleged by Hunter to be properly Chandan(a)-nagara, 'Sandalwood City,' but the usual form points rather to Chandra-nagara, 'Moon City.' [Natives prefer to call it Farash-donga, or 'The gathering together of Frenchmen']

1727.—"He forced the Ostenders to quit their Factory, and seek protection from the French at Charnagur. ... They have a few private Families dwelling near the Factory, and a pretty little Church to hear Mass in, which is the chief Business of the French in Bengal."—A. Hamilton, ii. 18.

[1753.—"Shandernagor." See quotation under CALCUTTA.]

CHANK, CHUNK, s. H. sankh, Skt. sankha, a large kind of shell (Turbinella ruga), prized by the Hindus, and used by them for offering libations, as a horn to blow at the temples, and for cutting into armlets and other ornaments. It is found especially in the Gulf of Manaar, and the Chank fishery was formerly, like that of the pearl-oysters, a Government monopoly (see Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 556, and the references). The abnormal chank, with its spiral opening to the right, is of exceptional value, and has been sometimes priced, it is said, at a lakh of rupees!

c. 545.—"Then there is Sieleduiba, i.e. Taprobane.... and then again on the continent, and further back is Murallo, which exports conch-shells (сокольны)."—Cosmas, in Cathay, i. clxxviii.

851.—"They find on its shores (of Ceylon) the pearl, and the shank, a name by which they designate the great shell which serves for a trumpet, and which is much sought after."—Reinard, Relations, i. 6.

1563.—"... And this chanco is a ware for the Bengal trade, and formerly it produced more profit than now. ... And there was formerly a custom in Bengal that no virgin in honour and esteem could be corrupted unless it were by placing bracelets of chanco on her arms; but since the Patans came in this usage has more or less ceased; and so the chanco is rated lower now...."—Garcia, f. 141.

1644.—"What they chiefly bring (from Tuticorin) are cloths called cachas...* a large quantity of Chanku; these are large shells which they fish in that sea, and which supply Bengal, where the blacks make of them bracelets for the arm; also the biggest and best fowls in all these Eastern parts."—Bocarro, MS. 316.

1672.—"Ganvade flew in all haste to Braham, and brought to Ksna the chianko, or kinkhor, twisted to the right."—Baldaens, Germ. ed. 521.

* These are probably the same as Milburn, under Tuticorin, calls ketches. We do not know the proper name. [See Sutton Ketches, under PIECE-GOODS.]
1873.—"There are others they call chan-quo; the shells of which are the Mother of Pearl."—Fryer, 322.

1727.—"It admits of some Trade, and produces Cotton, Corn, cows Cloth, and Chonk, a Shell-fish in shape of a Peri-winkle, but as large as a Man's Arm above the Elbow. In Bengal they are saw'd into Rings for Ornaments to Women's Arms."—A. Hamilton, i. 131.

1734.—"Expended towards digging a foundation, where chanks were buried with accustomed ceremonies."—In Wheeler, iii. 147.

1770.—"Upon the same coast is found a shell-fish called xenus, of which the Indians at Bengal make bracelets."—Raynat (tr. 1777) i. 216.

1813.—"A chank opening to the right hand is highly valued... always sells for its weight in gold."—Mithurn, i. 357.

1875.—

CHARPOY, s. H. chaîr-pâi, from P. chhîdâr-pâi (i.e. four-feet), the common Indian bedstead, sometimes of very rude materials, but in other cases handsomely wrought and painted. It is correctly described in the quotation from Ibn Batuta.

c. 1350.—"The beds in India are very light. A single man can carry one, and every traveller should have his own bed, which his slave carries about on his head. The bed consists of four conical legs, on which four staves are laid; between them they plait a sort of ribbon of silk or cotton. When you lie on it you need nothing else to render the bed sufficiently elastic."—iii. 380.

1350.—--Husain Khan Tashtdâr was sent on some business from Bengal. He went on travelling night and day. Whenever sleep came over him he placed himself on a bed (chaîr-pâi) and the villagers carried him along on their shoulders."—MS. quoted in Elliot, iv. 418.

1692.—"Turbans, long coats, trowsers, shoes, and sleeping on charpâis, are quite unusual."—H. of Mir Jânum's Invasion of Assam, transl. by blobmann, J.A.S.B. xli. pt. i. 80.

1756.—"A syce at Mozaffernugger, lying asleep on a charpoy... was killed by a tame buck goring him in the side... it was supposed in play."—Baldwin, Large and Small Game of Bengal, 195.

1883.—"After a gallop across country, he would rest on a charpoy, or country bed, and hold an impromptu levee of all the village folk."—C. Raikes, in L. of L. Lawrence, i. 57.

CHATTA, s. An umbrella; H. chhâtâ, chhât; Skt. chhatra.

c. 900.—"He is clothed in a waist-cloth, and holds in his hand a thing called a Jatra; this is an umbrella made of peacock's feathers."—Reinand, Relations, &c. 154.

c. 1340.—"They hoist upon these elephants as many chartrâs, or umbrellas of silk, mounted with many precious stones, and with handles of pure gold."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 228.

c. 1354.—"But as all the Indians commonly go naked, they are in the habit of carrying a thing like a little tent-roof on a cane handle, which they open out at will as a protection against sun and rain. This they call a chaîtrâ. I brought one home to Florence with me. . ."—John Marignodii, in Cathy, &c. p. 381.

1673.—"Thus the chief Naik with his loud Music... an Ensign of Red, Swallow-tailed, several Chitories, little but rich Kiosolls (which are the Names of several Countries for Umbrellas). . ."—Fryer, 160.

[1894.—"3 chatters."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxv.

[1826.—"Another as my chitree-burdar or umbrella-carrier."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 28.]

CHATTY, s. An earthen pot, spheroidal in shape. It is a S. Indian word, but is tolerably familiar in the Anglo-Indian parlance of N. India also, though the H. Ghurra (ghaîra) is more commonly used there. The word is Tam. shâtî, shattî, Tel. chatthi, which appears in Pali as chaîthi.

1781.—"In honour of His Majesty's birthday we had for dinner fowl cutlets and a four pudding, and drank his health in a charthi of sherbet."—Narr. of an Officer of Braille's Detachment, quoted in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 285.

1829.—"The chatties in which the women carry water are globular earthen vessels, with a bell-mouth at top."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 97.

CHAW, s. For châ, i.e. Tea (q.v.).

1616.—"I sent . . . a silver chaw pot and a fan to Capt. China wife."—Cocks's Diary, i. 215.

CHAWBUCK, s. and v. A whip; to whip. An obsolete vulgurism from P. chibuk, 'alert'; in H. 'a horse-whip.' It seems to be the same as the sjambok in use at the Cape, and apparently carried from India (see the quotation from Van Twist). [Mr.
Skeat points out that Klinkert gives chawbok or sambok, as Javanese forms, the standard Malay being chabok or chabuk; and this perhaps suggests that the word may have been introduced by Malay grooms once largely employed at the Cape.]

1648. "... Poor and little thieves are flogged with a great whip (called Siamback) several days in succession." — Van Twist, 29.

1675. "Upon any suspicion of default he has a Black Guard that by a Chawbuck, a great Whip, extorts Confession." — Fryer, 98.

1673. "The one was of an Armenian, Chawbucked through the City for selling of Wine." — Ibid. 97.

1882."... Rangivian, our Vekeel there (at Hugly) was sent for by Permessuraduss, Balchund's servant, who immediately clapt him in prison. Soc. i. 45.]

1688. "Small offenders are only whipt on the back, which sort of Punishment they call Chawbuck." — Dampier, ii. 138.

1699. "The Governor of Surat ordered the cloth Broker to be tied up and chawbucked." — *Letter from General and Council at Bombay to G. T. G. (in Record Office), 23rd March, 1698-9.

1756. "... a letter from Mr. Hastings ... says that the Nabob to engage the Dutch and French to purchase also, had put peons upon their Factories and threatened their Vaglaws with the Chaubac." — In Long, 79.

1760. "Mr. Barton, laying in wait, seized Benanimot Chattagoee opposite to the door of the Council, and with the assistance of his bearer and his peons tied his hands and his feet, swung him upon a bamboo, like a hog, carried him to his own house, there with his own hand chawbucked him in the most cruel manner, almost to the deprivation of life; endeavoured to force beef into his mouth, to the irreparable loss of his Bramin's caste, and all this without giving ear to, or suffering the man to speak in his own defence. ..." — Fort Wm. Cons., in Long, 214-215.

1781. "The sentinels placed at the door Are for our security bail; With Muskets and Chabucks secure, They guard us in Bangalore Jail." Song, by a Gentleman of the Navy (prisoner with Hyder) in Seton-Karr, i. 18.

1817. "... ready to prescribe his favourite regimen of the Chabuk for every man, woman, or child who dared to think otherwise." — Lalla Rookh.

CHAWBUCKSWAR, s. H. from P. chabuk-suweir, a rough-rider.

[1820. "As I turned him short, he threw up his head, which came in contact with mine and made my chabookswar exclaim, Ali mutad, 'the help of All.'" — Tod, Personal Narr. Calcutta rep. ii. 723.

1892. "A sort of high-stepping caper is taught, the chabukswar (whip-rider), or breaker, holding, in addition to the bridle, cords tied to the fore fetlocks." — Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 171.]

CHEBULI. The denomination of one of the kinds of Myrobulans (q.v.) exported from India. The true etymology is probably Kabulii, as stated by Thevenot, i.e. 'from Cabul.'

C. 1343. "Chebuli mirabolani." — List of Spices, &c., in Pegolotti (Dolla Decina, iii. 393).

C. 1665. "De la Province de Caboul ... les Mirabolans croisent dans les Montagnes et e'est la cause pourquoi les Orientaux les appellent Cabuly." — Thevenot, v. 172.

CHEEECHEE, adj. A disparaging term applied to half-castes or Eurasians (q.v.) (corresponding to the Lip-lap of the Dutch in Java) and also to their manner of speech. The word is said to be taken from chê (Fie!), a common native (S. Indian) interjection of reprobation or reproof, supposed to be much used by the class in question. The term is, however, perhaps also a kind of onomatopoeia, indicating the mincing pronunciation which often characterises them (see below). It should, however, be added that there are many well-educated East Indians who are quite free from this mincing accent.

1873. "He is no favourite with the pure native, whose language he speaks as his own in addition to the hybrid mincèd English (known as chee-chee), which he also employs." — Graser's Magazine, Oct., 437.

1880. "The Eurasian girl is often pretty and graceful. ... 'What though upon her lips there hung The accents of her tchi-tchi tongue.'" — Sir Ali Baba, 122.

1881. "There is no doubt that the Chee Chee twang, which becomes so objectionable to every Englishman before he has been long in the East, was originally learned in the document and the Brothers' school, and will be clung to as firmly as the queer turns of speech learned in the same place.”—St. James's Gazette, Aug. 26.

CHEENAR. s. P. chinār, the Oriental Plane (Platanus orientalis) and platanus of the ancients; native from Greece to Persia. It is often by English travellers in Persia miscalled sycamore from confusion with the common British tree (Acer pseudoplatanus), which English people also habitually miscall sycamore, and Scotch people miscall plane-tree! Our quotations show how old the confusion is. The tree is not a native of India, though there are fine chinārs in Kashmir, and a few in old native gardens in the Punjab, introduced in the days of the Moghul emperors. The tree is the Arbre Sec of Marco Polo (see 2nd ed. vol. i. 131, 132). Chinārs of especial vastness and beauty are described by Herodotus and Pliny, by Chardin and others. At Buynukdaher near Constantimople, is still shown the Plane under which Godfrey of Boulogne is said to have encamped. At Tejris, N. of Teheran, Sir H. Rawlinson tells us that he measured a great chinār which has a girth of 108 feet at 5 feet from the ground.

c. 1628.—"The gardens here are many ... abounding in lofty pyramidall cypresses, broad-spreadingly Chenaurs. . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, 136.

1677.—"We had a fair Prospect of the City (Ispahan) filling the one half of an ample Plain, few Buildings . . . shewing themselves by reason of the high Chinors, or Sycamores shading the choicest of them. . . ."—Fryer, 259.

"We in our Return cannot but take notice of the famous Walk between the two Cities of Jelfis and Isphahun; it is planted with two rows of Sycamores (which is the tall Maple, not the Sycamore of Alkair)."—Ibid. 280.

1682.—"At the elegant villa and garden at Mr. Bohun's at Lee. He showed me the Zinnar tree or platanus, and told me that since they had planted this kind of tree about the City of Ispahan . . . the plague . . . had exceedingly abated of its mortal effects."—Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 16.

1726.—". . . the finest road that you can imagine . . . planted in the middle with 135 Sennaar trees on one side and 132 on the other."—Valentijn, v. 208.

1783.—"This tree, which in most parts of Asia is called the Chinaur, grows to the size of an oak, and has a taper straight trunk, with a silver-coloured bark, and its leaf, not unlike an expanded hand, is of a pale green."—G. Forster's Journey, ii. 17.

1817.—". . . they seem Like the Chinaw—tree grove, where winter throws O'er all its tufted heads its feathery snows."

Mokanaw.

[1835.—". . . the island Char chunur . . . a skillful monument of the Moghul Emperor, who named it from the four plane trees he planted on the spot."—Hügel, Travels in Kashmir, 112.

[1872.—"I . . . encamped under some enormous chunur or oriental plane trees."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 370.]

Chinār is alleged to be in Badakhshān applied to a species of poplar.

CHEENY. s. See under SUGAR.

1810.—"The superior kind (of raw sugar) which may often be had nearly white . . . and sharp-grained, under the name of cheeny."—Willison, V. M. ii. 134.

CHEESE. s. This word is well known to be used in modern English slang for "anything good, first-rate in quality, genuine, pleasant, or advantageous" (Slang Dict.). And the most probable source of the term is P. and H. chī, 'thing.' For the expression used to be common among Anglo-Indians, e.g., "My new Arab is the real chī"; "These cheroets are the real chī," i.e. the real thing. The word may have been an Anglo-Indian importation, and it is difficult otherwise to account for it. [This view is accepted by the N.E.D.; for other explanations see 1 ser. N. & Q. viii. 59; 3 ser. vii. 465, 505.]

CHEETA. s. H. chītā, the Felis jubata, Schreber, [Cynaeorus jubatus, Blanford], or 'Hunting Leopard,' so called from its being commonly trained to use in the chase. From Skt. chitra-, or chitrakāya, lit. 'having a speckled body.'

1563.—". . . and when they wish to pay him much honour they call him Rāo; as for example Chita-Rāo, whom I am acquainted with; and this is a proud name, for Chita signifies 'Once' (or panther) and this Chita-Rāo means 'King as strong as a Panther.'" —Garcia, f. 36.

c. 1596.—"Once a leopard (chīta) had been caught, and without previous training, on a mere hint by His Majesty, it brought in the prey, like trained leopards."—Ati-Akbar, ed. Blochmann, i. 286.

1610.—Hawkins calls the Cheetas at Akbar's Court 'ounces for game.'—In Purchas, i. 218.
CHELING, CHELI. 188 CHEROOT.

[1785.—"The Cheetah-connah, the place where the Nabob's panthers and other animals for hunting are kept."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 450.]

1862.—"The true Cheetah, the Hunting Leopard of India, does not exist in Ceylon."—Tennent, i. 140.

1879.—"Two young cheetahs had just come in from Bombay; one of these was tame as a house-cat, and like the puma, purred beautifully when stroked."—Jam-rack's," in Sat. Review, May 17, p. 612.

It has been ingeniously suggested by Mr. Aldis Wright that the word cheater, as used by Shakspere, in the following passage, refers to this animal:

Falstaff: "He's no swaggerer, Hostess; a tame cheater i' faith; you may stroke him gently as a puppy greyhound; he'll not swagger."—2nd Part King Henry IV. iv. 4.

Compare this with the passage just quoted from the Saturday Review! And the interpretation would rather derive confirmation from a parallel passage from Beaumont & Fletcher:

"... if you give any credit to the juggling rascal, you are worse than simple widgeons, and will be drawn into the net by this decoy-duck, this tame cheater."—The Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

But we have not been able to trace any possible source from which Shakspere could have derived the name of the animal at all, to say nothing of the familiar use of it. [The N.E.D. gives no support to the suggestion.]

CHELING, CHELI. s. The word is applied by some Portuguese writers to the traders of Indian origin who were settled at Malacca. It is not found in the Malay dictionaries, and it is just possible that it originated in some confusion of Quelin (see KLING) and Chuli (see CHOLIA), or rather of Quelin and Chettin (see CHETTY).

1567.—"From the cohabitation of the Chelinna of Malacqua with the Christians in the same street (even although in divers houses) spring great offences against God our Lord."—Decrees of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., Dec. 28.

"This settlement is divided into two parishes, S. Thome and S. Estevão, and that part of S. Thome called Campon Chelin, extends from the shore of the Jaos Bazar to the N.W. and terminates at the Stone Bastion; in this part dwell the Chelis of Choromandel."—Gedinho de Eredia, 5v. See also f. 22, [and under CAMPOO].

CHELINGO, s. Arab. shalandi, [whence Malayal. chalanti, Tam. shalaun, i] "djalanga, qui va sur l'eau; chalangue, barque, bateau dont les flancs sont cloutées" (Dict. Tam. Franc., Pondichéry, 1855). This seems an unusual word, and is perhaps connected through the Arabic with the medieval vessel chelandia, chelandria, chelindras, chelante, &c., used in carrying troops and horses. [But in its present form the word is S. Indian.]

1726.—"... as already a Chialeng (a sort of small native row-boat, which is used for discharging and loading cargo). ..."—Valentiin, V. Chor. 20.

"Chillinga hire . . . . 0 22 0"
Account charges at Fort St. David, Decr. 31, MS. in India Office.

1761.—"It appears there is no more than one frigate that has escaped; therefore don't lose an instant to send us chelingoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice. ..."—Lally to Raymond at Pulicat. In Comp. H. of the War in India (Tract), 1761, p. 85.

"... No more than one frigate has escaped; lose not an instant in sending chelingoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice."—Carraccio's Life of Clive, i. 58.

CHEROOT. s. A cigar; but the term has been appropriated specially to cigars truncated at both ends, as the Indian and Manilla cigars always were in former days. The word is Tam. shuruttu, [Mal. churuttu,] 'a roll (of tobacco).' In the South ceroots are chiefly made at Trichinopoly and in the Godavery Delta, the produce being known respectively as Trichies and Lankas. The earliest occurrence of the word that we know is in Father Beschi's Tamil story of Parmarta Guru (c. 1725). On p. 1 one of the characters is described as carrying a firebrand to light his pugareiyati shuruttu, 'roll (cheroot) of tobacco.' [The N.E.D. quotes cheroota in 1669.]

Grose (1750-60), speaking of Bombay, whilst describing the cheroot does not use that word, but another which is, as far as we know, entirely obsolete in British India, viz. Buncus (q.v.).

1759.—In the expenses of the Nabob's entertainment at Calcutta in this year we find:

60 lbs. of Masulipatam cheroots, Rs. 500."—In Long, 194.
CHERRY FOUIJ. 189

CHETTY.

1781.—"... am tormented every day by a parcel of gentlemen coming to the end of my berth to talk politics and smoke cheroots —advise them rather to come to mending the holes in their old shirts, like me." — Hon. J. Lindsay (in Lives of the Lindsay), iii. 297.

"Our evening amusements instead of your stupid Harmonies, was playing Cards and Backgammon, chewing Beetle and smoking Cheroots." — Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feby. 24.

1782.—"Le tabac y réussit très bien; les chirooutes de Manille sont renommées dans toute l’Inde par leur goût agréable; aussi les Dames dans ce pays fument-elles toute la journée." — Sonnerat, Voyage, iii. 43.

1792.—"At that time (c. 1757) I have seen the officers mount guard many’s the time and oft ... neither did they at that time carry your fuses, but had a long Pole with an iron head to it. ... With this in one Hand and a Cheroot in the other you saw them saluting away at the Main Guard." — Madras Courier, April 3.

1810.—"The lowest classes of Europeans, as also of the natives ... frequently smoke cheroots, exactly corresponding with the Spanish segar, though usually made rather more bulky." — Williamson, V. M., i. 499.

1811.—"Dire que le Tcherout est la cigarette, c’est me dispenser d’en faire la description." — Solvyns, iii.

[1823. — "He amused himself by smoking several carrots." — Ocen, Narr. ii. 50.]

1875.—"The meal despatched, all who were not on duty lay down ... almost too tired to smoke their cheroots before falling asleep." — The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

CHERRY FOUIJ, s. H. chari-fauj? This curious phrase occurs in the quotations, the second of which explains its meaning. I am not certain what the first part is, but it is most probably charī, in the sense of ‘movable,’ ‘locomotive,’ so that the phrase was equivalent to ‘flying brigade.’ [It may possibly be charīhī, for chārīhī, in the sense of ‘preparation for battle.’] It was evidently a technicality of the Mahratta armies.

1803.—"The object of a cherry fouj, without guns, with two armies after it, must be to fly about and plunder the richest country it can find, not to march through exhausted countries, to make revolutions in cities." — Elphinstone, in Life, i. 59.

1809.—"Two detachments under ... Mahratta chiefs of some consequence, are now employed in levying contributions in different parts of the d’yeer country. Such detachments are called charree fouj; they are generally equipped very lightly, with but little artillery; and are equally formidable in their progress to friend and foe." — Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, 128; [ed. 1892, p. 96].

CHETTY, s. A member of any of the trading castes in S. India, answering in every way to the Banyans of W. and N. India. Malayāl. chetti, Tam. shetti, [Tel. setti, in Ceylon sed[i]i]. These have all been supposed to be forms from the Skt. śresṭhī; but C. P. Brown (MS.) denies this, and says "Shetti, a shop-keeper, is plain Telegu," and quite distinct from śresṭhī. [The same view is taken in the Madras Gloss.] Whence then the H. Seth (see SETT)? [The word was also used for a ‘merchant-man’: see the quotations from Pyrard on which Gray notes: "I do not know any other authority for the use of the word for merchandises, though it is analogous to our ‘merchantmen.’"]

c. 1349.—The word occurs in Ibn Batuta (iv. 259) in the form sāti, which he says was given to very rich merchants in China; and this is one of his questionable statements about that country.

1511.—"The great Afon Dalboquerque ... determined to appoint Ninachatu, because he was a Hindoo, Governor of the Quilins (Cheling) and Chetines." — Comment. of Af. Dalboqg., Hak. Soc. iii. 128; [and see quotation from ibid. iii. 146, under KLING].

1516.—"Some of these are called Chettis, who are Gentiles, natives of the province of Cholmender." — Barbozzo, 144.

1552.—"... whom our people commonly call Chatis. These are men with such a genius for merchandise, and so acute in every mode of trade, that among our people when they desire either to blame or praise any man for his subtlety and skill in merchant’s traffic they say of him, he is a Chatim;" and they use the word chatim for ‘to trade,’—which are words now very commonly received among us." — Barros, I. ix. 3.

c. 1566.—"Ui sono uomini periti che si chiamano Chitini, li quali mettono il prezzo alle perle." — Cesare Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 390.

1596.—"The vessels of the Chatis of these parts never sail along the coast of Malavar nor towards the north, except in a cydilla, in order to go and come more securely, and to avoid being cut off by the Malavars and other corsairs, who are continually roving in those seas." — Viceroy’s Proclamation at Goa, in Archie. Port. Or., fasc. 3, 601.

1598.—"The Souldiers in these daysy give themselves more to be Chettijns [var. lect. Chatbins] and to deal in Merchandise, than to serve the King in his Armado." — Linschoten, 38; [Hak. Soc. i. 202].

[1] "Most of these vessels were Chetils, that is to say, merchentmen." — Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 345.
[c. 1610.—"Each is composed of fifty or sixty war galions, without counting those of chetie, or merchantmen."—Pymard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 117.]

1651.—"The Sitty are merchant folk."—Rogerius, 8.

1686.—"... And that if the Chetty Bazaar people do not immediately open their shops, and sell their grain, etc., as usually, that the goods and commodities in their several ships be confiscated."—In Wheeler, i. 152.

1726.—"The Sittis are merchant folk and also porters. ..."—Valentine, Chora. 88.

..."The strength of a Bramin is Knowledge; the strength of a King is Courage; the strength of a Bellie (or Cultivator) is Revenne; the strength of a Chetti is Money."—Apollodorus of Ceylon, tr. in Valentine, v. 390.

c. 1754.—"Chitties are a particular kind of merchants in Madras, and are generally very rich, but rank with the left-hand cast."—Ives, 25.

1796.—"Cetti, mercanti astuti, diligenti, laboriosi, sobri, frugali, ricchi."—Fra Pau- tino, 79.

[Cheyla, s. "Originally a H. word (chella, Skt. chetaka, chelaka) meaning 'a servant,' many changes have been rung upon it in Hindu life, so that it has meant a slave, a household slave, a family retainer, an adopted member of a great family, a dependant relative and a soldier in its secular senses; a follower, a pupil, a disciple and a convert in its ecclesiastical senses. It has passed out of Hindu usage into Muhammadan usage with much the same meanings and ideas attached to it, and has even meant a convert from Hinduism to Islam." (Col. Temple, in Ind. Anti., July, 1896, pp. 200 seqq.). In Anglo-Indian usage it came to mean a special battalion made up of prisoners and converts.

[c. 1596.—"The Cheilah or Slaves. His Majesty from religious motives dislikes the name bandah or slave. ... He therefore calls this class of men Cheilahs, which Hindi term signifies a faithful disciple."—Ain, Blockmann, i. 253 seqq.]

[1791.—"(The Europeans) all were bound on the parade and rings (boly) the badge of slavery were put into their ears. They were then incorporated into a battalion of Cheylas."—In Selow-Kerr, ii. 311.]

Chiamay, n.p. The name of an imaginary lake, which in the maps of the 16th century, followed by most of those of the 17th, is made the source of most of the great rivers of Further India, including the Brahmaputra, the Irawadi, the Salwen, and the Menam. Lake Chiamay was the counterpart of the African lake of the same period which is made the source of all the great rivers of Africa, but it is less easy to suggest what gave rise to this idea of it. The actual name seems taken from the State of Zimmé (see Jangomay) or Chiang-mai.

1544.—"So proceeding onward, he arrived at the Lake of Simpiraman, which ordinarily is called Chiammay. ..."—F. M. Pinto, Cogan's tr., p. 271.

1552.—"The Lake of Chiaimai, which stands to the northward, 200 leagues in the interior, and from which issue six notable streams, three of which combining with others form the great river which passes through the midst of Siam, whilst the other three discharge into the Gulf of Bengala."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1572.—"Olha o rio Menão, que se derrama Do grande lago, que Chiamai se chama."—Camões, x. 125.

1652.—"The Country of these Brames ... extendeth Northwards from the nearest Peguan Kingdomes ... watered with many great and remarkable Rivers, issuing from the Lake Chiamay, which though 600 miles from the Sea, and emptying itself continually into so many Channels, contains 400 miles in compass, and is nevertheless full of waters for the one or the other."—P. Heylin's Cosmographic, ii. 288.

Chicane, Chicanery, ss. These English words, signifying pettifogging, captious contention, taking every possible advantage in a contest, have been referred to Spanish chicó, 'little,' and to Fr. chic, chicquet, 'a little bit,' as by Mr. Wedgwood in his Dict. of Eng. Etymology. See also quotation from Saturday Review below. But there can be little doubt that the words are really traceable to the game of chauyán, or horse-golf. This game is now well known in England under the name of Polo (q.v.). But the recent introduction under that name is its second importation into Western Europe. For in the Middle Ages it came from Persia to Byzantium, where it was popular under a modification of its Persian name (verb čukodčiów, playing ground čukodčiów), and from Byzantium it passed, as a pedestrian game, to Languedoc, where it was called, by a further modification, chicane (see Ducange, Dissertations sur l'Histoire de St. Louis, viii., and his Glossarium Graecolatium, s.v. πυκκατη; also Ouseley's Travels, i. 345). The analogy of certain periods of the game of golf suggests how the figurative meaning of chicaneur might arise in taking advantage of the petty accidents of the surface. And this is the strict meaning of chicaneur, as used by military writers.

Ducange's idea was that the Greeks had borrowed both the game and the name from France, but this is evidently erroneous. He was not aware of the Persian chaugdn. But he explains well how the tactics of the game would have led to the application of its name to "those tortuous proceedings of pleaders which we old practitioners call barres." The indication of the Persian origin of both the Greek and French words is due to W. Ouseley and to Quatremère. The latter has an interesting note, full of his usual wealth of Oriental reading, in his translation of Makrizi's Mameluke Sultans, tom. i. pt. i. pp. 121 seqq.

The preceding etymology was put forward again in Notes upon Mr. Wedgwood's Dictionary published by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways, Sept. 1872, p. 186. The same etymology has since been given by Littré (s.v.), who says: "Dès lors, la série des sens est: jeu de mail, puis action de disputer la partie, et enfin manoeuvres processives"; [and is accepted by the N.E.D. with the reservation that "evidence actually connecting the French with the Greek word appears not to be known."]

The P. forms of the name are chaugûn and chaugîn; but according to the Bahârî 'Ajam (a great Persian dictionary compiled in India, 1768) the primitive form of the word is chûlîdîn from châlî, 'bent,' which (as to the form) is corroborated by the Arabic sawîlîân.

On the other hand, a probable origin of chaugûn would be an Indian (Prakrit) word, meaning 'four corners' [Platts gives chaugâna, 'four-fold'], viz. as a name for the polo-ground. The chûlîdîn is possibly a 'striving after meaning.'

The meanings are according to Vüllers (1) any stick with a crook; (2) such a stick used as a drumstick; (3) a crook from which a steel ball is suspended, which was one of the royal insignia, otherwise called kaukaba [see Blochmann, Âin, vol. i. plate ix. No. 2];

(4) (The golf-stick, and) the game of horse-golf.

The game is now quite extinct in Persia and Western Asia, surviving only in certain regions adjoining India, as is specified under Polo. But for many centuries it was the game of kings and courts over all Mahommedan Asia. The earliest Mahommedan historians represent the game of chaugûn as familiar to the Sassanian kings; Ferdusi puts the chaugûn-stick into the hands of Siâwûsh, the father of Kai Khursû or Cyrus; many famous kings were devoted to the game, among whom may be mentioned Nûrûddin the Just, Atâbek of Persia, and the great enemy of the Crusaders.

He was so fond of the game that he used (like Akbar in after days) to play it by lamp-light, and was severely rebuked by a devout Mussulman for being so devoted to a mere amusement. Other zealous chaugûn-players were the great Saladin, Jalâluddin Mankbarni of Khwârizm, and Malik Bibars, Marco Polo's "Bendoqocher Soldan of Babylon," who was said more than once to have played chaugûn at Damascus and at Cairo within the same week. Many illustrious persons also are mentioned in Asiatic history as having met their death by accidents in the maîlûn, as the chaugûn-field was especially called; e.g. Kutbuddin Íbâk of Delhi, who was killed by such a fall at Lahore in (or about) 1207. In Makrizi (I. i. 121) we read of an Amir at the Mameluke Court called Hûsûmûddin Lâjûn 'Azîzî the Jukandîr (or Lord High Polo-stick).

It is not known when the game was conveyed to Constantinople, but it must have been not later than the beginning of the 8th century. The fullest description of the game as played there is given by Johannes Cinnamus (c. 1190), who does not however give the barbarian name:

"The winter now being over and the gloom cleared away, he (the Emperor Manuel Comnenus) devoted himself to a certain sober exercise which from the first had been the custom of the Emperors and their sons to practise. This is the manner thereof. A party of young men divide into two equal bands, and in a flat space which has been measured out purposely they cast a leather ball in size somewhat like an apple; and setting this in the middle as if it were a prize to be contended for they rush into the contest at full speed, each grasping in his right hand a stick of moderate length which comes suddenly to a broad rounded end, the middle of which is closed by a network of dried catgut. Then each party strives who shall first send the ball beyond the goal planted consciously on the opposite side, for whenever the ball is struck by the netted sticks through the goal at either side, that gives the victory to the other side. This is the kind of game, evidently a slippery and dangerous one. For a player must be continually throwing himself right back, or bending to one side or the other, as he turns his horse short, or suddenly dashes off at speed, with such strokes and twists as are needed to follow up the ball. . . . And thus as the Emperor was rushing round in furious fashion in this game, it so happened that the horse which he rode came violently to the ground. He was prostrate below the horse, and as he struggled vainly to extricate himself from its incumbent weight his thigh and hand were crushed beneath the saddle and much injured. . . .”—In Bonn ed. pp. 283-284.

We see from this passage that at Byzantium the game was played with a kind of racket, and not with a polo-stick.

We have not been able to find an instance of the medieval French chicane in this sense, nor does Littre's Dictionary give any. But Ducange states positively that in his time the word in this sense survived in Languedoc, and there could be no better evidence. From Henschel's Ducange also we borrow a quotation which shows chouca, used for some game of ball, in French-Latin, surely a form of chaugdn or chicanne.

The game of chaugdn, the ball (gù or gasc) and the playing-ground (maidam) afford constant metaphors in Persian literature.

c. 820.—“If a man dream that he is on horseback along with the King himself, or some great personage, and that he strikes the ball home, or wins the chukân (ηρα τ'χωιατεί) he shall find grace and favour thereupon, conformable to the success of his ball and the dexterity of his horse.” Again: “If the King dream that he has won in the chukân (οὰ τ'χωιατεί) he shall find things prosper with him.”—The Dream Judgments of Akmet Ibon Serrim, from a MS. Greek version quoted by Ducange in Gloss. Graecolatix.

c. 940. — Constantine Porphyrogenitus, speaking of the rapids of the Danagris or Dnieper, says: “ο δὲ τούτο φαραγοῦς τοσού-[Burton, 'a bat'] with a hollow handle, into which he introduced them; after which . . . he went again to the King . . . and directed him to repair to the horse-course, and to play with the ball and goff-stick. . . .”—Lane's Arabian Nights, i. 86-86; [Burton, i. 43].

c. 1030-40.—“Whenever you march . . . you must take these people with you, and you must . . . not allow them to drink wine or to play at chaughân.”—Baihaki, in Ellis, ii. 120.

c. 1420.—“The Τ'χωιαστήριος was founded by Theodosius the Less. . . . Basilius the Macedonian extended and levelled the Τ'χωιαστήριος.”—Georgius Cadinus de Antiq. Constant., Bonn ed. 81-82.

1516.—Barbosa, speaking of the Mahommedans of Cambay, says: “Saom tam ligeiros e manhosos na sela que a cavalo jogaon ha chouca, ho qual jogou eles tem ante sy na conta em que nos temos ho das canas”—(Lisbon ed. 271); i.e. “They are so swift and dexterous in the saddle that they play choca on horseback, a game which they hold in as high esteem as we do that of the canes” (i.e. the jereed).

1590.—“They (the Arabs) are such great riders that they play tennis on horseback” (que jogão a choca a cavalo).—Tenreiro, Itinerario, ed. 1762, p. 359.

c. 1590.—“His Majesty also plays at chaugdan in dark nights . . . the balls which are used at night are set on fire . . . For the sake of adding splendour to the games . . . His Majesty has knobs of gold and silver fixed to the tops of the chaugdn sticks. If one of them breaks, any player that gets hold of the pieces may keep them.”—Ain-i-Akbari, i. 298; [ii. 303].

1837.—“The game of chougan mentioned by Baber is still played everywhere in Tibet; it is nothing but 'hockey on horseback,' and is excellent fun.”—Vigne, in J. A. S. Bengal, vi. 774.

In the following I would say, in justice to the great man whose words are quoted, that chicane is used in the quasi-military sense of taking every possible advantage of the ground in a contest:

1761.—"I do suspect that some of the great Ones have had hopes'given to them that the Dutch may be induced to join us in this war against the Spaniards,—if such an Event should take place I fear some sacrifices will be made in the East Indies—I pray God my suspicions may be without foundation. I think Delays and Chicanery is allowable against those who take Advantage of the times, our Distresses, and situation." — Unpublished Holograph Letter from Lord Clive, in India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed 27th Decr. 1761.

1881.—"One would at first sight be inclined to derive the French chic from the English 'cheek'; but it appears that the English is itself the derived word, chic being an old Romance word signifying finesse, or subdety, and forming the root of our own word chicanery." — Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, p. 326 (Essay on French Slang).

a. H.—P. chic; a kind of screen-blind made of finely-split bamboo, laced with twine, and often painted on the outer side. It is hung or framed in doorways or windows, both in houses and in tents. The thing [which is described by Roe.] may possibly have come in with the Mongols, for we find in Kovalefski's Mongol Dict. (1774) "Tchik=Natte." The Ain (i. 226) has chigh. Chicks are now made in London, as well as imported from China and Japan. Chicks are described by Clavijo in the tents of Timour's chief wife:

1404.—"And this tent had two doors, one in front of the other, and the first doors were of certain thin coloured wands, joined one to another like in a hurdle, and covered on the outside with a texture of rose-coloured silk, and finely woven; and these doors were made in this fashion, in order that when shut the air might yet enter, whilst those within could see those outside, but those outside could not see those who were within."—§ cxxvi.

[1616.—His wives "whose Curiositty made them breake little holes in a grate of reede that hung before it to gaze on mee."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 321.]

1673.—"Glass is dear, and scarcely purchasable . . . therefore their Windows are usually folding doors, screened with Cheeks or latisses."—Fryer, 92.

The pron. cheek is still not uncommon among English people:—"The Coach where the Women were was covered with cheeks, a sort of hanging Curtain, made with Bents variously coloured with Lacker, and Chequered with Paakthred so artificially that you see all without, and yourself within unperceived."—Fryer, 83.

1810.—"Cheeks or Screens to keep out the glare."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 49.

1825.—"The cheek of the tent prevents effectually any person from seeing what passes within . . ." — Heber (ed. 1844), i. 192.

b. Short for chickeen, a sum of four rupees. This is the Venetian zecchino, zecchino, or sequin, a gold coin long current on the shores of India, and which still frequently turns up in treasure-trove, and in hoards. In the early part of the 15th century Nicolò Conti mentions that in some parts of India, Venetian ducats, i.e. sequins, were current (p. 30). And recently, in fact in our own day, chick was a term in frequent Anglo-Indian use, e.g. "I'll bet you a chick."

The word zecchino is from the Zecca, or Mint at Venice, and that name is of Arabic origin, fromSilka, 'a coining die.' The double history of this word is curious. We have just seen how in one form, and by what circuitous secular journey, through Egypt, Venice, India, it has gained a place in the Anglo-Indian Vocabulary. By a directer route it has also found a distinct place in the same repository under the form Sicca (q.v.), and in this shape it still retains a ghostly kind of existence at the India Office. It is remarkable how first the spread of Saracenic power and civilisation, then the spread of Venetian commerce and coinage, and lastly the spread of English commerce and power, should thus have brought together two words identical in origin, after so widely divergent a career.

The sequin is sometimes called in the South shāñârceash, because the Doge with his sceptre is taken for the Shânsâr, or toddy-drawer climbing the palm-tree! [See Burnell, Linschoten, i. 243.] (See also VENETIAN.)

We apprehend that the gambling phrases 'chicken-stakes' and 'chicken-hazard' originate in the same word.

1583.—"Chickinos which be pieces of Golde woorth seven shillinges a piece sterling."—Caesar Frederici, in Hakl. ii. 343.

1608.—"When I was there (at Venice) a chiquiney was worth eleven livers and twelve sols."—Corey's Crudities, ii. 68.

1609.—"Three or four thousand chequins were as pretty a proportion to live quietly on, and so give over."—Pericles, P. of Tyre, iv. 2.

1612.—"The Grand Signiors Custome of this Port Moha is worth yearly unto him 1500 chiqueenes."—Saras, in Purchas, i. 348.

[1616. — Shee tooke chiqueens and royalls for her goods."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 228.]

1711.—"He (the Broker) will charge 32 Shakes per Chequeen when they are not worth 31½ in the Bazar."—Lockyer, 227.

1727.—"When my Barge landed him, he gave the Cookswain five Zequeen, and loaded her back with Poultry and Fruit."—A. Hamilton, i. 301; ed. 1744, i. 309.

1767.—"Received . . . . . .

"Chequins 5 at 5. Acret Rs. 25 0 0"

Lord Clive's Account of his Voyage to India, in Long, 457.

1866.—"Whenever master spends a chick, I keep back two rupees, Sir."—Trewedlyn, The Dawk Bungalow.

1875.—"Can't do much harm by losing twenty chicks," observed the Colonel in Anglo-Indian argot."—The Dilemma, ch. x.

CHICKEN, s. Embroidery; Chickenwalla, an itinerant dealer in embroidered handkerchiefs, petticoats, and such like. P. chikin or chikin, 'art needlework.' [At Lucknow, the chief centre of the manufacture, this embroidery was formerly done in silk; the term is now applied to hand-worked flowered muslin. (See Hoey, Monograph, 88, Yusuf Ali, 69.]

CHICKORE, s. The red-legged partridge, or its close congener Caccablis chikor, Gray. It is common in the Western Himalaya, in the N. Punjab, and in Afghanistan. The framilin of Moorcroft's Travels is really the chikore. The name appears to be Skt. chakora, and this derives of the disposition formerly suggested by one of the present writers, as from the Mongol tsokhor, 'dappled or pied' (a word, moreover, which the late Prof. Schieffer informed us is only applied to horses). The name is sometimes applied to other birds. Thus, according to Cunningham, it is applied in Ladak to the Snow-cock (Tetraogallus Himalayensis, Gray), and he appears to give čh-chor as meaning 'white-bird' in Tibetan. Jerdon gives 'snow chukor' and 'strath-chukor' as sportsmen's names for this fine bird. And in Bengal Proper the name is applied, by local English sportsmen, to the large handsome partridge (Ortygornis gularis, Tem.) of Eastern Bengal, called in H. hiriyah or bari-bitar ('forest partridge'). See Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 575. Also the birds described in the extract from Mr. Abbott below do not appear to have been caccablis (which he speaks of in the same journal as 'red-legged partridge'). And the use of the word by Persians (apparently) is notable; it does not appear in Persian dictionaries. There is probably some mistake. The birds spoken of may have been the Large Sand-grouse (Pterocles arenarius, Pal.), which in both Persia and Afghanistan is called by names meaning 'black-breast.'

The belief that the chikore eats fire, mentioned in the quotation below, is probably from some verbal misconception (quasi ātish-khōr?). [This is hardly probable as the idea that the partridge drinks the moonbeams is as old as the Brahma Vaivarta Purâna: "O Lord, I drink in with the partridges of my eyes thy face full of nectar, which resembles the full moon of autumn." Also see Katha Sūriti Sūgara, tr. by Mr. Tawney (ii 243), who has kindly given the above references.] Jerdon states that the Afghans call the bird the "Fire-eater."

c. 1190.—"... plantains and fruits, Kois, Chakors, peacocks, Sarasas, beautiful to behold."—The Prithiraj Rāsa of Chand Bārdā, in Ind. Ant. i. 273.

In the following passage the word cator is supposed by the editor to be a clerical error for cavor or chazor.

1298.—"The Emperor has had several little houses erected in which he keeps in mow a huge number of cators, which are what we call the Great Partridge."—Marco Polo (2nd ed.), i. 287.

1520.—"Haidar Alemdār had been sent by me to the Kafers. He met me below the Pass of Bādālī, accompanied by some of their chiefs, who brought with them a few skins of wine. While coming down the Pass, he saw prodigious numbers of chikors."—Babar, 282.

CHILAW, n.p. A place on the west coast of Ceylon, an old seat of the pearl-fishery. The name is a corruption of the Tam. solabham, 'the diving'; in Singhalese it is Halawatta.
The name was commonly applied by the Portuguese to the whole aggregation of shoals (Baixos de Chilao) in the Gulf of Mannar, between Ceylon and the coast of Madura and TNi-velly.

1543.—"Shoals of Chilao." See quotation under BEADALA.

1610.—"La pesqueria de Chilao ... por hazarse antiguamente in un puerto del mismo nombre en la isla de Seylan ... llamado asi por ista causa; por que chilao, en lengua Changala, ... quiere dezir pesqueria."— Teixeira, Pt. ii. 29.

CHILLUM, s. H. chillam; "the part of the hukka (see HOOKA) which contains the tobacco and charcoal balls, whence it is sometimes loosely used for the pipe itself, or the act of smoking it" (Wilson). It is also applied to the replenishment of the bowl, in the same way as a man asks for "another glass.
"The tobacco, as used by the masses in the bubble-bubble, is cut small and kneaded into a pulp with goor, i.e. molasses, and a little water. Hence actual contact with glowing charcoal is needed to keep it alight.

1781.—"Dressing a bubble-bubble, per week at 3 chillum a day.

—Prison Experiences in Captivity of Hon.
J. Lindsay, in Lives of Lindsays, iii.

1811.—"They have not the same scruples for the Chillum as for the rest of the Hooka, and it is often lent ... whereas the very proposition for the Hooka gives rise fre-cently to the most ridiculous quarrels."— Sotvey, iii.

1828.—"Every sound was hushed but the noise of that wind ... and the occasional bubbling of my hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum."—The Ruszilbash, ii. 2.

1829.—"Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having purlonned your silver chelam and surpouso."—John Shipp, ii. 159.

1848.—"Jos however ... could not think of moving till his baggage was cleared, or of travelling until he could do so with his chillum."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxiii.

CHILLUMBRUM, n.p. A town in S. Arcot, which is the site of a famous temple of Siva, properly Shidambaram. Etyrn. obscure. [Garstyn (Mau. S. Arcot, 400) gives the name as Chedamboram, or more correctly Chiti-ambalam, 'the atmosphere of wisdom.]

1755.—"Sheringham (Seringam), Schallembron, et Gengy m'offreien également la retraite après laquelle je soupirais."— xxviii.

CHILLUMCHEE, s. H. chillamchí, also silfchí, and silphchí, of which chillamchí is probably a corruption. A basin of brass (as in Bengal), or tinned copper (as usually in the West and South) for washing hands. The form of the word seems Turkish, but we cannot trace it.

1715.—"We prepared for our first present, viz., 1000 gold mohurs ... the unicorn's horn ... the astoa (?) and chelumgie of Manila work ...."—In Wheeler, ii. 246.

1833.—"Our supper was a pedawa ... when it was removed a chillumchee and goblet of warm water was handed round, and each washed his hands and mouth."—
P. Gordon, Fragment of the Journal of a Tour, &c.

1851.—"When a chillumchee of water sans soap was provided, 'Have you no soap?- Sir C. Napier asked—"—Mawson, Indian Command of Sir C. Napier.

1857.—"I went alone to the Fort Adjutant, to report my arrival, and inquire to what regiment of the Bengal army I was likely to be posted.

"Army!—regiment! was the reply.
"There is no Bengal Army; it is all in revolt ... Provide yourself with a camp-bedstead, and a chillumchee, and wait for orders."

"I saluted and left the presence of my superior officer, deeply pondering as to the possible nature and qualities of a chillum-chee, but not venturing to enquire further."

—Lt.-Col. Leven, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 3.

There is an Anglo-Indian tradition, which we would not vouch for, that one of the orators on the great Hastings trial depicted the oppressor on some occasion, as “grasping his chillum in one hand and his chillumchee in the other.”

The latter word is used chiefly by Anglo-Indians of the Bengal Presidency and their servants. In Bombay the article has another name. And it is told of a gallant veteran of the old Bengal Artillery, who was full of “Presidential” prejudices, that on hearing the Bombay army commended by a brother officer, he broke out in just wrath: “The Bombay Army! Don’t talk to me of the Bombay Army! They call a chillumchee a gindy!—the Beasts!”

CHILLY, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the pod of red pepper (Capsicum frutescens and C. annuum, Nat. Ord. Solanaceae). There can be little doubt that the name, as stated by Bontius in the quotation, was taken from Chili in S. America, whence the plant was carried to the Indian Archipelago, and thence to India.

[1604.—“Indian pepper. . . . In the language of Cusco, it is called Vchu, and in that of Mexico, chilli.”—Grimston, tr. D’Acosta, H. W. Indices, i. Bk. iv. 239 (Stanf. Dict.)]

Again (lib. vi. cap. 40, p. 131) Bontius calls it ‘piper Chilensis,’ and also ‘Ricinus Braziliensis.’ But his commentator, Piso, observes that Ricinus is quite improper; “vera Piperis sive Capsici Braziliensi species apparat.” Bontius says it was a common custom of natives, and even of certain Dutchmen, to keep a piece of chilly continually chewed, but he found it intolerable.

1848.—“‘Try a chili with it, Miss Sharp,’ said Joseph, really interested. ‘A chili?’ said Rebecca, gasping. ‘Oh yes!’ . . . ‘How fresh and green they look,’ she said, and put one into her mouth. It was hotter than the curry; flesh and blood could bear it no longer.”—Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

CHIMNEY-GLASS, s. Gardener’s name, on the Bombay side of India, for the flower and plant Allamanda cathartica (Sir G. Birdwood).

CHINA, n.p. The European knowledge of this name in the forms Thinae and Sinae goes back nearly to the Christian era. The famous mention of the Sinim by the prophet Isaiah would carry us much further back, but we fear the possibility of that referring to the Chinese must be abandoned, as must be likewise, perhaps, the similar application of the name Chinas in ancient Sanskrit works. The most probable origin of the name—which is essentially a name applied by foreigners to the country—as yet suggested, is that put forward by Baron F. von Richthofen, that it comes from Jih-nun, an old name of Tongking, seeing that in Jih-nan lay the only port which was open for foreign trade with China at the beginning of our era, and that that province was then included administratively within the limits of China Proper (see Richthofen, China, i. 504-510; the same author’s papers in the Trans. of the Berlin Geog. Soc. for 1876; and a paper by one of the present writers in Proc. R. Geog. Soc., November 1882.)

Another theory has been suggested by our friend M. Terrien de la Couverpier in an elaborate note, of which we can but state the general gist. Whilst he quite accepts the suggestion that Kiao-chi or Tongking, anciently called Kiao-ti, was the Kattigura of Ptolemy’s authority, he denies that Jih-nan can have been the origin of Sinae. This he does on two chief grounds: (1) That Jih-nan was not Kiao-chi, but a province a good deal further south, corresponding to the modern province of An (Nhíe-An, in the map of M. Dutreuil de Rhins, the capital of which is about 2° 17’ in lat. S. of Hanoi). This is distinctly stated in the Official Geography of Annam. An was one of the twelve provinces of Cochim China proper till 1820-41, when, with two others, it was transferred to Tongking. Also, in the Chinese Historical Atlas, Jih-nan lies in Chen-Ching, i.e. Cochim-China. (2) That the ancient pronunciation of Jih-nan, as indicated by the Chinese authorities of the Han period, was Nît-nam. It is still pronounced in Sinico-Annamite (the most archaic of the Chinese dialects) Nhut-nam, and in Cantonese Yat-nam. M. Terrien further points out that the export of Chinese goods, and the traffic with the south and west, was for several centuries B.C. monopolised by the State of Tsen (now pronounced in Sinico-Annamite Chen, and in Mandarin Tien), which corresponded to the centre and west of modern Yun-nan. The She-ki of Szema Tien (B.C. 91), and the Annals of the Han Dynasty afford interesting information on this subject. When the Emperor Wu-ti, in consequence of Chang-Kien's information brought back from Bactria, sent envoys to find the route followed by the traders of Shuh (i.e. Sze-chuen) to India, these envoys were detained by Tang-Kiang, King of Tsen, who objected to their exploring trade-routes through his territory, saying haughtily: "Has the Han a greater dominion than ours?"

M. Terrien conceives that as the only communication of this Tsen State with the Sea would be by the Song-Koi R., the emporium of sea-trade with that State would be at its mouth, viz. at Kiao-ti or Kattigara. Thus, he considers, the name of Tsen, this powerful and arrogant State, the monopoliser of trade-routes, is in all probability that which spread far and wide the name of Chin, Sin, Sinae, Thinae, and preserved its predominance in the mouths of foreigners, even when, as in the 2nd century of our era, the great Empire of the Han has extended over the Delta of the Song-Koi.

This theory needs more consideration than we can now give it. But it will doubtless have discussion elsewhere, and it does not disturb Richthofer's identification of Kattigara.

[Prof. Giles regards the suggestions of Richthofer and T. de la Coupeur as mere guesses. From a recent re-consideration of the subject he has come to the conclusion that the name may possibly be derived from the name of a dynasty, Ch'in or T'sin, which flourished B.C. 255-207, and became widely known in India, Persia, and other Asiatic countries, the final a being added by the Portuguese.]

C. A.D. 80-89.—"Behind this country (Chrysa) the sea comes to a termination somewhere in Thin, and in the interior of that country, quite to the north, there is a very great city called Thinae, from which raw silk and silk thread and silk stuffs are brought overland through Bactria to Barygaza, as they are on the other hand by the Ganges River to Limyrae. It is not easy, however, to get to this Thin, and few and far between are those who come from it."

c. 545.—"The country of silk, I may mention, is the remotest of all the Indies, lying towards the left when you enter the Indian Sea, but a vast distance further off than the Persian Gulf or that island which the Indians call Solodiba, and the Greeks Taprobane. Tzintzita (elsewhere Tzintza) is the name of the Country, and the Ocean compasses it round to the left, just as the same Ocean compasses Barbari (i.e. the Somalî Country) round to the right. And the Indian philosophers called Brachmans tell you that if you were to stretch a straight cord from Tzintzita through Persia to the Roman territory, you would just divide the world in halves."—Cosmas, Topogr. Christ., Bk. II.

c. 641.—"In 641 the King of Madagha (Behar, &c.) sent an ambassador with a letter to the Chinese Court. The emperor . . . in return directed one of his officers to go to the King . . . and to invite his submission. The King Shiloyo (Siladiyya) was all astonishment. 'Since time immemorial,' he asked his officer, 'did ever an ambassador come from Mohocinta?'. . . China. s. In the sense of porcelain this word (Chimi, &c.) is used in Asiatic languages as well as in English. In English it does not occur in Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), though it does in some earlier publications. [The earliest quotation in N.E.D. is from Cogan's Pinto, 1653.] The phrase China-dishes as occurring in Drake and in Shakspeare, shows how the word took the sense of porcelain in our own and other languages. The phrase China-dishes as first used was analogous to Turkey-carpets. But in the latter we have never lost the geographical sense of the adjective. In the word turquoises, again, the phrase was no doubt originally pierres turquoises, or the like, and here, as in china dishes, the specific has superseded the generic sense. The use of arab in India for an Arab horse is analogous to china. The word is used in the sense of a china dish in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 492; [Burton, i. 375].

Sala, in _Ibld. News_, May 12, 1883.
CHINA-ROOT, s. A once famous drug, known as Radix Chineae and Tuber Chineae, being the tuber of various species of Smilax (N. O. Smilacaceae, the same to which sarsaparilla belongs). It was said to have been used with good effect on Charles V. when suffering from gout, and acquired a great repute. It was also much used in the same way as sarsaparilla. It is now quite obsolete in England, but is still held in esteem in the native pharmacopoeias of China and India.

1563.—"R. I wish to take to Portugal some of the Root or Wood of China, since it is not a contraband drug. . . ."

"O. This wood or root grows in China, an immense country, presumed to be on the confines of Muscovy. . . . and because in all these regions, both in China and in Japan, there exists the morbo napolitano, the merciful God hath willed to give them this root for remedy, and with it the good physicians there know well the treatment."—Garci, f. 177.

c. 1590.—"Sincaar Silhet is very mountainous. . . . China-Root (chob-chini) is produced here in great plenty, which was but lately discovered by some Turks."—Ayeen AKB., by Godsew, ii. 10; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 124].

1598.—"The roote of China is commonlie used among the Egyptians . . . specially for a consumption, for which the seeth the roote China in broth of a henne or cocke, whereby they become whole and faire of face."—Dr. Paludanus, in Linschoten, 124, [Hak. Soc. ii. 112].

c. 1610.—"Quant à la verole. . . . Ils la guerissent sans sueur avec du bois d'Eschine. . . ."—Pyard de Laval, ii. 9 (ed. 1679); [Hak. Soc. ii. 13; also see i. 182].

CHINAPATAM, n.p. A name sometimes given by the natives to Madras. The name is now written Shennai—Shenna-patamam, Tam., in Tel. Chennapatnamam, and the following is the origin of that name according to the statement given in W. Hamilton's Hindostan.

On "this part of the Coast of Coromandel . . . the English . . . possessed no fixed establishment until A.D. 1639, in which year, on the 1st of March, a grant was received from the descendants of the Hindoo dynasty of Bijanagar, then reigning at Chander-gerry, for the erection of a fort. This document from Sree Rung Rayeel expressly enjoins, that the town and fort to be erected at Madras shall be called after his own name, Sree Ranga Rayapatam; but the local governor or Naik, Damera Venkadardi, who first invited Mr. Francis Day, the chief of Armagon, to remove to Madras, had previously intimated to him that he would have the new English establishment founded in the name of his father Chennappa, and the name of Chennappapatam continues to be universally applied to the town of Madras by the natives of that division of the south of India named Dravida."—(Vol. ii. p. 413).

Dr. Burnell doubted this origin of the name, and considered that the actual name could hardly have been formed from that of Chenappa. It is possible that some name similar to CHINA-ROOT, s. The Chinese name is Chih, and bears a clumsy imitation of a Chinese mark"—(see Turkistan, i. 187.)

For the following interesting note on the Arabic use we are indebted to Professor Robertson Smith:

Siniya is spoken of thus in the Latifui'l-ma'riff of al-Th'libi, ed. De Jong, Leyden, 1867, a book written in a.d. 990. "The Arabs were wont to call all elegant vessels and the like siniya (i.e. Chinese), whatever they really were, because of the specialty of the Chinese in objects of vertu; and this usage remains in the common word srednt (pl. of siniya) to the present day."

So in the Tajdrihi-l- Omn this Ibn Maskowaih (Fr. Hist. Ar. ii. 457), it is said that at the wedding of Mamun with Buraim her grandmother strewed over her 1000 pearls from a siniya of gold. In Egypt the familiar round brass trays used to dine off, are now called siniya (yulo ganiya), [the gani, genus of N. India] and so is the European sauce.

The expression siniyat al sini, "A Chinese siniya," is quoted again by De Goede from a poem of Abul-shiibl Agani, xiii. 27. [See SNEAKER.]

[1915.—"I carid a jarr of China Beare."—Cock's Diary, i. 34.]

CHINA-BUCKEER, n.p. One of the chief Delta-mouths of the Irawadi is so called in marine charts. We have not been able to ascertain the origin of the name, further than that Prof. Forchhammer, in his Notes on the Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma (p. 16), states that the country between Rangoon and Bassein, i.e. on the west of the Rangoon River, bore the name of Pokhara, of which Buckeer is a corruption. This does not explain the China.
CHIN-CHIN.

Chinapatam was borne by the place previously. It will be seen under MADRAS that Barros curiously connects the Chinese with St. Thomé. To this may be added this passage from the English translation of Mendoza's China, the original of which was published in 1585, the translation by R. Parke in 1588:

"... it is plainly seen that they did come with the shipping unto the Indies... so that at this day there is great memory of them in the Nands Philippinas and on the cost of Coromande, which is the cost against the Kingdome of Norsinga towards the sea of Bengala (misprinted Ccngala); whereas is a town called unto this day the Soile of the Chinos for that they did reedite and make the same."—(i. 94).

I strongly suspect that this was Chinapatam, or Madras. [On the other hand, the popular derivation is accepted in the Madras Gloss., p. 163. The gold plate containing the grant of Sri Ranga Raja is said to have been kept by the English for more than a century, till its loss in 1746 at the capture of Madras by the French.—(Wheeler, Early Rec., 49.).]

1780.—"The Nawaub sent him to Cheena Pattun (Madras) under the escort of a small party of light Cavalry."—H. of Hydar Naik, 386.

CHINCHEW, CHINCHEO, n.p.

A port of Fuhkien in China. Some ambiguity exists as to the application of the name. In English charts the name is now attached to the ancient and famous port of Chwan-chau-fu (Thsiouan-chéou-fou of French writers), the Zayton of Marco Polo and other medieval travellers. But the Chincheo of the Spaniards and Portuguese to this day, and the Chincheew of older English books, is, as Mr. G. Phillips pointed out some years ago, not Chwan-chau-fu, but Chang-chau-fu, distant from the former some 80 m. in a direct line, and about 140 by navigation. The province of Fuhkien is often called Chincheo by the early Jesuit writers. Changchau and its dependencies seem to have constituted the ports of Fuhkien with which Macao and Manilla communicated, and hence apparently they applied the same name to the port and the province, though Chang-chau was never the official capital of Fuhkien (see Encyc. Brittan., 9th ed. s.v. and references there). Chinchees is used for "people of Fuhkien" in a quotation under COMPOUND.

1517.—"... in another place called Chincheo, where the people were much richer than in Canton (Candão). From that city used every year, before our people came to Malaca, to come to Malaca 4 junks loaded with gold, silver, and silk, returning laden with wares from India."—Correa, ii. 529.

CHIN-CHIN. In the "pigeon English" of Chinese ports this signifies 'salutation, compliments,' or 'to salute,' and is much used by Englishmen as slang in such senses. It is a corruption of the Chinese phrase ts'ing-ts'ing, Pekingese ch'ing-ching, a term of salutation answering to 'thank-you,' 'adien.' In the same vulgar dialect chin-chin joss means religious worship of any kind (see JOSS). It is curious that the phrase occurs in a quaint story told to William of Rubruck by a Chinese priest whom he met at the Court of the Great Kaan (see below). And it is equally remarkable to find the same story related with singular closeness of correspondence out of "the Chinese books of Geography" by Franceso Carletti, 350 years later (in 1600). He calls the creatures Zinzin (Ragionamenti di F. C., pp. 138-9).

1253.—"One day there sate by me a certain priest of Cathay, dressed in a red cloth of exquisite colour, and when I asked him whence they got such a dye, he told me how in the eastern parts of Cathay there were lofty cliffs on which dwelt certain creatures in all things partaking of human form, except that their knees did not bend. ... The huntsmen go thither, taking very strong beer with them, and make holes in the rocks which they fill with this beer. ... Then they hide themselves and these creatures come out of their holes and taste the liquor, and call out 'Chin Chin.'"—Itinerarium, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 328.

Probably some form of this phrase is intended in the word used by Pinto in the following passage, which Cogan leaves untranslated:

"After we had saluted one another after the manner of the Country, they went and anchored by the shore" (in or. "despois de se fazerem as suas e as nossas salvos a Charachina como entre este gente se custumbra."—In Cogan, p. 56; in orig. ch. xlvii.

1795.—"The two junior members of the Chinese deputation came at the appointed hour. ... On entering the door of the marquee they both made an abrupt stop, and resisted all solicitation to advance to chairs that had been prepared for them, until I should first be seated; in this dilemma, Dr. Buchanan, who had visited China, advised me what to be done; I immediately seized the foremost, whilst the Doctor himself grappled with the second; thus we soon fixed them in their seats, both parties during the struggle, repeating Chin Chin, Chin Chin, the Chinese term of salutation.”—Synnes, Embassy to Aro, 295.

1829.—“One of the Chinese servants came to me and said, ‘Mr. Talbot chin-chin you come down.’”—The Fanevae at Canton, p. 20.

1880.—“But far from thinking it any shame to deface our beautiful language, the English seem to glory in its distortion, and will often ask one another to come to ‘chow-chow’ instead of dinner; and send their ‘chin-chin,’ even in letters, rather than their compliments; most of them ignorant of the fact that ‘chow-chow’ is no more Chinese than it is Hebrew; that ‘chin-chin,’ though an expression used by the Chinese, does not in its true meaning come near to the ‘good-bye, old fellow,’ for which it is often used, or the compliments for which it is frequently substituted.”—W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 158; [ed. 1883, p. 41].

CHINSURA, n.p. A town on the Hoogly River, 26 miles above Calcutta, on the west bank, which was the seat of a Dutch settlement and factory down to 1824, when it was ceded to us by the Treaty of London, under which the Dutch gave up Malacca and their settlements in continental India, whilst we withdrew from Sumatra. [The place gave its name to a kind of cloth, Chinhchurah (see PIECE-GOODS).]

1864.—“This day between 3 and 6 o’clock in the Afternoon, Capt. Richardson and his Sergeant, came to my house in ye Chincherah, and brought me this following message from ye President. . . .”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 166.

1705.—“La Loge appelée Chamdernagor est une très-belle Maison située sur le bord d’un des bras du fleuve de Gange. . . . À une lieue de la Loge il y a une grande Ville appelée Chinchurah. . . .”—Lullier, 64-65.

1726.—“The place where our Lodge (or Factory) is is properly called Sinternu [i.e. Chinsura] and not Hoogli (which is the name of the village).”—Valentijn, v. 182.

1727.—“Chinsura, where the Dutch Emporium stands. . . . the Factors have a great many good Houses standing pleasantly on the River-Side; and all of them have pretty Gardens.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; ed. 1744, ii. 18.

[1753.—“Shinshura.” See quotation under CALCUTTA.]

CHINTZ, CHINCH. s. A bug. This word is now quite obsolete both in India and in England. It is a corruption of the Portuguese chinche, which again is from chinxer. Mrs. Trollope, in her once famous book on the Domestic Manners of the Americans, made much of a supposed instance of affected squeamishness in American ladies, who used the word chintzes instead of bugs. But she was ignorant of the fact that chintz was an old and proper name for the objectionable exotic insect, ‘bug’ being originally but a figurative (and perhaps a polite) term, ‘an object of disgust and horror’ (Wedgewood). Thus the case was exactly the opposite of what she chose to imagine; chinta was the real name, bug the more or less affected euphonism.

1616.—“In the night we were likewise very much disquieted with another sort, called Musquitoes, like our Gnats, but some-what less; and in that season we were very much troubled with Chinches, another sort of little troublesome and offensive creatures, like little Ticks; and these annoyed us two ways; as first by their biting and stinging, and then by their stink.”—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 372; [ed. 1777, p. 117].

1645.—“. . . for the most part the bedsteads in Italy are of forged iron gilded, since it is impossible to keep the wooden ones from the chimices.”—Evelyn’s Diary, Sept. 29.

1673.—“. . . Our Bodies broke out into small fiery Pimplers . . . augmented by Muskeetoe-Bites, and Chinches raising Blisters on us.”—Fryer, 35.

“‘Chinta are venomous, and if squeezed leave a most Poisonous Stench.”—Ibid. 189.

CHINTZ, s. A printed or spotted cotton cloth; Port. chita; Mahr. chit, and H. chill. The word in this last form occurs (c. 1590) in the Ain-i-Albabi (i. 95). It comes apparently from the Skt. cittra, ‘variegated, speckled.’ The best chintzes were bought on the Madras coast, at Masulipatam and Sadras. The French term of the word is chite, which has suggested the possibility of our sheet being of the same origin. But chite is apparently of Indian origin, through the Portuguese, whilst sheet is much older than the Portuguese communication with India. Thus (1450) in Sir T. Cumberworth’s will he directs his “wretched body to be beryd in a chitte with owte any kyste” (Academy, Sept. 27, 1879, p. 230).
CHINTZ.

The resemblance to the Indian forms in this is very curious.

1817.—"Blue cloths, and chintzes in particular, have always formed an extensive article of import from Western India."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 86; [2nd ed. i. 95, and comp. i. 190].

In the earlier books about India some kind of chintz is often termed pintado (q.v.). See the phraseology in the quotation from Wheeler above.

This export from India to Europe has long ceased. When one of the present writers was Sub-Collector of the Madras District (1866-67), chintzes were still figured by an old man at Sadras, who had been taught by the Dutch, the cambric being furnished to him by a Madras Chetty (q.v.). He is now dead, and the business has ceased; in fact the colours for the process are no longer to be had.* The former chintz manufactures of Pulicat are mentioned by Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, p. 567. Havart (1693) mentions the manufacture at Sadras (i. 92), and gives a good description of the process of painting these cloths, which he calls chitzen (iii. 13). There is also a very complete account in the Lettres Édifiantes, xiv. 116 seqq.

In Java and Sumatra chintzes of a very peculiar kind of marbled pattern are still manufactured by women, under the name of bātik.

CHIPE, s. In Portuguese use, from Tamil shippi, 'an oyster.' The pearl-oysters taken in the pearl-fisheries of Tuticorin and Manār.

[1602.—"And the fishers on that coast gave him as tribute one day's oysters (hjem dia de chipo), that is the result of one day's pearl fishing."—Conto, Dec. 7, Bk. VIII. ch. ii.]

* I leave this passage as Dr. Burnell wrote it. But though limited to a specific locality, of which I doubt not it was true, it conveys an idea of the entire extinction of the ancient chintz production which I find is not justified by the facts, as shown in a most interesting letter from Mr. Purdon Clarke, C.S.I., of the India Museum. One kind is still made at Masulipatam, under the superintendence of Persian merchants, to supply the Isphahan market and the "Moghul" traders at Bombay. At Pulicat very peculiar chintzes are made, which are entirely Kalam Korti work, or hand-carved, and frequently the wood is used instead of the Calmendar of Tavernier, see above, and under CALAMANDER. This is a work of infinite labour, as the ground has to be stopped off with wax, and as many times as there are colours used. At Combaconum Sarongs (q.v.) are printed for the Straits. Very bold printing is done at Wālījāpet in N. Arcot, for sale to the Moslem at Hyderabad and Bangalore.

An anecdote is told me by Mr. Clarke which indicates a caution as to more things than chintz printing. One particular kind of chintz met with in S. India, he was assured by the vendor, was printed at W—; but he did not recognize the locality. Shortly afterwards, visiting for the second time the city of X. (we will call it), where he had already been assured by the collector's native aids that there was no such manufacture, and showing the stuff, with the statement of its being made at W—, 'Why,' said the collector, 'that is where I live!' Immediately behind his bungalow was a small bazaar, and in this trade work was found going on, though on a small scale.

Just so we shall often find persons 'who have been in India, and on the spot'—asseverating that at such and such a place there are no missions or no converts; whilst those who have cared to know, know better. (H. Y.)

For Indian chintzes, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 346 seqq.; Mulherji, Art Manufactures of India, 348 seqq.; S. H. Hadi, Mon. on Dyers and Dyeing in the N.W.F. and Oudh, 44 seqq.; Francis, Mon. on Punjab Cotton Industry, 6.)
oysters which their boats are wont to fish."—Ribeiro, f. 63.

1710.—"Some of these oysters or cephs, as the natives call them, produce pearls, but such are rare, the greater part producing only seed pearls (aljofres) [see ALJOFAR]."—Sonua, Orienta Conquest, ii. 243.

CHIRETTA, s. H. chirátta, Mahr. kirátá. A Himalayan herbaceous plant of the order Gentianaceae (Swertia Chirata, Ham.; Ophelia Chirata, Griesbach; Gentiana Chirayita, Roxb.); Agathetes chirayta, Don.). The dried twigs of which, infused, afford a pure bitter tonic and febrifuge. Its Skt. name kirátá-tikta, 'the bitter plant of the Kirtitas,' refers its discovery to that people, an extensively-diffused forest tribe, east and north-east of Bengal, the Kposição of the Periplus, and the people of the Kposição of Ptoleny. There is no indication of its having been known to G. de Orta.

[1773.—"Kol Meg in Bengal : Creat in Bombay. . . . It is excessively bitter, and given as a stomachic and vermiligate."—Ives, 171.]

1829.—"They also give a bitter decoction of the neem (Melia azadirachta) and che-reeta."—Ac. of the Township of Lundy, in Trans. Lit. Soc. of Bombay, ii. 232.

1874.—"Chiretta has long been held in esteem by the Hindus. . . . In England it began to attract some attention about 1829; and in 1839 was introduced into the Edinburgh Pharmacopeia. The plant was first described by Roxburgh in 1814."—Hanbury and Flückiger, 392.

CHIT, CHITTY, s. A letter or note; also a certificate given to a servant, or the like; a pass. H. chit'ti; Mahr. chiti. [Skt. chitra, 'marked.'] The Indian Portuguese also use chito for escrito (Bluteau, Supplement). The Tamil people use skil for a ticket, or for a playing-card.

1829.—"He wanted a chithe or note, for this is the most note-writing country under heaven; the very Drum-major writes me a note to tell me about the mails."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 80.

1839.—"A thorough Madras lady . . . receives a number of morning visitors, takes up a little worsted work; goes to tiffin with Mrs. C., unless Mrs. D. comes to tiffin with her, and writes some dozens of chitas. . . . These incessant chitas are an immense trouble and interruption, but the ladies seem to like them."—Letters from Madras, 284.

CHITTAGONG, n.p. A town, port, and district of Eastern Bengal, properly written Chatgunw (see PORTO PIQUENO). Chittagong appears to be the City of Bengal of Varthema and some of the early Portuguese. (See BANDEL, BENGAL).

c. 1346.—"The first city of Bengal that we entered was Sudkawn, a great place situated on the shore of the great Sea."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 212.

1552.—"In the mouths of the two arms of the Ganges enter two notable rivers, one on the east, and one on the west side, both bounding this kingdom (of Bengal); the one of these our people call the River of Chatigam, because it enters the Eastern estuary of the Ganges at a city of that name, which is the most famous and wealthy of that Kingdom, by reason of its Port, at which meets the traffic of all that Eastern region."—De Barros, Dec. iv. liv. ix. cap. i.

[1586.—"Satagam." See quotation under HING.]

1591.—"So also they inform me that Antonio de Sousa Goudinho has served me well in Bengualia, and that he has made tributary to this state the Isle of Sundiva, and has taken the fortress of Chataguo by force of arms."—King's Letter, in Archivo Port. Oriental., fasc. iii. 257.
There is no reason to suppose that Lünschoten had himself been to Chittagong. My friend, Dr. Burnell, in his (posthumous) edition of Lünschoten for the Hakluyt Society has confounded Chittagam in this passage with Satgaon—see Porto Piqueno (H. Y.).

† The châtab which figures in Hindu poetry, is, according to the dictionaries, Cuculus melanoleuca, which must be the pied cuckoo, Coccyzus melanoleucus, Gm., in Jerdon; but this surely cannot be Sir William’s "most beautiful little bird he ever saw"?

1786.—"The province of Chatigan (vulgarily Chittagong) is a noble field for a naturalist. It is so called, I believe, from the chatag,† which is the most beautiful little bird I ever saw."—Sir W. Jones, ii. 101.

Elsewhere (p. 81) he calls it a "Montpelier." The derivation given by this illustrious scholar is more than questionable. The name seems to be really a form of the Sanskrit Chaturgrâma (= Tetrapolis), (or according to others of Saptagrâma, 'seven villages'), and it is curious that near this position Potlemy has a Pentapolis, very probably the same place. Chaturgrâma is still the name of a town in Ceylon, lat. 6°, long. 81°.

CHOBWA. s. H. from P. chobdär, 'a stick-bearer.' A frequent attendant of Indian nobles, and in former days of Anglo-Indian officials of rank. They are still a part of the state of the Viceroy, Governors, and Judges of the High Courts. The chobdârs carry a staff overlaid with silver.

1442.—"At the end of the hall stand tchobdars... drawn up in line."—Abdur-Razzãk, in India in the XV. Cent., 25.

1673.—"If he (the President) move out of his Chamber, the Silver Staves wait on him."—Fryer, 68.

1701.—"... Yesterday, of his own accord, he told our Linguists that he had sent four Chobdars and 25 men, as a safeguard."—In Wheeler, i. 371.

1786.—"Chubdár. Among the Nabilob he proclaims their praises aloud, as he runs before their palankeens."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

1793.—"They said a Chubdar, with a silvertick, one of the Sultan's messengers of justice, had taken them from the place, where they were confined, to the public Bazar, where their hands were cut off."—Diron, Narrative, 235.

1798.—"The chief's Chobedar... also endeavoured to impress me with an ill opinion of these messengers."—G. Forster's Travels, i. 222.

1810.—"While we were seated at breakfast, we were surprised by the entrance of a Chobedar, that is, a servant who attends on persons of consequence, runs before them with a silver stick, and keeps silence at the doors of their apartments, from which last office he derives his name."—Maria Graham, 57.

This usually accurate lady has been here misled, as if the word were chup-där, 'silence-keeper,' a hardly possible hybrid.

CHOBDAE, n.p. A fort S.W. of Bellary; properly Chitra Jârgam, Red Hill (or Hill-Fort, or ['picturesque fort']) called by the Mahomedans Chitâludur (C. P. B.).

CHITTORE, n.p. Chitor, or Chitordâr, a very ancient and famous rock fortress in the Rajput State of Mewâr. It is almost certainly the Târórupa of Potlemy (vii. 1).

1533.—"Badour (i.e. Bahâdur Shâh)... in Champanel... sent to carry off a quantity of powder and shot and stores for the attack on Chitor, which occasioned some delay because the distance was so great."—Correa, iii. 506.

1615.—"The two and twentieth (Dec.), Master Edwards met me, accompanied with Thomas Coryat, who had passed into India on foot, fine course to Cytor, an ancient Cité ruined on a hill, but so that it appears a Tombe (Towne) of wonderfull magnificence. . . ."—Sir Thomas Roe, in Purchas, i. 540; [Hak. CHOGA, s. Turki chooghā. A long sleeved garment, like a dressing-gown (a purpose for which Europeans often make use of it). It is properly an Afghan form of dress, and is generally made of some soft woollen material, and embroidered on the sleeves and shoulders. In Bokhara the word is used for a furred robe. ["In Tibetan ch’u-ba; in Turki juba. It is variously pronounced chuaba, juba or chooha in Asia, and shuba or shukha in Russia" (J.R.A.S., N.S. XXIII. 122)].

1888.—"We do not hear of 'shirt-sleeves' in connection with Henry (Lawrence), so often as in John's case; we believe his favourite dishabille was an Afghan choga, which like charity covered a multitude of sins."—Qu. Review, No. 319, on Life of Lord Lawrence, p. 303.

CHOKIDAR, s. A watchman. Derivative in Persian form from Choky. The word is usually applied to a private watchman; in some parts of India he is generally of a thieving tribe, and his employment may be regarded as a sort of blackmail to ensure one's property. [In N. India the village Chaukidir is the rural policeman, and he is also employed for watch and ward in the smaller towns.]

1899.—"And the Day following the Chocadars, or Soldiers were remov'd from before our Gates."—Owington, 416.

1810.—"The chokey-dar attends during the day, often performing many little offices, sometimes at night parading about with his spear, shield, and sword, and assuming a most terrific aspect, until all the family are asleep; when he goes to sleep too."—Williamson, V. M. i. 295.

C. 1817.—"The birds were scarcely beginning to move in the branches of the trees, and there was not a servant excepting the chookedaur, stirring about any house in the neighbourhood, it was so early."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, &c. (ed. 1879), 249.

1837.—"Every village is under a potain, and there is a pursuav or priest, and choukednap (sic.) or watchman."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1864.—The church book at Peshawur records the death there of "The Revd. I.—L—l, who on the night of the —th, 1864, when walking in his veranda was shot by his own chokidar"—to which record the hand of an injudicious friend has added: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant! (The exact words will now be found in the late Mr. E. B. Eastwick's Punjab Handbook, p. 278.)

CHOKRA, s. Hind. chhokра, 'a boy, a youngster;' and hence, more specifically, a boy employed about a household, or a regiment. Its chief use in S. India is with the latter. (See CHUCKAROO.)

[1875.—"He was dubbed 'the chokra,' or simply 'boy.'"—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 136.]

CHOKY, s. H. choawki, which in all its senses is probably connected with Skt. chatvar, 'four,' whence chatushka, 'of four,' 'four-sided,' &c.

a. (Perhaps first a shed resting on four posts; a station of police; a lock-up; also a station of palankin bearers, horses, &c., when a post is laid; a customs or toll-station, and hence, as in the first quotation, the dues levied at such a place; the act of watching or guarding.

[1535.—"They only pay the choqueis coming in ships from the Moluccas to Malacca, which amounts to 3 parts in 10 for the owner of the ship for choque, which is freight; that which belongs to His Highness pays nothing when it comes in ships. This choque is as far as Malacca, from whence to India is another freight as arranged between the parties. Thus when cloves are brought in His Highness's ships, paying the third and the choqueis, there goes from every 30 bahas 16 to the King, our Lord."—Arrangement made by Nuvo da Cunha, quoted in Botelho Tombo, p. 113. On this Mr. Whiteway remarks: 'By this arrangement the King of Portugal did not ship any cloves of his own at the Moluccas, but he took one-third of every shipment.
free, and on the balance he took one-third as Choky, which is, I imagine, in lieu of 'customs.'}

c. 1590.— "Mounting guard is called in Hindi Chaulek.'— Anv, i. 257.

1608.— "The Kings Custome called Chukey, is eight bagges upon the hundred bagges."—Sarsia, in Purchas, i. 391.

1664.— "Near this Tent there is another great one, which is called Tchaunkayke, because it is the place where the Omrahs keep guard, every one in his turn, once a week twenty-four hours together."—Bernier, E.T., 117; [ed. Constable, 363].

1673.— "We went out of the Walls by Broach Gate . . . where, as at every gate, stands a Chockey, or Watch to receive Toll for the Emperor. . . ."—Fryer, 100.

1774.— "Il più difficile per viaggiare nell' Indostan sono certi posti di guardia chiamate Cikli . . . questi Cikli sono insolentissimi."—Della Tomba, 39.

1810.— "Chokies, or patrol stations."—Williamson, V. M., i. 297.

This word has passed into the English slang vocabulary in the sense of 'prison.'

b. A chair. This use is almost peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. Dr. John Muir [Orig. Skt. Texts, ii. 5] cites it in this sense, as a Hindi word which has no resemblance to any Skt. vocable. Mr. Growse, however, connects it with chatur, 'four' (Ind. Antiq., i. 105). See also beginning of this article. Chau is the common form of 'four' in composition, e.g. chawbandi, (i.e. 'four fastening') the complete shoeing of a horse; chawphra ("four watches") all night long; chappar, 'a quadruped'; chaukat and chaukhat ("four timber"), a frame (of a door, &c.). So chauki seems to have been used for a square-framed stool, and thence a chair.

1772.— "Don't throw yourself back in your burra chokhey, and tell me it won't do . . ."—W. Hastings to G. Vansittart, in Gleig, i. 238.

c. 1782.— "As soon as morning appeared he (Haidar) sat down on his chair (chauki) and washed his face."—H. of Hydar Naik, 505.

CHOLERA.

CHOLERA, and CHOLERA MORBUS. s. The Disease. The term 'cholera,' though employed by the old medical writers, no doubt came, as regards its familiar use, from India. Littre alleges that it is a mistake to suppose that the word cholera (χολέρα) is a derivative from χολή, 'bile,' and that it really means 'a gutter,' the disease being so called from the symptoms. This should, however, rather be ἀπὸ τῶν χολάδων, the latter word being anciently used for the intestines (the etym. given by the medical writer, Alex. Trallianus). But there is a discussion on the subject in the modern ed. of Stephani Theauraus, which indicates a conclusion that the derivation from χολή is probably right; it is that of Celsus (see below). [The N.E.D. takes the same view, but admits that there is some doubt.] For quotations and some particulars in reference to the history of this terrible disease, see under MORT-DE-CHIEN.

Also Frareti Xoleridae, in De Curatione Morb. Ac. ii. 4.

1568.— "R. Is this disease the one which kills so quickly, and from which so few recover? Tell me how it is called among us, and among them, and its symptoms, and the treatment of it in use?"—O. Among us it is called Collerica passio. . . ."—García, f. 74v.

CHOOLA. s. H. chalha, chalhi, challd, fr. Skt. chalali. The extemporeized cooking-place of clay which a native of India makes on the ground. to prepare his own food; or to cook that of his master.

1814.—"A marble corridor filled up with choolas, or cooking-places, composed of mud, cowdung, and unburnt bricks."—Forbes, Or.
Mem. iii. 120; [2nd ed. ii. 193].

CHOLIA, s. CholiA is a name given in Ceylon and in Malabar to a particular class of Mahomedans, and sometimes to Mahommedans generally.
There is much obscurity about the origin and proper application of the term. [The word is by some derived from Skt. chōḍā, the top-knot which every Hindu must wear, and which is cut off on conversion to Islam. In the same way in the Punjab, choṭīkāt,
'he that has had his top-knot cut off,' is a common form of abuse used by Hindus to Musulman converts; see Tobetson, Punjab Ethnog. p. 240.] According to Sonnerat (i. 109), the Chulias are of Arab descent and of Shia profession. [The Madras Gloss. takes the word to be from the kingdom of Chola and to mean a person of S. India.]

c. 1345.—"... the city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malibār. Its bazaars are splendid, and its merchants are known by the name of Šhīla (i.e. Cholā)."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 90.

1754.—"Chowlies are esteemed learned men, and in general are merchants."—Ives, 25.

1782.—"We had found ... less of that foolish timidity, and much more disposition to intercourse in the Choliars of the country, who are Mahommedans and quite distinct in their manners. ..."—Hugh Boyd, Journal of a Journey of an Embassy to Cooy, in Misc. Works (1800), i. 155.

1783.—"During Mr. Saunders's government I have known Chulia (Moors) vessels carry coco-nuts from the Nicobar Islands to Madras."—Forrest, Voyage to Mergui, p. v.

"Chulias and Malabars (the appellations are I believe synonymous)."—Ibid. 24.

1836.—"Mr. Boyd ... describes the Moors under the name of Cholias, and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation Lubbies (see LUBBYE). These epithets are, however, not admissible, for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate."—Casie Chilty, in J. R. A. Soc.
ii. 338.

1879.—"There are over 15,000 Kings, Chuliehs, and other natives of India."—
Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 254.

CHOP, s. Properly a seal-impress, stamp, or brand; H. chādp;
the verb (chādpā) being that which is now used in Hindustani to express the art of printing (books).
The word chādp seems not to have been traced back with any accuracy beyond the modern vernaculars. It has been thought possible (at least till the history should be more accurately traced) that it might be of Portuguese origin. For there is a Port. word chapa,
'a thin plate of metal,' which is no doubt, the original of the Old English chape for the metal plate on the sheath of a sword or dagger.* The word in this sense is not in the Portuguese Dictionaries; but we find 'homem chapado,' explained as 'a man of notable worth or excellence,' and Bluteau considers this a metaphor 'taken from the charpas or plates of metal on which the kings of India caused their letters patent to be engraven.' Thus he would seem to have regarded, though perhaps erroneously, the chādpā and the Portuguese chapa as identical. On the other hand, Mr.
Beames entertains no doubt that the word is genuine Hindi, and connects it with a variety of other words signifying striking, or pressing. And Thompson in his Hindi Dictionary says that chādpā is a technical term used by the Vaishnavas to denote the sectorial marks (lotus, trident, &c.), which they delineate on their bodies. Fallon gives the same meaning, and quotes a Hindi verse, using it in this sense.
We may add that while chādpā is used all over the N.W.P. and Punjab for printed cloths, Drummond (1808) gives chādpāṇi, chādpā, as words for 'Stampers or Printers of Cloth' in Guzerati, and that the passage quoted below from a Treaty made with an ambassador from Guzerat by the Portuguese in 1537, uses the word chapada for struck or coined, exactly as the modern Hindi verb chādpā might be used.† Chop, in writers

* Thus, in Shakespear, "This is Monsieur Parolles, the gallant militarist ... that had the whole theory of war in the knot of his scar," the practice in the chape of his dagger."—All's Well that Ends Well, iv. 3. And, in the Scottish Rites and Vestuaria, under 1612:
"Lockattis and Chapes for daggers."

† "... e quanto à moeda, ser chapada de sua sies (by error printed site), pois já há concedida, que todo o provéio serua del Rey de Portugal;

Tombo, 226.
prior to the last century, is often used for the seal itself. "Owen Cambridge says the Mohr was the great seal, but the small or privy seal was called a 'chop' or 'stamp.'" (C. P. Brown).

The word chop is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians in the sense of seal or stamp. But it got a permanent footing in the 'Pigeon English' of the Chinese ports, and thence has come back to England and India, in the phrase "first-chop," i.e. of the first brand or quality.

The word chop (chop) is adopted in Malay [with the meanings of seal-impression, stamp, to seal or stamp, though there is, as Mr. Skeat points out, a pure native word tera or tra, which is used in all these senses;] and chop has acquired the specific sense of a passport or licence. The word has also obtained a variety of applications, including that just mentioned, in the lingua franca of foreigners in the China seas. Van Braam applies it to a tablet bearing the Emperor's name, to which he and his fellow envoys made kotow on their first landing in China (Voyage, &c., Paris, An vi., 1798, i. 20-21). Again, in the same jargon, a chop of tea means a certain number of chests of tea, all bearing the same brand. Chop-houses are customs stations on the Canton River, so called from the chops, or seals, used there (Giles, Glossary). Chop-dollar is a dollar chopped, or stamped with a private mark, as a guarantee of its genuineness (tibid.). (Dollars similarly marked had currency in England in the first quarter of last century, and one of the present writers can recollect their occasional occurrence in Scotland in his childhood). The grand chop is the port clearance granted by the Chinese customs when all dues have been paid (tibid.). All these have obviously the same origin; but there are other uses of the word in China not so easily explained, e.g. chop, for 'a hulk'; chop-boat for a lighter or cargo-boat.

In Captain Forrest's work, quoted below, a golden badge or decoration, conferred on him by the King of Achin, is called a chapp (p. 55). The portrait of Forrest, engraved by Sharp, shows this badge, and gives the inscription, translated: "Capt. Thomas Forrest, Orancayo [see Orankay] of the Golden Sword. This chapp was conferred as a mark of honour in the city of Atcheen, belonging to the Faithful, by the hands of the Shabander [see Shabunder] of Atcheen, on Capt. Thomas Forrest."

1882.—"On the edge of the river facing the 'Pow-shan' and the Creek Hongs, were Chop houses, or branches of the Hopo's department, whose duty it was to prevent smuggling, but whose interest it was to aid and facilitate the shipping of silks . . . at a considerable reduction on the Imperial tariff."—The Fankaive at Canton, p. 25.

The writer last quoted, and others before him, have imagined a Chinese origin for chop, e.g., as "from chah, 'an official note from a superior,' or chah, 'a contract, a diploma, &c.,' both having at Canton the sound châp, and between them covering most of the 'pigeon' uses of chop" (Note by Bishop Moule). But few of the words used by Europeans in Chinese trade are really Chinese, and we think it has been made clear that chop comes from India.

CHOP-CHOP. Pigeon-English (or Chinese) for 'Make haste! look sharp!' This is supposed to be from the Cantonese, pron. kâp-kâp, of what is in the Mandarin dialect kip-kip. In the Northern dialects kvaï-kwaï, 'quick-quick' is more usual (Bishop Moule). [Mr. Skeat compares the Malay cheput-cheput, 'quick-quick.]

* H. Tikiya is a little cake of charcoal placed in the bowl of the hooks, or bubble-bubble.
a genuine H. term, chhappar khät, 'a bedstead with curtains.'

1778.—"Leito com armação. Châpär ctt."—Grammatica Indostana, 128.

C. 1809.—"Bedsteads are much more common than in Puraniya. The best are called Palang, or Chhapar Khat . . . they have curtains, mattresses, pillows, and a sheet . . . "—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 92.

C. 1817.—"My husband chanced to light upon a very pretty chopper-cot, with curtains and everything complete."—Mrs. Sheridan's Stories, ed. 1873, 161. (See COT.)

CHOPSTICKS, s. The sticks used in pairs by the Chinese in feeding themselves. The Chinese name of the article is 'kwai-tze, 'speedy-ones.' "Possibly the inventor of the present word, hearing that the Chinese name had this meaning, and accustomed to the phrase chop-chop for 'speedily,' used chop as a translation." (Bishop Moule). [Prof. Giles writes: "The N.E. D. gives incorrectly kwai-tze, i.e. 'nimble boys,' 'nimble ones.' Even Sir H. Yule is not without blemish. He leaves the aspirate out of kwai, of which the official orthography is now k'uai-k'uai-tzii, 'hasteners,' the termination -ers bringing out the value of tsii, an enclitic particle, better than 'ones.' Bishop Moule's suggestion is on the right track. I think, however, that chopstick came from a Chinaman, who of course knew the meaning of k'uai and applied it accordingly, using the 'pidgin' word chop as the, to him, natural equivalent."]

C. 1540.—". . . his young daughters, with their brother, did nothing but laugh to see us feed ourselves with our hands, for that is contrary to the custom which is observed throughout the whole empire of China, where the Inhabitants at their meat carry it to their mouths with two little sticks made like a pair of Cizera (this is the translator's folly; it is really com duas paos feitos como fusos—'like spindles')."—Pinto, orig. cap. lxxiii., in Cogan, p. 103.

[1598.—"Two little peeces of blacke woode made round . . . these they use instead of forkes."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 144.]

C. 1610.—". . . out comme deux petites spatules de bois fort bien faites, qu'ils tien- nent entre leurs doigts, et prennet avec cela ce qu'ils veulent manger, si dextrement, que rien plus."—Mocquet, 346.

1711—"They take it very dexterously with a couple of small Chopsticks, which serve them instead of Forks."—Lockyer, 174.

1876.—"Before each there will be found a pair of chopsticks, a wine-cup, a small saucer for soy . . . and a pile of small pieces of paper for cleaning these articles as required."—Giles, Chinese Sketches, 153-4.

CHOTA-HAZRY, s. H. chhoṭi hāzri, vulg. hāzri, 'little breakfast'; refreshment taken in the early morning, before or after the morning exercise. The term (see HAZREE) was originally peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras the meal is called 'early tea.' Among the Dutch in Java, this meal consists (or did consist in 1860) of a large cup of tea, and a large piece of cheese, presented by the servant who calls one in the morning.

1853.—"After a bath, and hasty ante-breakfast (which is called in India a 'little breakfast') at the Euston Hotel, he proceeded to the private residence of a man of law."—Oakfield, ii. 179.

1866.—"There is one small meal . . . it is that commonly known in India by the Hindustani name of chota-hazri, and in our English colonies as 'Early Tea.' . . ."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 172.

1875.—"We took early tea with him this morning."—The Dilemma, ch. iii.

CHOUR, CHAUL, n.p. A seaport of the Comon, famous for many centuries under various forms of this name, Chandav properly, and pronounced in Koukami Tsinval (Sinclair, Ind. Ant. iv. 283). It may be regarded as almost certain that this was the Συμόλλα of Ptolemy's Tables, called by the natives, as he says, Τίμωλα. It may be fairly conjectured that the true reading of this was Τίμωλα, or Τέμωλα. We find the sound ch of Indian names apparently represented in Ptolemy by τι (as it is in Dutch by tj). Thus Táisoukρα = Chitar, Táisowvρας = Chashtaima; here Τίμωλα = Chandav; while Táisoukρα and Tείσωτα probably stand for names like Chagara and Charsao. Still more confidently Chandav may be identified with the Saimur (Chaimur) or Jaimur of the old Arab. Geographers, a port at the extreme end of Lār or Guzerat. At Choul itself there is a tradition that its antiquity goes back beyond that of Suali (see SWALLY), Bassein, or Bombay. There were memorable sieges of Choul in 1570-71, and again in 1894, in which the Portuguese successfully resisted Mahomedan CHOULTRY.

Attempts to capture the place. Dr. Burgess identifies the ancient Σήμωλα rather with a place called Chemburn, on the island of Trombay, which lies immediately east of the island of Bombay; but till more evidence is adduced we see no reason to adopt this.* Choul seems now to be known as Revadanda. Even the name is not to be found in the Imperial Gazetteer. Revadanda has a place in that work, but without a word to indicate its connection with this ancient and famous port. Mr. Gerson d'Acunha has published in the J. Bo. Br. As. Soc., vol. xii., Notes on the H. and Ant. of Chaul.

A.D. c. 80-90.—"Μετά δὲ Καλλέναν ἄλλα ἑμπόρα τοπικά, Σήμωλα, καὶ Μαντα-γόρα..."—Periplus.

A.D. c. 150.—"Σύμωλα ἐπιφρόνων (κα-λοίμουσαν ὑπὸ τῶν ἐγχώριων Τιμονία);"—Proc. i. cap. 17.

A.D. 916. "The year 304 I found myself in the territory of Sāmirūr (or Chaimūr), belonging to Hind and forming part of the province of Lār. There were in the place about 10,000 Mussalmans, both of those called behydration (half-breeds), and of natives of Shirf, Oman, Basrah, Bagdad, &c."—Mas'ūdi, ii. 86.

c. 1470.—"We sailed six weeks in the tavo till we reached Chivil, and left Chivil on the seventh week after the great day. This is an Indian country."—Ath. Nīkitin, 9, in India in Xvith. Cent.

1510.—"Departing from the said city of Combeia, I travelled on until I arrived at another city named Cevul (Chevul) which is distant from the above-mentioned city 12 days' journey, and the country between the one and the other of these cities is called Guzerâti."—Tarâshât, 113.

1546.—Under this year d'Acunha quotes from Freire d'Andrade a story that when the Viceroy required 20,000 pardaos (g. v.) to send for the defence of Diu, offering in pledge a wisp of his mustachio, the women of Chouël sent all their earrings and other jewellery, to be applied to this particular service.

1554.—"The ports of Mahaim and Sheul belong to the Deccan."—The Mohil, in J. A.S.D., v. 461.

1681.—"The 10th of November we arrived at Chaul which standeth in the firme land. There be two townes, the one belonging to the Portugales, and the other to the Moorees."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 384.

c. 1630.—"After long toil... we got to Chouli; then we came to Daman."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 42.

1635.—"Chival, a seaport of Deccan."—Sālik Iftihād, 88.

1727.—"Chaul, in former Times, was a noted Place for Trade, particularly for fine embroidered Quilts; but now it is miserably poor."—A. Hamilton, i. 243.

1782.—"That St. Lubin had some of the Mahratta officers on board of his ship, at the port of Chouli... he will remember as long as he lives, for they got so far the ascendancy over the political Frenchman, as to induce him to come into the harbour, and to land his cargo of military stores... not one piece of which he ever got back again, or was paid sixpence for."—Price's Observations on a Late Publication, &c., 14. In Price's Tracts, vol. i.

CHOULTRY, s. Peculiar to S. India, and of doubtful etymology; Malayal. chāvāṭi, Tel. chāvāṭi, [śāvāṭi, chau, Skt. chatur, 'four,' vāṭa, 'road, a place where four roads meet]. In W. India the form used is chowry or chowree (Dakh, chaturī). A hall, a shed, or a simple loggia, used by travellers as a resting-place, and also intended for the transaction of public business. In the old Madras Archives there is frequent mention of the "Justices of the Choultry." A building of this kind seems to have formed the early Court-house.

1673.—"Here (at Swally near Surat) we were welcomed by the Deputy President... who took care for my Entertainment, which here was rude, the place admitting of little better Tenements than Booths stiled by the name of Choultries."—Fryer, 82.

"Maders... enjoys some Choultries for Places of Justice."—Ibid. 39.

1683.—"... he shall pay for every slave so shipped... 50 pagodas to be recovered of him in the Choultry of Madraspat- tanam."—Order of Madras Council, in Wheeler, i. 136.

1689.—"Within less than half a Mile, from the Sea (near Surat) are three Choultries or Convenient Lodgings made of Timber."—Ovington, 164.

1711.—"Besides these, five Justices of the Choultry, who are of the Council, or chief Citizens, are to decide Controversies, and punish offending Indians."—Lockyer, 7.

1714.—In the MS. List of Persons in the Service, &c. (India Office Records), we have:—"Josiah Cooke factor Register of the Choultry, £15."
CHOULTRY PLAIN, n.p. This was the name given to the open country formerly existing to the S.W. of Madras. Choultry Plain was also the old designation of the Hd. Quarters of the Madras Army; equivalent to “Horse Guards” in Westminster (C. P. B. MS.).

1780.—“Every gentleman now possessing a house in the fort, was happy in accommodating the family of his friend, who before had resided in Choultry Plain. Note. The country near Madras is a perfect flat, on which is built, at a small distance from the fort, a small choultry.”—Hodges, Travels, 7.

CHOUSE, s. and v. This word is originally Turk. chaūsh, in former days a sergeant-at-arms, herald, or the like. [Vambrery (Sketches, 17) speaks of the Tchaush as the leader of a party of pilgrims.] Its meaning as ‘a cheat,’ or ‘to swindle’ is, apparently beyond doubt, derived from the anecdote thus related in a note of W. Gifford’s upon the passage in Ben Jonson’s Alchemist, which is quoted below. “In 1609 Sir Robert Shirley sent a messenger or chiaus (as our old writers call him) to this country, as his agent, from the Grand Signor and the Sophy, to transact some preparatory business. Sir Robert followed him, at his leisure, as ambassador from both these princes; but before he reached England, his agent had chiaused the Turkish and Persian merchants here of 4000l., and taken his flight, unconscious perhaps that he had enriched the language with a word of which the etymology would mislead Upton and puzzle Dr. Johnson.”—Ed. of Ben Jonson, iv. 27. “In Kattywar, where the native chiefs employ Arab mercenaries, the Chaus still flourishes as an officer of a company. When I joined the Political Agency in that Province, there was a company of Arabs attached to the Residency under a Chaus.” (M.-Gen. Keatinge). [The N.E.D. thinks that “Gifford’s note must be taken with reserve.” The Stanf. Dict. adds that Gifford’s note asserts that two other Chiauses arrived in 1618-1625. One of the above quotations proves his accuracy as to 1618. Perhaps, however, the particular fraud had little to do with the modern use of the word. As Jonson suggests, chiaus may have been used for ‘Turk’ in the sense of ‘cheat’; just as Catoian stood for ‘thief’ or ‘rogue.’ For a further discussion of the word see N. & Q., 7 ser. vi. 387; 8 ser. iv. 129.]

1560.—“Cum vero me taeeret inclinationem in eodem diversioro, ago cum meo Chiauso (genus id est, ut tibi scripsi alias, multiplices apud Turcas officii, quod etiam ad oratorum custodiam extenditurus) ut mihi licet aere meo domum conducere. . . .”—Busby, Epist. iii. p. 149.

1610.—“Dapper. . . What do you think of me, that I am a chiaus?
Face. What’s that?
Dapper. The Turk was here.
As one would say, do you think I am a Turk?

CHOW-CHOW, s. A common application of the Pigeon-English term in China is to mixed preserves; but, as the quotation shows, it has many uses;
the idea of mixture seems to prevail.
It is the name given to a book by Viscountess Falkland, whose husband was Governor of Bombay. There it seems to mean 'a medley of trifles.'
Chow is in 'pigeon' applied to food of any kind. ["From the erroneous impression that dogs form one of the principal items of a Chinaman's diet, the common variety has been dubbed the 'chow dog'" (Bull, Things Chinese,
p. 179).] We find the word chow-chow in Blumentritt's Vocabular of Manilla terms: "Chau-chau, a Tagal dish so called."

1858.—"The word chow-chow is suggestive, especially to the Indian reader, of a mixture of things, 'good, bad, and in-different,' of sweet little oranges and bits of bamboo stick, slices of sugar-cane and rinds of unripe fruit, all concocted together, and made upon the whole into a very tolerable confection. . . .

"Lady Falkland, by her happy selection of a name, to a certain extent deprecates and disarms criticism. We cannot complain that her work is without plan, unconnected, and sometimes trashy, for these are exactly the conditions implied in the word chow-chow."—Bowsey Quarterly Review, January, p. 100.

1882.—"The variety of uses to which the compound word 'chow-chow' is put is almost endless. . . A 'No. 1 chow-chow' thing signifies utterly worthless, but when applied to a breakfast or dinner it means 'unexceptionably good.' A 'chow-chow' cargo is an assorted cargo; a 'general shop' is a 'chow-chow' shop . . . one (factory) was called the 'chow-chow,' from its being habited by divers Parsees, Moormen, or other natives of India."—The Funk vs,
p. 65.

CHOWDRY, s. H. chaudhari, lit.
'a holder of four'; the explanation of which is obscure: [rather Skt. chakra-dharin, 'the bearer of the discus as an esigil of authority']. The usual application of the term is to the headman of a craft in a town, and more particularly to the person who is selected by Government as the agent through whom supplies, workmen, &c., are supplied for public purposes.
[Thus the Chaudhari of carter's provides carriage, the Chaudhari of Kahars (bearers, and so on.) Formerly, in places, to the headman of a village; to certain holders of lands; and in Cuttack it was, under native rule, applied to a district Revenue officer.
In a paper of 'Explanations of Terms' furnished to the Council at Fort William by Warren Hastings, then Resident at Moradbagh (1759), chowdrees are defined as "landholders in the next rank to Zemindars." (In Long, p. 176.) [Comp. VENDUMASTER.] It is also an honorific title given by servants to one of their number, usually, we believe, to the melli [see MOLLY], or gardener—as khalifa to the cook and tailor, jama'adâr to the bhâskî, mehtar to the sweeper, sîrdîr to the bearer.

c. 1300.—"... The people were brought to such a state of obedience that one revenue officer would string twenty ... chaudharics together by the neck, and enforce payment by blows."—Zia-ul-din Burni, in Elliot, iii. 183.

c. 1343.—"The territories dependent on the capital (Delhi) are divided into hundreds, each of which has a Jauthari, who is the Sheikh or chief man of the Hindus."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 388.

[1772.—"Chowdras, land-holders, in the next rank to Zemindars."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss, s.v.]

1788.—"Chowdry. — A Landholder or Farmer. Properly he is above the Zemindar in rank; but, according to the present custom of Bengal, he is deemed the next to the Zemindar. Most commonly used as the principal purveyor of the markets in towns or camps."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

CHOWK, s. H. chauk. An open place or wide street in the middle of a city where the market is held, [as, for example, the Chândnî Chauk of Delhi]. It seems to be adopted in Persian, and there is an Arabic form Sâk, which it is just possible, may have been borrowed and Arabized from the present word. The radical idea of chauk seems to be "four ways" [Skt. chatushkâ], the crossing of streets at the centre of business. Compare Corfuz, and the Quattro Cantoni of Palermo. In the latter city there is a market place called Piazza Ballarò, which in the 16th century a chronicler calls Seggeballarath, or as Anami interprets, Sâk-Balharà.

CHOWNEE, s. The usual native name, at least in the Bengal Presidency, for an Anglo-Indian cantonnement (q.v.). It is H. chhàôôâî, 'a thatched roof,' chhàôôâîôa, chhàôôâîâ, v. 'to thatch.'

CHOWRINGHEE, n.p. The name of a road and quarter of Calcutta, in which most of the best European houses stand; Chaurangi.

1759.—"The houses ... at Chowringeey also will be much more healthy."—Selont Kapir, ii. 205.

1790.—"To dig a large tank opposite the Cherighie Building."—Ibid. 13.

1792.—"For Private Sale. A neat, compact and new built garden house, pleasantly situated at Chowringy, and from its contiguity to Fort William, peculiarly well calculated for an officer; it would likewise be a handsome provision for a native lady, or a child. The price is 1500 sicca rupees."—Ibid. ii. 541.

1803.—"Chowringhee, an entire village of palaces, runs for a considerable length at right angles with it, and altogether forms the finest view I ever beheld in any city."—Ed. Valentia, i. 298.

1810.—"As I enjoyed Calcutta much less this time ... I left it with less regret. Still, when passing the Chowringhee road the last day, I—"

"Looked on stream and sea and plain As what I ne'er might see again."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 231.

1848.—"He wished all Cheltenham, al Chowringhee, all Calcutta, could see him in that position, waving his hand to such a beauty, and in company with such a famous buck as Rawdon Crawley, of the Guards."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1857, i. 297.

CHOWRY, s.

(a.) See CHOUTRY.

(b.) H. chauvîwar, chauvîrî; from Skt. chamaara, châmara. The bushy tail of the Tibetan Yak (q.v.), often set in a costly decorated handle to use as a fly-flapper, in which form it was one of the insignia of ancient Asiatic royalty. The tail was also often attached to the horse-trappings of native warriors; whilst it formed from remote times the standard of nations and nomad tribes of Central Asia. The Yak-tails and their uses are mentioned by Aelian, and by Cosmas (see under YAK). Allusions to the châmara, as a sign of royalty, are frequent in Skt. books and inscriptions, e.g. in the Poët Kalidâsâ (see transl. by Dr. Mill in for leaving their districts in immunity from plunder. The term is also applied to some other exactions of like ratio (see Wilson).

[1559.—Mr. Whiteway refers to Conto (Dec. VII. bk. 6, ch. 6), where this word is used in reference to payments made in 1559 in the time of D. Constantine de Bragança, and in papers of the early part of the 17th century the King of the Chouteas is frequently mentioned.]

1644.—"This King holds in our lands of Daman a certain payment which they call Chouto, which was paid him long before they belonged to the Portuguese, and so after they came under our power the payment continued to be made, and about these exactions and payments there have risen great disputes and contentions on one side and another."—Boccarro (MS.).

1674.—"Messengers were sent to Bassein demanding the chout of all the Portuguese territory in these parts. The chout means the fourth part of the revenue, and this is the earliest mention we find of the claim."—Orme's Fragments, p. 45.

1763-78.—"They (the English) were ... not a little surprised to find in the letters now received from Balajerow and his agent to themselves, and in stronger terms to the Nabob, a peremptory demand of the Chout ..."—Wellington's Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 175.

1858.—"... They (the Mahrattas) were accustomed to demand of the provinces they threatened with devastation a certain portion of the public revenue, generally the fourth part; and this, under the name of the chout, became the recognized Mahratta tribute, the price of the absence of their plundering hordes."—Whitney, Oriental and Ling. Studies, ii. 20-21.

CHOYA, CHAYA, CHEY, s. A root, [generally known as chayroot.] (Hedyotis umbellata, Lam., Oldenlandia umb., L.) of the Nat. Ord. Comollaceae, affording a red dye, sometimes called 'India Madder,' ['Dye Root,' 'Rameshwaram Root'] ; from Tam. shiyaver, Malayil. chiyaver (chaya, 'colour,' ver, 'root'). It is exported from S. India, and was so also at one time from Ceylon. There is a figure of the plant in Lettres Edif. xiv. 164.

c. 1566.—"... Also from S. Tome they lay a great store of red yarne, of bombast died with a roote which they call saia, as aforesaid, which colour will never out."—Cœur Frederic, in Haukt. [Il. 354].
1583.—"Ne viei anchora di detta saia da un altro luogo detto Petopolì, e se ne tignono parimente in S. Thomè."—Balbi, f. 107.

1672.—"Here groweth very good Zaye."
—Baldaeus, Ceylon.

[1679.—"... if they would provide musters of Chae and White goods. ..."
—Memorial of S. Master, in Kistna Man., p. 131.]

1726.—"Saya (a dye-root that is used on the Coast for painting chintzes)."—Valentijn, Chor, 45.

1727.—"The Islands of Diu (near Masulipatam) produce the famous Dye called Shaili. It is a shrub growing in Grounds that are overflown with the Spring tides."—A. Hamilton, i. 370; [ed. 1744, i. 374].

1860.—"The other productions that constituted the exports of the Island were sapan-wood to Persia; and choya-roots, a substitute for Madder, collected at Manaar ... for transmission to Surat."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 54-55. See also Chitty's Ceylon Gazetteer (1834), p. 40.

CHUCKAROO, s. English soldier's lingo for Chokra (q.v.)

CHUCKER. From H. chakar, chakkar, chakrā, Skt. chakra, 'a wheel or circle.'

(a.) s. A quoit for playing the English game; but more properly the sharp quoit or discus which constituted an ancient Hindu missile weapon, and is, or was till recently, carried by the Sikh fanatics called Akali (see AKALEE), generally encircling their peaked turbans. The thing is described by Tavernier (E. T. ii. 41: [ed. Ball, i. 82]) as carried by a company of Mahommedan Fakirs whom he met at Sherpur in Guzerat. See also Lt.-Col. T. Levin, A Fly, &c., p. 47: [Egerton, Handbook, Pl. 15, No. 64].

1516.—"In the Kingdom of Dely ... they have some steel wheels which they call chacarani, two fingers broad, sharp outside like knives, and without edge inside; and the surface of these is the size of a small plate. And they carry seven or eight of these each, put on the left arm; and they take one and put it on the finger of the right hand, and make it spin round many times, and so they hurl it at their enemies."—Barbosa, 100-101.

1630.—"In her right hand shee bare a chuckerey, which is an instrument of a round forme, and sharp-edged in the superficies thereof ... and stung off, in the quickness of his motion, it is able to deliever or convey death to a farre remote enemy."
—Lord, Disc. of the Banian Religion, 12.

(b) v. and s. To lunge a horse. H. chakarna or chakar karna. Also 'the lunge.'

1829.—"It was truly tantalizing to see those fellows chuckering their horses, not more than a quarter of a mile from our post."—John Skipp, i. 153.

[c.) In Polo, a 'period.'

[1900.—"Two bouts were played to-day ... In the opening chucker Capt. — carried the ball in."—Overland Mail, Aug. 13.]

CHUCKERBUTTY, n.p. This vulgarized Bengal Brahman name is, as Wilson points out, a corruption of chakravartī, the title assumed by the most exalted ancient Hindu sovereigns, an universal Emperor, whose chariot-wheels rolled over all (so it is explained by some).

c. 400.—"Then the Bikshuni Uthala began to think thus with herself, 'To-day the King, ministers, and people are all going to meet Buddha ... but I—a woman—how can I contrive to get the first sight of him?' Buddha immediately, by his divine power, changed her into a holy Chakravartī Raja."—Travels of Fah-hian, tr. by Beate, p. 63.

c. 460.—"On a certain day (Asoka), having ... ascertained that the supernaturally gifted ... Nāga King, whose age extended to a Kappe, had seen the four Buddhas ... he thus addressed him: 'Beloved, exhibit to me the person of the omnipotent being of infinite wisdom, the Chakravitī of the doctrine.'"—The Mahavamsa, p. 27.

1856.—"The importance attached to the possession of a white elephant is traceable to the Buddhist system. A white elephant of certain wonderful endowments is one of the seven precious things, the possession of which marks the Maha Chakravarti Raja ... the holy and universal sovereign, a character which appears once in a cycle."—Mission to the Court of Ava (Major's Playre's), 1858, p. 164.

CHUCKLAH, s. H. chakkāl, [Skt. chakra, 'a wheel']. A territorial subdivision under the Mahommedan government, thus defined by Warren Hastings, in the paper quoted under CHOWDRY:

1759.—"The jurisdiction of a Phoijdar (see FOUDAR), who receives the rents from the Zemindars, and accounts for them with the Government."

1760.—"In the treaty concluded with the Nawāb Meer Mohammud Čāsim Khān, on the 27th Sept. 1760, it was agreed that ... the English army should be ready to assist, him in the management of all affairs, and that the lands of the chuklahs (districts) of Burdwan, Midnapore and Chittagong, should be assigned for all the charges of the company and the army..."—Harington's _Analysis of the Laws and Regulations_, vol. i. Calcutta, 1805-1809, p. 5.

CHUCKLER. s. Tam. and Malavî. shakılı, the name of a very low caste, members of which are rams or cobblers, like the Chamârs (see CHUMAR) of Upper India. But whilst the latter are reputed to be a very dark caste, the Chucklers are fair (see Elliot's Gloss. by Beaumes, i. 71, and Caldwell's _Gram._ 574). [On the other hand the Madras Gloss. (s.v.) says that as a rule they are of "a dark black hue."] Colloquially in S. India Chuckler is used for a native shoemaker.

c. 1580.—"All the Gentoons (Gentio) of those parts, especially those of Bismaga, have many castes, which take precedence one of another. The lowest are the Cha-quillis, who make shoes, and eat all unclean flesh..."—Primor eu Honra, &c., i. 95.

1759.—"Shackelays are shoemakers, and held in the same despicablc light on the Coromandel Coast as the Naaddes and Fullies on the Malabar."—Ives, 26.

c. 1790.—"Aussi n'est-ce que le rebùt de la classe méprisée des parriss; savoir les tschakelis ou cordonniers et les vetrians ou fossoyeurs, qui s'occupent de l'enterrnement et la combustion des morts."—Hauflner, ii. 60.

[1814.—"... the chockly, who performs the degrading duty of executioner. ..."—Society, Manners, &c., of India, ii. 282.]

1869.—"The Komatis or mercantile caste of Madras by long established custom, are required to send an offering of betel to the chucklers, or shoemakers, before contracting their marriages."—Sir W. Elliot, in _J. Ethn. Soc._, N. S. vol. i. 102.

CHUCKMUCK. S. H. chakmak. 'Flint and steel.' One of the titles conferred on Haidar 'Ali before he rose to power was 'Chakmak Jang, 'Firelock of War'? See _II. of Hydor Naik_, 112.

CHUCKRUM. s. An ancient coin once generally current in the S. of India, Malayâl, chakram, Tel. chakram; from Skt. chakra (see under CHUCKER). It is not easy to say what was its value, as the statements are inconsistent: nor do they confirm Wilson's, that it was equal to one-tenth of a pagoda. [According to the Madras Gloss. (s.v.) it bore the same relation to the gold _Pagoda_ that the Anna does to the Rupee, and under it again was the copper _Cash_, which was its sixteenth.] The denomination survives in Travancore, [where 28½ go to one rupee. (Ibid.)]

1554.—"And the fanoms of the place are called _chocrôes_, which are coins of inferior gold; they are worth 12½ or 12½ to the _parado_ of gold, reckoning the _parado_ at 350 reis."—A. Nunes, _Livro dos Peso_, 98.

1711.—"The Enemy will not come to any agreement unless we consent to pay 30,000 _chuckrms_, which we take to be 16,000 and odd pagodas."—In Wheeler, ii. 165.

1813.—Milburn, under Tanjore, gives the _chuckrum_ as a coin equal to 20 Madras, or ten gold fanams. 20 Madras fanams would be ½ of a pagoda.

[From the difficulty of handling these coins, which are small and round, they are counted on a _chuckrum_ board as in the case of the _Fanam_ (q.v.).]

CHUDDER. s. H. châdur, a sheet, or square piece of cloth of any kind; the ample sheet commonly worn as a mantle by women in N. India. It is also applied to the cloths spread over Mahommedan tombs. Barbosa (1516) and Linschoten (1598) have _chautars_, _chautares_, as a kind of cotton piece-goods, but it is certain that this is not the same word. _Chowtars_ occur among Bengal piece-goods in Milburn, ii. 221. [The word is _chauder_, 'anything with four threads,' and it occurs in the list of cotton cloths in the _Ain_ (i. 94). In a letter of 1610 we have "_Chautares are white and well requested" (Dumers, Letters, i. 75); "_Chauters of Agra_" (Foster, Letters, ii. 45); Cocks has "fine _Cashe or Chouter" (Diary, i. 86); and in 1615 they are called "_Contner" (Foster, iv. 51).]

1525.—"Chader of Cambaya."—_Lembrança_, 56.

[c. 1610.—"From Bengal comes another sort of hanging, of fine linen painted and ornamented with colours in a very agreeable fashion; these they call _iader_."—_Pyramid de Laval_, Hak. Soc. i. 222.]

1614.—"_Pintados, chints and chadors_."—Peyton, in _Purchas_, i. 530.

1673.—"The habit of these water-nymphs was fine _Shudders_ of lawn embroidered on the neck, wrist, and skirt with a border of several coloured silks or threads of gold."—Herbert, 3rd ed. 191.
1832.—"Chuddur...a large piece of cloth or sheet, of one and a half or two breadths, thrown over the head, so as to cover the whole body. Men usually sleep rolled up in it."—Herklotz, Quaanoor.-Islam, xii.-xiii.

1878.—"Two or three women, who had been chattering away till we appeared, but who, on seeing us, drew their chadders...round their faces, and retired to the further end of the boat."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 79.

The Rampore Chudder is a kind of shawl, of the Tibetan shawl-wool, of uniform colour without pattern, made originally at Râmpur on the Sutlej; and of late years largely imported into England: [see the Punjab Mono. on Wool, p. 9]. Curiously enough a claim to the derivation of the title from Râmpur, in Rohilkhand, N. W. P. is made in the Imperial Gazetteer, 1st ed. (s. v.).]

CHUL! CHULLO! v. in imperative; 'Go on! Be quick.' H. chalo! imper. of chalid, to go, go speedily. [Another common use of the word in Anglo-Indian slang is—"It won't chul," 'it won't answer, succeed.]

c. 1790.—"Je montai de três-bonne heure dans mon palanquin."—Tschoollo (c'est-à-dire, marche), crirent mes coulis, et aussitôt le voyage commença."—Houtker, ii. 5.

[CHUMAR, s. H. Chamrâr, Skt. charma-kàra, 'one who works in leather;' and thus answering to the Chuckler of S. India; an important caste found all through N. India, whose primary occupation is tanning, but a large number are agriculturists and day labourers of various kinds.]

[1823.—'From this abomination, beef-eating...they [the Bheels] only rank above the Choomars, or shoemakers, who feast on dead carcases, and are in Central India, as elsewhere, deemed so unclean that they are not allowed to dwell within the precincts of the village."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 179.]

CHUMPUK, s. A highly ornamental and sacred tree (Michelia champaca, L., also M. Rheediti), a kind of magnolia, whose odorous yellow blossoms are much prized by Hindus, offered at shrines, and rubbed on the body at marriages, &c. H. champak, Skt. champaka. Drury strangely says that the name is "derived from Cîampa, an island between Cambogia and Cochin China, where the tree grows." Champa is not an island, and certainly derives its Sanskrit name from India, and did not give a name to an Indian tree. The tree is found wild in the Himalaya from Nepal, eastward; also in Pegu and Tenasserim, and along the Ghauts to Travancore. The use of the term champaka extends to the Philippine Islands. [Mr. Skeat notes that it is highly prized by Malay women, who put it in their hair.]

1623.—"Among others they showed me a flower, in size and form not unlike our lily, but of a yellowish white colour, with a sweet and powerful scent, and which they call champâ [ciampâ]."—P. della Valle, ii. 517; [Hak. Soc. i. 40].

1786.—"The walks are scented with blossoms of the champac and nagnier, and the plantations of pepper and coffee are equally new and pleasing."—Sir W. Jones, in Mem., &c., ii. 81.

1810.—"Some of these [birds] build in the sweet-scented champaka and the mango."—Maria Graham, 22.

1819.—"The wandering airs they faint On the dark, the silent stream; And the champak's odours fail Like sweet thoughts in a dream."—Shelley, Lines to an Indian Air. 1821.—"Some champak flowers proclaim it yet divine."—Medeir, Sketches in Hindoostan, 73.

CHUNÁM, s. Prepared lime; also specially used for fine polished plaster. Forms of this word occur both in Dravidian languages and Hind. In the latter chûnâ is from Skt. chârya, 'powder'; in the former it is somewhat uncertain whether the word is, or is not, an old derivative from the Sanskrit. In the first of the following quotations the word used seems taken from the Malayâl. chunâmba, Tam. chunambu. 1610.—"And they also eat with the said leaves [betel] a certain lime made from oyster shells, which they call cionama."—Varthema, 114.

1563.—"...so that all the names you meet with that are not Portuguese are Malabar; such as betre [betel], chunâ, which is lime..."—Garcia, l. 37g.

c. 1610.—"...l'in porte son éventail, l'autre la boîte d'argent pleine de betel, l'autre une boîte ou il y a du chunâ, qui est de la chaux."—Pygârd de Lavall, ii. 84; [Hak. Soc. ii. 135].
1614.—“Having burnt the great idol into chunah, he mixed the powdered lime with pān leaves, and gave it to the Rājput that they might eat the objects of their worship.”—Firishta, quoted by Quatremère, Not. et Est., xiv. 510.

1673.—“The Natives chew it (Betel) with Chinam (Lime of calcined Oyster Shells).”—Freyer, 40.

1657.—“That stores of Brick, Iron, Stones, and Chimah be in readiness to make up any breach.”—Maddax Consultations, in Wheeler, i. 168.

1699.—“The flooring is generally composed of a kind of loam or stucco, called chunam, being a lime made of burnt shells.”—Grose, i. 52.

1763.—“In the Chukkel of Silet for the space of five years . . . my ph Osman and the Company’s gomastah shall jointly prepare chunam, of which each shall defray all expenses, and half the chunam so made shall be given to the Company, and the other half shall be for my use.”—Treaty of Mir Jaffir with the Company, in Carraccioli’s L. of Clive, i. 64.

1809.—“The row of chunam pillars which supported each side . . . were of a shining white.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 61.

CHUNÁM, TO. v. To set in mortar; or, more frequently, to plaster over with chunam.

1867.—“. . . to get what great jars he can, to put wheat in, and chenam them up, and set them round the fort curtain.”—In Wheeler, i. 168.

1809.—“. . . having one . . . room . . . beautifully chunammed.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 386.

Both noun and verb are used also in the Anglo-Chinese settlements.

CHUNÁRGURH, n.p. A famous rock-fort on the Ganges, above Benares, and on the right bank. The name is believed to be a corr. of Churana-giri, ‘Foot Hill,’ a name probably given from the actual resemblance of the rock, seen in longitudinal profile, to a human foot. [There is a local legend that it represents the foot of Vishnu. A native folk etymology makes it a corr. of Chandalgir, from some legendary connection with the Bhangi tribe (see CHANDAUL). (See Crooke, Tribes and Castes, i. 203.)] 1785.—“Chunar, called by the natives Chandalgur. . . .”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 442.

CHUPPATTY, s. H. chapātī, an unleavened cake of bread (generally of coarse wheaten meal), patted flat with the hand, and baked upon a griddle; the usual form of native bread, and the staple food of Upper India. (See HOPPER.)

1615.—Parson Terry well describes the thing, but names it not: “The ordinary sort of people eat bread made of a coarse grain, but both toothsome and wholesome and hearty. They make it up in broad cakes, thick like our eaten cakes; and then bake it upon small round iron hearts which they carry with them.”—In Purchas, ii. 1468.

1810.—“Chow-patties, or bannocks.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 348.

1857.—“From village to village brought by one messenger and sent forward by another passed a mysterious token in the shape of one of those flat cakes made from flour and water, and forming the common bread of the people, which in their language, are called chupatties.”—Kaye’s Nepāy War, i. 570. [The original account of this by the Correspondent of the ‘Times,’ dated “Bom- bay, March 3, 1857,” is quoted in 2 ser. N. d. Q. iii. 965.]

There is a tradition of a noble and gallant Governor-General who, when compelled to rough it for a day or two, acknowledged that “chupressies and masauchleis were not such bad diet,” meaning Chupatties and Mussalla.

CHUPKUN, s. H. chapkan. The long frock (or cassock) which is the usual dress in Upper India of nearly all male natives who are not actual labourers or indigent persons. The word is probably of Turki or Mongol origin, and is perhaps identical with the chakman of the Ām (i. 90), a word still used in Turkistan. [Vambéry, (Sketches, 121 seqq.) describes both the Tehapan or upper coat and the Tehkmen or gown.] Hence Beames’s connection of chapkan with the idea of chap as meaning compressing or clinging [Platts chapka, ‘to be pressed’], “a tightly-fitting coat or cassock,” is a little fanciful. (Comp. Gram. i. 212 seq.) Still this idea may have shaped the corruption of a foreign word.

1883.—“He was, I was going to say, in his shirt-sleeves, only I am not sure that he wore a shirt in those days—I think he had a chupkun, or native under-garment.”—C. Raikes, in L. of Ld. Lawrence, i. 59.
CHUPRA, n.p. Chapra, [or perhaps rather Chhapra, 'a collection of straw huts,' (see CHOPPER),] a town and head-quarter station of the District Saran in Bahar, on the north bank of the Ganges.

1665.—'The Holland Company have a House there (at Patna) by reason of their trade in Salt Peter, which they refine at a great Town called Choupar . . . 10 leagues above Patna.'—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 53; [ed. Ball, i. 122].

1728.—'Sjopera (Chupra).''—Valentijn, Charom., &c., 147.

CHUPRASSY, s. H. chauprasi, the bearer of a chaupras, i.e. a badge-plate inscribed with the name of the office to which the bearer is attached. The chaupras is an office-messenger, or henchman, bearing such a badge on a cloth or leather belt. The term belongs to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras Peon is the usual term; in Bombay Puttywalla. (H. pattiwala), or 'man of the belt.' The etymology of chaupras is obscure; [the popular account is that it is a corr. of P. chapo-rast, 'left and right'); but see Beames (Comp. Gram. i. 212), who gives buckle as the original meaning.

1865.—'I remember the days when every servant in my house was a chuprassee, with the exception of the Khansamaun and a Portuguese Ayah.'—The Duck Bengalor, p. 389.

c. 1866.—
'The big Sahib's tent has gone from under the Peepul tree,
With his horde of hungry chuprassees,
And oilly sons of the quill—
I paid them the bribe they wanted, and Sheitan will settle the bill.'

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1877. — 'One of my chuprassees or messengers . . . was badly wounded.'—Meadows Taylor, Life, i. 227.

1880.—'Through this refractory medium the people of India see their rulers. The Chuprassie paints his master in colours drawn from his own black heart. Every lie he tells, every insinuation he throws out, every demand he makes, is endorsed with his master's name. He is the arch-slanderer of our name in India.'—Ali Baba, 102-3.

CHUR, s. H. char, Skt. char, 'to move.' 'A sand-bank or island in the current of a river, deposited by the water, claims to which were regulated by the Bengal Reg. xi. 1825' (Wilson). A char is a new alluvial deposit by the great rivers as the floods are sinking, and covered with grass, but not necessarily insulated. It is remarkable that Mr. Marsh mentions a very similar word as used for the same thing in Holland. "New sandbank land, covered with grasses, is called in Zeeland sehor" (Man and Nature, p. 339). The etymologies are, however, probably quite apart.

1878.—'In the dry season all the various streams . . . are merely silver threads winding among innumerable sandy islands, the soil of which is specially adapted for the growth of Indigo. They are called Churs.'—Life in the Mogusil, ii. 3 seq.

CHURRUCK, s. A wheel or any rotating machine; particularly applied to simple machines for cleaning cotton. Pers. charkh, 'the celestial sphere,' a wheel of any kind,' &c. Beng. charak is apparently a corruption of the Persian word, facilitated by the nearness of the Skt. chakra, &c.

—— POOJAH. Beng. charak-pajá (see POOJA). The Swinging Festival of the Hindus, held on the sun's entrance into Aries. The performer is suspended from a long yard, traversing round on a mast, by hooks passed through the muscle over the bladebones, and then whirled round so as to fly out centrifugally. The chief seat of this barbarous display is, or latterly was, in Bengal, but it was formerly prevalent in many parts of India. [It is the Shurry (Ca. and Tel. sidli, Tam. shedil, Tel. sidli, 'a hook') of S. India.] There is an old description in Purchas's Pilgrimage, p. 1000; also (in Malabar) in A. Hamilton, i. 270; (at Ikkeri, P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 259); and (at Calcutta) in Heber's Journal, quoted below.

c. 1430.—'Ali ad ornandos cursus perorato latere, fune per corpus immisso se ad currum suspendunt, pendentesque et ipsi examinati idolum comitantur; id optimum sacrificium putant et acceptissimum deo.'—Conti, in Poggios, De Var. Fornaciv, iv.

[1754.—See a long account of the Bengal rite in Jos., 27 seq.]

1824.—'The Hindoo Festival of 'Churruck Poojah' commenced to-day, of which, as my wife has given an account in her journal, I shall only add a few particulars.'—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 57.

CHURRUS, s.

a. H. charas. A simple apparatus worked by oxen for drawing water from a well, and discharging it into irrigation channels by means of pulley ropes, and a large bag of hide (H. chara, Skt. charma). [See the description in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 153. Hence the area irrigated from a well.]

[1829.—"To each Churrus, chhursa, or skin of land, there is attached twenty-five bighas of irrigated land."—Ted, Annals (Calcutta repr.), ii. 688.]

b. H. charus, [said to be so called because the drug is collected by men who walk with leather aprons through the field]. The resinous exudation of the hemp-plant (Cannabis Indica), which is the basis of intoxicating preparations (see BANG, GUNJA).

[1842.—"The Moolah sometimes smoked the intoxicating drug called Chirs."—Elphinstone, Calcuta, i. 344.]

CHUTKARRY, CHATTAGAR, in S. India, a half-caste; Tam. shattt-kar, 'one who wears a waistcoat' (C. P. B).

CHUTNY, s. H. chatnī. A kind of strong relish, made of a number of condiments and fruits, &c., used in India, and more especially by Mahomedans, and the merits of which are now well known in England. For native chutny recipes, see Herklotz, Qamoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. xlvii. seqq.

1813.—"The Chatna is sometimes made with coco-nut, lime-juice, garlic, and chillies, and with the pickles is placed in deep leaves round the large cover, to the number of 30 or 40."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 50 seq.; [2nd ed. i. 348].

1820.—"Chitney, Chatnee, some of the hot spices made into a paste, by being bruised with water, the 'kitchen' of an Indian peasant."—Aec. of Township of Loony, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, ii. 194.

CHUTT, s. H. chhat. The proper meaning of the vernacular word is 'a roof or platform.' But in modern Anglo-Indian its usual application is to the coarse cotton sheeting, stretched on a frame and whitewashed, which forms the usual ceiling of rooms in thatched or tiled houses; properly chadar-chhat, 'sheet-ceiling.'

CHUTTANUTTY, n.p. This was one of the three villages purchased for the East India Company in 1686, when the agents found their position in Hugi intolerable, to form the settlement which became the city of Calcutta. The other two villages were Calcutta and Govindpur. Dr. Hunter spells it Sātanāti, but the old Anglo-Indian orthography indicates Chatānāti as probable. In the letter-books of the Factory Council in the India Office the earlier letters from this establishment are lost, but down to 27th March, 1700, they are dated from "Chutta-nutte"; on and after June 8th, from "Calcuta"; and from August 20th in the same year from "Fort William" in Calcutta. [See Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lix.] According to Major Ralph Smyth, Chatānāti occupied "the site of the present native town," i.e. the northern quarter of the city. Calcutta stood on what is now the European commercial part; and Govindpur on the present site of Fort William.*

1753.—"The Hoogly Phousdar demanding the payment of the ground rent for 4 months from January, namely:—B. A. P.
Sootaloota, Calcuta. 325 0 0
Govindpoor, Pice. 70 0 0
Govindpoor, Calcuta. 33 0 0
Buxies. 1 8 0

Agreed that the President do pay the same out of cash."—Comm. Ft. William, April 30, in Long, 43.

CHUTTRUM, s. Tam shattiram, which is a corruption of Skt. asthāra, 'abode.' In S. India a house where pilgrims and travelling members of the higher castes are entertained and fed gratuitously for a day or two. [See CHOULTRY, DHURMSALLA.]

1807.—"There are two distinct kinds of buildings confounded by Europeans under the name of Choultry. The first is that called by the natives Chaturam, and built for the accommodation of travellers. These have in general pent roofs . . . built in the form of a square enclosing a court. . . . The other kind are properly built for the reception of images, when these are carried in procession. These have flat roofs, and consist of one apartment only, and by the natives are called Mandapam. . . . Besides the Chaturam and the Mandapam, there is another kind of building which by Europeans is called Choultry: in the Tamul language it is called Tanj Pudat, or Water Shed . . . small buildings where weary travellers may enjoy a temporary repose in the shade, and obtain a draught of water or milk."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 11, 15.

CINDERELLA'S SLIPPER. A Hindu story on the like theme appears among the Hala Kanara MSS. of the Mackenzie Collection:—

"Servomadeni having dropped her slipper in a reservoir, it was found by a fisherman of Kowmakauri, who sold it to a shopkeeper, by whom it was presented to the King Ugrabahu. The Prince, on seeing the beauty of the slipper, fell in love with the wearer, and offered large rewards to any person who should find and bring her to him. An old woman undertook the task, and succeeded in tracing the shoe to its owner. . . ."—Mackenzie Collection, by H. H. Wilson, ii. 52. [The tale is not uncommon in Indian folk-lore. See Miss Crow, Cindrella (Folk-lore Soc.), i. 91, 183, 465, &c.]

CINTRA ORANGES. See ORANGE and SUNGARA.

CIRCARS, n.p. The territory to the north of the Coromandel Coast, formerly held by the Nizam, and now forming the districts of Kistna, Godavari, Vizagapatam, Ganjam, and a part of Nellore, was long known by the title of "The Circars" or "Northern Circars" (i.e. Governments), now officially obsolete. The Circars of Chicacole (now Vizagapatam Dist.), Rajamandri and Ellore (these two embraced now in Godavari Dist.), with Condapilly (now embraced in Kistna Dist.), were the subject of a grant from the Great Mogul, obtained by Clive in 1765, confirmed by treaty with the Nizam in 1766. Gantur (now also included in Kistna Dist.) devolved eventually by the same treaty (but did not come permanently under British rule till 1803. [For the history see Madras Admin. Man. i. 179.] C. P. Brown says the expression "The Circars" was first used by the French, in the time of Bussy. [Another name for the Northern Circars was the Carnatic or Corbigo country, apparently a corr. of Kalinga (see KLING), see Pringle, Diary, &c., of Pt. St. George, 1st ser. vol. 2, p. 125. (See SIRCAR.)]

1767.—"Letter from the Chief and Council at Masulipatam . . . that in consequence of orders from the President and Council of Fort St. George for securing and sending away all vagrant Europeans that might be met with in the Circars, they have embarked there for this place . . . ."—Fort William Coops, in Long, 476 seq.

1789.—"The most important public transaction . . . is the surrender of the Guntoor Circar to the Company, by which it becomes possessed of the whole Coast, from Jaggyaut to Cape Comorin. The Nizam made himself master of that province, soon after Hyder's invasion of the Carnatic, as an equivalent for the arrears of pechush, due to him by the Company for the other Circars."—Letter of T. Muaro, in Life by Cleyj, i. 70.

1823.—"Although the Sirkars are our earliest possessions, there are none, perhaps, of which we have so little accurate knowledge in everything that regards the condition of the people."—Sir T. Muaro, in Selections, &c., by Sir A. Arbuthnot, i. 204.

We know from the preceding quotation what Muaro's spelling of the name was.

1836.—"The district called the Circars, in India, is part of the coast which extends from the Carnatic to Bengal . . . The domestic economy of the people is singular; they inhabit villages (!), and all labour is performed by public servants paid from the public stock."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1878.—"General Sir J. C., C.B., K.C.S.I. He entered the Madras Army in 1820, and in 1834, according to official despatches, displayed 'active zeal, intrepidity, and judgment' in dealing with the savage tribes in Orissa known as the Circars" (!!).—Obituary Notice in Homeward Mail, April 27.

CIVILIAN, s. A term which came into use about 1750-1770, as a designation of the covenanted European servants of the E. I. Company, not in military employ. It is not used by Grose, c. 1760, who was himself of such service at Bombay. [The earliest quotation in the N.E.D. is of 1766 from Malcolm's L. of Olive, 54.] In Anglo-Indian parlance it is still appropriated to members of the covenanted Civil Service [see COVENANTED SERVANTS]. The Civil Service is mentioned in Corraccio's L. of Olive, (c. 1785), iii. 164. From an early date in the Company's history up to 1833, the members of the Civil Service were classified during the first five years as Writers (q.v.), then to the 8th year as Factors (q.v.); in the 9th and 11th as Junior Merchants; and thenceforward as Senior Merchants. These names were relics of the original commercial character of the E. I. Company's transactions, and had long ceased to have any practical meaning at the time of their abolition in 1833, when the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 85), removed the last traces of the Company's commercial existence.

1848.—(Lady O'Dowd's) "quarrel with Lady Smith, wife of Minos Smith the puisne Judge, is still remembered by some at Madras, when the Colonel's lady snapped her fingers in the Judge's lady's face, and said she'd never walk behind over a beggarly civilian."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 85.

1872.—"You bloated civilians are never satisfied, retorted the other."—A True Reformer, i. 4.

CLASSY, CLASHY, s. H. khalāši, usual etym. from Arab khalās. A tent-pitcher; also (because usually taken from that class of servants) a man employed as chain-man or staffman, &c., by a surveyor; a native sailor; or Matross (q.v.). Khalāš is constantly used in Hindustani in the sense of 'liberation'; thus, of a prisoner, a magistrate says 'khalāš karo,' 'let him go.' But it is not clear how khalāši got its ordinary Indian sense. It is also written khalāši, and Vulners has an old Pers. word khalāšha for 'a ship's rudder.' A learned friend suggests that this may be the real origin of khalāši in its Indian use. [Khalāš also means the 'escape channel of a canal,' and khalādī may have been originally a person in 'charge of such a work.]

1785.—"A hundred clashies have been sent to you from the presence."—Tippoo's Letters, 17.

1801.—"The sepoys in a body were to bring up the rear. Our left flank was to be covered by the sea, and our right by Gopie Nath's men. Then the clashies and other armed followers."—Mt. Stewart Elphinstone, in Life, i. 27.

1824.—"If the tents got dry, the clashees (tent-pitchers) allowed that we might proceed in the morning prosperously."—Hoben, ed. 1844, i. 194.

CLEARING NUT, WATER FILTER NUT, s. The seed of Strychnos potatorum, L.; a tree of S. India; [known in N. India as nirmala, nirmali, 'dirt-cleaner?']. It is so called from its property of clearing muddy water, if well rubbed on the inside of the vessel which is to be filled.

CLOVE, s. The flower-bud of Caryophyllum aromaticum, L., a tree of the Moluccas. The modern English name of this spice is a kind of ellipsis from the French clous de girofles, 'Nails of Girofles,' i.e. of garofala, caryophylla, &c., the name by which this spice was known to the ancients; the full old English name was similar, 'clove gilliflower,' a name which, cut in two like a polypus, has formed two different creatures, the clove (or nail) being assigned to the spice, and the 'gillyflower' to a familiar clove-smelling flower. The comparison to nails runs through many languages. In Chinese the thing is called t'ing-hiang, or 'nail-spike'; in Persian mekhah, 'little nails,' or 'nailkins,' like the German Nelken, Nagelchen, and Gewürzt-nagel (spice nail).

[1802-3.—"Also be careful to get together all the cloves you can."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 36.]

COAST, THE, n.p. This term in books of the 18th century means the 'Madras or Coromandel Coast,' and often 'the Madras Presidency.' It is curious to find ḫaḍāma, "the Shore," applied in a similar specific way, in Ptolomy, to the coast near Cape Comorin. It will be seen that the term "Coast Army," for "Madras Army," occurs quite recently. The Persian rendering of Coast Army by Bandāri below is curious.

1781.—"Just imported from the Coast . . . a very fine assortment of the following cloths."—India Gazette, Sept. 15.

1789.—"Unseduced by novelty, and uninfluenced by example, the bolles of the Coast have courage enough to be unfashionable . . . and we still see their charming tresses flow in luxuriant ringlets."—Hugh Boyd, 78.

1800.—"I have only 1892 Coast and 1200 Bombay sepoys."—Wellington, i. 227.

1802.—"From Hydurabad also, Colonels Roberts and Dalrymple, with 4000 of the Banduri or coast sipahees."—H. of Reign of Tipu Sultan, E. T. by Miles, p. 253.

1879.—"Is it any wonder then, that the Coast Army has lost its ancient renown, and that it is never employed, as an army should be, in fighting the battles of its country, or its employers?"—Pollock, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 1:26.

and other Malay countries. The name is explained below by Pyrard as ‘black fish,’ and he is generally to be depended on. But the first accurate elucidation has been given by Mr. H. C. P. Bell, of the Ceylon C. S., in the Indian Antiquary for Oct. 1882, p. 294; see also Mr. Bell's Report on Maldives Islands, Colombo, 1882, p. 93, where there is an account of the preparation. It is the Maldiver kalu-bili-mäs, ‘black-bonito-fish.' The second word corresponds to the Singhalese baluqā.

c. 1345.—"It's flesh is red, and without fat, but it smells like mutton. When caught each fish is cut in four, slightly boiled, and then placed in baskets of palm-leaf, and hung in the smoke. When perfectly dry it is eaten. From this country it is exported to India, China, and Yemen. It is called Kolb-al-mäs."—Ibn Batuta (on Maldives), iv, 112, also 311.

1578.—"They eat it with a sort of dried fish, which comes from the Islands of Malediva, and resembles jerked beef, and it is called Comalamaa."—Acosta, 103.

c. 1610.—"Ce poisson qui se prend ainsi, s'appelle généralement en leur langue cobolly masse, c'est à dire du poisson noir. . . . Ils le font cuire en de l'eau de mer, et puis le font secher au feu sur des clayes, en sorte qu'estant see il se garde fort long-temps."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 138; see also 141.

[Hak. Soc. i. 100 (with Gray's note) and 194.]

1727.—"The Bonetta is caught with Hook and Line, or with nets. . . . they cut the Fish from the Back-bone on each Side, and lay them in a Shade to dry, sprinkling them sometimes with Sea Water. When they are dry enough. . . . they wrap them up in Leaves of Cocoa-nut Trees, and put them a Foot or two under the Surface of the Sand, and with the Heat of the Sun, they become baked as hard as Stock-fish, and Ships come from Atcheen . . . and purchase them with Gold-dust. I have seen Comelamash (for that is their name after they are dried) sell at Atcheen for 8L. Sterl. per 1000."—A. Hamilton, i. 347; [ed. 1744, i. 350].

1783.—"Many Maldives boats come yearly to Atcheen, and bring chiefly dried bonnetta in small pieces about two or three ounces; this is a sort of staple article of commerce, many shops in the Bazaar deal in it only, having large quantities piled up, put in matt bags. It is when properly cured, hard like horn in the middle; when kept long the worm gets to it."—Forrest, V. to Margus, 45.

1813.—"The fish called Commel melch, so much esteemed in Maldiva, is caught at Minicoy."—Millsburn, i. 321, also 336.

1841.—"The Sultan of the Maldiva Islands sends an agent or minister every year to the government of Ceylon with presents consisting of . . . a considerable quantity of dried fish, consisting of bonitos, albicore, and fish called by the inhabitants of the Maldivas the black fish, or Comboli mas."—J. R. As. Soc. vi. 75.

The same article contains a Maldivian vocabulary, in which we have "Bonito or gooomulmuth . . . kannelmos" (p. 49). Thus we have in this one paper three corrupt forms of the same expression, viz. comboli mas, kanneli mas, and gooomulmuth; all attempts at the true Maldivian term kalu-bili-mäs, 'black bonito fish.'

COBRA DE CAPELLO, or simply COBRA, s. The venomous snake Naja tripudians. Cobra [Lat. colubra] is Port. for 'snake'; cobra de capello, 'snake of (the) hood.' [In the following we have a curious translation of the name: "Another sort, which is called Chapel- snakes, because they keep in Chapels or Churches, and sometimes in Houses" (A Relation of Two Several Voyages made into the East Indies, by Christopher Fryke, Surg. . . . London, 1700, p. 291).]

1523.—"A few days before, cobras de capello had been secretly introduced into the fort, which bit some black people who died thereof, both men and women; and when this news became known it was perceived that they must have been introduced by the hand of some one, for since the fort was made never had the like been heard of."—Correa, ii. 177.

1539.—"Vimos tabe aquy grande soma de cobras de capello, da grossura da coxa de hú homè, e tão peoquenthas em tanto- estremo, que dizia os negros que se chegou com a boca a qualquer cousa viva, logo em proviso cahia morta em terra . . ."—Pinto, cap. xiv.

". . . Adders that were copped on the crowns of their heads, as big as a man's thigh, and so venomous, as the Negroes of the country informed us, that if any living thing came within the reach of their breath, it dyed presently. . . ."—Cogan's Trans., p. 17.

1563.—"In the beautiful island of Ceylon . . . there are yet many serpents of the kind which are vulgarly called Cbras de capello; and in that island we may call them regressus serpens."—Garcia, f. 150.

1672.—"In Jafnapatam, in my time, there lay among others in garrison a certain High German who was commonly known as the Snake-Catcher; and this man was summoned by our Commander . . . to lay hold of a Cobre Capel that was in his Chamber. And this the man did, merely holding his hat before his eyes, and seizing it with his hand, without any damage. . . . I had my suspicions that this was done by some devil . . . but he maintained that it was all by natural means. . . ."—Baldaens (Germ. ed.), 25.

Some forty-nine or fifty years ago a staff-sergeant at Delhi had a bull-dog that used to catch cobras in much the same way as this High-Dutchman did.

1710.—"The Brother Francisco Rodriguez persevered for the whole 40 days in these exercises, and as the house was of clay, and his cell adjoined the garden, it was invaded by cobra de capelo, and he made report of this inconvenience to the Father Rector. But his answer was that these were not the snakes that did spiritual harm; and so left the Brother in the same cell. This and other admirable instances have always led me to doubt if S. Paul did not communicate to his Paulists in India the same virtue as of the tongues of S. Paul, for the snakes in these parts are so numerous and so venomous, and though our Missionaries make such long journeys through wild uncultivated places, there is no account to this day that any Paulist was ever bitten."—F. de Souza, Oriente Conquistado, Conq. i. Div. i. cap. 73.

1711.—Bluteau, in his great Port. Dict., explains Cobra de Capello as a "reptile (bicho) of Brazil." But it is only a slip; what is further said shows that he meant to say India.

c. 1713.—"En account le paez de cerf sur laquelle nous avons coutume de nous asseoir, il on sortit un gros serpent de ceux qu'on appelle en Portugal Cobra-Capel."—Lettres Edifi., ed. 1751, xi. 89.

1888.—"In my walks abroad I generally carry a strong, supple walking cane. . . . Armed with it, you may rout and slaughter the hottest-tempered cobra in Hindustan. Let it rear itself up and spread its spectacled head and blister as it will, but one rap on the side of its head will bring it to reason."—Tribes on my Frontier, 198-9.

COBRA LILY.

s. The flower Arum campanulatum, which stands on its curving stem exactly like a cobra with a reared head.

COBRA MANILLA, or MINELLE.

s. Another popular name in S. India for a species of venomous snake, perhaps a little uncertain in its application. Dr. Russell says the Bungurus caeruleus was sent to him from Masulipatam, with the name Cobra Monil, whilst Günther says this name is given in S. India to the Daboia Russellii, or Tie-Polonga (q.v.) (see Feyer's Thaumatophidia, pp. 11 and 15). [The Madras Gloss, calls it the chain-viper, Daboia elegans.] One explanation of the name is given in the quotation from Lockyer. But the name is really Mahr. mayer, from Skt. mapi, 'a jewel.' There are judicious remarks in a book lately quoted, regarding the popular names and popular stories of snakes, which apply, we suspect, to all the quotations under the following heading:

"There are names in plenty . . . but they are applied promiscuously to any sort of snake, real or imaginary, and are therefore of no use. The fact is, that in real life, as distinguished from romance, snakes are so seldom seen, that no one who does not make a study of them can know one from the other."—Tribes on my Frontier, 197.

1711.—"The Cobra Manilla has its name from a way of Expression common among the Nears on the Malabar Coast, who speaking of a quick Motion . . . say, in a Phrase peculiar to themselves, Before they can pull a Manilla from their Hands. A Person bit with this Snake, dies immediately; or before one can take a Manilla off. A Manilla is a solid piece of Gold, of two or three ounces Weight, worn in a Ring round the Wrist."—Lockyer, 276.

[1773.—"The Covra Manilla, is a small bluish snake of the size of a man's little finger, and about a foot long, often seen about old walls."—Itea, 48.]

1780.—"The most dangerous of those reptiles are the coverynamili and the green snake. The first is a beautiful little creature, very lively, and about 6 or 7 inches long. It creeps into all private corners of houses, and is often found coiled up betwixt the sheets, or perhaps under the pillow of one's bed. Its sting is said to inflict immediate death, though I must confess, for my own part, I never heard of any dangerous accident occasioned by it."—Munro's Narrative, 34.

1810.—... Here, too, lurks the small bright speckled Cobra manilla, whose fangs convey instant death."—Maria Graham, 23.

1813.—"The Cobra minelle is the smallest and most dangerous; the bite occasions a speedy and painful death."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd ed. i. 27].

n.p. A famous city of Malabar, Malayal. Kochi, ['a small place'] which the nasalling, so usual with the Portuguese, converted into Cochin or Cochín. We say "the Portuguese" because we seem to owe so many nasal terminations of words in Indian use to them; but it is evident that the real origin of this nasal was in some cases anterior to their arrival, as in the present case (see the first quotations), and in that of Acheen (q.v.). Padre Paolino says the town was called after the small river "Coci" (as he writes it). It will be seen that

* Lingua di San Paolo is a name given to fossil 'sharks' teeth, which are commonly found in Malta, and in parts of Sicily.

* I have seen more snakes in a couple of months at the Bagni di Lucca, than in any two years passed in India.—H. Y.
Conti in the 15th century makes the same statement.

1767.—"From this place the Nawaub marched to Koochi-Bundur, of the inhabitants of which he exacted a large sum of money."—H. of Hydur Naik, 186.

COCHIN-CHINA, n.p. This country was called by the Malays Kuchi, and apparently also, to distinguish it from Kuchi of India (or Cochim), Kuchi-China, which the Portuguese adopted as Cauch-China; the Dutch and English from them. Kuchi occurs in this sense in the Malay traditions called Siçar Malauy (see J. Ind. Archip., v. 729). In its origin this word Kuchi is no doubt a foreigner's form of the Annamite Kwa-chin (Chin. Kiu-Ching, South Chin. Kau-Chen), which was the ancient name of the province Thanh-hoa, in which the city of Hué has been the capital since 1398.*

1516.—"And he (Fernão Peres) set sail from Calicut . . . in August of the year 516, and got into the Gulf of Concim china, which he entered in the night, escaping by miracle from being lost on the shoals. . . ."—Correa, ii. 474.

COCKROACH.

1652.—"Cochin-China is bounded on the West with the Kingdoms of Broma; on the East, with the Great Realm of China; on the North extending towards Tartary; and on the South, bordering on Cambodia."—P. Heylin, Cosmographie, ii. 259.

1727.—"Cockato-china has a large Sea-coast of about 700 Miles in Extent...and it has the Conveniency of many good Harbours on it, tho' they are not frequented by Strangers."—A. Hamilton, ii. 208; [ed. 1744].

COCHIN-LEG. A name formerly given to elephantiasis, as it prevailed in Malabar. [The name appears to be still in use (Boswell, Mon. of Nellore, 33). Linschoten (1598) describes it in Malabar (Hak. Soc. i. 288), and it was also called "St. Thomas's leg" (see an account with refs. in Gray, Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 392).]

1757.—"We could not but take notice at this place (Cochin) of the great number of the Cochin, or Elephant legs."—Ives, 193.

1813.—"Cochin-Leg, or elephantiasis."—Forbes, Or Mem. i. 327; [2nd ed. i. 207].

COCKATOOT. s. This word is taken from the Malay kakatåwå. According to Crawfurd the word means properly 'a vice,' or 'gripe,' but is applied to the bird. It seems probable, however, that the name, which is asserted to be the natural cry of the bird, may have come with the latter from some remoter region of the Archipelago, and the name of the tool may have been taken from the bird. This would be more in accordance with usual analogy. [Mr. Skeat writes: "There is no doubt that Sir H. Yule is right here and Crawfurd wrong. Kakak tuaa (or tua) means in Malay, if the words are thus separated, 'old sister,' or 'old lady.' I think it is possible that it may be a familiar Malay name for the bird, like our 'Polly.' The final k in kakak is a mere click, which would easily drop out."] 1638.—"Il y en a qui sont blances...et sont coeufes d'une house ouencore...l'on les appelle kakatou, à cause de ce mot qu'ils prononcent en leur chant assoz distinctement."—Mandelslo (Paris, 1669), 144.

[1843.—"...saucy Krocotaos, and gaudy-coloured Loris."—Belcher, Narr. of Voyage of Samarang, i. 15.]

CROCKROACH, s. This objectionable insect (Blatta orientalis) is called by the Portuguese cucalacco, for the reason given by Bontius below; a name adopted by the Dutch as kakelrak, and by the French as canarelat. The Dutch also apply their term as a slang name to half-castes. But our word seems to have come from the Spanish, cecarracha. The original application of this Spanish name appears to have been to a common insect found under water-vessels standing on the ground, &c. (apparently Oniscus, or woodlouse); but as cecarracha de Indias it was applied to the insect now in question (see Dice de la Lengua Castellana, 1729).

1577.—"We were likewise annoyed not a little by the biting of an Indian fly called Cacaroch, a name agreeable to its bad condition; for living it vext our flesh; and being kill'd smelt as loathsomely as the French punaise, whose smell is odious."—Herbert's Travels, 3rd ed., 322-33.

COCKUP, s. An excellent table-fish, found in the mouths of tidal rivers in most parts of India. In Calcutta it is generally known by the Beng. name of behi or bhikti (see BHIKTY), and it forms the daily breakfast dish of half the European gentlemen in that city. The name may be a corruption, we know not of what; or it may be given from the erect sharp spines of the dorsal fin. [The word is a corr. of the Malay ikukapi, which Klinkert defines as a palatable sea-fish, Lat. nobilis, the more common form being isiyakap.] It is Lates calcarifer (Günther) of the group Percidae, and grows to an immense size, sometimes to eight feet in length.

COCO, COCOA, COCOA-NUT, and (vulg.) COKER-NUT, s. The tree and nut Cocca nucifera, L.; a palm found in all tropical countries, and the only one common to the Old and New Worlds.

The etymology of this name is very obscure. Some conjectural origins are given in the passages quoted below. Ritter supposes, from a passage in Pigafetta's Voyage of Magellan, which we cite, that the name may have been indigenous in the Ladrone Islands, to which that passage refers, and that it was first introduced into Europe by Magellan's crew. On the other hand, the late Mr. C. W. Goodwin found in ancient Egyptian the word kuku used as "the name of the fruit of a palm. 60 cubits high, which fruit contained water." (Chabas, Mélanges Égyptologiques, ii. 239.) It is hard, however, to conceive how this name should have survived, to reappear in Europe in the later Middle Ages, without being known in any intermediate literature.*

The more common etymology is that which is given by Barros, García de Orta, Linschoten, &c., as from a Spanish word coco applied to a monkey's or other grotesque face, with reference to the appearance of the base of the shell with its three holes. But after all may the term not have origin-

* It may be noted that Theophrastus describes under the names of kokax and k6i a palm of Ethiopia, which was perhaps the Doms palm of Upper Egypt (Theop., ii. 11, ii. 6, 10). Schneider, the editor of Theop., states that Sprengel identified this with the coco-palm. See the quotation from Pliny below.

ated in the old Span. coca, 'a shell' (presumably Lat. concha), which we have also in French coque' properly an egg-shell, but used also for the shell of any nut. (See a remark under COPRAH.)

The Skt. veitekte [nārikēta, nārika] has originated the Pers. nārgil, which Cosmas grecizes into apēleithn, and H. nāriyāf.

Medieval writers generally (such as Marco Polo, Fr. Jordanus, &c.) call the fruit the Indian Nut, the name by which it was known to the Arabs (al jauz-al-Hindi). There is no evidence of its having been known to classical writers, nor are we aware of any Greek or Latin mention of it before Cosmas. But Brugsch, describing from the Egyptian wall-paintings of c. B.C. 1600, on the temple of Queen Hashop, representing the expeditions by sea which she sent to the Incense Land of Punt, says: "Men never seen before, the inhabitants of this divine land, showed themselves on the coast, not less astonished than the Egyptians. They lived on pile-buildings, in little dome-shaped huts, the entrance to which was effected by a ladder, under the shade of cocoa-palms laden with fruit, and splendid incense-trees, on whose boughs strange fowls rocked themselves, and at whose feet herds of cattle peacefully reposed." c. 1328. — "First of these is a certain tree called Nargil; which tree every month in the year sends out a beautiful frond like [that of a] date-palm tree, which from or branch produces very large fruit, as big as a man's head. . . . And both flowers and fruit are produced at the same time, beginning with the first month, and going up gradually to the twelfth. . . . The fruit is that which we call nuts of India." — Friar Jordanus, 15 seq. The wonder of the coco-palm is so often noticed in this form by medieval writers; that doubtless in their minds they referred it to that "tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruit, and yielded her fruit every month" (Apoc. xxii. 2).}

The parallel passage in De Bry runs: "Illas quoque quae nuae Indicas coceas, id est Simias (intus enim simiame caput referunt) dictas palmas appellant."—i. 29.

Purchas has various forms in different narratives: Cocts (i. 37); Cokers, a form which still holds its ground among London stall-keepers and costermongers (i. 461, 502); coquier-nuts (Terry, in ii. 1466); coco (ii. 1008); coquo (Pilgrimage, 567), &c.

Pyyard de Lavall, Hak. Soc. i. 113.]

c. 1690.—Rumphius, who has coco in Latin, and cocos in Dutch, mentions the derivation already given as that of Linchoten and many others, but proceeds:

"Meo vero judicio verior et certior vocis origo invenienda est, plurum enim nationes, quibus hic fructus est notus, nucem appellant. Sic dictur Arabicos Guccos-Indi vel Genztn-Indi, h. e. Nux India... Turcis Cock-Indi, eodem significatibus, unde sine dubio Ætiopes, Africani, eorumque vicini Hispani ac Portugalli coquo deflexerunt. Omnia vero ista nomina, originem suam debent Hebraicæ voci Epou quae nucem significat."—Herb. Ambrosin. i. p. 7.

"... in India Occidentali Kokernoot vocant... "—Ibid. p. 47.

One would like to know where Rumphius got the term Cock-Indi, of which we can find no trace.

1881.—"Among the popular French slang words for 'head' we may notice the term 'coco,' given—like our own 'nut'—on account of the similarity in shape between a cocoa-nut and a human skull:

"... Mais de ce franc picton de table Qui rend spirituel, aimable, Sans vous alourdir le coco, Je m'en fourre à gogo."—H. Valère.

The Dict. Hist. d'Argot de Lorédan Larchey, from which this seems taken, explains picton as 'vin supérieur.'

COCO-DE-MER, or DOUBLE COCO-NUT. s. The curious twin fruit so called, the produce of the Lodowica Secellarum, a palm growing only in the Seychelles Islands, is cast up on the shores of the Indian Ocean, most frequently on the Maldiv Islands, but occasionally also on Ceylon and S. India, and on the coasts of Zanzibar, of Sumatra, and some others of the Malay Islands. Great virtues as medicine and antidote were supposed to reside in these fruits, and extravagant prices were paid for them. The story goes that a "country captain," expecting to make his fortune, took a cargo of these nuts from the Seychelles Islands to Calcutta, but the only result was to destroy their value for the future.

The old belief was that the fruit was produced on a palm growing below the sea, whose fronds, according to Malay seamen, were sometimes seen in quiet bights on the Sumatran coast, especially in the Lampong Bay. According to one form of the story among the Malays, which is told both by Pigafetta and by Rumphius, there was but one such tree, the fronds of which rose above an abyss of the Southern Ocean, and were the abode of the monstrous bird Garuda (or Rukh of the Arabs—see ROC).* The tree itself was called Pausengi, which Rumphius seems to interpret as a corruption of Buwa-zangi, "Fruit of Zang" or E. Africa. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Rumphius is evidently wrong. The first part of the word is 'Pau,' or 'Pauh,' which is perfectly good Malay, and is the name given to various species of mango, especially the wild one, so that 'Pausengi' represents (not 'Buwa,' but) 'Pauh Janggi,' which is to this day the universal Malay name for the tree which grows, according to Malay fable, in the central whirlpool or Navel of the Seas. Some versions add that it grows upon a sunken bank (tēbing runtok), and is guarded by dragons. This tree figures largely in Malay romances, especially those which form the subject of Malay shadow-plays (vide infra, Pl. 23, for an illustration of the Pauh Janggi and the Crab). Rumphius' explanation of the second part of the name (i.e. Janggi) is, no doubt, quite correct."—Malay Magic, pp. 6 seqq.]

They were cast up occasionally on the islands off the S.W. coast of Sumatra; and the wild people of the islands brought them for sale to the Sumatran marts, such as Padang and Priamang. One of the largest (say about 12 inches across) would sell for 150 rix dollars. But the Malay princes coveted them greatly, and would sometimes (it was alleged) give a laden junk for a single nut. In India the best known source of supply was from the Maldive Islands. [In India it is known as Durvyānāriyāl, or 'cocoa-nut of the sea,' and this term has been in Bombay corrupted into jāhari (zahrt) or 'poisonous,' so that the fruit is incorrectly regarded as dangerous to life. The hard shell is largely used to make Fakirs' water-bowls.]

The medicinal virtues of the nut were not only famous among all the peoples of the East, including the Chinese, but are extolled by Piso and by Rumphius, with many details. The latter, learned and laborious student of nature as he was, believed in the submarine origin of the nut, though he discredited its growing on a great palm, as no traces of such a plant had ever been discovered on the coasts. The fame of the nut's virtues had extended to Europe, and the Emperor Rudolf II. in his later days offered in vain 4000 florins to purchase from the family of Wolfert Hermanszen, a Dutch Admiral, one that had been presented to that commander by the King of Bantam, on the Hollander's relieving his capital, attacked by the Portuguese, in 1602.

It will be seen that the Maldive name of this fruit was Tāwa-kārhi. The latter word is 'coco-nut,' but the meaning of tāwa does not appear from any Maldive vocabulary. [The term is properly Tāwākarkhi, 'the hard-shelled nut,' (Gray, on Pyrrad de Loval, Hak. Soc. i. 231.) Rumphius states that a book in 4to (totum opusculum) was published on this nut, at Amsterdam in 1634, by Augerius Clutius, M.D. [In more recent times the nut has become famous as the subject of curious speculations regarding it by the late Gen. Gordon.]

1522.—"They also related to us that beyond Java Major . . . there is an enormous tree named Campangangi, in which dwell certain birds named Garuda, so large that they take with their claws, and carry away flying, a buffalo and even an elephant, to the place of the tree. . . . The fruit of this tree is called Buapangangi, and is larger than a water-melon . . . it was understood that those fruits which are frequently found in the sea came from that place."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. p. 155.

another kind of these trees, which gives a fruit bigger than the coco-nut; and experience shows that the inner husk of this is much more efficacious against poison than the Bezoar stone."—Barros, III. iii. 7.

1563.—"The common story is that those islands were formerly part of the continent, but being low they were submerged, whilst these palm-trees continued in situ; and growing very old they produced such great and very hard coco-nuts, buried in the earth which is now covered by the sea. . . . When I learn anything in contradiction of this I will write to you in Portugal, and anything that I can discover here, if God grant me life; for I hope to learn all about the matter when, please God, I make my journey to Malabar. And you must know that these coco come joined two in one, just like the hind quarters of an animal."—Garcia, f. 70-71.

COCASVASCAM, n.p. A region with this puzzling name appears in the Map of Blaeu (c. 1650), and as Ryk van Cocasvascam in the Map of Bengal in Valentijn (vol. v.), to the E. of Chittagong. Wilford has some Willfordian nonsense about it, connecting it with the Tskottara R. of Ptolemy, and with a Tousuan which he says is mentioned by the "Portuguese writers" (in such case a criminal mode of expression). The name was really that of a Mahommedan chief, "hum Prince Mouro, grande Senhor," and "Vassalo del Rey de Bengala." It was probably "Khodâbakhsh Khân." His territory must have been south of Chittagon, for one of his towns was Chacurid, still known as Chakiria on the Chittagong and Arakan Road, in lat 21° 45'. (See Barros, IV. ii. 8. and IV. ix. 1; and Couto, IV. iv. 10; also Correa, iii. 264-266, and again as below:—)

which appears to have been originally a term for wine.* [So in the Arab.
Nights, ii. 158, where Burton gives the derivation as akha, fastidire fecit, causing disinclination for food. In old days the scrupulous called coffee kahwah to distinguish it from kahweh, wine.] It is probable, therefore, that a somewhat similar word was twisted into this form by the usual propensity to strive after meaning. Indeed, the derivation of the name has been plausibly traced to Kaffa, one of those districts of the S. Abyssinian highlands (Enarea and Kaffa) which appear to have been the original habitat of the Coffee plant (Coffee arabica, L.); and if this is correct, then Coffee is nearer the original than Kahwa. On the other hand, Kahwa, or some form thereof, is in the earliest mentions appropriated to the drink, whilst some form of the word Bunn is that given to the plant, and Bun is the existing name of the plant in Shoa. This name is also that applied in Yemen to the coffee-berry.
There is very fair evidence in Arabic literature that the use of coffee was introduced into Aden by a certain Sheikh Shihabuddin Dhabhani, who had made acquaintance with it on the African coast, and who died in the year H. 873, i.e. A.D. 1470, so that the introduction may be put about the middle of the 15th century, a time consistent with the other negative and positive data.† From Yemen it spread to Mecca (where there arose after some years, in 1511, a crusade against its use as unlawful), to Cairo, to Damascus and Aleppo, and to Constantinople, where the first coffee-house was established in 1554. [It is said to have been introduced into S. India some two centuries ago by a Mahommedan pilgrim, named Babâ Bûdan, who brought a few seeds with him from Mecca; see Grigg, Nilagiri Man.
483; Rice, Mysores, i. 162.] The first European mention of coffee seems to be by Rauwolf, who knew it in Aleppo in 1573. [See I ser. N. & Q. I.
25 seqq.] It is singular that in the Observations of Pierre Belon, who was in Egypt, 1546-49, full of intelligence and curious matter as they are, there is no indication of a knowledge of coffee.

COIMBATORE. n.p. Name of a District and town in the Madras Presidency. Koyammutārum; [Kōi, the local goddess so called, muttu, 'pearl,' är, 'village'].

COIR, s. The fibre of the coco-nut husk, from which rope is made. But properly the word, which is Tam. kaiyiru, Malayāl. kāyir, from v. kaiyiru, 'to be twisted,' means 'cord' itself (see the accurate Al-Birūnī below). The former use among Europeans is very early. And both the fibre and the rope made from it appear to have been exported to Europe in the middle of the 16th century. The word appears in early Arabic writers in the forms kānbar and kanbār, arising probably from some misreading of the diacritical points (for kāyir, and kaiyār). The Portuguese adopted the word in the form coiro. The form coir seems to have been introduced by the English in the 18th century. [The N.E.D. gives coire in 1697; coir in 1779.] It was less likely to be used by the Portuguese because coirol in their language is 'leather.' And Barros (where quoted below) says allusively of the rope: "parece feito de coiro (leather) encolhendo e estendendo a vontade do mar," contracting and stretching with the movement of the sea.

The Governor, learning this, sent for the said Moor, and ordered him to abandon this island trade and to recall his factors... The Moor, not to lose such a profitable business... finally arranged with the Governor that the Isles should not be taken from him, and that he in return would furnish for the king 1000 bahars (barla) of coarse coir, and 900 more of fine coir, each bahar weighing 4½ quintals; and this every year, and laid down at his own charges in Cananor and Cochyn, gratis and free of all charge to the King (not being able to endure that the Portuguese should frequent the Isles at their pleasure)."—Correa, ii. 129-30.

COLAO, s. Chin. kok-lao, 'Council Chamber Elders' (By Moule). A title for a Chinese Minister of State, which frequently occurs in the Jesuit writers of the 17th century.

COLEROON, n.p. The chief mouth, or delta-branch, of the Kaveri River (see CAUVERY). It is a Portuguese corruption of the proper name Kallidam, vulg. Kollidam. This name, from Tam. kul, 'to receive,' and 'adam,' 'place,' perhaps answers to the fact of this channel having been originally an 1876.—"These 'distinguished visitors' are becoming a frightful nuisance; they think that Collectors and Judges have nothing to do but to act as their guides, and that Indian officials have so little work, and suffer so much from ennui, that even ordinary thanks for hospitality are unnecessary; they take it all as their right."—Ext. of a Letter from India.

COLLEGE-PEASANT, s. An absurd enough corruption of kālī; the name in the Himalaya about Simla and Mussoorie for the birds of the genus Gallophasis of Hodgson, intermediate between the pheasants and the Jungle-fowls. "The group is composed of at least three species, two being found in the Himalayas, and one in Assam, Chittagong and Arakan." (Jerdon).

[1880.—"These, with kalege pheasants, afforded me some very fair sport."—Ball, Jungle Life, 588.]

[1882.—"Jungle-fowl were plentiful, as well as the black khalege pheasant."—Sanderson, Thirty Years among Wild Beasts, 147.]

COLLEY, s. Properly Bengali khalër, 'a salt-pan, or place for making salt.'

[1767.—"... rents of the Collaries, the fifteen Dees, and of Calcutta town, are none of them included in the estimation I have laid before you."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 223.]

1768.—"... the Collector-general be desired to obtain as exact an account as he possibly can, of the number of colleries in the Calcutta purgannesh."—In Carraccioli's L. of Olive, iv. 112.

COLLEY, n.p. The name given to a non-Aryan race inhabiting part of the country east of Madura. Tam. kallar, 'thieves.' They are called in Nelson's Madura, [Pt. ii. 44 seq.]; Kallans; Kallam being the singular, Kallar plural.

1763.—"The Polygar Tondiman . . . likewise sent 3000 Colleries; these are a people who, under several petty chiefs, inhabit the woods between Trichinopoly and Cape Comorin; their name in their own language signifies Thieves, and justly describes their general character."—Orme, i. 208.

1790.—"The country of the Colleries . . . extends from the sea coast to the confines of Madura, in a range of sixty miles by fifty-five."—Col. Monthly Register or India Repository, i. 7.

COLLEY-HORN, s. This is a long brass horn of hideous sound, which is often used at native funerals in the Peninsula, and has come to be called, absurdly enough, Cholera-horn! [1832.—"Toorrree or Toorrtooree, commonly designated by Europeans collery horn, consists of three pieces fixed into one another, of a semi-circular shape."—Herklotz, Qanoone-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. liv. App.]

1879.—"... an early start being necessary, a happy thought struck the Chief Commissioner, to have the Amildar's Chola-horn men out at that hour to sound the reveillé, making the round of the camp."—Madras Mail, Oct. 7.

COLLEY-STICK, s. This is a kind of throwing-stick or boomerang used by the Colleries.

1801.—"It was he first taught me to throw the spear, and hurl the Collery-stick, a weapon scarcely known elsewhere, but in a skilful hand capable of beingthrown to a certainty to any distance within 100 yards."—Welsh's Reminiscences, i. 130.

Nelson calls these weapons ' Vailari Thadis or boomerangs.'—Madura, Pt. ii. 44. [The proper form seems to be Tam. valai tadi, 'curved stick'; more usually Tam. kallarładi, tadi, 'stick.'] See also Sir Walter Elliot in J. Ethnol. Soc., N. S., i. 112, seq.

COLOMBO, n.p. Properly Kolumbon, the modern capital of Ceylon, but a place of considerable antiquity. The derivation is very uncertain; some suppose it to be connected with the adjoining river Kalans-gangi. The name Columbwm, used in several medieval narratives, belongs not to this place but to Karalum (see QULON).

c. 1346.—"We started for the city of Kalamb, one of the finest and largest cities of the island of Serendib. It is the residence of the Wazir Lord of the Sea (Hākim-al-Bahr), Jālāstī, who has with him about 500 Habshis."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 185.

1517.—"The next day was Thursday in Passion Week; and they, well remembering this, and inspired with valour, said to the King that in fighting the Moors they would be insensible to death, which they greatly desired rather than be slaves to the Moors... There were not 40 men in all, whose sound for battle. And one brave man made a cross on the tip of a cane, which he set in front for standard, saying that God was his Captain, and that it was his Flag, under which they should march deliberately against Colombo, where the Moor was with his forces."—Correa, ii. 521.
COLUMBO ROOT. 237

COMBOY.

1553.—"The King, Don Manuel, because . . . he knew . . . that the King of Colombo, who was the true Lord of the Cinnamon, desired to possess our peace and friendship, wrote to the said Affonso d'Alboquerque, who was in the island in person, that if he deemed it well, he should establish a fortress in the harbour of Colombo, so as to make sure the offers of the King."—Barros, Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 2.

COLUMBO ROOT, CALUMBA ROOT, is stated by Milburn (1813) to be a staple export from Mozambique, being in great esteem as a remedy for dysentery, &c. It is Jateorhiza palmata, Miers; and the name Calumb is of E. African origin (Hambury and Flückiger, 23). [The N.E.D. takes it from Colombo, 'under a false impression that it was supplied from thence.'] The following quotation is in error as to the name:

c. 1779.—"Radix Colombo . . . derives its name from the town of Colombo, from whence it is sent with the ships to Europe (!); but it is well known that this root is neither found near Columba, nor upon the whole island of Ceylon. . . ."—Thunberg, Travels, iv. 185.

1752.—"Any person having a quantity of fresh sound Columbia Root to dispose of, will please direct a line. . . ."—India Gazette, Aug. 24.

[1809.—"An Account of the Male Plant, which furnishes the Medicine generally called Columbo or Colonna Root."—Asiat. Res. x. 385 seqq.]

1850.—"Caoutchouc, or India-rubber, is found in abundance . . . (near Tette) . . . and calumba-root is plentiful. . . . The India-rubber is made into balls for a game resembling 'lives,' and calumba-root is said to be used as a mordant for certain colours, but not as a dye itself."—Livingstone, Expedition to the Zambezi, &c., p. 32.

COMAR, n.p. This name (Ar. al-Kumár), which appears often in the old Arab geographers, has been the subject of much confusion among modern commentators, and also among the Arabs themselves; some of the former (e.g. the late M. Reinard) confounding it with C. Comorin, others with Kámírúp (or Assam). The various indications, e.g. that it was on the continent, and facing the direction of Arabia, i.e. the west; that it produced most valuable aloes-wood; that it lay a day's voyage, or three days' voyage, west of Sanf or Champa (q.v.), and from ten to twenty days' sail from Zába (or Java), together with the name, identify it with Camboja, or Khmer, as the native name (see Reinard, Rel. des Arabes, i. 97, ii. 48, 49; Gildemeister, 156 seqq.; Ibn Batuta, iv. 240; Abulfeda, Cathay and the Way Thither, 519, 569). Even the sagacious De Orta is misled by the Arabs, and confounds alcomari with a product of Cape Comorin (see Colloquios, f. 120r.).

COMATY, s. Telug. and Canar. komati, 'a trader,' [said to be derived from Skt. go, 'eye,' muskhi, 'fist,' from their vigilant habits]. This is a term used chiefly in the north of the Madras Presidency, and corresponding to Chetty, [which the males assume as an affix].

1627.—"The next Tribe is thence termed Committy, and these are generally the Merchants of the Place who by themselves or their servants, travell into the Country, gathering up Callicoes from the weavers, and other commodities, which they sell againe in greater parcels."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 997.

[1679.—"There came to us the Factory this day a Dworfe an Indian of the Comitte Cast, he was he said 30 years old . . . we measured him by the rule 46 inches high, all his limbs and his body straight and equal proportioned, of comely face, his speech small equalling his stature. . . ."—Skeynsham Master, in Kistna Man. 142.

[1869.—"Komatis." See quotation under CHUCKLER.]

COMBACONUM, n.p., written Kumbakonam. Formerly the seat of the Chola dynasty. Col. Branfill gives, as the usual derivation, Skt. Kumbhakona, 'brim of a water-pot'; [the Madras Gloss, Skt. kumbha, kona, 'brim'] and this form is given in Williams's Skt. Dict. as 'name of a town.' The fact that an idol in the Saiva temple at Combaconam is called Kumbheswaram ('Lord of the water-pot') may possibly be a justification of this etymology. But see general remarks on S. Indian names in the Introduction.

COMBOY. A sort of skirt or kilt of white calico, worn by Singhalese of both sexes, much in the same way as the Malay Sarong. The derivation which Sir E. Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612, ii. 107) gives of the word is quite inadmissible. He finds that a Chinese author describes the people of Ceylon as wearing a cloth made of koo-pet, i.e. of cotton; and he assumes therefore that those people call their own dress by a Chinese name for cotton! The word, however, is not real Singalese; and we can have no doubt that it is the proper name Cambay. Paños de Cábaya are mentioned early as used in Ceylon (Castanheda, ii. 78), and Cambays by Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, 79). In the Government List of Native Words (Ceylon, 1869) the form used in the Island is actually Kumbayya. A picture of the dress is given by Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612). It is now usually of white, but in mourning black is used.

1615.—"Tansho Samme, the Kings kinsman, brought two pec. Cambaiais cloth."—Cook's Diary, i. 15.

COMMERCOLLY, n.p. A small but well-known town of Lower Bengal in the Nadiya District; properly Kumārkhalī ["Prince's Creek"]). The name is familiar in connection with the feather trade (see ADJUTANT).

COMMISSIONER, s. In the Bengal and Bombay Presidencies this is a grade in the ordinary administrative hierarchy; it does not exist in Madras, but is found in the Punjab, Central Provinces, &c. The Commissioner is over a Division embracing several Districts or Zillahs, and stands between the Collectors and Magistrates of these Districts on the one side, and the Revenue Board (if there is one) and the Local Government on the other. In the Regulation Provinces he is always a member of the Covenanted Civil Service; in Non-Regulation Provinces he may be a military officer; and in these the District officers immediately under him are termed 'Deputy Commissioners.'

COMMISSIONER, CHIEF. A high official, governing a Province inferior to a Lieutenant-Governorship, in direct subordination to the Governor-General in Council. Thus the Punjab till 1859 was under a Chief Commissioner, as was Oudh till 1877 (and indeed, though the offices are united, the Lieut.-Governor of the N.W. Pro-turning point of the Indian coast, and even in Ptolemy's Tables his Kory is further south than Komaróc, and is the point of departure from which he discusses distances to the further East (see Ptolemy, Bk. I. cap. 13, 14; also see Bishop Caldwell's Comp. Grammar, Introd., p. 103). It is thus intelligible how comparative geographers of the 16th century identified Kory with C. Comorin.

In 1864 the late venerated Bishop Cotton visited C. Comorin in company with two of his clergy (both now missionary bishops). He said that having bathed at Hardwar, one of the most northerly of Hindu sacred places, he should like to bathe at this, the most southerly. Each of the chaplains took one of the bishop's hands as they entered the surf, which was heavy; so heavy that his right-hand aid was torn from him, and had not the other been able to hold fast, Bishop Cotton could hardly have escaped.*

aloes-wood.

COMOTAY, COMATY, n.p. This name appears prominently in some of the old maps of Bengal, e.g. that embraced in the Magni Mogolis Imperiun of Blaeu's great Atlas (1645-50). It re-resents Kāmta, a State, and Kāmatapur, a city, of which most extensive remains exist in the territory of Koch Bībār in Eastern Bengal (see COOCH BEHAR). These are described by Dr.
Francis Buchanan, in the book published by Montgomery Martin under the name of Eastern India (vol. iii. 426 seqq.). The city stood on the west bank of the River Darlā, which formed the defence on the east side, about 5 miles in extent. The whole circumference of the enclosure is estimated by Buchanan at 19 miles, the remainder being formed by a rampart which was (c. 1809) "in general about 130 feet in width at the base, and from 20 to 30 feet in perpendicular height."

1553.—"Within the limits in which we comprehend the kingdom of Bengala are those kingdoms subject to it ... lower down towards the sea the kingdom of Comotaj.”—Burros, IV. ix. 1.

[c. 1596.—Kamta"h." See quotation under COOCH BEHAR.]

1873.—"During the 15th century, the tract north of Rangpur was in the hands of the Rājahs of Kāmta... Kāmta was invaded, about 1498 A.D., by Husain Shāh."

COMPETITION-WALLAH. s. A hybrid of English and Hindustani, applied in modern Anglo-Indian colloquial to members of the Civil Service who have entered it by the competitive system first introduced in 1856. The phrase was probably the invention of one of the older or Haileybury members of the same service. These latter, whose nominations were due to interest, and who were bound together by the intimacies and esprit de corps of a common college, looked with some disfavour upon the children of Innovation.
The name was readily taken up in India, but its familiarity in England is probably due in great part to the "Letters of a Competition-wala," written by one who had no real claim to the title, Sir G. O. Trevelyon, who was later on member for Hawick Burghs, Chief Secretary for Ireland, and author of the excellent Life of his uncle, Lord Macaulay.

The second portion of the word, vala, is properly a Hindi adjectival affix, corresponding in a general way to the Latin -arius. Its usual employment as affix to a substantive makes it frequently denote "agent, doer, keeper, man, inhabitant, master, lord, possessor, owner," as Shakespeare vainly tries to define it, and in Anglo-Indian usage is popularly assumed to be its meaning.
But this kind of denotation is incidental; there is no real limitation to such meaning. This is demonstrable from such phrases as Kabul-vala ghorā,
'the Kabuli horse,' and from the common form of village nomenclature in the Panjab, e.g. Mir-Khān-vala, Ganda-Singh-vala, and so forth, implying the village established by Mir-Khan or Ganda-Singh. In the three immediately following quotations, the second and third exhibit a strictly idiomatic use of vala, the first an incorrect English use of it.

Notice prefixed to vol. i. of Dowerson's Ed. of Elliot's Historians of India, p. xxviii.
The exceptional arrangement alluded to in the preceding quotation was authorised by 7 Geo. IV. cap. 56. But it did not involve competition; it only authorised a system by which the places could be given to young men who had not been at Haileybury College, on their passing certain test examinations, and they were ranked according to their merit in passing such examinations, but below the writers who had left Haileybury at the preceding half-yearly examination. The first examination under this system was held 29th March, 1827, and Sir H. M. Elliot headed the list. The system continued in force for five years, the last examination being held in April, 1832. In all 83 civilians were nominated in this way, and, among other well-known names, the list included H. Torrens, Sir H. B. Harington, Sir R. Montgomery, Sir J. Cracroft Wilson, Sir T. Pyecroft, W. Taylor, the Hon. E. Drummond.

COMPANY.

s. The enclosed ground, whether garden or waste, which surrounds an Anglo-Indian house. Various derivations have been suggested for this word, but its history is very obscure. The following are the principal suggestions that have been made:—*

(a.) That it is a corruption of some supposed Portuguese word.
(b.) That it is a corruption of the French campagne.
(c.) That it is a corruption of the Malay word kampung, as first (we believe) indicated by Mr. John Crawfurd.

The Portuguese origin is assumed by Bishop Heber in passages quoted below. In one he derives it from campaña (for which, in modern Portuguese at least, we should read campañha); but campañha is not used in such a sense. It seems to be used only for a campaign, or for the Roman Campagna. In the other passage he derives it from campao (sic), but there is no such word.

It is also alleged by Sir Emerson Tennent (infra), who suggests campinho; but this, meaning a small plain, is not used for compound. Neither is the latter word, nor any word suggestive of it, used among the Indo-Portuguese.

In the early Portuguese histories of India (e.g. Castanheda, iii. 436, 442; vi. 3) the words used for what we term compound, are jardim, patio, horta. An examination of all the passages of the Indo-Portuguese Bible,

* On the origin of this word for a long time different opinions were held by my lamented friend Burnell and by me. And when we printed a few specimens in the Indian Antiquary, our different arguments were given in brief (see J. A., July 1879, pp. 202, 203). But at a later date he was much disposed to come round to the other view, insomuch that in a letter of Sept. 21, 1881, he says:—"Compound can, I think, after all, be Malay Kampilong; take these lines from a Malay poem"—then giving the lines which I have transcribed on the following page I have therefore had no scruple in giving the same unity to this article that had been unbroken in almost all other cases.—H. Y.
where the word might be expected to occur, affords only horta.

There is a use of campo by the Italian Capuchin P. Vincenzo Maria (Roma, 1672), which we thought at first to be analogous: "Gionti alla porta della città (Aleppo) ... arrivati al Campo de' Francesi; dote è la Dogana ..." (p. 475). We find also in Rauwolf's Travels (c. 1579), as published in English by the famous John Ray: "Each of these nations (at Aleppo) have their peculiar Champ to themselves, commonly named after the Master that built it ..."; and again: "When ... the Turks have washed and cleansed themselves, they go into their Chappells, which are in the Middle of their great Camps or Carvatschars ..." (p. 84 and p. 259 of Ray's 2nd edition). This use of Campo, and Champ, has a curious kind of analogy to compound, but it is probably only a translation of Meisdān or some such Oriental word.

(b.) As regards campagne, which once commended itself as probable, it must be observed that nothing like the required sense is found among the seven or eight classes of meaning assigned to the word in Littré.

The word campo again in the Portuguese of the 16th century seems to mean always, or nearly always, a camp. We have found only one instance in those writers of its use with a meaning in the least suggestive of compound, but in this its real meaning is 'site': "quemou a cidade toda ate não ficar mais que ho campo em que estevera." ("They burned the whole city till nothing remained but the site on which it stood"—Castanheda, vi. 130). There is a special use of campo by the Portuguese in the Further East, alluded to in the quotation from Palle- goix's Siam, but that we shall see to be only a representation of the Malay Kampung. We shall come back upon it. [See quotation from Correa, with note, under FACTORY.]

(c.) The objection raised to kampung as the origin of compound is chiefly that the former word is not so used in Java by either Dutch or natives, and the author of Max Havelaar expresses doubt if compound is a Malay or Javanese word at all (pp. 360-361). Erf is the usual word among the Dutch.

In Java kampung seems to be used only for a native village, or for a particular ward or quarter of a town.

But it is impossible to doubt that among the English in our Malay settlements compound is used in this sense in speaking English, and kampung in speaking Malay. Kampung is also used by the Malays themselves, in our settlements, in this sense. All the modern dictionaries that we have consulted give this sense among others. The old Dictionarium Malaiico-Latinum of David Haex (Romae, 1631) is a little vague:

"Campon, coniunctio, vel commun. Hine vicinia et parua loca, campoon etiam appellantur."

Crawford (1852): "Kampung ... an enclosure, a space fenced in; a village; a quarter or subdivision of a town."

Favre (1875): "Maison avec un terrain qui l'entoure."

Pijnappel (1875), Maleisch-Holländisch Woordenboek: "Kampoeng—Omheind Erf, Wijk, Buurt, Kamp," i.e. "Ground hedged round, village, hamlet, camp."

And also, let it be noted, the Javanese Dict. of P. Jansz (Javaansch-Nederlandsch Woordenboek, Samarang, 1876): "Kampoeng—Omheind erf van Woningen; wijk die onder een hoofd staat," i.e. "Enclosed ground of dwellings; village which is under one Headman."

Muir, in his Kata-Kata Malayou (Paris, 1875), gives the following expanded definition: "Village palissadé, ou, dans une ville, quartier séparé et généralement clos, occupé par des gens de même nation, Malais, Siames, Chinois, Bougnis, &c. Ce mot signifie proprement un enclos, une enceinte, et par extension quartier clos, faubourg, on village palissadé. Le mot Kampong désigne parfois aussi une maison d'une certaine importance avec le terrain clos qui en dépend, et qui l'entoure." (p. 93).

We take Marsden last (Malay Dictionary, 1812) on this, because he gives an illustration: "Kampong, an enclosure, a place surrounded with a palis; a fenced or fortified village; a quarter, district, or suburb of a city; a collection of buildings. Mem- bhāt [to make] rumah [house] serta..."
The pong, with [compound thereof], to erect a house with its enclosure . . . Ber-Kampong to assemble, come together; meñgampong, to collect, to bring together."

The Reverse Dictionary gives: "YARD, alaman, Kampong." [See also many further references much to the same effect in Scott, Malayan Words, p. 123 seqg.]

In a Malay poem given in the Journal of the Ind. Archipelago, vol i. p. 44, we have these words:—

"Trásták be kampong s'orange Soudágár."

["Passed to the kampong of a Merchant."] and

"Titák bágindá raja sultání Kampong îdídya gurindun îní."

["Thus said the Prince, the Raja Sultani, Whose kampong may this be?"]

These explanations and illustrations render it almost unnecessary to add in corroboration that a friend who held office in the Straits for twenty years assures us that the word kampung is habitually used, in the Malay there spoken, as the equivalent of the Indian compound. If this was the case 150 years ago in the English settlements at Bencoolen and elsewhere (and we know from Marsden that it was so 100 years ago), it does not matter whether such a use of kampung was correct or not, compound will have been a natural corruption of it. Mr. E. C. Baber, who lately spent some time in our Malay settlements on his way from China, tells me (H. Y.) that the frequency with which he heard kampung applied to the 'compound,' convinced him of this etymology, which he had before doubted greatly.

It is not difficult to suppose that the word, if its use originated in our Malay factories and settlements, should have spread to the continental Presidencies, and so over India.

Our factories in the Archipelago were older than any of our settlements in India Proper. The factors and writers were frequently moved about, and it is conceivable that a word so much wanted (for no English word now in use does express the idea satisfactorily) should have found ready acceptance. In fact the word, from like causes, has spread to the ports of China and to the missionary and mercantile stations in tropical Africa, East and West, and in Madagascar.

But it may be observed that it was possible that the word kampung was itself originally a corruption of the Port. campo, taking the meaning first of camp, and thence of an enclosed area, or rather that in some less definable way the two words reacted on each other. The Chinese quarter at Batavia—Kampong Taina—is commonly called in Dutch het Chinesche Kamp or het Kamp der Chinesen. Kampung was used at Portuguese Malacca in this way at least 270 years ago, as the quotation from Godinho de Eredia shows. The earliest Anglo-Indian example of the word compound is that of 1679 (below). In a quotation from Dampier (1688) under Cot, where compound would come in naturally, he says "yard."

1696.—"The 27th we began to unlade, and come to their custom-houses, of which there are three, in a square compound of about 100 paces over each way. . . . The goods being brought and set in two Rows in the middle of the square are one by one opened before the Mandareens."—Mr. Bowyer's Journal at Cochín China, dated Foy-Foy, April 90. Dulcimape, Or. Rep. i. 79.

1772.—"YARD (before or behind a house). Aunglan. Commonly called a compound."—Vocabulary in Hadley's Grammar, 129. (See under MOORS.)
COMPOUND.

1781.—"In common usage here a child serves for our business or our wit. Bankshal's a place to lodge our ropes, and Mango orchards all are Tapes. Godown usurps the ware-house place, compound denotes each walled space. To Dufferkhawa, Ottor, Tanks, the English language owes no thanks; since Office, Essence, Fish-pond shew we need not words so harsh and new. Much more I could such words expose, but Ghauts and Dawks the list shall close; which in plain English is no more than Wharf and Post expressed before," India Gazette, March 3.

1788.—"Compound—The court-yard belonging to a house. A corrupt word."—The Indian Vocabulary, London, Stockdale.

1793.—"To be sold by Public Ottery . . . all that Brick Dwelling-house, Godowns, and compound."—Ibid., April 21.

1798.—"The houses (at Madras) are usually surrounded by a field or compound, with a few trees or shrubs, but it is with incredible pains that flowers or fruit are raised."—Maria Graham, 124.

1810.—"When I entered the great gates, and looked around for my palanquin . . . and when I beheld the beauty and extent of the compound . . . I thought that I was no longer in the world that I had left in the East."—An Account of Bengal, and of a Visit to Government House (at Calcutta) by Brahmin the son of Candu the Merchant, ibid., p. 198. This is a Malay narrative translated by Dr. Leyden. Very probably the word translated compound was kompong, but that cannot be ascertained.

1811.—"Major Yule's attack was equally spirited, but after routing the enemy's force at Campong Malayo, and killing many of them, he found the bridge on fire, and was unable to penetrate further."—Sir S. Archimutin's Report of the Capture of Fort Cornelis.

1817.—"When they got into the compound, they saw all the ladies and gentlemen in the verandah waiting."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1863, p. 6.

1824.—"He then proceeded to the rear compound of the house, returned, and said, 'It is a tiger, sir.'"—Sooty, Wonders of Elora, ch. 1.

1848.—"Lady O'Dowd, too, had gone to her bed in the nuptial chamber, on the ground floor, and had tucked her mosquito curtains round her fair form, when the guard at the gates of the commanding officer's compound beheld Major Dobbin, in the moonlight, rushing towards the house with a swift step."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 93.

1860.—"Even amongst the English, the number of Portuguese terms in daily use is remarkable. The grounds attached to a house are its 'compound,' 'campanho.'"—Emerson Tennent, Ceylon, ii. 70.

[1869.—"I obtained the use of a good-sized house in the Campong Sirani (or Christian village)."—Wallace, Malay Archip., ed. 1890, p. 256.]

We have found this word singularly transformed in a passage extracted from a modern novel:

1877.—"When the Rebellion broke out at other stations in India, I left our own compost."—Sat. Review, Feb. 3, p. 148.

A little learning is a dangerous thing!

The following shows the adoption of the word in West Africa.

1880.—From West Afr. Mission, Port Lokoko, Mr. A. Burneah wrote: "Every evening we go out visiting and preaching the Gospel to our Timneh friends in their compounds."—Proceedings of C. M. Society for 1878-9, p. 14.

COMPRADORE, COMPODORE, &c., s. Port. comprador, 'purchaser,' from comprar, 'to purchase.' This word was formerly in use in Bengal, where it is now quite obsolete; but it is perhaps still remembered in Madras, and it is common in China. In Madras the compradore is (or was) a kind of house-steward, who keeps the household accounts, and purchases necessary. In China he is much the same as a Butler (q.v.). A new building was to be erected on the Bund at Shanghai, and Sir T. Wade was asked his opinion as to what style of architecture should be adopted. He at once said that for Shanghai, a great Chinese commercial centre, it ought to be Compradoric!

1593.—"Antonio da Silva kept his own counsel about the (threat of) war, because during the delay caused by the exchange of messages, he was all the time buying and selling by means of his compradores."—Corre, iii. 362.

1615.—"I understand that yesterday the Hollander cut a slave of theirs a-pieces for theft, per order of justice, and thrust their comprador (or cats buyer) out of dores for a lecherous knife. . . ."—Cocks's Diary, i. 19.

1711.—"Every Factory had formerly a Compradore, whose Business it was to buy in Provisions and other Necessaries. But the Hoppes have made them all such Knaves..."—Lockyer, 108.

[1748.—"Compradores." See quotation under BANKSHALL.]

1754.—"Compidor. The office of this servant is to go to market and bring home small things, such as fruit, &c."—Ives, 50.

1760-1810.—"All river-pilots and ships' Compradores must be registered at the office of the Tung-che at Macao."—Eight Regulations, from the Fornkraze at Canton (1832), p. 28.

1782.—"Le Comprador est celui qui fournit généralement tout ce dont on a besoin, excepté les objets de caravans; il y en a un pour chaque Nation; il apprécie la loge, et tient sous lui plusieurs commiss chargés de la fourniture des vaisseaux."—Sonnerat (ed. 1782), ii. 236.

1785.—"Compudour... Sicca Rs. 3."—In Seton-Karr, i. 107 (Table of Wages).

1810.—"The Compadore, or Kurz-burdar, or Butler-Konhah-Sircar, are all designations for the same individual, who acts as purveyor... This servant may be considered as appertaining to the order of sircars, of which he should possess all the cunning."—Williamson, V. M. i. 270. See SIRCAR. The obsolete term Kurz-burdar above represents Khurach-burdar "in charge of (daily) expenditure." 1849.—"About 10 days ago... the Chinese, having kidnapped our Compendor, Parties were sent out to endeavour to recover him."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 164.

1876.—"We speak chiefly of the educated classes, and not of 'boys' and compradores, who learn in a short time both to touch their caps, and wipe their noses in their masters' pocket-handkerchiefs."—Giles, Chinese Sketches, [p. 15].

1876.—"An' Massa Coo feel velly sore An' go an' scold he compradore."—Leland, Pidgin English Sing-Song, 26.

1882.—"The most important Chinese within the Factory was the Compadore... all Chinese employed in any factory, whether as his own 'pursers,' or in the capacity of servants, cooks, or coolies, were the Compadore's own people."—The Fornkraze, p. 53.

CONBALINGUA. s. The common pumpkin, [cucurbita pepo]. The word comes from the Malayal, Tel. or Can. kumbalam; kumbalum, the pumpkin].

1510.—"I saw another kind of fruit which resembled a pumpkin in colour, is two spans in length, and has more than three fingers of pulp... and it is a very curious thing, and it is called Comolanga, and grows on the ground like melons."—Varthemas, 161.

[1554.—"Conbalingus." See quotation under BRINJAUJ.]

[c. 1610.—Cueto gives a tradition of the origin of the kingdom of Pegu, from a fisherman who was born of a certain flower; "they also say that his wife was born of a Combalenga, which is an apple (pomo) very common in India of which they make several kinds of preserve, so cold that it is used in place of sugar of roses; and they are of the size and fashion of large melons; and there are some so large that it would be as much as a lad could do to lift one by himself. This apple the Pegués call Sapura."—Dec. xii, liv. v. cap. iii.]

c. 1690.—"In Indiae insulis quaedam quoque Cucurbitae et Cucumeris reperiturunt species ab Europaeis diversae... harumque nobilissima est Comolinga, qua maxima est species Indicarum cucurbitarum."—Rumphius, Herb. Amb. v. 995.

CONCAN, n.p. Skt. konkana, [Tam. konkayam], the former in the Pauranic lists the name of a people; Hind. Konkan and Kokan. The low country of western India between the Ghauts and the sea, extending, roughly speaking, from Goa northward to Guzerat. But the modern Commissionery, or Civil Division, embraces also North Canara (south of Goa). In medieval writings we find frequently, by a common Asiatic fashion of coupling names, Kokan or Konkan-Tana; Tana having been a chief place and port of Konkan.

C. 70 A.D.—The Concaedes of Pliny are perhaps the Konkames.

404.—"In the south are Ceylon (Lanka)... Konkan..."—&c.—Byrat Sankita, in J.R.A.S., N.S. v. 83.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Konkan and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibar."—Rushkdduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1335.—"When he heard of the Sultan's death he fled to a Kafir prince called Bura- bra, who lived in the inaccessible mountains between Danbalabad and Kakan-Tana."— Ibn Batuta, iii. 335.

c. 1350.—In the Portulano Mediceo in the Laurentian Library we have 'Cocinata,' and in the Catalan Map of 1375 'Cocintaya.'

1553.—"And as from the Ghauts (Gate) to the Sea, on the west of the Decan, all that strip is called Concan, so also from the Ghauts to the Sea, on the West of Canara (leaving out those forty and six leagues just spoken of, which are also parts of this same Canara), that strip which extends to Cape Comorin... is called Malabar..."—Barros, t. i. ix. 1.

[1563.—"Cuncam." See quotation under GHAUT.]

1728.—"The kingdom of this Prince is commonly called Vissapoor, after its capital... but it is properly called Cunkan."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 243; [also see under DECCAN].
CONFIRMED. 245

min (which they call canje).—Garcia, f. 766.

1578.—". . . Canju, which is the water from the boiling of rice, keeping it first for some hours till it becomes acid. . . ."—Acoa, Tractado, 56.

1631.—"Potus quotidians itaque sit decoctum oryzae quod Candgie Indi vacant."—Jac. Boutii, Lib. ii. cap. iii.

1673.—"They have. . . a great smooth Stone on which they beat their Clothas till clean; and if for Family use, starch them with Congee."—Fryer, 200.

1850.—"Le dejete des bois est ordinairement du Cangé, qui est une eau de ris eqaise."—Dellon, Inscription at Goa, 136.

1796.—"Cagni, [boiled rice water, which the Europeans call Cangi, is given free of all expenses, in order that the traveller may quench his thirst with a cooling and wholesome beverage."— P. Paulinus, Voyage, p. 76.

"Can't drink as it is hot, and can't throw away as it is Kanji."—Ceylon Proverb, Ind. Ant. i. 59.

CONGEE-HOUSE, CONJEE-HOUSE. s. The 'cells' (or temporary lock-up) of a regiment in India; so called from the traditionary regiment of the inmates; [in N. India commonly applied to a cattle-pound].

1835.—"All men confined for drunkenness should, if possible, be confined by themselves in the Congee-House, till sober."—G. O., quoted in Mawson's Records of the Indian Command of Sir C. Napier, 101 note.

CONGEEVERAM, u.p. An ancient and holy city of S. India, 46 m. S.W. of Madras. It is called Kachchi in Tamil literature, and Kachchipuram is probably represented by the modern name. [The Madras Gloss. gives the indigenous name as Cutch (Kachhi), meaning 'the heart-leaved moon-seed plant,' tinospera cordifolia, from which the Skt. name Kanchipura, 'shining city,' is corrupted.]

c. 1030.—See Kanchi in Al-Biruni, under MALABAR.

1531.—"Some of them said that the whole history of the Holy House (of St. Thomas) was written in the house of the Pagoda which is called Camjeveranz, twenty leagues distant from the Holy House, of which I will tell you hereafter. . . ."—Correa, iii. 424.

1680.—"Upon a report that Podela Lingapa had put a stop to all the Dutch business of Polient under his government, Congo-Bunder, Congo, n.p. Kung bandar; a port formerly of some consequence and trade, on the north shore of the Persian Gulf, about 100 m. west of Gombroon. The Portuguese had a factory here for a good many years after their expulsion from Ormus, and under treaty with Persia, made in 1623, had a right of pearl-fishing at Bahrain and a claim to half of the customs of Cong. These claims seem to have been gradually disregarded, and to have had no effect after about 1670, though the Portuguese would appear to have still kept up some pretense of monopoly of rights there in 1677 (see Chardin, ed. 1735, i. 348, and Bruce's Annals of the E.I.C., iii. 393). Some confusion is created by the circumstance that there is another place on the same coast, called Kongo, which possessed a good many vessels up to 1859, when it was destroyed by a neighbouring chief (see Stiff's P. Gulf Pilot, 128). And this place is indicated by A. Hamilton (below) as the great mart for Bahrain pearls, which Fryer and others assign to what is evidently Cong.

1654.—"Near to the place where the Euphrates falls from Balsara [see BALSORA] into the Sea, there is a little Island, where the Barques generally come to an Anchor. . . . There we stayed four days, whence to Bandar-Congo it is 14 days Sail. . . . This place would be a far better habitation for the Merchants than Ormus, where it is very unwholsome and dangerous to live. But that which hinders the Trade from Bandar-Congo is, because the Road to Lar is so bad. . . . The 30th, we hir'd a Vessel for Bander-Allasi, and after 3 or 4 hours Sailing we put into a Village . . . in the Island of Keckmische" (see KISHIM).—Tavenier, E.T. i. 94.

1653.—"Conge is very petit ville fort agraable sur le sein Persique a trois journées du Bandar Abbassi tirant a l'Ouest dominé par le Schah . . . les Portugais y ont vn Feitour (see FACTOR) qui prend la moitié de la Doîlane, et donne la permission aux barques de nauiger, en luy payant vn certain droit, parceque toutes ces mers sont tributaires de la generalité de Malique, qui est a l'entrée du sein Persique. . . . Cette ville est peuplée d'Arabes, de Persis et d'Indous qui ont leur Pagodes et leur Saintcs hors la ville."—De la Boulaye-le-Gonç, ed. 1657, p. 284.

1677.—"A Voyage to Congo for Pearl.—Two days after our Arrival at Gombroon, I went to Congo. . . . At noon we came to Bassatu (see BASSADORE), an old ruined Town of the Portuguese, fronting Congo. . . . Congo is something better built than Gombroon, and has some small Advantage of the Air" (Then goes off about pearls).—Fryer, 320.

1683.—"One Haggerston taken by ye said President into his Service, was run away with a considerable quantity of Gold and Pearle, to ye amount of 30,000 Rupees, intrusted to him at Bussera (see BALSORA) and Cong, to bring to Surrat, to save Freight and Custom."—Hedges, Diary, i. 96 seq.

1685.—"May 27.—This afternoon it pleased God to bring us in safety to Cong Road. I went ashore immediately to Mr. Brough's house (Supra Cargo of ye Siwin Merchant), and lay there all night."—Ibid. i. 202.

1727.—"Congoua stands on the South side of a large River, and makes a pretty good figure in Trade; for most of the Pearl that are caught at Bareen, on the Arabian Side, are brought hither for a Market, and many fine Horses are sent thence to India, where they generally sell well. . . . The next maritime town, down the Gulf, is Cong, where the Portuguese lately had a Factory, but of no great Figure in Trade, tho' that Town has a small Trade with Banyans and Moors from India." (Here the first place is Kongo, the second one Kung).—A. Hamilton, i. 92 seq.; [ed. 1744].

Conicopoly, s. Literally 'Account-Man,' from Tam. kanakka, 'account' or 'writing,' and pillai, 'child' or 'person.' "The Kanakar are usually addressed as 'Pillay,' a title of respect common to them and the agricultural and shepherd castes" (Madras Men. ii. 229). In Madras, a native clerk or writer, [in particular a shipping clerk. The corresponding Tel. term is Curnum].

1544.—"Due oò tecum . . . domesticos tuos; pueros et aliquem Conacapulium qui norit scribere, cujus manu exaratas relinquere posses in quovis loco praecatione a Pueris et aliis Catechumenis ediscendas."—Seti. Franc. Xavier, Epist., pp. 160 seq.

1584.—"So you must appoint in each village or station fitting teachers and Canacopoly, as we have already arranged, and these must assemble the children every day at a certain time and place, and teach and drive into them the elements of reading and religion."—Ditto, in Oderidge’s L. of him, ii. 24.

1585.—"At Tanor in Malabar I was acquainted with a Nayre Canacopola, a writer in the Camara del Rey at Tanor . . . who every day used to eat to the weight of 5 drachms (of opium), which he would take in my presence."—Acosta, Tractado, 415.
c. 1580.—"One came who worked as a clerk, and said he was a poor canaquapolle, who had nothing to give."—Primæ e Honra, &c., f. 94.

1672.—"Xaveriæ set everywhere teachers called Canacappels."—Baldoscus, Ceylon, 377.

1680.—"The Governour, accompanied with the Councell and several Persons of the factory, attended by sixe files of Solldyers, the Company's Peons, 300 of the Washers, the Pedda Naigue, the Cancopy of the Towne and of the grounds, went the circuit of Madras ground, which was described by the Cancopy of the grounds, and lyes so intermixed with others (as is customary in these Countries) that 'tis impossible to be knowne to any others, therefore every Village has a Cancopy and a Parryar, who are employed in this office, which goes from Father to Son for ever."—Pt. St. Geo. Cons. Sept. 21. In Notes and Exts. No. iii. 94.

1718.—"Besides this we maintain several Konakappels, or Malabarick writers."—Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Pt. ii. 55.

1728.—"The Conakapules (commonly called Kannekkappels) are writers."—Valentin, Chora, 88.

1749.—"Canacapula," in Loggan, Malabar, iii. 52.

1750.—"Conicoplas," ibid. iii. 150.

1778.—"Conucopola. He keeps your accounts, pays the rest of the servants their wages, and assists the Dubash in buying and selling. At Bengal he is called secretary. . . ."—Ives, 49.]

CONSOO-HOUSE, n.p. At Canton this was a range of buildings adjoining the foreign Factories, called also the 'Council Hall' of the foreign Factories. It was the property of the body of Hong merchants, and was the place of meeting of these merchants among themselves, or with the chiefs of the Foreign houses, when there was need for such conference (see Fankvæi, p. 23). The name is probably a corruption of 'Council.' Bp. Moule, however, says: "The name is likely to have come from kung-su, the public hall, where a kung-su', a 'public company;' or guild, meets."

CONSUMAH, KHANSAMA, s. P. Khansmadn; a house-steward. In Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency, this is the title of the chief table servant and provider, now always a Mahommedan. [See BUTLER.] The literal meaning of the word is 'Master of the household gear'; it is not connected with khwân, 'a tray,' as Wilson suggests. The analogous word Mir-sâdân occurs in Elliot, vii. 153. The Anglo-Indian form Consumer seems to have been not uncommon in the 18th century, probably with a spice of intention. From tables quoted in Long, 182, and in Seton-Karr, i. 95, 107, we see that the wages of a "Consumah, Christian, Moor, or Gentoo," were at Calcutta, in 1759, 5 rupees a month, and in 1785, 8 to 10 rupees.

c. 1664.—"Some time after . . . she chose for her Kansa-saman, that is, her Steward, a certain Persian called Nazerian, who was a young Omrah, the handsomest and most accomplished of the whole Court."—Bernier, E.T., p. 4; [ed. Constable, p. 13.]

1712.—"They were brought by a great circuit on the River to the Chansamma or Steward (Dispenser) of the aforesaid Mahali."—Valentin, iv. (Suratle) 288.

1759.—"Dustuck or Order, under the Chan Sumaan, or Steward's Seal, for the Honorable Company's holding the King's [i.e. the Great Mogul's] fleet."* * * *

"At the back of this is the seal of Zecah al Doulat Tidaudin Caun Bahadour, who is Caun Samaun, or Steward to his Majesty, whose prerogative it is to grant this Order."—R. Owen Cambridge, pp. 231 seq.

1788.—"After some deliberation I asked the Khansaman, what quantity was remaining of the clothes that had been brought from Iran to camp for sale, who answered that there were 15,000 jackets, and 12,000 pairs of long drawers."—Mém. of Khôjir Abdulkerem, tr. by Gladwin, 55.

1810.—"The Kansaamah may be classed with the house-steward, and butler; both of which offices appear to unite in this servant."—Williams, V. M., i. 199.

1831.—"I have taught my khansama to make very light iced punch."—Laugrenou, Letters, E.T., ii. 104.

COOCH AZO, or AZO simply, n.p. Koch Hajo, a Hindu kingdom on the banks of the Brahmaputra R., to the E. of Koch Bihâr, annexed by Jâhângîr's troops in 1637. See Blochmann in J.A.S.B. xii. pt. i. 53, and xiii. pt. i. 235. In Valentin's map of Bengal (made c. 1660) we have Coz Assam with Azo as capital, and T'yk van Asoe, a good way south and east of Silhet.

1753.—"Coste rivière (Brahmapoutra), en remontant, conduit à Rangamati et à Azo, qui font la frontière de l'état du Mogol. Azo est une forteresse que l'Emir Jemla, sous le règne d'Aorengzâbe, replit COOCH BEHAR, n.p. Koch Bihār, a native tributary State on the N.E. of Bengal, adjoining Bhutan and the Province of Assam. The first part of the name is taken from that of a tribe, the Koch, apparently a forest race who founded this State about the 15th century, and in the following century obtained dominion of considerable extent. They still form the majority of the population, but, as usual in such circumstances, give themselves a Hindu pedigree, under the name of Rājputa. [See Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 491 seqq.] The site of the ancient monarchy of Kāmrūp is believed to have been in Koch Bihār, within the limits of which there are the remains of more than one ancient city. The second part of the name is no doubt due to the memory of some important Vihara, or Buddhist Monastery, but we have not found information on the subject. [Possibly the ruins at Kamatapur, for which see Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, iii. 426 seqq.]

1585.—"I went from Bengal to the country of Couche, which lieth 25 days journey Northwards from Tanda."—R. Fitch, in Hakl., ii. 397.

c. 1596.—"To the north of Bengal is the province of Coach, the Chief of which commands 1,000 horse, and 100,000 foot. Kamroop, which is also called Kamroo and Kautah (see COMOTAY) makes a part of his dominions."—Ayeen (by Gladwin), ed. 1800, ii. 27; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 117].

1726.—"Cos Bhaar is a Kingdom of itself, the King of which is sometimes subject to the Great Mogol, and sometimes throws his yoke off."—Valentijn, v. 159.

1774.—"The country about Bahar is low. Two kos beyond Bahar we entered a thicket... frogs, watery insects and dank air... 2 miles farther on we crossed the river which separates the Kuch Bahar country from that of the Deb Rajah, in sal canoes."

-Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, &c., p. 14 seq.

But Mr. Markham spoils all the original spelling. We may be sure Bogle did not write kos, nor "Kuch Bahar," as Mr. M. makes him do.

1791.—"The late Mr. George Bogle... travelled by way of Coos-Beyhar, Tasasudon, and Paridrong, to Channanning the then residence of the Lama."—Rennell (3rd ed.), 301.

COOJA, s. P. kūsa; an earthenware water-vessel (not long-necked, like the surāhī—see SERAI). It is a word used at Bombay chiefly, [but is not uncommon among Mahommedans in N. India].

[1611.—"One sack of cusher to make coho."—Dunners, Letters, i. 128.]

[1871.—"Many parts of India are celebrated for their coojahs or gutlets, but the finest are brought from Bussorah, being light, thin, and porous, made from a whitish clay."—Riddell, Indian Domestic Economy, 7th ed., p. 362.]

1883.—"They (tree-frogs) would perch pleasantly on the edge of the water cooja, or on the rim of a tumbler."—Trībes on my Frontier, 118.

COOK-ROOM, s. Kitchen; in Anglo-Indian establishments always detached from the house.

1758.—"We will not in future admit of any expenses being defrayed by the Company either under the head of cook-rooms, gardens, or other expenses whatever."—The Court's Letter, March 3, in Long, 130.

1758.—"I was one day watching an old female monkey who had a young one by her side to whom she was giving small bits of a piece of bread which she had evidently just received from my cook-room."—Life in the Mogfussil, ii. 44.

COOLCURNEE, s. This is the title of the village accountant and writer in some of the central and western parts of India. Mahr. kulkarnī, apparently from kula, 'tribe.' and karna, writer, &c., the pātwārī of N. India (see under CRANNY, CURNUM). [Kula "in the revenue language of the S. appears to be applied especially to families, or individual heads of families, paying revenue" (Wilson).]

c. 1590.—... "in this Soobah (Berar) a chowdry they call Deysmuck; a Canoongow with them is Deyspandeh; a Mokkadlem... they style Putied; and a Puteeareh they name Kulkurnee."—Gladwin's Ayeen Akbery, ii. 57; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228].

[1826.—"You potails, coolcunnies, &c., will no doubt... contrive to reap tolerable harvests."—Pundarang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 47.]

COOLICOY, s. A Malay term, properly kulit-kayu, "skin-wood," explained in the quotation:

1784.—"The coolitcayo or coolicoy... This is a bark procured from some particular trees. (It is used for matting the sides of houses, and by Europeans as dunnage in pepper cargoes.)"—Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 51.
COOLIN, adj. A class of Brāhmans of Bengal Proper, who make extraordinary claims to purity of caste and exclusiveness. Beng. kulinas, from Skt. kula, ‘a caste or family,’ kulina, ‘belonging to a noble family.’ They are much sought in marriage for the daughters of Brāhmans of less exalted pretensions, and often take many bridegrooms for the sake of the presents they receive. The system is one of the greatest abuses in Bengali Hinduism. [Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, 1. 146 seq.] 1820.—“Some inferior Koolēnns marry many wives; I have heard of persons having 120; many have 15 or 20, and others 40 and 50 each. Numbers procure a subsistence by this excessive polygamy. . . .”—Ward, i. 81.

COOLUNG, COOLEN, and in W. India CULLUM, s. Properly the great grey crane (Grus cinerea), H. kulang (said by the dictionaries to be Persian, but Jerdon gives Mahr. kullam, and Tel. kulangi, kolangi, which seem against the Persian origin), [and Platts seems to connect it with Skt. kurakbara, the Indian crane, Ardea Sibirica (Williams)]. Great companies of these are common in many parts of India, especially on the sands of the less frequented rivers; and their clanging, trumpet-like call is often heard as they pass high overhead at night.

Clamor in aestheris dispersus nubibus austri." (Lucr. iv. 182 seq.)

The name, in the form Coolen, is often misapplied to the Demoiselle Crane (Anthropoides virgo, L.), which is one of the best of Indian birds for the table (see Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 667, and last quotation below). The true Coolung, though inferior, is tolerably good eating. This bird, which is now quite unknown in Scotland, was in the 15th century not uncommon there, and was a favourite dish at great entertainments (see Accts. of L. H. Treasurer of Scotland, i. ccc.). 1698.—“Peculiarly Brand-geese, Colum, and Serras, a species of the former.”—Fryer, 117.

c. 1809.—“Large flocks of a crane called Kolong, and of another called Saros (Ardea Antigone—see CYRUS), frequent this district in winter. . . . They come from the north in the beginning of the cold season, and retire when the heats commence.”—Buchanan’s Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 579.

COOLY, s. A hired labourer, or burden-carrier; and, in modern days especially, a labourer induced to emigrate from India, or from China, to labour in the plantations of Mauritius, Réunion, or the West Indies, sometimes under circumstances, especially in French colonies, which have brought the cooly’s condition very near to slavery. In Upper India the term has frequently a specific application to the lower class of labourer who carries earth, bricks, &c., as distinguished from the skilled workman, and even from the digger.

The original of the word appears to have been a nomen gentile, the name (Koli) of a race or caste in Western India, who have long performed such offices as have been mentioned, and whose savagery, filth, and general degradation attracted much attention in former times, [see Hamilton, Deser. of Hindostan (1820), 1. 609]. The application of the word would thus be analogous to that which has rendered the name of a Slav, captured and made a bondservant, the word for such a bondservant in many European tongues. According to Dr. H. V. Carter the Kolis proper are a true hill-people, whose especial locality lies in the Western Ghats, and in the northern extension of that range, between 18° and 24° N. lat. They exist in large numbers in Guzerat, and in the Konkan, and in the adjoining districts of the Deccan, but not beyond these limits (see Ind. Antiquary, ii. 154). [But they are possibly kinsfolk of the Kols, an important Dravidian race in Bengal and the 1813.—“Peacocks, partridges, quails, doves, and green pigeons supplied our table, and with the addition of two stately birds, called the Sahroo and cullum, added much to the animated beauty of the country.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 29; [2nd ed. i. 331].

1883.—“Not being so green as I was, I let the tempting herd of antelopes pass, but the kullum I cannot resist. They are feeding in thousands at the other end of a large field, and to reach them it will only be necessary to crawl round behind the hedge for a quarter of a mile or so. But what will one not do with roast kullum looming in the vista of the future?”—Tribes on my Frontier, P. 102.

“ N.B.—I have applied the word kullum, as everybody does, to the demoiselle crane, which, however, is not properly the kullum but the Koonja.”—Ibid. p. 171.
N.W.P. (see Risley, T. and C. of Bengal, ii. 101; Crooke, T. C. of N.W.P. iii. 294.) In the Rās Mālā [ed. 1878, p. 78 seqq.] the Koolies are spoken of as a tribe who lived long near the Indus, but who were removed to the country of the Null (the Nal, a brackish lake some 40 m. S.W. of Ahmedabad) by the goddess Hinglāj.

Though this explanation of the general use of the term Cooly is the most probable, the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to trace to the same origin. Thus in S. India there is a Tamil and Can. word kāli in common use, signifying 'hire' or 'wages,' which Wilson indeed regards as the true origin of Cooly. [Oppert (Orig. Inhab. of Bharatavarsa, p. 131) adopts the same view, and disputing the connection of Cooly with Koli or Kol, regards the word as equivalent to 'hired servant' and originating in the English Factories on the E. coast.] Also in both Oriental and Osmani Turkish kol is a word for a slave, whilst in the latter also kaleh means 'a male slave, a bondsman' (Redhouse). Khol is in Tibetan also a word for a servant or slave (Note from A. Schiefner; see also Jäschke's Tibetan Dict., 1881, p. 59). But with this the Indian term seems to have no connection. The familiar use of Cooly has extended to the Straits Settlements, Java, and China, as well as to all tropical and sub-tropical colonies, whether English or foreign.

The word Cooly has passed into English thievish jargon in the sense of "a soldier" (v. Slang Dict.), COOMKEE, adj., used as sub. This is a derivative from P. kumnek, 'aid,' and must have been widely diffused in India, for we find it specialised in different senses in the extreme West and East, besides having in both the general sense of 'auxiliary.'

[a] In the Moghul army the term is used for auxiliary troops.

[c. 1590.—"Some troops are levied occasionally to strengthen the mensae, and they are called Kumooly (or auxiliaries)."—Gladwin, A spee Akbery, ed. 1800, i. 183; in Blockmann, i. 292, Kumakis.

1858.—"The great landholders despise them (the ordinary levies) but respect the Koomkee corps..."—Sheeman, Journey through Oudh, i. 30.]

(b) Kumaki, in N. and S. Canara, is applied to a defined portion of forest, from which the proprietor of the village or estate has the privilege of supplying himself with wood for housebuilding, &c. (except from the reserved kinds of wood), with leaves and twigs for manure, fodder, &c. (See COOMRAY. [The system is described by Sturrock, Max. S. Canara, i. 16, 224 seqq.]

(c) Koomkee, in Bengal, is the technical name of the female elephant used as a decoy in capturing a male.

1807.—"When an elephant is in a proper state to be removed from the Kollok, he is conducted either by koomkies (i.e. decoy females) or by tame males."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, folio ed., p. 30.

COOTUB, N.—"in H. in H. and to [Can.] [which is used in the word which the Koran is laid]. It is the word usually employed in Western India for 'a chair,' and is in the Bengal Presidency a more dignified term than chauki (see CHOKY). Kurā is the Arabic form, borrowed from the Aramaic, in which the emphatic state is kursēyā. But in Hebrew the word possesses a more original form with as for rs (lisse, the usual word in the O. T. for 'a throne'). The original sense appears to be 'a covered seat.'

1781.—"It happened, at this time, that the Nawaub was seated on his koorsī, or chair, in a garden, beneath a banyan tree."
—Hist. of Hydrā Bāl, 452.

COOSUMBA, s. H. kusum, kusumbba, Safflower, q.v. But the name is applied in Rajputana and Guzerat to the timeturd of opium, which is used freely by Rājputs and others in those territories; also (according to Shakespear) to an infusion of Bang (q.v.).

[1823.—"Several of the Rajput Princes West of the Chumbal seldom hold a Durbar without presenting a mixture of liquid opium, or, as it is termed, 'kusumbbah,' to all present. The minister washes his hands in a vessel placed before the Rawul, after which some liquid opium is poured into the palm of his right hand. The first in rank who may be present then approaches and drinks the liquid."—Malcolm, Mem. of Central India, 2d ed. ii. 146, note.]}

COOTUB, THE, n.p. The Kutb Minār, near Delhi, one of the most remarkable of Indian architectural antiquities, is commonly so called by Europeans. It forms the minaret of the Great Mosque, now long in ruins, which Kutb-uddin Ibak founded A.D.
1191, immediately after the capture of Delhi, and which was built out of the materials of numerous Hindu temples, as is still manifest. According to the elaborate investigation of Gen. A. Cunningham [Arch. Rep. i. 189 seq.], the magnificent Minār was begun by Kutb-uddin Ibak about 1200, and completed by his successor Shamsuddin Iyaltimish about 1220. The tower has undergone, in its upper part, various restorations. The height as it now stands is 238 feet 1 inch. The traditional name of the tower no doubt had reference to the name of its founder, but also there may have been a reference to the contemporary Saint, Kutb-uddin Usbī, whose tomb is close by; and perhaps also to the meaning of the name Kutb-uddin, 'The Pole or COOMRY, s. [Can. kumāri, from Mahr. kumbāri, 'a hill slope of poor soil.'] Kumāri cultivation is the S.

Indian (especially in Canara), [Sturrock, S. Canara Man. i. 17], appellation of that system pursued by hill-people in many parts of India and its frontiers, in which a certain tract of forest is cut down and burnt, and the ground planted with crops for one or two seasons, after which a new site is similarly treated. This system has many names in different regions; in the east of Bengal it is known as āhdān (see JHOOM); in Burma as toungeyan; in parts of the N.W. P., dāhya, Skt. dāha, 'burning'; ponem in Malabar; ponacaud in Salem]. We find kumāried as a quasi-English participle in a document quoted by the High Court, Bombay, in a judgment dated 27th

1888.—"Kumāki (Coomkee) and Kumari privileges stand on a very different platform.
The former are perfectly reasonable, and worthy of a civilised country. . . . As for Kumari privileges, they cannot be defended before the tribunal of reason as being really good for the country, but old custom is old custom, and often commands the respect of a wise government even when it is indefensible."—Mr. Grant Duff's Reply to an Address at Mangalore, 15th October.

COONOR, n.p. A hill-station in the Nilgherries. Kunur, 'Hill-Town.' [The Madras Gloss, gives Can.
Kumāru, Skt. kumāra, 'small,' Can.
ūru, 'village.]

COORG, n.p. A small hill State on the west of the table-land of Mysore, in which lies the source of the Cauvery, and which was annexed to the British Government, in consequence of cruel misgovernment in 1834. The name is a corruption of Koḍagu, of which Gundert says: "perhaps from kōtu, 'step,' or Tamil kadaga, 'west.'" [For various other speculations on the derivation, see Oppert, Original Inhabit., 162
seq. The Madras Gloss, seems to refer it to Skt. krodādēśa, 'hog-land,' from "the tradition that the inhabitants had nails on hands and feet like a boar."] Coorg is also used for a native of the country, in which case it stands for Koḍaga.

COORSY, s. H.—from Ar.—kursī [which is used in the word which the Koran is laid]. It is the word Axle of the Faith,' as appropriate to such a structure.

c. 1320.— "Attached to the mosque (of Delhi) is a tower for the call to prayer which has no equal in the whole world. It is built of red stone, with about 360 steps. It is not square, but has a great number of angles, is very massive at the base, and very lofty, equalling the Pharos of Alexandria."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 190.

c. 1340.— "In the northern court of the mosque stands the minaret (al-san'ate), which is without a parallel in all the countries of Islam. . . . It is of surpassing height; the pinnacle is of milk-white marble, and the globes which decorate it are of pure gold. The aperture of the staircase is so wide that elephants can ascend, and a person on whom I could rely told me that when the minaret was a-building, he saw an elephant ascend to the very top with a load of stones."—Ibn Battuta, iii, 151.

The latter half of the last quotation is fiction.

1663.— "At two Leagues off the City on Agrod's side, in a place by the Mahometans called Koya Kothabaddine, there is a very ancient Edifice which hath been a Temple of Idols. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 91.

It is evident from this that Bernier had not then visited the Koth. [Constable in his tr. reads "Koja Kothabaddine," by which he understands Kok-i-Kotch-uddin, the hill or eminence of the Saint, p. 283.]

1825.— "I will only observe that the Cattab Minar . . . is really the finest tower I have ever seen, and must, when its spire was complete, have been still more beautiful."—Heser, ed. 1844, i. 308.

COPECK, s. This is a Russian coin,  franç. of a ruble. The degeneration of coin denominations is often so great that we may suspect this name to preserve that of the dinár Kopeki often mentioned in the histories of Timur and his family. Kopek is in Turki, 'dog,' and Charmoy explains the term as equivalent to Abā-kalb, 'Father of a dog,' formerly applied in Egypt to Dutch crowns (Löwen-thaler) bearing a lion. There could not be Dutch coins in Timur's time, but some other Frank coin bearing a lion may have been so called, probably Venetian. A Polish coin with a lion on it was called by a like name (see Macarius, quoted below, p. 169). Another etymology of kopek suggested (in Chaudoir, Aperçu des Monnaies Russes) is from Russ. kopić, kopyć, a pike, many old Russian coins representing the Prince on horseback with a spear. [This is accepted by the N.E.D.] Kopeks are mentioned in the reign of Vassili III., about the middle of the 15th century, but only because regularly established in the coinage c. 1536. [See TANGA.]

1390.—(Timur resolved) "to visit the venerated tomb of Sheikh Maslahat . . . and with that intent proceeded to Tash-kand . . . he there distributed as alms to worthy objects, 10,000 dinârs kopâki . . ."—Sharifuddin, in Extracts by M. Charmoy, Mem. Acad. St. P., vi. S., tome iii. p. 363, also note, p. 135.

1355.— "It was on this that the Grand Duchess Helena, 'mother of Ivan Vassilievitch, and regent in his minority, ordered, in 1535, that these new Dengui should be melted down and new ones struck, at the rate of 300 dengui, or 3 Roubles of Moscow & la grivenka, in Kopeks . . . From that time accounts continued to be kept in Roubles, Kopeks, and Dengui."—Chaudoir, Aperçu.

c. 1655.— "The pension in lieu of provisions was, for our Lord the Patriarch 25 copecks daily."—Travels of the Patriarch Macarius, Or. Tr. Fund, i. 281.

1783.— "The Copeck of Russia, a copper coin, in name and apparently in value, is the same which was current in Tartary during the reign of Timur."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 322.

COPPERSMITH, s. Popular name both in H. (tambayat) and English of the crimson-breasted barbet (Xantho-lemna indica, Latham). See the quotation from Jerdon.

1862.— "It has a remarkably loud note, which sounds like took-took-took, and this it generally utters when seated on the top of some tree, nodding its head at each call, first to one side and then to another. . . . This sound and the motion of its head, ac- companying it, have given origin to the name of 'Coppersmith.' . . ."—Jerdon, ed. 1877, i. 316.

1879.— " . . . In the mango-sprays The sun-birds flashed; alone at his green forge Toiled the loud Coppersmith. « . » The Light of Asia, p. 20.

1883.— "For the same reason myyas seek the tope, and the 'blue jay,' so-called, and the little green coppersmith hooting ventri- locastically."

Tribes on my Frontier, 154.

COPRAH, s. The dried kernel of the coco-nut, much used for the expression of its oil, and exported largely from the Malabar ports. The Portuguese probably took the word from the Malayâl, koppâra, which is, however, apparently borrowed from the H. khopârâ, of the same meaning. The latter is connected by some with khapna, 'to dry up.' Shakespear however, more probably, connects khopra, as well as khoppri, 'a skull, a shell,' and khoppur, 'a skull,' with Skt. kharpura, having also the meaning of 'skull.' Compare with this a derivation which we have suggested (s.v.) as possible of coco from old Fr. and Span. coque, coco, 'a shell'; and with the slang use of coco there mentioned.

1568.—"And they also dry these cocos... and these dried ones they call copra, and they carry them to Ormus, and to the Balaghat."—Garcia, Coll. t. 689.

1573.—"The kernel of these cocos is dried in the sun, and is called copra. From this same copra oil is made in presses, as we make it from olives."—Acosta, 104.

1581.—"Chopra, from Cochin and Malabar..."—Barret, in Hall. ii. 413.

1598.—"The other Oyle is prest out of the dried Cocus, which is called Copra. ..."—Linschoten, 101. See also (1602), Conto, Dec. i. liv. iv. cap. 8; (1606) Gouvea, f. 629; (1610) Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 384 (reading kuypara for suppara:)] (c. 1690) Rumphius, Herb. Amph. i. 7.

1727.—"That tree (coco-nut) produceth... Copera, or the Kernels of the Nut dried, and out of these Kernels there is a very clear Oil exprest."—A. Hamilton, i. 307; [ed. 1744, i. 308]

1860.—"The ordinary estimate is that one thousand full-grown nuts of Jaffina will yield 525 pounds of Copra when dried, which, in turn will produce 25 gallons of copra-nut oil."—Tennent, Ceylon, ii. 531.

1878.—It appears from Lady Brassay's Voyage in the Sambocon (5th ed. 248) that this word is naturalised in Tahiti.

1883.—"I suppose there are but few English people outside the trade who know what copra is; I will therefore explain:—it is the white pith of the ripe cocoa-nut cut into strips and dried in the sun. This is brought to the trader (at New Britain) in baskets varying from 3 to 20 lbs. in weight; the payment... was a thimbleful of beads for each pound of copra. ... The nut is full of oil, and on reaching Europe the copra is crushed in mills, and the oil pressed from it... half the oil sold as 'olive-oil' is really from the cocoa-nut."—Wilfred Powell, Wanderings in a Wild Country, p. 37.

CORAL-TREE. Erythrina indica, Lam., so called from the rich scarlet colour of its flowers.

[1860.—"There are... two or three species of the genus Erythrina or Coral Tree. A small species of Erythrina, with reddish flowers, is famous in Buddhist mythology as the tree around which the Devas dance till they are intoxicated in Sudra's (or Indra's heaven)." Mason's Burma, p. 531.—McMahon, Karena of the Golden Chersonese, p. 11.]

CORCOPALI. s. This is the name of a fruit described by Varthema, Acosta, and other old writers, the identity of which has been the subject of much conjecture. It is in reality the Garcinia indica, Choisy (N. O. Guttiferae), a tree of the Concan and Canara, which belongs to the same genus as the mangosteen, and as the tree affording the gamboge (see CAMBOJA) of commerce. It produces an agreeable, acid, purple fruit, which the Portuguese call brinjões. From the seeds a fatty oil is drawn, known as kokon butter. The name in Malayul is kodukka, and this possibly, with the addition of puli, 'acid,' gave rise to the name before us. It is stated in the English Cyclopaedia (Nat. Hist. s.v. Garcinia) that in Travancore the fruit is called by the natives gharka pulli, and in Ceylon goraka. Forbes Watson's 'List of Indian Productions' gives as synonyms of the Garcinia cambogia tree 'karra-pallivaram,' 'Tum.,' 'kurupa-pulit,' Mal.; and 'goraka-gass,' Ceyl. [The Madras Gloss. calls it Mate mangosteen, a ship term meaning 'coock-room mangosteen'; Can. murunginathu, 'twisted tamarind'; Mal. punamulp, 'stiff tamarind. '] The Cyclopaedia also contains some interesting particulars regarding the uses in Ceylon of the goraka. But this Ceylon tree is a different species (G. Gambogia, Desrous). Notwithstanding its name it does not produce gamboge; its gum being insoluble in water. A figure of G. indica is given in Beddome's Flora Sylvaica, pl. lxxix. [A full account of Kokam butter will be found in Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 467 seq.]

1510.—"Another fruit is found here fashioned like a melon, and it has divisions after that manner, and when it is cut, three or four grains which look like grapes, or birdcherries, are found inside. The tree which bears this fruit is of the height of a quince tree, and forms its leaves in the same manner. This fruit is called Corcopal; it is extremely good for eating, and excellent as a medicine."—Varthema (transl. modified from), Hak. Soc. 187.

1578.—"Carcapuli is a great tree, both lofty and thick; its fruit is in size and aspect like an orange without a rind, all divided in lobes...."—Acosta, Tractado, 357.

CORGE, COORGE, &c., s. A mercantile term for 'a score.' The word is in use among the trading Arabs and others, as well as in India. It is established in Portuguese use apparently, but the Portuguese word is almost certainly of Indian origin, and is this expressly asserted in some Portuguese Dictionaries (e.g. Lacerda's, Lisbon, 1871). Korî is used exactly in the same way by natives all over Upper India. Indeed, the vulgar there in numeration habitually say do korî, tin korî, for 40, 60, and so forth. The first of our quotations shows the word in a form very closely allied to this, and explaining the transition. Wilson gives Telugu korîjam, "a bale or lot of 20 pieces, commonly called a corge." [The Madras Gloss, gives Cun. korî, Tel. korîjam, as meaning either a measure of capacity, about 44 maunds, or a Madras town cloth measure of 20 pieces.] But, unless a root can be traced, this may easily be a corruption of the trade-word. Littré explains corge or course as "Paquet de toile de coton des Indes"; and Marcel Devie says: "C'est vraisemblablement l'Arabe khordj"—which means a saddlebag, a portmanteau. Both the definition and the etymology seem to miss the essential meaning of corge, which is that of a score, and not that of a packet or bundle, unless by accident.

COROMANDEL, n.p. Koringa; probably a corruption of Kalinga [see KLING]. CORLE, s. Singh. kórale, a district. 1726.—"A Coral is an overseer of a Corle or District...."—Valentijn, Names of Native Officers in the Villages of Ceylon, 1.

CORNAC, s. This word is used, by French writers especially, as an Indian word, and as the equivalent of Mahout (q.v.), or driver of the elephant. Littré defines: "Nom qu'on donne dans les Indes au conducteur d'un éléphant," &c., &c., adding: "Etym. Sanskrit karntkinn, éléphant." "Dans les Indes" is happily vague, and the etymology worthless. Bluteau gives Cornáca, but no etymology. In Singhalese Kárawa= 'Elephant Stud.' (It is not in the Singhalese Dict., but it is in the official Glossary of Terms, &c.), and our friend Dr. Rost suggests Kárawa-náyaka, 'Chief of the Kárawa' as a probable origin. This is confirmed by the form Courmaka in Valentijn, and by another title which he gives as used for the head of the Elephant Stable at Matura, viz. Gaga-náicke (Names, &c., p. 11), ñ.e. Gaga-náyaka, from Gaga, 'an elephant.' [The N.E.D. remarks that some authorities give for the first part of the word Skt. kari, 'elephant.]

1672.—"There is a certain season of the year when the old elephant discharges an oil at the two sides of the head, and at that season they become like mad creatures, and often break the neck of their carnac or driver."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 422. (See MUST.)

1712.—"The aforesaid author (P. Fr. Gaspar de S. Bernardino in his Itinerary), relates that in the said city (Goa), he saw three Elephants adorned with jewels, adorning the most Holy Sacramento at the Sá Gate on the Octave of Easter, on which day in India they make the procession of Corpus Dominii, because of the calm weather. I doubt not that the Cornacas of these animals had taught them to perform these acts of apparent adoration. But at the same time there appears to be Religion and Piety innate in the Elephant."*—In Bluteau, s.v. Elephante.

1726.—"After that (at Mongeere) one goes over a great walled area, and again through a gate, which is adorned on either side with a great stone elephant with a Carnak on it."—Valentijn, v. 167.

1727.—"As he was one Morning going to the River to be wash'd, with his Carnack or Rider on his Back, he chanc'd to put his Trunk in at the Taylor's Window."—A. Hamilton, ii. 110; [ed. 1744, ii. 109]. This is the only instance of English use that we know (except Mr. Carl Bock's; and he is not an Englishman, though his book is in English). It is the famous story of the Elephant's revenge on the Tailor.

[1853.—"With the same judgment an elephant will task his strength, without human direction. 'I have seen,' says M. D'Oeissonville, 'two occupied in beating down a wall which their carnacs (keepers) had desired them to do."..."—Library of Entertaining Knowledge, Quadrupeds, ii. 157.]

1884.—"The carnac, or driver, was quite unable to control the beast, which roared and trumpeted with indignation."—C. Bock, Temples and Elephants, p. 22.

COROMANDEL, n.p. A name which has been long applied by Europeans to the Northern Tamil Country, or (more comprehensively) to the eastern coast of the Peninsula of India from Pt. Calimere northward to the mouth of the Kistna, sometimes to Orissa. It corresponds pretty nearly to the Maabar of Marco Polo and the Mahomedan writers of his age, though that is defined more accurately as from C. Comorin to Nellore.

Much that is fanciful has been written on the origin of this name. Tod makes it Kára-mandala, the Realm of the Kúrus (Trans. R. As. Soc. iii. 157). Bp. Caldwell, in the first edition of his Dravidian Grammar, suggested that European traders might have taken this familiar name from that of Karumaual ('black sand'), the name of a small village on the coast north of Madras, which is habitually pronounced and written Coromandel by European residents at Madras. [The same suggestion was made earlier (see Walks, Hist. Sketches, ed. 1869, i. 5,

* "This elephant is a very pious animal," a German friend once observed in India, misled by the double sense of his vernacular from (harmless, tame as well as 'pious or innocent').
note]. The learned author, in his second edition, has given up this suggestion, and has accepted that to which we adhere. But Mr. C. P. Brown, the eminent Telugu scholar, in repeating the former suggestion, ventures positively to assert: "The earliest Portuguese sailors pronounced this Coromandel, and called the whole coast by this name, which was unknown to the Hindus";* a passage containing in three lines several errors. Again, a writer in the Ind. Antiquary (i. 380) speaks of this supposed origin of the name as "pretty generally accepted," and proceeds to give an imaginative explanation of how it was propagated. These etymologies are founded on a corrupted form of the name, and the same remark would apply to Khoramandalam, the 'hot country,' which Bp. Caldwell mentions as one of the names given, in Telugu, to the eastern coast. Padre Paolino gives the name more accurately as Ciola (i.e. Chola) mandalam, but his explanation of it as meaning the Country of Cholam (or Saliwari—Sorphwun vulgare, Pers.) is erroneous. An absurd etymology is given by Teixeira (Relacion de Hormuz, 28; 1610). He writes: "Choromadel or Choro Badel, i.e. Rice Port, because of the great export of rice from thence." He apparently compounds H. chaul, chavol, "cooked rice" (!) and bandar, (q.v.) "harbour." This is a very good type of the way etymologies are made by some people, and then confidently repeated.

The name is in fact Chōramandala, the Realm of Chōra; this being the Tamil form of the very ancient title of the Tamil Kings who reigned at Tanjore. This correct explanation of the name was already given by D'Anville (see Eclatrecissements, p. 117), and by W. Hamilton in 1820 (ii. 405), by Ritter, quoting him in 1836 (Erdkunde, vi. 296); by the late M. Reinaud in 1845 (Relation, &c., i. lxxxvi.); and by Sir Walter Elliot in 1869 (J. Ethnol. Soc. N.S. i. 117). And the name occurs in the forms Cholamandalam or Solamandalam on the great Temple inscription of Tanjore (11th century), and in an inscription of A.D. 1101 at a temple dedicated to Varāhāsvāmi near the Seven Pagodas. We have other quite analogous names in early inscriptions, e.g. Ilamandalam (Ceylon), Cheramandalam, Tondaimandalam, &c.

Chola, as the name of a Tamil people and of their royal dynasty appears as Chola in one of Asoka's inscriptions, and in the Telugu inscriptions of the Chālukya dynasty. Nor can we doubt that the same name is represented by Śrava of Potemny who reigned at 'Ārkatu (Arcot), Śvra-ṇaḥ who reigned at 'Ordhura (Warriūr), and the Śrava vāmūdhē who dwelt inland from the site of Madras.*

The word Solī, as applied to the Tanjore country, occurs in Marco Polo (Bk. iii. ch. 20), showing that Chola in some form was used in his day. Indeed Solī is used in Ceylon.† And although the Choromandel of Baldaens and other Dutch writers is, as pronounced in their language, ambiguous or erroneous, Valentijn (1726) calls the country Sjola, and defines it as extending from Negapatam to Orissa, saying that it derived its name from a certain kingdom, and adding that mandalam is 'kingdom.'‡ So that this respectable writer had already distinctly indicated the true etymology of Coromandel.

Some old documents in Valentijn speak of the 'old city of Coromandel.' It is not absolutely clear what place was so called (probably by the Arabs in their fashion of calling a chief town by the name of the country), but the indications point almost certainly to Negapatam.§

The oldest European mention of the name is, we believe, in the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, where it appears as Chomandara. The short Italian narrative of Hieronymo da Stö Stefano is, however, perhaps earlier still, and he curiously enough gives the name in exactly the modern form "Coromandel," though perhaps his C had originally a cedilla (Ramusio, i. f. 345v.). These instances suffice to show that the name was not given by the Portuguese. Da Gama and his companions knew the east coast only by hearsay, and no doubt derived their information chiefly from Mahommedan traders, through their "Moorish" interpreter. That the name was in familiar Mahommedan use at a later date may be seen from Rowlandson's Translation of the Tohfat-ul-Majahidin, where we find it stated that the Franks had built fortresses "at Meelapoor (i.e. Mailapur or San Tomé) and Nagapatan, and other ports of Solmundul," showing that the name was used by them just as we use it (p. 153). Again (p. 154) this writer says that the Mahommedans of Malabar were cut off from extra-Indian trade, and limited "to the ports of Guzerat, the Concan, Solmundul, and the countries about Kael." At page 160 of the same work we have mention of "Cormandel and other parts," but we do not know how this is written in the original Arabic. Varthema (1510) has Coromandil, i.e. Cormondil, but which Eden in his translation (1577, which probably affords the earliest English occurrence of the name) deforms into Cyromandil (f. 3066). [Albuquerque in his Cortas (see p. 155 for a letter of 1513) has Corumandill passim.] Barbosa has in the Portuguese edition of the Lisbon Academy, Charamandil; in the Span. MS. translated by Lord Stanley of Alderley, Cholmendil and Cholmender. D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (1557), Mendez Pinto (c. 1550) and Barros (1553) have Choromandil, and Garcia De Orta (1563) Charamandel. The ambiguity of the ch, soft in Portuguese and Spanish, but hard in Italian, seems to have led early to the corrupt form Coromandel, which we find in Parkes's Mendoza (1589), and Cormondyl, among other spellings, in the English version of Castanheira (1582). Cesare Federici has in the Italian (1587) Chiaramandel (probably pronounced soft in the Venetian manner), and the translation of 1599 has Coromandel. This form thenceforward generally prevails in English books, but not without exceptions. A Madras document of 1672 in Wheeler has Cormandell, and so have the early Bengal records in the India Office; Dampier (1689) has Coromandel (i. 509); Lockyer (1711) has "the Coast of Cormandel"; A. Hamilton (1727) Cormondil (i. 349); ed. 1744, i. 351; and a paper of about 1759, published by Dalrymple, has "Chormandel Coast." (Orient. Repert. i. 120-121). The poet Thomson has Cormandil:

"all that from the tract
Of woody mountains stretch'd through gorgeous Ind Fall on Cormandel's Coast or Malabar." —Summer.

The Portuguese appear to have adhered in the main to the correcter form Choromandel: e.g. Archivio Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 480, and passim. A Protestant Missionary Catechism, printed at Tranquebar in 1713 for the use of Portuguese schools in India has: "na costa dos Malabaros que se chama Cormandel." Bernier has "la côte de Koromandel" (Amst. ed. ii. 322). W. Hamilton says it is written Chormandel in the Madras Records until 1779, which is substantially correct. In the MS. "List of Persons in the Service of the Rt. Honble. E. I. Company in Fort St. George and other places on the Coast of Choromandel," preserved in the Indian Office, that spelling continues down to 1778. In that year it is changed to Cormandel. In the French translation of Ibn Batuta (iv. 142) we find Coromandel, but this is only the perverse and misleading manner of Frenchmen, who make Julius Caesar cross from "France" to "England." The word is Malabar in the original. [Albuquerque (Comm. Hak. Soc. i. 41) speaks of a violent squall under the name of vara de Coromandel.]

CORPORAL FORBES, s. A soldier's grimly jesting name for Cholera Morbus.

1829.—"We are all pretty well, only the regiment is sickly, and a great quantity are in hospital with the Corporal Forbes, which carries them away before they have time to die, or say who comes there."—In Skipp's Memoirs, ii. 218.

CORRAL, s. An enclosure as used in Ceylon for the capture of wild elephants, corresponding to the Kedda of Bengal. The word is Sp. corral, 'a court,' &c., Port. curral, 'a cattle-pen, a paddock.' The Americans have the same word, direct from the Spanish, in common use for a cattle-pen; and they have formed a verb 'to corral,' i.e. to enclose in a pen, to pen. The word clairal applied to native camps and villages at the Cape of Good Hope appears to be the same word introduced there by the Dutch. The word corral is explained by Bluteau: "A receptacle for any kind of cattle, with rallings round it and no roof, in which respect it differs from Corte, which is a building with a roof."
Also he states that the word is used especially in churches for septum nobilium femininarum, a pen for ladies.

wrought with gold and azure, and enamelled tiles (azulejos); and within there was a great 1880. — In Emerson Tennent's Ceylon, Bk. VIII. ch. iv. the corral is fully described.

1880. — "A few hundred pounds expended in houses, and the erection of coralls in the CORUNDUM. s. This is described by Dana under the species Saphire, as including the grey and darker coloured opaque crystallised specimens.

The word appears to be Indian, Shakespeare gives Hind. kurand, Dakh.
kurund. Littre attributes the origin to Skt. kuruvinda, which Williams gives as the name of several plants, but also as 'a ruby.' In Telugu we have kuruvindam, and in Tamil Kurundam for the substance in present question; the last is probably the direct origin of the term.

et s'appelle Corind en langue Telengui." — Thevenot, v. 297.

COSMIN, n.p. This name is given with it. Till quite recently this was all that could be said on the subject, but Prof. Forchhammer of Rangoon has now identified the name as a corruption of the classical name formerly borne by Bassein, viz. Kusuma or Kusmanagara, a city founded about the beginning of the 5th century. Kusumamandala was the western province of the Delta Kingdom which we know as Pegu. The Burmese corrupted the name of Kusuma into Kusmein and Kothien, and Alompra after his conquest of Pegu in the middle of the 18th century, changed it to Buthien. So the facts are stated substantially by Forchhammer (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, No. 2, p. 12); though familiar and constant use of the word Persaim, which appears to be a form of Bassein, in the English writings of 1750-60, published by Dalrymple (Or. Repertory, passim), seems hardly consistent with this statement of the origin of Bassein.

[Col. Temple (Ind. Ant. xxii. 19 seqq.; J. R. A. S. 1893, p. 885) disputes the above explanation. According to him the account of the change of name by Alompra is false history; the change from initial p to k is not isolated, and the word Bassein itself does not date beyond 1780.]

The last publication in which Cosmin appears is the "Draught of the River Irrawaddy or Irabatty," made in 1796, by Ensign T. Wood of the Bengal Engineers, which accompanies Syme's Account (London, 1800). This shows both Cosmin, and Persaim or Bassein, some 30 or 40 miles apart. But the former was probably taken from an older chart, and from no actual knowledge.

so make a great profit. But on reaching the coast he could not make the port of Martaban, and had to make the mouth of COSPETIR, n.p. This is a name which used greatly to perplex us on the 16th and 17th century maps of India, e.g. in Blaeu’s Atlas (c. 1650), appearing generally to the west of the Ganges Delta. Considering how the geographical names of different ages and different regions sometimes get mixed up in old maps, we at one time tried to trace it to the Κασπάρυος of Herodotus, which was certainly going far afield! The difficulty was solved by the sagacity of the deeply-lamented Prof. Blochmann, who has pointed out (J. As. Soc. Beng., xlii. pt. i. 224) that Cospetir represents the Bengali genitive of Gajpati, ‘Lord of Elephants,’ the traditional title of the Kings of Orissa. The title Gajpati was that one of the Four Great Kings who, according to Buddhist legend, divided the earth among them in times when there was no Chakravartti, or Universal Monarch (see Chuckerbutty). Gajpati rules the South; Aśvakpati (Lord of Horses) the North; Chhatrapati (Lord of the Umbrella) the West; Narapatī (Lord of Men) the East. In later days these titles were variously appropriated (see Lassen, ii. 27 seg.). And Akbar, as will be seen below, adopted these names, with others of his own devising, for the suits of his pack of cards. There is a Raja Gajpati, a chief Zamindar of the country north of Patna, who is often mentioned in the wars of Akbar (see Elliot, v. 399 and passim, vi. 55, &c.) who is of course not to be confounded with the Orissa Prince.

c. 700 (!).—"In times when there was no Chakravartti King ... Chen-pu (Samba-dyev) was divided among four lords. The southern lord was Lord of Elephants (Gajpati), &c. ..."—Introduct. to Si-yu-ki (in Pélérins Bouddh., ii. lxv.

This and the next passage compared show that Barros was not aware that Cospetir and Gajpati were the same.

"... of this realm of Bengal, and of other four realms its neighbours, the Genoos and Moors of those parts say that God has given to each its peculiar gift: to Bengal infantry numberless; to the Kingdom of Orixa elephants; to that of Bissanag men most skilful in the use of sword and shield; to the Kingdom of Dely multitudes of cities and towns; and to Cou a vast number of horses. And so naming them in this order they give them these other names, viz.: Espaty, Gaspay, Noropaty, Buapaty, and Coapaty."—Barros, ibid. [These titles appear to be Aśvakpati, "Lord of Horses"; Gajpati; Narapatī, "Lord of Men"; Bhāpati, "Lord of Earth"; Gopati, "Lord of Cattle."]

c. 1590.—"His Majesty (Akbar) plays with the following suits of cards. 1st. Aśvakpati, the lord of horses; the highest card represents a king on horseback, resembling the King of Dihi. . . . 2nd. Gajpati, the King whose power lies in the number of his elephants, as the ruler of Orisah. . . . 3rd.

COSS, s. The most usual popular measure of distance in India, but like the mile in Europe, and indeed like the mile within the British Islands up to a recent date, varying much in different localities.

The Skt. word is kroṣa, which also is a measure of distance, but originally signified a 'call,' hence the distance at which a man's call can be heard.*

In the Pali vocabulary called Abhiddhānaappadipikā, which is of the 12th century, the word appears in the form kossa; and nearly this, kos, is the ordinary Hindi. Kuroh is a Persian form of the word, which is often found in Mahomedan authors and in early travellers. These latter (English) often write course. It is a notable circumstance that, according to Wrangell, the Yakuts of N. Siberia reckon distance by koses (a word which, considering the Russian way of writing Turkish and Persian words, must be identical with kos). With them this measure is "indicated by the time necessary to cook a piece of meat." Kossa is = to about 5 verst, or 1 1/4 miles, in hilly or marshy country, but on plain ground to 7 verst, or 2 1/2 miles.†

The Yakuts are a Turk people, and their language is a Turki dialect. The suggestion arises whether the form kos may not have come with the Mongols into India, and modified the previous kroṣa? But this is met by the existence of the word kos in Pali, as mentioned above.

In ancient Indian measurement, or estimation, 4 kroṣas went to the yojana. Sir H. M. Elliot deduced from distances in the route of the Chinese pilgrim Fa-hian that the yojana of his age was as nearly as possible 7 miles. Cunningham makes it 7 1/2 or 8, Ferguson 6; but taking Elliot's estimate as a mean, the ancient kos would be 1 1/4 miles.

The kos as laid down in the Āīn [ed. Jarrett, iii. 414] was of 5000 gaz [see GUDGE]. The official decision of the British Government has assigned the length of Akbar's Ḫāli gaz as 33 inches, and this would make Akbar's kos = 2 m. 4 f. 153¾ yards. Actual measurement of road distances between 5 pair of Akbar's kos-minārs,* near Delhi, gave a mean of 2 m. 4 f. 158 yards.

In the greater part of the Bengal Presidency the estimated kos is about 2 miles, but it is much less as you approach the N.W. In the upper part of the Doab, it is, with fair accuracy, 1 1/4 miles. In Bundelkhand again it is nearly 3 m. (Carnegy), or, according to Beames, even 4 m. [In Madras it is 2 1/2 m., and in Mysore the Sulṭānī kos is about 4 m.] Reference may be made on this subject to Mr. Thomas's ed. of Princep's Essays, ii. 129; and to Mr. Beames's ed. of Elliot's Glossary ("The Races of the N.-W. Provinces," ii. 194). The latter editor remarks that in several parts of the country there are two kinds of kos, a pakkā and a kōchā kos, a double system which pervades all the weights and measures of India; and which has prevailed also in many other parts of the world [see PUCK].

In S. Canada also to this day such expressions as "a horn's blow," "a man's call," are used in the estimation of distances. [See under GOW.]

COSSACK, s. It is most probable that this Russian term for the military tribes of various descent on what was the S. frontier of the Empire has come originally from Kazak, a word of obscure origin, but which from its adoption in Central Asia we may venture to call Turki. [Schuyler, Turkis- tan, i. 8.] It appears in Pave de Courteille's Dict. Turk-Oriental as "vogabond; aventurier . . . ; ouagre que ses compagnons chassent loin d'eux." But in India it became common in the sense of 'a predatory horseman' and freebooter.

1366.—"On receipt of this bad news I was much dispirited, and formed to myself three plans; 1st. That I should turn Cos- sack, and never pass 24 hours in one place, and plunder all that came to hand."—Mem. of Timur, tr. by Stewart, p. 111.

[1609.—In A Letter from the Company to the factors at Bantam mention is made of one "Sophony Cosuke," or as he is also styled in the Court Minutes "the Russe."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 288.]

1618.—"Cossacks (Cossachi) . . . you should know, is not the name of a nation, but of a collection of people of various countries and sects (though most of them Christians) who without wives or children, and without horses, acknowledge obedience to no prince; but dwelling far from cities in fastnesses among the woods or mountains, or rivers . . . live by the booty of their swords . . . employ themselves in perpetual inroads and cruisings by land and sea to the detriment of their nearest enemies, i.e. of the Turks and other Mahometans. . . . As I have heard from them, they promise themselves one day the capture of Constantinople, saying that Fate has reserved for them the liberation of that country, and that they have clear prophecies to that effect."—P. della Valle, i. 614 seq.

1819.—"Some dashing leader may . . . gather a predatory band round his standard, which, composed as it would be of desperate adventurers, and commanded by a professional Kuzzauk, might still give us an infinite deal of trouble."—Ibid. ii. 68.

c. 1823.—"The term Cossack is used be- cause it is the one by which the Mahrattas describe their own species of warfare. In their language the word Cossâk (borrowed like many more of their terms from the Moghuls) means predatory."—Malcolm, Central India, 3d ed. i. 69.

COSSID, s. A courier or running messenger; Arab. kâsid.

1682.—"I received letters by a Cossid from Mr. Johnson and Mr. Catchpole,

c. 1759.—“For the performance of this arduous . . . duty, which required so much care and caution, intelligencers of talent, and Kasids or messengers, who from head to foot were eyes and ears . . . were stationed in every quarter of the country.”—H. of Hyder Naik, 126.

1803.—“I wish that you would open a communication by means of cassids with the officer commanding a detachment of British troops in the fort of Songhr.”—Wellington, H. 159.

COSSIMBAZAR, n.p. Properly Kāštimābāzār. A town no longer existing, which closely adjoined the city of Murshidábâd, but preceded the latter. It was the site of one of the most important factories of the East India Company in their mercantile days, and was indeed a chief centre of all foreign trade in Bengal during the 17th century. ["In 1658 the Company established a factory at Cossinbazara, ‘Castle Bazaar.’"]—(Birdwood Rep. on Old Rec. 219.) Fryer (1673) calls it Castle Buzzara (p. 38).

1665.—“That evening I arrived at Casen-Basar, where I was welcom’d by Menheir Arnold van Wackendorck, Director of all Holland-Factories in Bengal.”—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 59; [ed. Ball, i. 131. Bernier (E.T. p. 141; ed. Constable, 419) has Kassem-Bazar; in the map, p. 454, Kasembazar.]

1676.—“Kassembasar, a Village in the Kingdom of Bengola, sends abroad every year two and twenty thousand Bales of Silk; every Bale weighing a hunder’d pound.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 126; [Ball, ed. ii. 2].

1678.—“Casumbazar.” See quotation under DADNY.]

COSSYA, n.p. More properly Kāśiā, but now officially Khaṣi; in the language of the people themselves ki-

Kāṣī, the first syllable being a prefix denoting the plural. The name of a hill people of Mongoloid character, occupying the mountains immediately north of Silhet in Eastern Bengal. Many circumstances in relation to this people are of high interest, such as their practice, down to our own day, of erecting rude stone monuments of the menhir and dolmen kind, their law of succession in the female line, &c. Shillong, the modern seat of administration of the Province of Assam, and lying midway between the proper valley of Assam and the plain of Silhet, both of which are comprehended in that government, is in the Kāśiā country, at a height of 4,000 feet above the sea. The Kāśiās seem to be the people encountered near Silhet by Ibn Batuta as mentioned in the quotation:

c. 1346.—“The people of these mountains resemble Turks (i.e. Tartars), and are very strong labourers, so that a slave of their race is worth several of another nation.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 216. [See KHASYA.]

1780.—“The first thing that struck my observation on entering the arena was the similarity of the dresses worn by the different tribes of Cusseahs or native Tartars, all dressed and armed agreeable to the custom of the country or mountain from whence they came.”—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 182.

1789.—“We understand the Cossyahs who inhabit the hills to the north-westward of Sylhet, have committed some very daring acts of violence.”—In Seton-Karr, ii. 218.

1790.—“Agreed and ordered, that the Trade of Sylhet . . . be declared entirely free to all the natives . . . under the following Regulations:—1st. That they shall not supply the Cossyahs or other Hill-people with Arms, Ammunition or other articles of Military store . . .” —In Seton-Karr, ii. 31.

COSTUS. (See PUTCHOCK.)

COT, s. A light bedstead. There is a little difficulty about the true origin of this word. It is universal as a sea-term, and in the South of India. In Northern India its place has been very generally taken by charpoy (q.v.), and cot, though well understood, is not in such prevalent European use as it formerly was, except as applied to barrack furniture, and among soldiers and their families. Words with this last characteristic have very frequently been introduced from the south. There are, however, both in north and south, vernacular words which may have led to the adoption of the term cot in their respective localities. In the north we have H. khat and khatav, both used in this sense, the latter also in Sanskrit; in the south, Tam. and Malayal. kottil, a form adopted by the Portuguese. The quotations show, however, no Anglo-Indian use of the word in any form but cot.

The question of origin is perhaps further perplexed by the use of quatre as a Spanish term in the West Indies (see Tom Cringle below). A Spanish lady tells us that catre, or catre de tigera (“scissors-cot”) is applied to a bedstead with X-trestles. Catre is also common Portuguese for a wooden bedstead, and is found as such in a dictionary of 1611. These forms, however, we shall hold to be of Indian origin; unless it can be shown that they are older in Spain and Portugal than the 16th century. The form quatre has a curious analogy (probably accidental) to chârpati.

1559.—“The Camarij (Zamorin) who was at the end of a house, placed on a bedstead, which they call catle . . .”—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. viii.

1557.—“The king commanded his men to furnish a tent on that spot, where the interview was to take place, all carpeted inside with very rich tapestries, and fitted with a sofa (catle) covered over with a silken cloth.”—Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 294.

1666.—“The king was set on a catel (the name of a kind of field bedstead) covered with a cloth of white silk and gold . . .”—Damian de Goës, Chron. del R. Dom Emanuel, 48.

1600.—“He retired to the hospital of the sick and poor, and there had his cell, the walls of which were of coarse palm-mats. Inside there was a little table, and on it a crucifix of the wood of St. Thomé, covered with a cloth, and a breviary. There was also a catre of coir, with a stone for pillow; and this completes the inventory of the furniture of that house.”—Lucena, Y. do P. P. Xavier, 199.

1613.—“Here hired a catele and 4 men to have carried me to Agra.”—Davies, Letters, i. 277.

1685.—“I hired 12 stout fellows to carry me as far as Lar in my cott (Pallanneen fashion).”—Hedges, Diary, July 29; [Hak Soc. i. 203].

1688.—“In the East Indies, at Fort St. George, also Men take their Cotts or little Field-Beds and put them into the Yards, and go to sleep in the Air.”—Dampier’s Voyages, ii. Pt. iii.

1690.—“. . . the Cott or Bed that was by . . .”—Ovington, 211.

1711.—In Canton Price Current: “Bamboo Cotts for Servants each . . . 1 mace.”—Lockyer, 150.

1768.71.—“We here found the body of the deceased, lying upon a kadell, or couch.”—Stacominus, E.T., i. 442.

1794.—“Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received . . . for supplying . . . the different General Hospitals with clothing, cotts, and bedding.”—In Seton-Karr, ii. 115.

1824.—“I found three of the party insisted upon accompanying me the first stage, and had despatched their camp-cotts.”—Seely, Ellora, ch. iii.

c. 1830.—“After being . . . furnished with food and raiment, we retired to our quaters, a most primitive sort of couch, with a piece of canvas stretched over it.”—Tom Cringle’s Log, ed. 1863, p. 100.

1872.—“As Badan was too poor to have a khat, that is, a wooden bedstead with tester frames and mosquito curtains.”—Goenka Samanta, i. 140.

COTAMALUCO, n.p. The title by which the Portuguese called the kings of the Golconda Dynasty, founded, like the other Mahomedan kingdoms of S. India, on the breaking up of the Bahmani kingdom of the Deccan. It was a corruption of Kuth-ul-Mulk, the designation of the founder, retained as the style of the dynasty by Mahomedans as well as Portuguese (see extract from Akbar-nama under IDALCAN).

1543.—“When Idalcan heard this reply he was in great fear . . . and by night made his escape with some in whom he trusted (very few they were), and fled in secret, leaving his family and his wives, and went to the territories of the Izam Maluco (see NIZAMALUCO), his neighbour and friend . . . and made matrimonial ties with the Izam Maluco, marrying his daughter, on which they arranged together; and there also came into this concert the Madremaluco, and Cotamaluco, and the COTIA, s. A fast-sailing vessel, with two masts and lateen sails, employed on the Malabar coast. Kotia is used in Malayal.; [the Madras Gloss. writes the word kotiel, and says that it comes from Ceylon;] yet the word hardly appears to be Indian. Bluteau however appears to give it as such (iii. 590).

1552.—"Among the little islands of Goa he embarked on board his fleet, which consisted of about a dozen cotias, taking with him a good company of soldiers."—Cotan-kota, iii. 23. See also pp. 47, 48, 228, &c.

1580.—"In the gulf of Naguana... I saw some Cutias."—Priyam e Hours, &c., f. 73.

1602.—"... embarking his property on certain Cotias, which he kept for that purpose."—Conto, Dec. IV. liv. i. cap. viii.

COTTA, s. H. kutha. A small land-measure in use in Bengal and Bahar, being the twentieth part of a Bengal bigha (see BEEGAR), and containing eighty square yards.

1767.—"The measurement of land in Bengal is thus estimated: 16 Guntas make 1 Cotta; 20 Cottas, 1 Bopa, or about 16,000 square feet."—Verelst, View of Bengal, 221, note.

1784.—"... An upper roomed House standing upon about 5cottahs of ground. ..."—Selon-Karr, i. 34.

COTTON, s. We do not seem to be able to carry this familiar word further back than the Ar. kutn, kutun, or kutman, having the same meaning, whence Prov. coton, Port. cotao, It. cotone, Germ. Kattu. The Sp. keeps the Ar. article, algodon, whence old Fr. augueton and hoqueton, a coat quilted with cotton. It is only by an odd coincidence that Pliny adduces a like-sounding word in his account of the arbores lanigerae: "ferunt mali cotonei amplitudine cucurbitas, quae maturit-at ruptae ostendunt lanuginis pilas, ex quibus vestes pretioso linteo faciunt."—xii. 10 (21). [On the use and cultivation of cotton in the ancient world, see the authorities collected by Frazer, Pausanias, iii. 470, seqq.]

1830.—"The dress of the great is on the Persian model; it consists of a shirt of kuttaen (a kind of linen of a wide texture, the best of which is imported from Aleppo, and the common sort from Persia). ..."—Elphinstone's Cawul, i. 351.

COTTON-TREE, SILK. (See SEEMUL.)

COTWAL, CUTWAUL, s. A police-officer; superintendent of police; native town magistrate. P. kotwal, 'a seneschal, a commandant of a castle or fort.' This looks as if it had been first taken from an Indian word, kotwal; [Skt. kotha- or koshtha pala 'castle-porter']; but some doubt arises whether it may not have been a Turki term. In Turki it is written kotowal, kotòval, and seems to be regarded by both Vambah and Pavet de Courtelle as a genuine Turki word. V. defines it as: "Kotwal, garde de forteresse, chef de la garnison; nom d'un tribu d'Ozbegs;" P. "kotowal, kotòval, gardien d'une citadelle." There are many Turki words of analogous form, as kardwal, 'a vedette,' barkowal, 'a table-steward,' yasowal, 'a chamberlain,' tangoval, 'a patrol,' &c. In modern Bokhara Kotaul is a title conferred on a person who superintends the Amir's buildings (Khaniéoff, 241). On the whole it seems probable that the title was originally Turki, but was shaped by Indian associations.

[The duties of the Kotowal, as head of the police, are exhaustively laid down in the Ain (Jarrett, ii. 41). Amongst other rules: "He shall amputate the hand of any who is the pot-companion of an executioner, and the finger of such as converse with his family."]

The office of Kotowal in Western and Southern India, technically speaking, ceased about 1862, when the new police system (under Act, India, V. of 1861, and corresponding local Acts) was introduced. In Bengal the term has been long obsolete. [It is still in use in the N.W.P. to designate the chief police officer of one of the larger cities or cantonments.]

c. 1040.—"Bu-Ali Kotwal (of Ghazni) returned from the Khilj expedition, having adjusted matters."—Bashkhi, in Elliot, ii. 151.

1406-7. —"They fortified the city of Astarābād, where Abū Leith was placed with the rank of Kotwal."—Abdurrazākī, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 123.

1553.—"The message of the Camorij arriving, Vasco da Gama landed with a dozen followers, and was received by a noble person whom they called Catual ..."—Barros, Dec. i. liv. iv. ch. vii.

1727.—"Mr. Boucher being bred a Druggist in his youth, presently knew the Poison, and carried it to the Cutwaul or Sheriff, and showed it."—A. Hamilton, ii. 199. [In ed. 1744, ii. 199, cutwal.]

1763.—"The Catwal is the judge and executor of justice in criminal cases."—Orme (ed. 1803), i. 26.

1812.—"... an officer retained from the former system, denominated cutwal, to whom the general police of the city and regulation of the market was entrusted."—Fifth Report, 44.

1847.—"The Kutwal ... seems to have done his duty resolutely and to the best of his judgment."—G. O. by Sir C. Napier, 121.

[1890.—"The son of the Raja's Kotwal was the prince's great friend."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 209.]

COUNSEILLE, s. This is the title by which the natives in Calcutta generally designate English barristers. It is the same use as the Irish one of Counsellor, and a corruption of that word.

COUNTRY, adj. This term is used colloquially, and in trade, as an adjective to distinguish articles produced in India (generally with a sub-indication of disparagement), from such as are imported, and especially imported from Europe. Indeed Europe (q.v.) was, and still occasionally is, used as the contrary adjective. Thus, 'country harness' is opposed to 'Europe harness'; 'country-born' people are persons of European descent, but born in India; 'country horses' are Indian-bred in distinction from Arabs, Walers (q.v.). English horses, and even from 'stud-breds,' which are horses reared in India, but from foreign sires; 'country ships' are those which are owned in Indian ports, though often officered by Europeans; country bottled beer is beer imported from England in cask and bottled in India; ['country-wound' silk is that reeled in the crude native fashion]. The term, as well as the H. desā, of which country is a translation, is also especially used for things grown or made in India as substitutes for certain foreign articles. Thus the Cica disticha in Bombay gardens is called 'Country gooseberry'; Convolvulus batatas, or sweet potato, is sometimes called the 'country potato.' It was, equally with our quotidian root which has stolen its name, a foreigner in India, but was introduced and familiarised at a much earlier date. Thus again desā bāddām, or 'country almond,' is applied in Bengal to the nut of the Terminaria Catappa. On desā, which is applied, among other things, to silk, the great Ritter (dornraitis Homerus) makes the odd remark that desā is just Seide reversed! But it would be equally apposite to remark that Trigon-ometry is just Country-ometry reversed!

Possibly the idiom may have been taken up from the Portuguese, who also use it, e.g. 'açafrao da terra,' 'country saffron,' i.e. safflower, otherwise called bastard saffron, the term being sometimes applied to turmeric. But the source of the idiom is general, as the use of desā shows. Moreover the Arabic baladi, having the same literal meaning, is applied in a manner strictly analogous, including the note of disparagement, insomuch that it has been naturalised in Spanish as indicating 'of little or no value.' Illustrations of the mercantile use of beledi (i.e. baladi) will be found in a note to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 370. For the Spanish use we may quote the Dict.
of Cobarruvias (1611): "Baladi, the thing which is produced at less cost, and is of small duration and profit." (See also Dozy and Engelmann, 232 seq.)

1516.—"Beledyn ginger grows at a distance of two or three leagues all round the city of Calicut. . . . In Bengal there is also much ginger of the country (Gengivere Beledin)."—Barbona, 221 seq.

[1530.—"I at once sent some of these country men (homines valadis) to the Thanas."—Alboquerque, Cartas, p. 148.]

1582.—"The Nayres maye not take anye Countrie women, and they also doe not marrie."—Castañeda, (by N. L.), f. 36.

[1608.—"The Country here are at dis- sension among themselves." —Dawers, Letters, i. 20.]

1619.—"The twelfth in the morning Master Methwall came from Misselipaitain in one of the Country Boats."—Irving, in Purchas, i. 658.

1683.—"The inhabitants of the Gentoo Town, all in arms, bringing with them also elephants, kettle-drums, and all the Country music."—Wheeler, i. 140.

1747.—"It is resolved and ordered that a Sergeant with two Troopers and a Party of Country Horse, to be sent to Markismah Purnam to patroll. . . ."—Pt. St. David Council of War, Dec. 25. —MS. Records in India Office.

1752.—"Captain Clive did not despair . . . and at ten at night sent one Shirhum, a sergeant who spoke the country languages, with a few sepoyos to reconnoitre."—Orme, i. 211 (ed. 1803).

1769.—"I supped last night at a Country Captain's; where I saw for the first time a specimen of the Indian taste."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 15.

1775.—"The Moors in what is called Country ships in East India, have also their chearing songs; at work in hoisting, or in their boats a rowing."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 305.

"1783.—"The jolting springs of country-made carriages, or the grants of country-made carriers, commonly called patankensoyos."—Hugh Boyd, 146.

1809.—"The Rajah had a drawing of it made for me, on a scale, by a country Draftsman of great merit."—Ld. Valentina, i. 356.

" . . . split country peas . . ."—Maria Graham, 25.

1817.—"Since the conquest (of Java) a very extensive trade has been carried on by the English in country ships."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 210.

[1882.—"There was a country-born European living in a room in the bungalow."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 256.]

COUNTRY-CAPTAIN, s. This is in Bengal the name of a peculiar dry kind of curry, often served as a breakfast dish. We can only conjecture that it was a favourite dish at the table of the skippers of 'country ships,' who were themselves called 'country captains,' as in our first quotation. In Madras the term is applied to a satch-cock dressed with onions and curry stuff, which is probably the original form. [Riddell says: "Country-captain.—Cut a fowl in pieces; shred an onion small and fry it brown in butter; sprinkle the fowl with fine salt and curry powder and fry it brown; then put it into a stewpan with a pint of soup; stew it slowly down to a half and serve it with rice" (Ind. Dom. Econ. 176).]

1792.—"But now, Sir, a Country Captain is not to be known from an ordinary man, or a Christian, by any certain mark what- ever."—Madras Courier, April 26.

c. 1825.—"The local name for their business was the 'Country Trade,' the ships were 'Country Ships,' and the masters of them 'Country Captains.' Some of my readers may recall a dish which was often placed before us when dining on board these vessels at Whampoa, viz. 'Country Capt- in.'"—The Punkree at Canton (1882), p. 33.

COURSE, s. The drive usually frequented by European gentlemen and ladies at an Indian station.

1853.—"It was curious to Oakfield to be back on the Ferozepore course, after a six months' interval, which seemed like years. How much had happened in these six months!"—Oakfield, ii. 124.

COURTALLUM, n.p. The name of a town in Tinnevelly [used as an European sanatorium (Stuart, Mon. of Tinnevelly, 96)]; written in vernacular Kattālam. We do not know its etymology. [The Madras Gloss, gives Trīkūtākāla, Skt., the 'Three-peaked Mountain.]

COVENANTED SERVANTS. This term is specially applied to the regular Civil Service of India, whose members used to enter into a formal covenant with the East India Company, and do now with the Secretary of State for India. Many other classes of servants now go out to India under a variety of contracts and covenants, but the term in question continues to be appropriated as before. [See CIVILIAN.] 1757.—"There being a great scarcity of covenanted servants in Calcutta, we have entertained Mr. Hewitt as a monthly writer... and beg to recommend him to be covenanted upon this Establishment."—Letter in Long, 112.

COVID, s. Formerly in use as the name of a measure, varying much locally in value, in European settlements not only in India but in China, &c. The word is a corruption, probably an Indo-Portuguese form, of the Port. covado, a cubit or ell.

[1612.—"A long covad within 1 inch of our English yard, wherewith they measure cloth, the short covad is for silks, and containeth just as the Portuguese covad."—Dawers, Letters, i. 241.

[1616.—"Clothes of gould... were worth 100 rupies a cobde."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 203.

[1617.—Cloth "here affordeth at a rupie and two in a cobdee vnder ours."—Ibid. ii. 409.]

1672.—"Measures of Surat are only two; the Lesser and the Greater Coveld [probably a misprint for Cowed], the former of 27 inches English, the latter of 36 inches English."—Fryer, 206.

1720.—"Item. I leave 200 pagodas for a tomb to be erected in the burial place in form as follows. Four large pillars, each to be six covids high, and six covids distance one from the other; the top to be arched, and on each pillar a cherubim; and on the top of the arch the effigy of Justice."—Testament of Charles Divers, Merchant, in Wheeler, ii. 393.

[1728.—"Cobidos." See quotation under LOONGHEE.]

c. 1790.—According to Grose the covid at Surat was 1 yard English [the greater coved of Fryer], at Madras ½ a yard; but he says also: "At Bengal the same as at Surat and Madras."

1794.—"To be sold, on very reasonable terms, About 3000 covita of 2-inch Calcutt Planks."—Bombay Courier, July 19.

The measure has long been forgotten under this name in Bengal, though used under the native name hath. From Milburn (i. 334, 341, &c.) it seems to have survived on the West Coast in the early part of last century, and possibly may still linger.

[1612.—"½ corge of pintados of 4 hastas the piece."—Dawers, Letters, i. 232.]

COVL, s. Tam. kō-ū-il, 'God-house; a Hindu temple; and also (in Malabar) a palace, [also in the form Colghun, for Kovilagam]. In colloquial use in S. India and Ceylon. In S. India it is used, especially among the French, for 'a church'; also among the uneducated English.

[1786.—"I promise to use my utmost endeavours to procure for this Raja the collofhum of Pych for his residence..."—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 254.]

COWCOLLY, n.p. The name of a well-known lighthouse and landmark at the entrance of the Hooghly, in Midnapur District. Properly, according to Hunter, Geonkhâl. In Thornton's English Pilot (pt. iii. p. 7, of 1711) this place is called Cockoly.

COW-ITCH, s. The irritating hairs on the pod of the common Indian climbing herb Mucuna pruriens, D.C., N. O. Leguminosae, and the plant itself. Both pods and roots are used in native practice. The word is doubtless the Hind. kevâinch (Skt. kapâkchchhum), modified in Hobson-Jobson fashion, by the 'striving after meaning.'

[1773.—"Cow-itch. This is the down found on the outside of a pod, which is about the size and thickness of a man's little finger, and of the shape of an Italian S."—Ives, 494.]

COWLE, s. A lease, or grant in writing; a safe-conduct, amnesty, or in fact any written engagement. The Emperor Sigismund gave Cowle to John Huss—and broke it. The word is Ar. kaul, 'word, promise, agreement,' and it has become technical in the Indian vernaculars, owing to the prevalence of Mahommedan Law.

[1611.—"We desired to have a cowl of the Shahbunder to send some persons alond."—Dawers, Letters, i. 133.

[1613.—"Procured a cowl for such ships as should come."—Foster, Letters, i. 17.]

1680.—"A Cowle granted by the Right Worshipful Streynsham Master, Esq., Agent and Governor for affairs of the Honorable East India Company in Fort St. George at Chinapatnam, by and with the advice of his Councell to all the Pegu Ruby Merchants..."—Fort St. George Cons. Feb. 23, in Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 10.

1688.—"The President has by some correspondence procured a Cowle for renting the Town and customs of S. Thomé."—Wheeler, i. 176.

1758.—"The Nawab... having mounted some large guns on that hill... sent to the Killadar a Kowl-nama, or a summons and terms for his surrender."—H. of Hyder Nâik, 128.
1780.—“This [cowry] was confirmed by another King of Gingy . . . of the Braham Caste.”—Duna, New Directory, 140.

Sir A. Wellesley often uses the word in his Indian letters. Thus:

1800.—“One tandah of brinjaries . . . has sent to me for cowle . . .”—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1837), i. 59.

1804.—“On my arrival in the neighbour- hood of the pettah I offered cowle to the inhabitants.”—Ibid. ii. 193.

COWRY, s. Hind. kauri (kawiḍī), Mahr. kavaḍī, Skt. kapardha, kapar-dika. The small white shell, Cypraea moneta, current as money extensively in parts of S. Asia and of Africa.

By far the most ancient mention of shell currency comes from Chinese literature. It is mentioned in the famous “Tribute of Yü” (or Yü-Kung); in the Shu-King (about the 14th cent. B.C.); and in the “Book of Poetry” (Shi-King), in an ode of the 10th cent. B.C. The Chinese seem to have adopted the use from the aborigines in the East and South; and they extended the system to tortoise-shell, and to other shells, the cowry remaining the unit. In 338 B.C., the King of Ts’in, the supply of shells failing, suppressed the cowry currency, and issued copper coin, already adopted in other States of China. The usurper Wang Mang, who ruled A.D. 9-23, tried to revive the old systems, and issued rules instituting, in addition to the metallic money, ten classes of tortoise-shell and five of smaller shells, the value of all based on the cowry, which was worth 3 cash.* [Cowries were part of the tribute paid by the aborigines of Puanit to Metesouphis I. (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 427.)]

The currency of cowries in India does not seem to be alluded to by any Greek or Latin author. It is mentioned by Masāfida (c. 943), and their use for small change in the Indo-Chinese countries is repeatedly spoken of by Marco Polo, who calls them pourcelettes, the name by which this kind of shell was known in Italy (porcellane) and France. When the Mahomedans conquered Bengal, early in the 13th century, they found the ordinary currency composed exclusively of cowries, and in some remote districts this continued to the beginning of the last century. Thus, up to 1801, the whole revenue of the Silhet District, amounting then to Rs. 250,000, was collected in these shells, but by 1813 the whole was realised in specie. Interesting details in connection with this subject are given by the Hon. Robert Lindsay, who was one of the early Collectors of Silhet (Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 170).

The Sanskrit vocabulary called Trikāṇḍaśeṣha (iii. 3, 206) makes 20 kapardikas (or kauris)=½ pana; and this value seems to have been pretty constant. The cowry table given by Mr. Lindsay at Silhet, circa 1778, exactly agrees with that given by Milburn as in Calcutta use in the beginning of last century, and up to 1854 or thereabouts it continued to be the same:

4 kauris = 1 ganda
20 gandas = 1 pana
4 pana = 1 āna
4 ānas = 1 kāhan, or about ¼ rupee.

This gives about 5120 cowries to the Rupee. We have not met with any denomination of currency in actual use below the cowry, but it will be seen that, in a quotation from Mrs. Parkes, two such are indicated. It is, however, Hindu idiosyncracy to indulge in imaginary submultiples as well as imaginary multiples. (See a parallel under LACK).

In Bastar, a secluded inland State between Orissa and the Godavery, in 1870, the following was the prevailing table of cowry currency, according to Sir W. Hunter’s Gazetteer:

28 kauris = 1 bori
12 boris = 1 dugānī
12 dugānis = 1 Rupee, i.e. 2880 cowries.

Here we may remark that both the pana in Bengal, and the dugānī in this secluded Bastar, were originally the names of pieces of money, though now in the respective localities they represent only certain quantities of cowries. (For pana, see under FANAM; and as regards dugānī, see Thomas’s Patan Kings of Delhi, pp. 218 seq.). [“Up to 1865 bee-a or cowries were in use in Siam; the value of these was so small that from 800 to 1500 went to a fuang (7½ cents).”]—Hallett, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, p. 164. Mr. Gray has an interesting note on cowries in his ed. of Pyramid de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 236 seqq.

Cowries were at one time imported into England in considerable quantities for use in the African slave-trade. "For this purpose," says Milburn, "they should be small, clean, and white, with a beautiful gloss" (i. 273). The duty on this importation was £53, 16s. 3d. per cent. on the sale value, with \( \frac{1}{2} \) added for war-tax. In 1803, 1418 cwt. were sold at the E. I. auctions, fetching £3,626; but after that few were sold at all. In the height of slave-trade, the great mart for cowries was at Amsterdam, where there were spacious warehouses for them (see the Voyage, &c., quoted 1747).

c. A.D. 943.—"Trading affairs are carried on with cowries (al-wuda), which are the money of the country."—Moaydā'i, i. 385.

c. 1020.—"These isles are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their chief products. The one are called Dervā-Kamtha, 'the Isles of the Cowries,' because of the Cowries that they collect on the branches of coco-trees planted in the sea."—Albirā'ī, in J. As., Ser. IV. tom. iv. 296.

c. 1240.—"It has been narrated on this island that as in that country (Bengal), the kauri [ed.] is current in place of silver, the least gift he used to bestow was a lāk of kauri. The Almighty mitigate his punishment [in hell]!"—Ṭabākāt-Nāṣirī, by Razvī, 555 seq.

c. 1350.—"The money of the Islanders (of the Maldives) consists of cowries (al-wuda). They so style creatures which they collect in the sea, and bury in holes dug on the shore. The flesh wastes away, and only a white shell remains. 100 of these shells are called sugāh, and 700 fāl; 12,000 they call kuta; and 100,000 kūta. Bargains are made with these cowries at the rate of 4 bustā for a gold dinār. [This would be about 40,000 for a rupee.] Sometimes the rate falls, and 12 bustā are exchanged for a gold dinār. The islanders barter them to the people of Bengal for rice, for they also form the currency in use in that country. . . . These cowries serve also for barter with the negroes in their own land. I have seen them sold at Mālī and Gūgā [on the Niger] at the rate of 1150 for a gold dinār."—Ibn Batūta, iv. 122.

c. 1420.—"A man on whom I could rely assured me that he saw the people of one of the chief towns of the Said employ as currency, in the purchase of low-priced articles of provision, kaudās, which in Egypt are known as wuda, just as people in Egypt use fals."—Makrizī, S. de Syrie, Chríst. Arab., 2nd ed. i. 252.

[1510.—Mr. Whiteway writes: "In an abstract of an unpublished letter of Alboquerque which was written about 1510, and abstracted in the following year, occurs this sentence:—'The merchandize which they carry from Cairo consists of snails (caurīes) of the Twelve Thousand Islands.' He is speaking of the internal caravan-trade of Africa, and these snails must be *cowries."]

1554.—At the Maldives: "Cowries 12,000 make one cota; and 4\\(^\prime\) cotās of average size weigh one quintal; the big ones something more."—A. Nīkēs, 55.

"In these isles . . . are certain white little shells which they call caurīs."—Codexheda, iv. 7.

1561.—"Which vessels (grandas, or palm-wood boats from the Maldives) come loaded with coir and caurī, which are certain little white shells found among the islands in such abundance that whole vessels are laden with them, and which make a great trade in Bengal, where they are current as money."—Correa, i. 341.

1586.—"In Bengal are current those little shells that are found in the islands of Maldiva, called here courim, and in Portugal *Buzia."—Souset, in De Gubernatis, 205.

[c. 1590.—"Four kos from this is a well, into which if the bone of any animal be thrown it petrifles, like a cowrie shell, only smaller."—Aīn, ed. Jerritt, ii. 299.]

c. 1610.—"Les marchandises qu'ils portent le plus souvent sont ces petites coquilles des Maldives, dont ils chargent tous les ans grand nombre de navires. Ceux des Maldives les appellent Bolî, et les autres Indiens Caurī.-Pyramid de Laval, i. 517; see also p. 165; Hak. Soc. i. 438; also comp. i. 78, 157, 228, 236, 240, 250, 299; Bolî is Singh.

1664.—". . . lastly, it (Indostan) wants those little sea-cockles of the Maldives, which serve for common Coyne in Bengale, and in some other places . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 63; [ed. Constable, 204].

[c. 1665.—"The other small money consists of shells called Cowries, which have the edges inverted, and they are not found in any other part of the world save only the Maldives Islands. Close to the isle they give up to 80 for the paisa, and that diminishes as you leave the sea, on account of carriage; so that at Agra you receive but 50 or 55 for the paisa."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 27 seq.]

1672.—"Cowreys, like sea-shells, come from Siam, and the Philippine Islands."—Fryer, 86.

1683.—"The Ship Britannia—from the Maldives, arrived before the Factory . . . at their first going ashore, their first salutation from the natives was a shower of Stones and Arrows, whereby 6 of their Men were wounded, which made them immediately return on board, and by ye mouths of their Guns forced them to a complacency, and permission to load what Cowries they would at Markett Price; so that in a few days time they sett sayle from thence for Surrat with above 60 Tunn of Cowreys."—Hodges, Diary, July 1; Hak. Soc. i. 96.

1705.—". . . Coris, qui sont des petits coquillages."—Lutter, 245.
1727.—"The Couries are caught by putting Branches of Cocoa-nut trees with their Leaves on, into the Sea, and in five or six Months the little Shell-fish stick to those leaves in Clusters, which they take off, and digging Pits in the Sand, put them in and cover them up, and leave them two or three Years in the Pit, that the Fish may putrefy, and then they take them out of the Pit, and barter them for Rice, Butter, and Cloth, which Shipping bring from Ballasore in Orissa near Bengal, in which Countries Couries are sold for Money from 2500 to 3000 for a Rupee, or half a Crown English."—A. Hamilton [ed. 1744], i. 349.

1747.—"Formerly 12,000 weight of these cowries would purchase a cargo of five or six hundred Negroes: but those lucrative times are now no more; and the Negroes now set such a value on their countrymen, that there is no such thing as having a cargo under 12 or 14 tons of cowries.

"As payments of this kind of specie are attended with some intricacy, the Negroes, though at times more as to sell one another for shells, have contrived a kind of copper vessel, holding exactly 108 pounds, which is a great dispatch to business."—A Voyage to the I'd, of Ceylon on board a Dutch Indiaman in the year 1747, &c. &c. Written by a Dutch Gentleman. Transl. &c. London, 1754, pp. 21 seq.

1749.—"The only Trade they deal in is Couries (or Blackamoor's Teeth as they call them in England), the King's sole Property, which the sea throws up in great abundance."—The Bickeren's Voyage to Bombay, by Philalethes (1750), p. 52.

1753.—"Our Hon'ble Masters having expressly directed ten tons of couries to be laden in each of their ships homeward bound, we ordered the Secretary to prepare a protest against Captain Cooke for refusing to take any on board the Admiral Vernon."—In Long, 41.

1762.—"The trade of the salt and butty wood in the Chuola of Sillett, has for a long time been granted to me, in consideration of which I pay a yearly rent of 40,000 cowries of cowries. . . ."—Native Letter to Nabob, in Van Sittard, i. 203.

1770.—". . . millions of millions of lires, pounds, rupees, and cowries."—H. Walpole's Letters, v. 421.

1780.—"We are informed that a Copper Coinage is now on the Carpet . . . it will be of the greatest utility to the Public, and will totally abolish the trade of Couries, which for a long time has formed so expensive a field for deception and fraud. A grievance (sic) the poor has long groaned under."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 29.

1786.—In a Calcutta Gazette the rates of payment at Pultah Ferry are stated in Rupees, Annas, Puns, and Gudus (i.e. of Couries, see above).—In Seton-Karr, i. 140.

1791.—"Notice is hereby given, that on or before the 1st November next, sealed proposals of Contract for the remittance in Dacea of the cowries received on account of the Revenues of Sylhet . . . will be received at the Office of the Secretary to the Board of Revenue . . . All persons who may deliver in proposals, are desired to specify the rates per cowan or cowans of cowries (see kahan above) at which they will engage to make the remittance proposed."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 53.

1803.—"I will continue to pay, without demur, to the said Government, as my annual pesdkosh or tribute, 12,000 kahans of cowries in a year, installments, as specified herein below."—Treaty Engagement by the Rajah of Kitta Keonghur, a Tributary subordinate to Cuttack, 16th December, 1803.

1833.—"May 1st. Notice was given in the Supreme Court that Messrs. Gould and Campbell would pay a dividend at the rate of nine gunadhaka, one cowrie, one cowry, and eighteen teed, in every sicca rupee, on and after the 1st of June. A curious dividend, not quite a farthing in the rupee!"—The Pilgrim (by Fanny Parkes), i. 273.

c. 1835.—"Strip him stark naked, and cast him upon a desert island, and he would manage to play heads and tails for cowries with the sea-gulls, if land-gulls were not to be found."—Zelda's Fortune, ch. iv.

1833.—"Johnnie found a lovely cowrie two inches long, like mottled tortoise-shell, walking on a rock, with its red fleshy body covering half its shell, like a jacket trimmed with chenille fringe."—Letter (of Miss North's) from Seychelles Island, in Polli Maff Gazette, Jan. 21, 1834.

COWRY, s. Used in S. India for the yoke to carry burdens, the Bangy (q.v.) of N. India. In Tamil, &c., kāyādi, [kāyū, 'to carry on the shoulder', tadi, 'pole']

COWTAILS, s. The name formerly in ordinary use for what we now more euphoniously call chowries (q.v.).

c. 1664.—"These Elephants have then also . . . certain Cow-tails of the great Tibet, white and very dear, hanging at their

* A Kāy would seem here to be equivalent to ¼ of a cowry. Wilson, with (?) as to its origin (perhaps P. kik, 'minute'), explains it as "a small division of money of account, less than a gunadh of Kauris." Tīt is properly the sesame seed, applied in Bengal, Wilson says, "in account to 5 of a kauri." The Table would probably thus run: 20 til = 1 kāy, 4 kāy = 1 kauri, and so forth. And 1 rupee = 409,600 til!
Ears like great Mustachios. . .—Bernier, E.T., 84; [ed. Constable, 261].

1665.—"Now that this King of the Great Tibet knows, that Auren'z-Zeh is at Kuchenire, and threatens him with War, he hath sent to him an Ambassador, with Presents of the Country, as Chryстал, and those dear White Cow-tails. . ."—Ibid. 185; [ed. Constable, 422].

1774.—"To send one or more pair of the cattle which bear what are called cowtails."—Warren Hastings, Instruction to Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, s.

"There are plenty of cowtailed cows (!), but the weather is too hot for them to go to Bengal."—Bogle, ibid. 52. 'Cow-tailed cows' seem analogous to the 'dismounted mounted infantry' of whom we have recently heard in the Saucki campaign.

1784.—In a 'List of Imports probable from Tibet,' we find 'Cow Tails.'—In Seton-Karr, i. 4.

"From the northern mountains are imported a number of articles of commerce. The principal . . . are musk, cowtails, honey. . ."—Chardin's Ayen Akbery (ed. 1800) ii. 17; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 172].

CRAN, s. Pers. krān. A modern Persian silver coin, worth about a franc, being the tenth part of a Toman.

1880.—"A couple of mules came clattering into the courtyard, driven by one muleteer. Each mule carried 2 heavy sacks . . . which jingled pleasantly as they were placed on the ground. The sacks were afterwards opened in my presence, and contained no less than 35,000 silver krans. The one muleteer without guard had brought them across the mountains, 170 miles or so, from Tehran."—MS. Letter from Col. Bateman-Champlain, R.E.

[1891.—"I on my arrival took my servants' accounts in tomans and kerans, afterwards in keruys and shabies, and at last in kerans and puls."—Wills, Land of the Lion, 63.]

CRANCHEE, s. Beng. H. karān-chī. This appears peculiar to Calcutta, [but the word is also used in N. India]. A kind of ricketty and sordid carriage resembling, as Bp. Heber says below, the skeleton of an old English hackney-coach of 1800-35 (which no doubt was the model), drawn by wretched ponies, harnessed with rope, and standing for native hire in various parts of the city.

1893.—" . . a considerable number of caranchies, or native carriages, each drawn by two horses, and looking like the skeletons of hackney coaches in our own country."—Heber, i. 28 (ed. 1844).

1834.—"As Lady Wroughton guided her horse through the crowd to the right, a kuranchy, or hackney-coach, suddenly passed her at full speed."—The Baboo, i. 228.

CRANGANORE, n.p. Properly (according to Dr. Gundert), Koduvilār, more generally Kodungalār, [the Madras Gloss. gives Mal. Kotamallār, kota, 'west,' kōrīl, 'palace,' īn, 'village']. An ancient city and port of Malabar, identical with the Māyūri-kkōṇu of an ancient copper-plate inscription,* with the Mokṣāk of Ptolemy's Tables and the Periplus, and with the Muziriā prīnum emporium Indiæ of Pliny (bk. vi. cap. 23 or 26) [see Logan, Malabar, i. 80]. "The traditions of Jews, Christians, Brahmans, and of the Kērāla Ulpatti (legendary History of Malabar) agree in making Kodungalār the residence of the Perumnāls (ancient sovereigns of Malabar), and the first resort of Western shipping." (Dr. Gundert in Madras Journal, vol. xiii. p. 120). It was apparently the earliest settlement of Jew and Christian immigrants. It is prominent in all the earlier narratives of the 16th century, especially in connection with the Malabar Christians; and it was the site of one of the seven churches alleged in the legends of the latter to have been founded by St. Thomas.† Cranganor was already in decay when the Portuguese arrived. They eventually established themselves there with a strong fort (1523), which the Dutch took from them in 1662. This fort was dismantled by Tippoo's troops in 1790, and there is now hardly a trace left of it. In Baldaeus (Malabar und Coromandel, p. 109, Germ. ed.) there are several good views of Cranganore as it stood in the 17th century. [See SHINKALI.]

C. 774. A.D.—"We have given as eternal possession to Irvin Corttan, the lord of the town, the brokerage and due customs . . . namely within the river-mouth of Codangalūr."—Copper Charter, see Madr. Journ. xiii. And for the date of the inscription, Burnett, in Ind. Antiq. iii. 315.

or Muziris with Cranganore, an identification afterwards verified by tradition ascertained on the spot by Dr. Burnell.

1498.—"Quorongoliz belongs to the Chris-tyrdom. . . ."—Mahabhat Khân (writing of events in 16th century), in Elliot, viii. 388.

CRANNY, s. In Bengal commonly used for a clerk writing English, and tence vulgarly applied generically to the East Indians, or half-caste class, from among whom English copyists are chiefly recruited. The original is Hind. karâní, kirâní, which Wilson derives from Skt. karun, 'a doer.'

Karanâ is also the name of one of the (so-called) mixt castes of the Hindus, sprung from a Sudra mother and Vaisya father, or (according to some) from a pure Kashtriya mother by a father of degraded Kashtriya origin. The occupation of the members of this mixt caste is that of writers and accountants; [see Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 424 seqq.]

The word was probably at one time applied by natives to the junior memers of the Covenanted Civil Service "Writers," as they were designated.
See the quotations from the "Seir Mutagheryn" and from Hugh Boyd.
And in our own remembrance the "Writers' Buildings" in Calcutta, where those young gentlemen were at one time quartered (a range of apartments which has now been transfigured into a splendid series of public offices, but, wisely, has been kept to its old name), was known to the natives as Karâni ki Bârik.

C. 1350.—"They have the custom that when a ship arrives from India or elsewhere, the slaves of the Sultan . . . carry with them complete suits . . . for the Robeen or skipper, and for the kirâni, who is the ship's clerk."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 198.

"The second day after our ar-ival at the port of Kailâkuri, the princess escorted the nakhoodâh (or skipper), the kirânî, or clerk. . . ."—Ibid. iv. 250.

C. 1590.—"The Karrâni is a writer who keeps the accounts of the ship, and serves out the water to the passengers."—Av (Blockmann), i. 280.

C. 1610.—"Le Secrétaire s'appelle carans
. . ."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 152; [Hak. Soc.
i. 214].

[1611.—"Doubt you not but it is too true, howsoever the Cranny flatters you with better hopes."—Danvers, Letters, i. 117, and see also f. 190.

[1884.—"Ye Noseda and Crannee."—
Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. George, iii. 111.]

C. 1781.—"The gentlemen likewise, other than the Military, who are in high offices and employments, have amongst themselves degrees of service and work, which have not come minutely to my knowledge; but the whole of them collectively are called Carrani."—Seir Mutagheryn, ii. 543.

1793.—"But, as Gay has it, example gains where precept fails. As an encouragement therefore to my brother crannies, I will offer an instance or two, which are remembered as good Company's jokes."—Hugh Boyd,
The Indian Observer, 42.

1810.—"The Cranny, or clerk, may be either a native Armenian, a native Portuguese, or a Bengallese."—Williamson, V. M.
i. 209.
1834.—"Nazir, see bail taken for 2000 rupees. The Crany will write your evidence, Captain Forrester."—The Baboo, i. 311

It is curious to find this word explained by an old French writer, in almost the modern application to East Indians. This shows that the word was used at Goa in something of its Hindu sense of one of mixt blood.

1633.—"Les karanes sont engendres d’un Mestis, et d’une Indienne, lesquels sont oliustres. Ce mot de Karanes vient a mon avis de Kara, qui signifie en Turqu la terre, ou bien la couleur noire, comme si l’on voulait dire par karanes les enfans du pays, ou bien les noirs; ils ont les mêmes avantages dans leur professions que les autres Mestis."—De la Boullaye-le-Gon, ed. 1657, p. 226. Compare in M. Polo, Bk. i., ch. 18, his statement about the Caranaos, and note thereon.

CRAPE, s. This is no Oriental word, though crape comes from China. It is the French crêpe, i.e. crespe, Lat. crispus, meaning frizzed or minutely curled. As the word is given in a 16th century quotation by Littré, it is probable that the name was first applied to a European texture. [Its use in English dates from 1633, according to the N.E.D.]

"I own perhaps I might desire
Some shawls of true Cashmere—
Some narrow crapes of China silk,
Like wrinkled skins, or scalded milk."

O. W. Holmes, 'Contentment.'

CREASE, CRIS, &c., s. A kind of dagger, which is the characteristic weapon of the Malay nations; from the Javanese name of the weapon, adopted in Malay, krîs, kirîs, or kres (see Favre, Dict. Javanais-Français, 137b, Crawford's Malay Dict. s.v., Jansen, Jawaansch-Nederl. Woordenboek, 202). The word has been generalised, and is often applied to analogous weapons of other nations, as 'an Arab crese,' &c. It seems probable that the H. word kirîch, applied to a straight sword, and now almost specifically to a sword of European make, is identical with the Malay word krîs. See the form of the latter word in Barboa, almost exactly kirîch. Perhaps Turkî kirîch is the original. [Platts gives Skt. kritt, 'a sort of knife or dagger."

If Reinaud is right in his translation of the Arab Relations of the 9th and 10th centuries, in correcting a reading, otherwise unintelligible, to krîs, we shall have a very early adoption of this word by Western travellers. It occurs, however, in a passage relating to Ceylon.

c. 910.—"Formerly it was common enough to see in this island a man of the country walk into the market grasping in his hand a kirî, i.e. a dagger peculiar to the country, of admirable make, and sharpened to the finest edge. The man would lay hands on the wealthiest of the merchants that he found, take him by the throat, brandish his dagger before his eyes, and finally drag him outside of the town."—Relation, &c., par Reinanu, p. 156; and see Arabic text, p. 120, near bottom.

It is curious to find the cris adopted by Alboquerque as a piece of state costume. When he received the ambassadors of Shâh Ismael, i.e. the Shah of Persia, Ismael Sûfi, at Ormuz, we read:

1515.—"For their reception there was prepared a daís of three steps ... which was covered with carpets, and the Governor seated thereon in a decorated chair, arrayed in a tunic and surcoat of black damask, with his collar, and his golden cris, as I described before, and with his big, long snow-white beard; and at the back of the daís the captains and gentlemen, handsomely attired, with their swords girt, and behind them their pages with lances and targets, and all uncovered."—Correa, ii. 423.

The portrait of Alboquerque in the 1st vol. of Mr. Birch's Translation of the Commentaries, realises the snow-white beard, tunic, and black surcoat, but the cris is missing. [The Malay Creese is referred to in iii. 86.]

1516.—"They are girt with belts, and carry daggers in their waists, wrought with rich inlaid work, these they call quercis."—Barbosa, 189.

1552.—"And the quartermaster ran up to the top, and thence beheld the son of Timuta raja to be standing over the Captain Major with a cris half drawn."—Castanheda, ii. 363.

1572.—"... assentada
Lá no gremio da Aurora, onde nasceste, Opulenta Malaca nomeada!
As settas venenosas que fízeste!
Os crises, com que já te vejo armada. ..."

Oamôes, x. 44.

By Burton:

"... so strong thy site
there on Aurora's bosom, whence they rise, thou Home of Opulence, Malaca hight! The poysened arrows which thine art supplies to the kries thirsting, as I see, for fight. ..."

1580.—A vocabulary of "Words of the naturall language of laun." in the voyage of Sir Fr. Drake, has Cricke, ‘a dagger.’—Hakl. iv. 248.

[1584.—“Crise.” See quotation under A MUCK.]

1586–88.—“The custom is that whenever the King (of Java) doth die ... the wives of the said King ... every one with a dagger in her hand (which dagger they call a creese, and is as sharp as a razor) stab themselves to the heart.”—Cavendish, in Hakl. iv. 337.

1591.—“Furthermore I enjoin and order in the name of our said Lord ... that no servant go armed whether it be with staves or daggers, or crisses.”—Procl. of Viceroy Mathias d’Alboquerque in Archiv. Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 325.

1598.—“In the Western part of the Island (Sumatra) is Mananabo where they make Poinyards, which in India are called Cryses, which are very well accounted and esteemed of.”—Linschoten, 33; [with some slight differences of reading, Hak. Soc. i. 110].

1602.—“... Chinesische Dolchen, so sie Cris nennen.”—Hulsius, i. 33.

C. 1610.—‘Ceux-la ont d’ordinaire à leur costé vn poignard ondé qui s’appele cris, et qui vient d’Achen en Sumatra, de Iaua, et de la Chine.’—Pyrard de Laval, i. 121; [Hak. Soc. i. 164]; also see ii. 101; [ii. 162, 170].

1634.—“Malayos crisses, Arabes alfanges.”—Malac Conquistada, ix. 32.

1686.—“The Cresset is a small thing like a Haggonet which they always wear in War or Peace, at Work or Play, from the greatest of them to the poorest or meanest person.”—Dampier, i. 337.

1690.—“And as the Japanners ... rip up their Bowels with a Cric. ...”—Ovington, 172.

1727.—“A Page of twelve Years of Age ... (said) that he should shew him the Way to die, and with that he took a Cress, and ran himself through the body.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 99; [ed. 1744, ii. 98].

1770.—“The people never go without a poniard which they call cris.”—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 97.

C. 1850–60.—“They (the English) chew hashish, cut themselves with poisoned creases ... taste every poison, buy every secret.”—Emerson, English Traits [ed. 1866, ii. 59].

The Portuguese also formed a word crisada, a blow with a (see Castanheda, iii. 379). And in English we find a verb to ‘crease’; see in Purchas, i. 532, and this:

1604.—“This Boyhog we tortured not, because of his confession, but cryossed him.”—Scott’s Discoverse of Java, in Purchas, i. 175.

[1704.—“At which our people ... were most of them creesed.”—Yale, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxxvii.]

Also in Bradem’s Abstract of the Sijara Malayu:

“... He was in consequence creased at the shop of a sweetmeat seller, his blood flowed on the ground, but his body dis- appeared miraculously.”—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 318.

CREDERE, DEL. An old mercantile term.

1813.—“Del creedere, or guaranteeing the responsibility of persons to whom goods were sold—commission 2 per cent.”—Milborn, i. 235.

CREOLE, s. This word is never used in the English by a Scotch Planter by a French Creole, of one of the West India Islands, is as swarthy and ill-looking a man as is to be seen on the Portuguese Walk on the Royal Exchange.”—Price’s Observations, &c. in Price’s Tracts, i. 9.

CROCODILE, s. This word is seldom used in India; alligator (q.v.) being the term almost invariably employed.

C. 1328.—“There be also coquadridles, which are vulgarly called calcatic [Lat. calcatic, ‘a cockatrice’]... These animals be like lizards, and have a tail stretched over all like unto a lizard’s,” &c.—Friar Jordanus, p. 19.

1590.—“One Crocodile was so huge and greedy that he devoured an Alibamba, that is a chained company of eight or nine slaves; but the indigestible iron paid him his wages, and murthered the murtherer.”—Andrew Battel (West Africa), in Purchas, ii. 985.

[1870.—“... I have been compelled to amputate the limbs of persons seized by crocodiles (Mugger). ... The Alligator (gavral) sometimes devours children. ...”—Cheever, Med. Jurispr. in India, 366 seq.].
CRORE, s. One hundred lakhs, i.e. 10,000,000. Thus a crore of rupees was for many years almost the exact equivalent of a million sterling. It had once been a good deal more, and has now been for some years a good deal less. The H. is korar, Skt. कोटि.

CRORE, c. 1315. — "Kales Dewar, the ruler of Ma'bar, enjoyed a highly prosperous life. . . . His coffers were replete with wealth, in so much as in the city of Mardit (Madura) there were 1200 crores of gold deposited, every crore being equal to a thousand laks, and every lak to one hundred thousand dinars." — Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 52. N.B.—The reading of the word crore is however doubtful here (see note by Elliot in loco). In any case the value of crore is misstated by Wassaf.

C. 1343.—"They told me that a certain Hassan fanned the revenue of the city and its territories (Danlatábad) for 17 korar . . . as for the karor it is equivalent to 100 lak, and the lak to 100,000 dinars." — Ibn Battuta, iv. 49.

C. 1350.—"In the course of three years he had misappropriated about a koror of tankas from the revenue." — Zá'd-ud-dín-Barní, in Elliot, iii. 247.

C. 1500.—"Zealous and upright men were put in charge of the revenues, each over one kor of dama." (These, it appears, were called króris.) — Aín-i-Abári, i. 13.

1609.—"The King's yeerely Income of his Crowne Land is fittie Crow of Rupees, every Crow is an hundred Lecks, and every Leck is an hundred thousand Rupees." — Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1628.—"The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Delhi amounts, according to the Royal registers, to six arbs and thirty korors of dama. One arb is equal to a hundred korors (a koror being ten millions) and one hundred korors of dama are equivalent to two korors and fifty lacs of rupees." — Muhammad Sharif Hanafi, in Elliot, vii. 138.

1690.—"The Nabob or Governor of Bengal was reputed to have left behind him at his Death, twenty Courous of Roupies: A korou is an hundred thousand lacs." — Ovington, 189.

1757.—"In consideration of the losses which the English Company have sustained . . . I will give them one crore of rupees." — Orme, ii. 162 (ed. 1803).

C. 1785.—"The revenues of the city of Decca, once the capital of Bengal, at a low estimation amount annually to two kherore." — Caraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 172.

C. 1797.—"An Englishman, for H. E.'s amusement, introduced the elegant European diversion of a race in sacks by old women: the Nabob was delighted beyond measure, and declared that though he had spent a crore of rupees . . . in procuring amusement, he had never found one so pleasing to him." — Teignmouth, Mem. i. 407.

1879.—"Tell me what lies beyond our brazen gates." Then one replied, 'The city first, fair Prince!' . . . * * * * * And next King Bimbhásra's realm, and then The vast flat world with crores on crores of folk.'" — Sir E. Arnold, The Light of Asia, iii.

[CROI, s. "The possessor or collector of a kror, or ten millions, of any given kind of money; it was especially applied as an official designation, under the Mohammedan government, to a collector of revenue to the extent of a kror of dãms, or 250,000 rupees, who was also at various times invested with the general superintendence of the lands in his district, and the charge of the police." (Wilson.)

CROTHEY, KURACHEE, properly Karáthí, the sea-port and chief town of the province of Sind, which is a creation of the British rule, no town appearing to have existed on the site before 1725. In As Suuytí's History of the Caliphs (E.T. p. 229) the capture of Kirakh or Kiraj is mentioned. Sir H. M. Elliot thinks that this place was probably situated in if not named from Kachh. Jarrett (Áín, ii. 344, note) supposes this to be Karáthí, which Elliot identified with the Krokala of Arrian. Here, according to Curtius, dwelt the Arabioi or Arabaiti. The harbour of Karáthí was possibly the Poras Alexandri, where Nearchus was detained by the monsoon for twenty-four days (see McCrindle, Ancient India, 167, 263).

[1839.—". . . spices of all kinds, which are carried from Bombay . . . to Karachi or other ports in Sind." — Elphinstone's Caubul, i. 384."

CROW-PHEASANT, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of a somewhat ignoble bird (Fam. Cuculidae), common all over the plains of India, in Burma, and the Islands, viz. Cen-CUBEB, s. The fruit of the Piper Cubeba, a climbing shrub of the Malay region. [Its Hind. name kabab chini marks its importation from the East by Chinese merchants.] The word and the articles were well known in Europe in the Middle Ages, the former being taken directly from the Arab, kababah. It was used as a spice like other peppers, though less common. The importation into Europe had become infinitesimal, when it revived in last century, owing to the medicinal power of the article having become known to our medical officers during the British occupation of Java (1811-15). Several particulars of interest will be found in Hanbury and Flückiger's Pharmacog. 526, and in the notes to Marco Polo, ii. 380.

c. 943.—"The territories of this Prince (the Maharaja of the Isles) produce all sorts of spices and aromatics. . . . The exports are camphor, lign-aloes, clove, sandal-wood, betel-nut, nutmeg, cardamom, cubeb (al-kababah). . . .":—Maşa‘id, 1. 341 seq.

And swete savoury meynete I wis,
Theo gilfore, quybine and mace."

1298.—"This Island (Java) is of surpassing wealth, producing black pepper, nutmegs, spikenard, galangale, cubebes, cloves. . . .

—Marco Polo, ii. 254.

c. 1328.—"There too (in Java) are produced cubebes, and nutmegs, and mace, and all the other finest spices except pepper."

—Friar Jordanus, 31.

c. 1340.—"The following are sold by the pound. Raw silk; saffron; clove-stalks and cloves; cubebes; lign-aloes. . . .":—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c., p. 305.

"Cubebes are of two kinds, i.e., domestic and wild, and both should be entire and light, and of good smell; and the domestic are known from the wild in this way, that the former are a little more brown than the wild; also the domestic are round, whilst the wild have the lower part a little flattened underneath like flattened buttons."

—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c.; in orig. 374 seq.

c. 1390.—"Take fresh pork, seethe it, chop it small, and grind it well; put to it hard yolks of eggs, well mixed together, with dried currants, powder of cinnamon, and maces, cubebes, and cloves whole."—Recipe in Wright's Domestic Manners, 350.

1563.—"R. Let us talk of cubebes; although, according to Sepulveda, we seldom use them alone, and only in compounds.

"O. 'Tis not so in India; on the contrary they are much used by the Moors soaked in wine . . . and in their native region, which is Java, they are habitually used for coldness of stomach; you may believe me they hold them for a very great medicine."—García, f. 80-80r.

1572.—"The Indian physicians use cubebes as cordials for the stomach. . . .":—Aosta, p. 138.

1612.—"Cubebes, the pound . . . xvi. s."

—Rates and Valuations (Scotland).

1874.—"In a list of drugs to be sold in the . . . city of Ulm, A.D. 1596, cubebes are mentioned . . . the price for half an ounce being 8 kreuzers."—Hanb. & Flück. 527.

CUBEER BURR, n.p. This was a famous banyan-tree on an island of the Nerbuuda, some 12 m. N.E. of Baroch, and a favourite resort of the English there in the 18th century. It is described by Forbes in his Or. Mem. i. 28; [2nd ed. i. 16, and in Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 137 seqq.] Forbes says that it was thus called by the Hindus in memory of a favourite saint (no doubt Kabir). Possibly, however, the name was merely the Ar. kabir, 'great,' given by some Mahomedan, and misinterpreted into an allusion to the sectarian leader.

[1623.—"On an other side of the city, but out of the circuit of the houses, in an open place, is seen a great and fair tree, of that kind which I saw in the sea coasts of Persia, near Ormuz, called there Lul, but here Ber."

—P."della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 35. Mr. Grey identifies this with the CUBEER BURR.]

1818.—"The popular tradition among the Hindus is that a man of great sanctity named Kubeer, having cleaned his teeth, as is practised in India, with a piece of stick, stuck it into the ground, that it took root, and became what it now is."—Copley, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 290.

CUCUYA, CUCUYADA, s. A cry of alarm or warning; Malayul. kikuyuji, 'to cry out'; not used by English, but found among Portuguese writers, who formed cucuyada from the native word, as they did Crisada from kris (see CREASE). See Correa, Lendas, ii. 2. 926. See also quotation from Tennent, under COSS, and compare Australian cocoey.

1525.—"On this immediately some of his Nairs who accompanied him, desired to smite the Portuguese who were going through the streets; but the Regedor would not permit it; and the Caimal approaching the King's palace, without entering to speak to the King, ordered those cries of theirs to be made which they call cucuyadas, and in a few minutes there gathered together more than 2000 Nairs with their arms. . . ."—Correa, ii. 926.

1543.—"At the house of the pagod there was a high enclosure-wall of stone, where the Governor collected all his people, and those of the country came troopine with bows and arrows and a few matchlocks, raising great cries and cucuyadas, such as they employ to call each other to war, just like canes when they are going to take wing."—Ibid, iv. 327.

CUDDALORE, n.p. A place on the marine backwater 16 m. S. of Pondicherry, famous in the early Anglo-Indian history of Coromandel. It was settled by the Company in 1682-3, and Fort St. David's was erected there soon after. Probably the correct name is Kadal-ur, 'Sea-Town.' [The Madras Gloss gives Tam. kādāl, 'junction,' ur, 'village,' because it stands on the confluence of the Kadilam and Paravanar Rivers.]

[1773.—"Fort St. David is . . . built on a rising ground, about a mile from the Black-Town, which is called Cuddalore."—Ives, p. 18.]

CUDDAPAH, n.p. Tel. kadapa, ['threshold,' said to take its name from the fact that it is situated at the opening of the pass which leads to the holy town of Tripatty (Gribble, Man. of Cuddapah, p. 3); others connect it with Skt. kṛpā, 'pity,' and the Skt. name is Kṛpanagāra]. A chief town and district of the Madras Presidency. It is always written Kurpah in Kirkpatrick's Translation of Tippoos Letters, [and see Wilks, Mysore, ed. 1869, i. 303]. It has been suggested as possible that it is the KAPITH (for KAPÎÎI) of Ptolemy's Tables. [Kurpah indigo is quoted on the London market.]

1768.—"The chiefs of Shanoor and Kirpa also followed the same path."—H. of Hydor Naik, 189.

CUDDOOO, s. A generic name for pumpkins, [but usually applied to the musk-melon, cucurbita moschata (Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 640)]. Hind. Kadūdū.

[1870.—"Pumpkin, Red and White—Hind. Kadūddō. This vegetable grows in great abundance in all parts of the Deccan."—Reidell, Ind. Dom. Econ. 568.]

CUDDY, s. The public or captain's cabin of an Indian or other passenger ship. We have not been able to trace the origin satisfactorily. It must, however, be the same with the Dutch and Germ. ka}"ute, which has the same signification. This is also the Scandinavian languages, Sw. in ka}"utja, Dan. kahøl, and Grimm quotes ka}"ute, "Casteria," from a vocabulary of Saxon words used in the first half of 15th century. It is perhaps originally the same with the Fr. cahute, 'a novel,' which Littré quotes from 12th century as quaîute. Ducange has L. Latin cahua, 'casa, tugurium,' but a little doubtfully. [Burton (Ar. Nights, xi. 169) gives P. kadah, 'a room,' and compares Cumra. The N.E.D. leaves the question doubtful.]

1726.—"Neither will they go into any ship's Caynutt so long as they see any one in the Skipper's cabin or on the half-deck."—Valentijn, Chorom. (and Pegu), 134.

1769.—"It was his (the Captain's) invariable practice on Sunday to let down a canvas curtain at one end of the cuddy . . . and to read the church service,—a duty which he considered a complete clearance of the sins of the preceding week."—Life of Lord Teignmouth, i. 12.

1843.—"The youngsters among the passengers, young Chaffers of the 15th, and poor little Kickets, coming home after his third fever, used to draw out Sedley at the cuddy-table, and make him tell prodigious stories about himself and his exploits against tigers and Napoleon."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 255.

CULGEE, s. A jewelled plume surmounting the sirpesh or aigrette upon the turban. Shakespeare gives kalghā as a Turki word. [Platte gives kalghā, kalghā, and refers to Skt. kalās, 'a spire.']

CULGEE, s. A type of hat worn on the cap or turban on great occasions. Also see Punjab Trade Report, App., p. ccxv., are of the heron's feathers.—Baber, 154.

1715.—"John Surman received a vest and Culgee set with precious stones."—Wheeler, ii. 246.
1759.—"To present to Omed Roy, viz.:
1 Cugah . . . . . . . . . . . . . 1200 0 0
1 Surpage (sirpešh, or aigrette) . 600 0 0
1 Killot (see Killut) . . . . . . . 250 0 0"

1786.—"Three Kulgies, three Surpasishes (sirseph) and three Prataks (f) [padék, H.
' a badge, a flat piece of gold, a neck ornament] of the value of 36,320 rupees have been despatched to you in a casket."— Tippero's Letters, 263.

[1892.—Of a Banjara ox—"Over the beast's forehead is a shaped frontlet of cotton cloth bordered with patterns in colour with pieces of mirror sewn in, and crowned by a kalgi or aigrette of peacock feather tips."—L. Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 147.

The word was also applied to a rich silk cloth imported from India.

[1714.—In a list of goods belonging to sub-governors of the South Sea C.—"A pair of culgee window curtains."—2 ser. Notes &
Q. VI. 244.]

CULMUREEA, KOORMUREEA.

s. Nautical H. kalmaríya, 'a calm,' taken direct from Port. calmaria (Roebuck).

CULSEY. s. According to the quotiation a weight of about a candy (q.v.). We have traced the word, which is rare, also in Prinsep's Tables (ed. Thomas, p. 115), as a measure in Bhúj, kalsí. And we find H. Drummond gives it: "Kulsee or Culsey (Guz.).
A weight of sixteen maunds" (the Guzerat maunds are about 40 lbs., therefore kalsí = about 640 lbs.). [The word is probably
Skt. kalaśi, 'a water jar,' and hence a grain measure.
The Madras Gloss, gives Can. kalaśi as a measure of capacity holding 14 Seers.]

1813.—"So plentiful are mangos... that during my residence in Guzerat they were sold in the public markets for one rupee the culsey; or 600 pounds in English weight."—Forbes, Orient. Mem. i. 30; [2d.
ed. i. 20].

CUMBLEY, CUMLY, CUMMUL.

s. A blanket; a coarse woolen cloth.
Skt. kambala, appearing in the vernaculars in slightly varying forms, e.g.
H. kami. Our first quotation shows a curious attempt to connect this word with the Arab. khammāl, 'a porter' (see HUMMAUL), and with the camel's hair of John Baptist's raiment. The word is introduced into Portuguese as cambolim, 'a cloak.'

1830.—"It is customary to make of these fibres wet-weather mantles for those rusties whom they call camallī, whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in palankins (le tęcis). A garment, such as I mean, of this camall cloth (and not camel cloth) I wore till I got to Florence.
No doubt the raiment of John the Baptist was of that kind. For, as regards camel's hair, it is, next to silk, the softest stuff in the world, and never could have been meant. . . ."—John Mariquand, in Catley, 366.

1606.—"We wear nothing more frequently than those cambolins."—Guevera,
f. 132.

[c. 1610.—"Of it they make also good store of cloaks and capes, called by the Indians Manxus, and by the Portuguese Ornus camboalis."—Ferard de Lavall,
Hak. Soc. ii. 240.]

1673.—"Leaving off to wonder at the natives quivering and quaking after Sunset wearing themselves in a combly or Hair-Cloth."—Fryer, 64.

1690.—"Camlees, which are a sort of Hair Coat made in Persia . . . ."—Ovington, 455.

1718.—"But as a body called the Cammul-pothes, or blanket wearers, were going to join Qandharan, their commander, they fell in with a body of troops of Mahatta horse, who forbade their going further."
—Sir Mutaguerin, i. 143.

1751.—"One comley as a covering . .
A fanam, 6 duha, 0 cash."—Prison. Expenses of Hon. J. Lindsay, Lives of Lindsays, iii.

1798.—". . . a large black Kummul, or blanket."—G. Farther, Travels, i. 194.

1800.—"One of the old gentlemen, ob-severing that I looked very hard at his cumly, was alarmed lest I should think he possessed numerous flocks of sheep."—Letter of Sir
T. Munro, in Life, i. 281.

1813.—Forbes has cameleens.—Or. Mem.
i. 195; [2d. ed. i. 108].

CUMMERBUND. s. A girdle.
H. from P. kamar-band, i.e. 'loin-band.'
Such an article of dress is habitually worn by domestic servants, peons, and irregular troops; but any waist-belt is so termed.

[1584.—"And tying on a cummerbund (cumamabanda) of yellow silk."—Corret, iii.
588. Cumarabandha in Dalboquerque, Comm.,
Hak. Soc. iv. 104.]

1552.—"The Governor arriving at Goa received there a present of a rich cloth of Persia which is called comarabados, being of gold and silk."—Cortanchois, iii. 386.

* Camallī (=fuchina) survives from the Arabic in some parts of Sicily.
CUMQUOT.

—Cocks's Diary, i. 147.

CUMSHAW, s. Chin. Pigeon-English for bucksheesh (q.v.), or a present of any kind. According to Giles it is the Amoy pron. (kam-sid) of two characters signifying ‘grateful thanks.’ Bp. Moule suggests kan-siu (or Cantonese) käm-sau, ‘thank-gift.’

1879.—"... they pressed upon us, blocking out the light, uttering discordant cries, and clamouring with one voice, Kum-sha, i.e. bucksheesh, looking more like demons than living men."—Miss Bird's Golden Chersones, 70.

1882.—"As the ship got under weigh, the Compradore's cumshas, according to 'olo custom,' were brought on board... dried lychee, Nankin dates... baskets of oranges, and preserved ginger."—The Fankwoe, 103.

CURIA MURIA, n.p. The name of a group of islands off the S.E. coast of Arabia (Kharyän Maryän, of Edrisi).

1597.—"Thus as they sailed, the ship got lost upon the shore of Fartaque in (the region of) Curia Muria; and having swum ashore they got along in company of the Moors by land to Calayata, and thence on to Ormuz."—Correa, iii. 562; see also i. 366.

c. 1555.—"Dopo Adem è Fartaque, e l'isole Curia, Muria..."—Sommario de' Regni, in Ramusio, f. 325.

1540.—"We letted not to discover the Isles of Curia, Muria, and Avedalcuria (in orig. Abedalcuria)."—Mendes Pinto, E.T. p. 4.

[1553.—See quotation under ROSALGAT.]

1554.—"... it is necessary to come forth between Síkara and the islands Khûr or Muria (Khôr Möriya)."—The Mohit, in Jour. As. Soc. Beng. v. 459.
Curnum, s. Tel. karṇānuma; a village accountant, a town-clerk. Acc. to Wilson from Skt. karana; (see Cranney). [It corresponds to the Tam. kanakan (see Conicopoly).]

1827.—"Very little care has been taken to preserve the survey accounts. Those of several villages are not to be found. Of the remainder only a small share is in the Collector's cutcherry, and the rest is in the hands of Curnums, written on cadjana."—Minutes by Sir T. Munro, in Arbuthnot, i. 285.

Currounda, s. H. karuvndā. A small plum-like fruit, which makes good jelly and tarts, and which the natives pickle. It is borne by Carissa carandas, L., a shrub common in many parts of India (N.O. Apocynaceae).

[1870.—Riddell gives a receipt for kur- under jelly, Ind. Dom. Econ. 338.]

Curirig Jema, adj. A corr. of H. khādri jama, "separated or detached from the rental of the State, as lands exempt from rent, or of which the revenue has been assigned to individuals or institutions" (Wilson).

[1887.—"... that whenever they have a mind to build Factory, satisfying for the land where it was Currig Jema, that is over measure, not entred in the King's books, or paying the usual and accustomed Rent, no Government should molest them."—Ynde, Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxiii.]

Currumshaw Hills, n.p. This name appears in Rennell's Bengal Atlas, applied to hills in the Gaya district. It is ingeniously supposed by F. Buchanan to have been a mistake of the geographer's, in taking Karna-Chaupār ('Karna's place of meeting or teaching'), the name of an ancient ruin on the hills in question, for Karnachau Pahār (Pahār = Hill).—(Eastern India, i. 4).

Curry, s. In the East the staple food consists of some cereal, either (as in N. India) in the form of flour baked into unleavened cakes, or boiled in the grain, as rice is. Such food having little taste, some small quantity of a much more savoury preparation is added as a relish, or 'kitchen,' to use the phrase of our forefathers. And this is in fact the proper office of curry in native diet. It consists of meat, fish, fruit, or vegetables, cooked with a quantity of bruised spices and turmeric [see Mussalla]; and a little of this gives a flavour to a large mess of rice. The word is Tam. kari, i.e. 'sauce'; [kari, v. 'to eat by biting']. The Canarese form karil was that adopted by the Portuguese, and is still in use at Goa. It is remarkable in how many countries a similar dish is habitual; pilão [see Pillau] is the analogous mess in Persia, and kuskuusu in Algeria; in Egypt a dish well known as ruzz mufalsal [Lane, Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 185], or "peppered rice." In England the proportions of rice and "kitchen" are usually reversed, so that the latter is made to constitute the bulk of the dish.

The oldest indication of the Indian cuisine in this kind, though not a very precise one, is cited by Athenaeus from Megasthenes: "Among the Indians, at a banquet, a table is set before each individual . . . and on the table is placed a golden dish on which they throw, first of all, boiled rice . . . and then they add many sorts of meat dressed after the Indian fashion" (Athen., by Yonge, iv. 39). The earliest precise mention of curry is in the Mahavansa (c. A.D. 477), where it is said of Kassapo that "he partook of rice dressed in butter, with its full accompaniment of curries." This is Turnour's translation, the original Pali being sāpa.

It is possible, however, that the kind of curry used by Europeans and Mahomedans is not of purely Indian origin, but has come down from the spiced cookery of medieval Europe and Western Asia. The medieval spiced dishes in question were even coloured like curry. Turmeric, indeed, called by Garcia de Orta, Indian saffron, was yet unknown in Europe, but it was represented by saffron and sandalwood. A notable incident occurs in the old English poem of King Richard, wherein the Lion-heart feasts on the head of a Saracen—

"soden full hastily
With powder and with spysory,
And with saffron of good colour."
Moreover, there is hardly room for doubt that capsicum or red pepper (see CHILLY) was introduced into India by the Portugese (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 407); and this spice constitutes the most important ingredient in modern curries. The Sanskrit books of cookery, which cannot be of any considerable antiquity, contain many recipes for curry without this ingredient. A recipe for curry (caril) is given, according to Bluteau, in the Portuguese Arte de Cozinha, p. 101. This must be of the 17th century.

It should be added that kari was, among the people of S. India, the name of only one form of 'kitchen' for rice, viz. of that in consistency resembling broth, as several of the earlier quotations indicate. Europeans have applied it to all the savoury concoctions of analogous spicy character eaten with rice. These may be divided into three classes—viz. (1), that just noticed; (2), that in the form of a stew of meat, fish or vegetables; (3), that called by Europeans 'dry curry.' These form the successive courses of a Hindu meal in S. India, and have in the vernaculars several discriminating names.

In Java the Dutch, in their employment of curry, keep much nearer to the original Hindu practice. At a breakfast, it is common to hand round with the rice a dish divided into many sectoral spaces, each of which contains a different kind of curry, more or less liquid.

According to the Fankvae at Canton (1882), the word is used at the Chinese ports (we presume in talking with Chinese servants) in the form käärle (p. 62).

1502.—"Then the Captain-major commanded them to cut off the hands and ears of all the crews, and put all that into one of the small vessels, into which he ordered them to put the friar, also without ears or nose or hands, which he ordered to be strung round his neck with a palm-leaf for the King; on which he told him to have a curry (caril) made to eat of what his friar brought him."—Correa, Three Voyages, Hak. Soc. 331. The "Friar" was a Brahman, in the dress of a friar, to whom the odious ruffian Vasco da Gama had given a safe-conduct.

1563.—"They made dishes of fowl and flesh, which they call caril."—Garcia, f. 68.

c. 1580.—"The victual of these (renegade soldiers) is like that of the barbarous people; that of Moors all bragüe (birgí, 'rice'); that of Gentoes rice-carril."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 9v.

1598.—"Most of their fish is eaten with rice, which they seeth in broth, which they put upon the rice, and is somewhat sour, as if it were sodden in gooseberries, or unripe grapes, but it tasteth well, and is called Carriel [v.l. Carril], which is their daily meat."—Linschoten, 88; [Hak. Soc. ii. 11]. This is a good description of the ordinary tamarind curry of S. India.

1606.—"Their ordinary food is boiled rice with many varieties of certain soups which they pour upon it, and which in those parts are commonly called carril."—Gouveia, 61v.

1608-1610.—"... me disoit qu'il y auoit plus de 40 ans, qu'il estoit escalea, et auoit gagné bon argent à celuy qui le possedoit; et toute fois qu'il ne luy donnoit pour tout viure qu'une mesure de riz cru par jour sans autre chose... et qu'on y faisait aussi... carri qu'il put aller avec le riz."—Morel, Voyages, 337.

1623.—"In S. India they give the name of carril to certain messes made with butter, with the kernel of the coco-nut (in place of which might be used in our part of the world milk of almonds)... with spices of every kind, among the rest cardamom and ginger... with vegetables, fruits, and a thousand other condiments of sorts;... and the Christians, who eat everything, put in also flesh or fish of every kind, and sometimes eggs... with all which things they make a kind of broth in the fashion of our guazzetti (or hotch-potch).... and this broth with all the said condiments in it they pour over a good quantity of rice boiled simply with water and salt, and the whole makes a most savoury and substantial mess."—P. della Valle, ii. 799; [Hak. Soc. ii. 328].

1681.—"Most sorts of these delicious Fruits they gather before they be ripe, and boil them to make Carrees, to use the Portuguese word, that is somewhat to eat with and relish their Rice."—Knoz, p. 12. This perhaps indicates that the English curry is formed from the Port. caris, plural of caril.

c. 1690.—"Currama in India tam ad cibum quam ad medicinam adhibetur, Indi enim... adoe ipsi adsueti sunt ut cum cunctis admiscet condimentis et piscibus, praesertim autem isti quod karri ipsi vocatur."—Rumphius, Pars Vta, p. 166.

c. 1759-60.—"The currees are infinitely various, being a sort of fricaces to eat with rice, made of any animals or vegetables."—Grose, i. 150.

1781.—"To-day have curry and rice for my dinner, and plenty of it as C—, my messmate, has got the grieves, and cannot eat his hearty."—Hon. J. Lindsay’s Imprisonment, in Lives of Lindsays, iii. 296.

1794-97.—"The Bengal squad he fed so wondrous nice, Baring his currie took, and Scott his rice."—

This shows that curry was not a domesticated dish in England at the date of publication. It also is a sample of what the wit was that ran through so many editions! c. 1890.—"J'ai substitué le lait à l'eau pour boisson... c'est une sorte de contre-poison pour l'essence de feu que forme la sauce enragée de mon sempiternel cari."—Jaqueymont, Correspondance, i. 196.

1848.—"Now we have seen how Mrs. Sedley had prepared a fine curry for her son."— Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

1860.—"... Vegetables, and especially farinaceous food, are especially to be commended. The latter is indeed rendered attractive by the unrivalled excellence of the Singhalese in the preparation of innumerable curries, each tempered by the delicate creamy juice expressed from the flesh of the coco-nut, after it has been reduced to a pulp."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 77. N.B. Tennent is misled (i. 437) that chillies are mentioned in the Mahavanso. The word is maricha, which simply means "pepper," and which Turnour has translated erroneously (p. 158).

1874.—"The craving of the day is for quasi-intellectual food, not less highly peppered than the curries which gratify the faded stomach of a returned Nabob."— Blackwood's Magazine, Oct. 434.

The Dutch use the word as Kerrie or Karrie; and Kari à l'Indienne has a place in French cartes.

CURRY-STUFF, s. Onions, chillies, &c.; the usual material for preparing curry, otherwise mussalla (q.v.), represented in England by the preparations called curry-powder and curry-paste.

1860.—"... with plots of esculents and curry-stuffs of every variety, onions, chillies, yams, cassavas, and sweet potatoes."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 468.

CUSBAH, s. Ar.—H. kuša, kašaba; the chief place of a pergunnah (q.v.).

1548.—"And the çaçabe of Tanai is rented at 4450 pardas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 150.

[c. 1590.—"In the fortieth year of his Majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of one hundred and five Sirçars, sub-divided into two thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven kusbals."—Ayên, tr. Glavius, ii. 1; Jarrett, ii. 115.]

1844.—"On the land side are the houses of the Wazodor (!) or Possessor of the Casabe, which is as much as to say the town—or aldea of Mombaym (Bombay). This town of Mombaym is a small and scattered affair."— Bocarro, MS. fol. 227.

c. 1844-45.—"In the centre of the large Cusbah of Steevygoontum exists an old mud fort, or rather wall of about 20 feet high, surrounding some 120 houses of a body of people calling themselves Kotir Velladas,—that is 'Fort Vellulas.' Within this wall no police officer, warrant or Peon ever enters... The females are said to be kept in a state of great degradation and ignorance. They never pass without the walls alive; when dead they are carried out by night in sacks."—Report by Mr. E. B. Thomas, Collector of Tinnevelly, quoted in Lord Stanhope's Miscellaneous, 2nd Series, 1872, p. 132.

CUSCUSS, CUSS, s. Pers.—H. khaskhas. The roots of a grass [called in N. India santá or tín,] which abounds in the drier parts of India, Anathemerum muricatum (Beauv.), Andropogon muricatus (Retz.), used in India during the hot dry winds to make screens, which are kept constantly wet, in the window openings, and the fragrant evaporation from which greatly cools the house (see TATTY). This device seems to be ascribed by Abul Fażl to the invention of Akbar. These roots are well known in France by the name vetiver, which is the Tam. name vetivarv, 'the root which is dug up.' In some of the N. Indian vernaculars khaskha is 'a poppy-head'; [but this is a different word, Skt. khashasa, and compare P. kashkhashi].

c. 1590.—"But they (the Hindus) were notorious for the want of cold water, the intolerable heat of their climate... His Majesty remedied all these evils and defects. He taught them how to cool water by the help of salt-petre... He ordered mats to be woven of a cold odoriferous root called Khuss... and when wetted with water on the outside, those within enjoy a pleasant cool air in the height of summer."— Ayên (Glavius, 1800), ii. 196; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 9].

1663.—"Kas _kanaya._" See quotation under TATTY.

1810.—"The Kuss-Kuss... when fresh, is rather fragrant, though the scent is somewhat tartaceus."— Williamson, V. M. i. 295.

1824.—"We have tried to keep our rooms cool with 'tatties,' which are mats formed of the Kuskos, a peculiar sweet-scented grass..."— Heber, ed. 1844, i. 59.

It is curious that the coarse grass which covers the more naked parts of the Islands of the Indian Archipelago appears to be called kusu-kusu (Wallace, 2nd ed. ii. 74). But we know not if there is any community of origin in these names.
CUSTARD-APPLE.

[1832.—“The sirrrakee (airki) and santurh (sen’ha) are two specimens of one genus of jungle grass, the roots of which are called secundah (airkandah) or khuss-khuss.”—Mrs. Meer Haasan Ali, Observations, &c., ii. 208.]

In the sense of poppy-seed or poppy-head, this word is P.; De Orta says Ar.; [see above.]

1563.—“... at Cambaiete, seeing in the market that they were selling poppy-heads big enough to fill a canada, and also some no bigger than ours, and asking the name, I was told that it was cacazex (cashcash)—and that in fact is the name in Arabic—and they told me that of these poppies was made opium (amjūdo), cuts being made in the poppy-head, so that the opium exudes.”
—Garcia De Orta, f. 155.

1621.—“The 24th of April public proclamation was made in Isphahan by the King’s order... that on pain of death, no one should drink covner, which is a liquor made from the husk of the capsule of opium, called by them khash-khash.”—P. della Valle, ii. 299; [covner is P. koknār.]

CUSPADORE, s. An old term for a spittoon. Port. cuspadéira, from cuspir, [Lat. conspurre], to spit. Cuspidor would be properly qui mulium spirit.

[1554.—Speaking of the greatness of the Sultan of Benaulim, he says to illustrate it—“From the camphor which goes with his spittle when he spits into his gold spittoon (cospidor) his chamberlain has an income of 2000 cruzados.”—Custanheda, Bk. iv. ch. 83.]

1672.—“Here maintain themselves three of the most powerful lords and Naiks of this kingdom, who are subject to the Crown of Velour, and pay it tribute of many hundred Pagodas... viz. Vitipa-naik of Madura, the King’s Cuspidor-bearer, 200 Pagodas, Cristipa-naik of Chengier, the King’s Betel-server, 300 pagodas, the Naik of Tanjower, the King’s Warder and Umbrella-carer, the King’s Pagodas...”—Baldaews, Germ. ed. 158.

1735.—In a list of silver plate we have “5 cuspadores.”—Wheeler, iii. 139.

1775.—“Before each person was placed a large brass salver, a black earthen pot of water, and a brass cuspadore.”—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, &c. (at Magindanau), 235.

[1900.—“The royal cuspadore” is mentioned among the regalia at Selangor, and a “cuspadore” (ketor) is part of the marriage appliances.—Skeat, Malay Magic, 26, 374.]

CUSTARD-APPLE, s. The name in India of a fruit (Anona squamosa, L.), originally introduced from S. America, but which spread over India during the 16th century. Its commonest name in Hindustan is sharifa, i.e. ‘noble’; but it is also called Sitap’hal, i.e. ‘the Fruit of Sitā,’ whilst another Anona (‘bullock’s heart,’ A. reticulata, L.), the custard-apple of the W. Indies, where both names are applied to it) is called in the south by the name of her husband Rāma. And the Sitap’hal and Rām’hal have become the subject of Hindu legends (see Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 410). The fruit is called in Chinese Fan-li-chī, i.e. foreign leechee.

A curious controversy has arisen from time to time as to whether this fruit and its congeners were really imported from the New World, or were indigenous in India. They are not mentioned among Indian fruits by Baber (c. A.D. 1530), but the translation of the Ain (c. 1590) by Prof. Blochmann contains among the “Sweet Fruits of Hindustan,” Custard-apple (p. 66). On referring to the original, however, the word is sadāphal (fructus perenvis), a Hind. term for which Shakespear gives many applications, not one of them the anona. The bel is one (Aegle marmelos), and seems as probable as any (see BAEI). The custard-apple is not mentioned by Garcia de Orta (1563), Linschoten (1597), or even by P. della Valle (1624). It is not in Bontius (1631), nor in Piso’s commentary on Bontius (1658), but is described as an American product in the West Indian part of Piso’s book, under the Brazilian name Aratica. Two species are described as common by P. Vincenzo Maria, whose book was published in 1672. Both the custard-apple and the sweet-sop are fruits now generally diffused in India; but of their having been imported from the New World, the name Anona, which we find in Oviedo to have been the native West Indian name of one of the species, and which in various corrupted shapes is applied to them under different parts of the East, is an indication. Crawford, it is true, in his Malay Dictionary explains nona or buah- (“fruit”) nona in its application to the custard-apple as fructus virginalis, from nona, the term applied in the Malay countries (like missy in India) to an unmarried European lady. But in the face of the American word this becomes out of the question.

It is, however, a fact that among the Bharut sculptures, among the carvings dug up at Muttra by General Cunningham, and among the copies. from wall-paintings at Ajanta (as pointed out by Sir G. Birdwood in 1874, see Athenaeum, 26th October), [Bombay Gazetteer, xii. 490]) there is a fruit represented which is certainly very like a custard-apple (though an abnormally big one), and not very like anything else yet pointed out. General Cunningham is convinced that it is a custard-apple, and urges in corroboration of his view that the Portuguese in introducing the fruit (which he does not deny) were merely bringing coals to Newcastle; that he has found extensive tracts in various parts of India covered with the wild custard-apple; and also that this fruit bears an indigenous Hindi name, ātā or āt, from the Sanskrit ātripya.

It seems hard to pronounce about this ātripya. A very high authority, Prof. Max Müller, to whom we once referred, doubted whether the word (meaning 'delightful') ever existed in real Sanskrit. It was probably an artificial name given to the fruit, and he compared it aptly to the fictitious Latin of aurum malum for "orange," though the latter word really comes from the Sanskrit nāranga. On the other hand, ātripya is quoted by Raja Rádhakant Deb, in his Sanskrit dictionary, from a medieval work, the Dravyaguna. And the question would have to be considered how far the MSS. of such a work are likely to have been subject to modern interpolation. Sanskrit names have certainly been invented for many objects which were unknown till recent centuries. Thus, for example, Williams gives more than one word for cactus, or prickly pear, a class of plants which was certainly introduced from America (see Vidara and Viśvasaraka, in his Skt. Dictionary).

A new difficulty, moreover, arises as to the indigenous claims of ātā, which is the name for the fruit in Malabar as well as in Upper India. For, on turning for light to the splendid works of the Dutch ancients, Rheede and Rumphius, we find in the former (Hortus Malabaricus, part iv.) a reference to a certain author, 'Reechus de Plantis Mexicanis', as giving a drawing of a custard-apple tree, the name of which in Mexico was ahat or át, "fructu apud Mexicanos praeellentii arbor nobilis" (the expressions are noteworthy, for the popular Hindustani name of the fruit is sharifa = "nobilis"). We also find in a Manilla Vocabulary that ate or atte is the name of this fruit in the Philippines. And from Rheede we learn that in Malabar the ātā was sometimes called by a native name meaning "the Manilla jack-fruit"; whilst the Anona reticulata, or sweet-sop, was called by the Malabars "the Parangi (i.e. Firingi or Portuguese) jack-fruit."

These facts seem to indicate that probably the ātā and its name came to India from Mexico viā the Philippines, whilst the anona and its name came to India from Hispaniola viā the Cape. In the face of these probabilities the argument of General Cunningham from the existence of the tree in a wild state loses force. The fact is undoubted and may be corroborated by the following passage from "Observations on the nature of the Food of the Inhabitants of South India, 1864, p. 12:—"I have seen it stated in a botanical work that this plant (Anona sq.) is not indigenous, but introduced from America, or the W. Indies. If so, it has taken most kindly to the soil of the Deccan, for the jungles are full of it": [also see Watt, Écon. Dict. ii. 259 seq., who supports the foreign origin of the plant]. The author adds that the wild custard-apples saved the lives of many during famine in the Hyderabad country. But on the other hand, the Argemone Mexicana, a plant of unquestioned American origin, is now one of the most familiar weeds all over India. The cashew (Anacardium occidentale), also of American origin, and carrying its American name with it to India, not only forms tracts of jungle now (as Sir G. Birdwood has stated) in Canara and the Konkan (and, as we may add from personal knowledge, in Tanjore), but was described by P. Vincenzo Maria, more than two hundred and twenty years ago, as then abounding in the wilder tracts of the western coast.

The question raised by General Cunningham is an old one, for it is alluded to by Rumphius, who ends by leaving it in doubt. We cannot say that we have seen any satisfactory suggestion of another (Indian) plant as that represented in the ancient sculpture of Bharhut. [Dr. Watt says: "They may prove to be conventional representations of the jack-fruit tree or some other allied plant; they are not unlike the flower-heads of the sacred \textit{kadamba} or \textit{An tho cephalus}, (loc. cit. i. 260). But it is well to get rid of fallacious arguments on either side.

In the \textit{Materia Medica of the Hindus} by Udo Chand Dutt, with a Glossary by G. King, M.B., Calc. 1877, we find the following synonymy given:

\begin{quote}
\textit{Anona reticulata}: Skt. \textit{Lavali}; Beng. \textit{Loudi}.\end{quote}

1672.—"The plant of the \textit{Atta} in 4 or 5 years comes to its greatest size . . . the fruit . . . under the rind is divided into so many wedges, corresponding to the external compartments. . . The pulp is very white, tender, delicate, and so delicious that it unites to agreeable sweetness a most delightful fragrance like rose-water . . . and if presented to one unacquainted with it he would certainly take it for a blamange . . . The \textit{Anona}," &c., &c.—P. Vincenzo Maria, pp. 346-7.

1690.—"They (Hindus) feed likewise upon Pine-Apples, \textit{Custard-apples}, so called because they resemble a Custard in Colour and Taste. . ."—Orington, 303.

c. 1830.—". . . the \textit{custard-apple}, like russet bags of cold puddling."—Tom Cringle's \textit{Log}, ed. 1863, p. 140.

1875.—"The gushing \textit{custard-apple} with its crust of stones and luscious pulp."—Ph. Robinson, \textit{In my Indian Garden}, [49].

\textbf{CUSTOM}, s. Used in Madras as the equivalent of \textit{Dustoor, Dustoo ry}, of which it is a translation. Both words illustrate the origin of \textit{Customs} in the solemn revenue sense.

1683.—"Threder and Barker positively denied ye overweight, ye Merchants proved it by their books; but ye skynye out of every draught was confess, and claimed as their due, having been always the \textit{custom}.

—\textit{Hedges, Diary}, Hak. Soc. i. 83.

1788-71.—"Banyans, who . . . serve in this capacity without any fixed pay, but they know how much more they may charge upon every rupee, than they have in reality paid, and this is called \textit{costumado}."—\textit{Stanourius}, E.T., i. 522.

\textbf{CUSTOMER}, s. Used in old books of Indian trade for the native official who exacted duties. [The word was in common use in England from 1448 to 1748; see \textit{N.E.D}.]

\begin{quote}
[1609.—"His houses . . . are seized on by the \textit{Customer}."—\textit{Dawers, Letters}, i. 25; and comp. Foster, \textit{ibid.} ii. 225.]

[1615.—"The \textit{Customer} should come and visit them."—\textit{Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc.} i. 44.]

1682.—"The several affronts, insolences, and abuses dayly put upon us by Bluechound, our chief \textit{Customer}.—\textit{Hedges, Diary}, [Hak. Soc. i. 33].

\textbf{CUTC H}, s. See \textit{CATE CHU}.

\textbf{CUTCH}, n.p. Properly \textit{Kachchh}, a native State in the West of India, immediately adjoining Sind, the Rajput ruler of which is called the \textit{Rao}. The name does not occur, as far as we have found, in any of the earlier Portuguese writers, nor in Linschoten, [but the latter mentions the gulf under the name of \textit{Jaqueta} (Hak. Soc. i. 56 seq.)]. The Skt. word \textit{kachchha} seems to mean a morass or low, flat land.

c. 1030.—"At this place (Mansura) the river (Indus) divides into two streams, one empties itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Ladharni, and the other branches off to the east to the borders of \textit{Kach}."—Al-Biruni, \textit{i.} Hak. Soc. i. 49.

Again, \textit{Kach}, the country producing \textit{gum} (\textit{i.e.} mukal or \textit{beedullam}), p. 96.

The port mentioned in the next three extracts was probably \textit{Mandavi} (this name is said to signify \textit{Custom-House}); [\textit{ma\textacute{u}d\textacute{w}i}, a temporary hut, is a term commonly applied to a bazaar in N. India].

[1612.—"The other ship which proved of \textit{Cuts-nagana}."—\textit{Dawers, Letters}, i. 178.]

1615.—"Francisco Sodre . . . who was serving as captain-major of the fortress of Dio, went to \textit{Cach}, with twelve ships and a \textit{sangucel}, to inflict chastisement for the arrogance and insolence of these blacks (". . . pela soberbia e desaforos d'estes negros . . ."; "Of these niggers!"), thinking that he might do it as easily as Gaspar de Mello had punished those of Por."—Bocarro, 257.

[c. 1661.—"Daur . . . traversing with speed the territories of the Raja \textit{Katche} soon reached the province of Guzarate . . ."—Berrier, ed. \textit{Constable}, 73.]

1727.—"The first town on the south side of the Indus is \textit{Cutch-naggen}."—\textit{A. Hamilton}, i. 131; [ed. 1744].

* Sir Joseph Hooker observes that the use of the terms \textit{Custard-apple}, Bullock's heart, and \textit{Sweet-sop} has been so indiscriminate or uncertain that it is hardly possible to use them with unquestionable accuracy.
CUTCH GUNDAVA, n.p. Kachchh Gandava or Kachchh, a province of Biluchistán, under the Khan of Kelát', adjoining our province of Sind; a level plain, subject to inordinate heat in summer, and to the visitation of the simâm. Across the northern part of this plain runs the railway from Sukkur to Sibi. Gandâva, the chief place, has been shown by Sir H. Elliot to be the Kandhâbel or Gandhâbel of the Arab geographers of the 9th and 10th centuries. The name in its modern shape, or what seems intended for the same, occurs in the Persian version of the Chachâm-nâmah, or H. of the Conquest of Sind, made in A.D. 1216 (see Elliot, i. 166).

CUTCHA, KUTCHA, adj. Hind. kachchâ, ‘raw, crude, unripe, uncooked.’ This word is with its opposite pûcka (see PUCKA) among the most constantly recurring Anglo-Indian colloquial terms, owing to the great variety of metaphorical applications of which both are susceptible. The following are a few examples only, but they will indicate the manner of use better than any attempt at comprehensive definition:

A cutcha Brick is a sun-dried brick.
" House is built of mud, or of sun-dried brick.
" Road is earthwork only.
" Appointment is acting or temporary.
" Settlement is one where the land is held without lease.
" Account or Estimate, is one which is rough, superficial, and untrustworthy.
" Maund, or Seer, is the smaller, where two weights are in use, as often happens.
" Major is a brevet or local Major.
" Colour is one that won't wash.
" Pêer is a simple auge or a light attack.
" Pice generally means one of those amorphous coppers, current in up-country bazars at varying rates of value.
" Coss—see analogy under Maund above.
" Roof. A roof of mud laid on beams; or of thatch, &c.
" Scoumdrel, a limp and fatuous knave.
" Seam (silâd) is the tailor's task for trying on.

1763.—"Il paraît que les catcha cosses sont plus en usage que les autres cosses dans le gouvernement du Decan."—Lettres Edithantes, xv. 190.

1863.—"In short, in America, where they cannot get a pucka railway they take a cutcha one instead. This, I think, is what we must do in India."—Lord Elgin, in Letters and Journals, 432.

Captain Burton, in a letter dated Aug. 26, 1879, and printed in the "Academy" (p. 177), explains the gypsy word gorjio, for a Gentile or non-Rommany, as being kachhâ or cutcha. This may be, but it does not carry conviction.

CUTCHEEEY, and in Madras CUTCHERY, s. An office of administration, a court-house. Hind. kachhâri; used also in Ceylon. The word is not usually now, in Bengal, applied to a merchant's counting-house, which is called dufter, but it is applied to the office of an Indigo-Planter or a Zemindar, the business in which is more like that of a Magistrate's or Collector's Office. In the service of Tipoo Sahib cutcherry was used in peculiar senses besides the ordinary one. In the civil administration it seems to have been used for something like what we should now call Department (see e.g. Tipoo's Letters, 292); and in the army for a division or large brigade (e.g. ibid. 332; and see under JYSHE and quotation from Wilks below).

1610.—"Over against this seat is the Cichery or Court of Rolls, where the King's Visor sits every morning some three hours, by whose hands passe all matters of Rents, Grants, Lands, Firmans, Debts, &c."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 439.

1673.—"At the lower End the Royal Exchange or Queshery . . . opens its folding doors."—Fryer, 281.

[1792.—"But not making an early escape themselves were carried into the Cutcherry or publick Gaol."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cvi.]

1763.—"The Secretary acquaints the Board that agreeably to their orders of the 9th May, he last Saturday attended the Court of Cutcherry; and acquainted the Members with the charge the President of the Court had laid against them for non-attendance."—In Long, 316.

"The protection of our Komastahs and servants from the oppression and jurisdiction of the Zemindars and their cutcherries has been ever found to be a liberty highly essential both to the honour and interest of our nation."—From the Chief and Council at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 247.

c. 1765.—"We can truly aver that during almost five years that we presided in the Cutcherry Court of Calcutta, never any murder or atrocious crime came before us but it was proved in the end a Bream was at the bottom of it."—Holwell, Interesting Historical Events, Pt. II. 152.

1783.—"The moment they find it true that the English Government shall remain as it is, they will divide sugar and sweetmeats among all the people in the Cutcheree; then every body will speak sweet words."—Native Letter, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 227.

1786.—"You must not suffer any one to come to your house; and whatever business you may have to do, let it be transacted in our Kuchurry."—Tipoo's Letters, 303.

1791.—"At Seringapatam General Matthews was in confinement. James Skurry was sent for one day to the Kutcherry there, and some pewter plates with marks on them were shown to him to explain; he saw on them words to this purport, 'I am indebted to the Malabar Christians on account of the Public Service 40,000 Rs.; the Company owes me (about) 30,000 Rs.; I have taken Poison and am now within a short time of Death; whoever communicates this to the Bombay Govt. or to my wife will be amply rewarded." (Signed) Richard Matthews."—Narrative of Mr. William Drake, and other Prisoners (in Mysore), in Madras Courier, 17th Nov.

c. 1796.—". . . the other Asaf Mirán Hassein, was a low fellow and a debauchee, . . . who in different . . . towns was carried in his palki on the shoulders of dancing girls as ugly as demons to his Kutcherry or hall of audience."—H. of Tipã Sultan, E.T. by Miles, 246.

". . . the favour of the Sultan towards that worthy man (Dundia Wagh) still continued to increase . . . but although, after a time, a Kutchery, or brigade, was named after him, and orders were issued for his release, it was to no purpose."—Ibid. 248.

[c. 1810.—"Four appears to have been the fortunate number (with Tipoo; four companies (sic), one battalion (top), four keep one cuzzoon (see KOSHOON): . . . four cuzzoons, one Cutcherry. The establishment . . . of a cutcherry . . . 5,688, but these numbers fluctuated with the Sultan's caprices, and at one time a cuzzoon, with its cavalry attached, was a legion of about 3,000."—Wilks, Mysore, ed. 1859, ii. 132.]

1834.—"I mean, my dear Lady Wroughton, that the man to whom Sir Charles is most heavily indebted, is an officer of his own Kucheree, the very sircar who cringes to you every morning for orders."—The Buboo, ii. 126.

1860.—"I was told that many years ago, what remained of the Dutch records were removed from the record-room of the Colonial Office to the Cutcherry of the Government Agent."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. xxviii.

1873.—"I'd rather be out here in a tent any time . . . than be stewing all day in a stuffy Cutcherry listening to Ram Buksh and Co. perjuring themselves till they are nearly white in the face."—The True Reformer, i. 4.

1883.—"Surrounded by what seemed to me a mob of natives, with two or three dogs at his feet, talking, writing, dictating,—in short doing Cutcherry."—C. Radlee, in Bosworth Smith's Lord Lawrence, i. 59.

CUTCHNAR. s. Hind. kachnar, Skt. kanchandra (kanchana, 'gold') the beautiful flowering tree Bauhinia variegata, L., and some other species of the same genus (N. O. Leguminosae).

1855.—"Very good fireworks were exhibited . . . among the best was a sort of maypole hung round with minor fireworks which went off in a blaze and roll of smoke, leaving suspended a tree hung with quivering flowers of purple flame, evidently intended to represent the Kachnar of the Burmese forests."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 95.
CUTTACK, n.p. The chief city of Orissa, and district immediately attached. From Skt. kataka, ‘an army, a camp, a royal city.’ This name Al-kataka is applied by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century to Deogir in the Deccan (iv. 46), or at least to a part of the town adjoining that ancient fortress.

c. 1567.—“Citta di Catheca.”—Cesare Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 392. [Catecha, in Hakl. ii. 358.]

[c. 1590.—“Attock on the Indus is called Atak Benares in contra distinction to Katak Benares in Orissa at the opposite extremity of the Empire.”—Ain, ed. Jarrett, s. 311.]

1633.—“The 30 of April we set forward in the Morning for the City of Coteka (it is a city of seven miles in compass, and it standeth a mile from Mal candy where the Court is kept.”—Brunton, in Hakl. v. 49.

1726.—“Cattek.”—Valentijn, v. 158.

CUTTANEE, s. Some kind of piece-goods, apparently either of silk or mixed silk and cotton. Kuttan, Pers., is flax or linen cloth. This is perhaps the word. [Kattan is now used in India for the waste selvage in silk weaving, which is sold to Patwas, and used for stringing ornaments, such as joshans (armlets of gold or silver beads) bazabands (armlets with folding bands), &c. (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 66.)] Cutanees appear in Milburn’s list of Calculuta piece-goods.

[1598.—“Cotonias, which are like canvas.”—Linschoten, Hak, Soc. i. 60.]

[1648. — “Contenija.” See under AL-CATIF.]

[1673.—“Cutane breeches.” See under ATLAS.]

[1690.—“... rich Silks, such as Atlases, Cutanees...” —See under ALLEJA.]

[1734.—“They manufacture ... in cotton and silk called Cutanees.”—A. Hamilton, i. 126; ed. 1744.]

CUTTRYY. See KHUTTRY.

CYRUS, SYRAS, SARUS, &c. A common corruption of Hind. saras, [Skt. sarasa, the ‘lake bird,’] or (corruptly) sathans, the name of the great gray crane, Grus Antigone, L., generally found in pairs, held almost sacred in some parts of India, and whose “fine trumpet-like call, uttered when alarmed or on the wing, can be heard a couple of miles off” (Jerdon). [The British soldier calls the bird a “Serious,” and is fond of shooting him for the pot.]

1672. — “... peculiarly Brand-geese, Colum [see COOLUNG], and Sarass, a species of the former.”—Friar, 117.

1807.—“The argeelak as well as the cyrus, and all the aquatic tribe are extremely fond of snakes, which they ... swallow down their long throats with great despatch.”—Williamson, Or. Field Sports, 27.

[1809.—“Saras.” See under COOLUNG.]

1813.—In Forbes’s Or. Men. (ii. 277 seqq.; [2nd ed. i. 502 seqq.]), there is a curious story of a Cyrrus or Sahras (as he writes it) which Forbes had tamed in India, and which nine years afterwards recognised its master when he visited General Conway’s menagerie at Park Place near Henley.

1840.—“Bands of gobbling pelicans” (see this word, probably ADJUTANTS are meant) “and groups of tall cyruses in their half-Quaker, half-lancer plumage, consulted and conferred together, in seeming perplexity as to the nature of our intentions.”—Mrs. Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier’s Life, i. 108.

DABUL, n.p. Dabhol. In the later Middle Ages a famous port of the Konkan, often coupled with Choul (q.v.), carrying on extensive trade with the West of Asia. It lies in the modern dist. of Ratnagiri, in lat. 17° 34’, on the north bank of the Anjanel or Vashishti R. In some maps (e.g. A. Arrowsmith’s of 1816, long the standard map of India), and in W. Hamilton’s Gazetteer, it is confounded with Dapoli, 12 m. north, and not a seaport.

c. 1475.—“Dabyl is also a very extensive seaport, where many horses are brought from Mysore,* Rabast [Arabistan? i.e. Arabia], Khorassan, Turkistan, Noghestan.”—Nikitin, p. 20. “It is a very large town, the great meeting-place for all nations living along the coast of India and of Ethiopia.”—Ibid. 30.

1502.—“The gale abated, and the caravels reached land at Dabul, where they rigged their latten sails, and mounted their artillery.”—Correa, Three Voyages of V. da Gama, Hak. Soc. 308.

1510.—“Having seen Cevel and its customs, I went to another city, distant from it two days journey, which is called Dabul. ... There are Moorish merchants here in very great numbers.”—Varthema, 114.

* Mysore is nonsense. As suggested by Sir J. Campbell in the Bombay Gazetteer, Mys (Egypt) is probably the word.
1516.—"This Dabul has a very good harbour, where there always congregate many Moorish ships from various ports, and especially from Mekkah, Aden, andOrmuz with horses, and from Cambay, Diu, and the Malabar country."—Barboza, 72.

1554.—"23d Voyage, from Dabul to Aden."—The Moku, in J. As. Soc. Beng., v. 464.

1672.—See Cambes, x. 72.

[c. 1665.—"The King of Bijapur has three good ports in this kingdom: these are Raja-pur, Dabol, and Kereputtan."—Tavernier, ed. Bull, i. 181 seq.]

DACCA. n.p. Properly Dhakā, ['the wood of dhāk (see DHAWK) trees'; the Imp. Gaz. suggests Dhakeswari, 'the concealed goddess']. A city in the east of Bengal, once of great importance, especially in the later Mahomedan history; famous also for the "Dacca muslins" woven there, the annual advances for which, prior to 1801, are said to have amounted to £250,000. [Taylor, Decr. and Hist. Account of the Cotton Manufacture of Dacca in Bengal].

Dāka is throughout Central Asia applied to all muslins imported through Kabul.

c. 1612.—"... liberos Osmanis ascensutos vivos cepit, eosque cum elephantis et omnibus thesauris defuncti, post quam Daeck Bengalae metropolim est reversus, misit ad regem."—De Laet, quoted by Blochmann, Ann., i. 521.

[c. 1617.—"Dekaka" in Sir T. Roe’s List, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

c. 1660.—"The same Robbers took Sultan-Sijah at Daka, to carry away in their Galleasses to Rakan..."—Bernier, E.T. 55; [ed. Constable, 195].

1665.—"Daca is a great Town, that extends itself only in length; every one coveting to have an House by the Ganges side. The length... is above two leagues. These Houses are properly no more than paltry Huts built up with Bambone's, and daub'd over with fat Earth."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 55; [ed. Bull, i. 128].

1682.—"The only expedient left was for the Agent to go himself in person to the Nabob and Dwan at Decca."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 33].

DACOIT, DACOO, s. Hind. dākāit, dākāt, dākā; a robber belonging to an armed gang. The term, being current in Bengal, got into the Penal Code. By law, to constitute dacoity, there must be five or more in the gang committing the crime. Beamess derives the word from dākā, 'to shout,' a sense not in Shakespear's Diet. [It is to be found in Platts, and Fallon gives it as used in E. H. It appears to be connected with Skt. dasṭa, 'pressed together.']

1810.—"Dcoits, or water-robbers."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 396.

1812.—"Dacoits, a species of depredators who infest the country in gangs."—Fifth Report, p. 9.

1817.—"The crime of dacoity" (that is, robbery by gangs), says Sir Henry Strachey, "... has, I believe, increased greatly since the British administration of justice."—Mill, H. of B. I., v. 466.

1834.—"It is a conspiracy! a false warrant!—they are Dakkoos! Dakkoos!"—The Baboo, ii. 202.

1872.—"Daroga! Why, what has he come here for? I have not heard of any dacoity or murder in the Village."—Govinda Samanta, i. 264.

DADNY, s. H. dāḍnī, [P. dāḍan, 'to give']; an advance made to a craftsman, a weaver, or the like, by one who trades in the goods produced.

1678.—"Wee met with Some trouble About ye Investment of Taffaties with hath Continued ever Since, Soc ye we had not been able to give out any daudne on Muxa-davad Side many weanours absenting themselves..."—MS. Letter of 3d June, from Cussumbazar Factory, in India Office.

1683.—"Chuttermull and Deepchund, two Cussumbazar merchants this day assured me Mr. Charnock gives out all his new Sico Rupees for Dady at 2 per cent., and never gives the Company credit for more than ½ rupee—by which he gains and puts in his own pocket Rupees 4½ per cent. of all the money he pays, which amounts to a great Summe in ye Yeare: at least £1,000 sterling."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 121, also see i. 83].

1748.—"The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Flibuck Chund, Gosserrain, Ocone, and Otteram, they being of a different caste, and consequently they could not do business with them, upon which they refused Danday, and having the same objection to make this year, they propose taking their shares of the Danday."—Pt. William Cons., May 23. In Long, p. 9.

1772.—"I observe that the Court of Directors have ordered the yomastahs to be withdrawn, and the investment to be provided by Dandey merchants."—Warren Hastings to J. Purling, in Gleig, i. 227.

DAGBAIL, s. Hind. from Pers. ddīqh-i-bel,'spade-mark.' The line dug to trace out on the ground a camp, or a road or other construction. As the central line of a road, canal, or railroad it is the equivalent of English ‘lockspit.’

DAGOBA, s. Singhalese dâgaba, from Pâli dhâtugabba, and Sânsk. dhâtu-garbha, ‘Relic-receptacle’; applied to any dome-like Buddhist shrine (see TOPE, PAGODA). Gen. Cunningham alleges that the Chaitâja was usually an empty tope dedicated to the Adi-Buddha (or Supreme, of the quasi-Theistic Buddhists), whilst the term Dhâtu-garbha, or Dâgoba, was properly applied only to a tope which was an actual relic-shrine, or repository of ashes of the dead (Bhilsa Topes, 9).

["'The Shan word 'Hpit,' or 'Tat,' and the Siamese 'Sat-oop,' for a pagoda placed over portions of Gaudama's body, such as his flesh, teeth, and hair, is derived from the Sanskrit 'Dhâtu-garbha,' a relic shrine" (Hallett, A Thousand Miles, 308).]

We are unable to say who first introduced the word into European use. It was well known to William von Humboldt, and to Ritter; but it has become more familiar through its frequent occurrence in Fergusson's Hist. of Architecture. The only surviving example of the native use of this term on the Continent of India, so far as we know, is in the neighbourhood of the remains of the great Buddhist establishments at Nalanda in Behar. See quotation below.

1806.—"In this irregular excavation are left two dagopas, or solid masses of stone, bearing the form of a cupola."—Salt, Caes of Salisbury, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 47, pub. 1819.

1823.—"... from the centre of the screen or walls, projects a daghope."—Des. of Caes near Nâsîk, by Lt.-Col. Delamain in As. Journal, N.S. 1830, vol. iii. 276.

1834.—"... Mihindu-Kumara... preached in that island (Ceylon) the Religion of Buddha, converted the aforesaid King, built Dâgobas (Dagops, i.e. sanctuaries under which the relics or images of Buddha are deposited) in various places."—Ritter, Aсен, Bd. iii. 1162.

1835.—"The Temple (cave at Nâsîk)... has no interior support, but a rock-ceiling richly adorned with wheel-ornaments and lions, and in the end-niche a Dâgop..."

—Ibid. iv. 683.

1836.—"Although the Dagops, both from varying size and from the circumstance of their being in some cases independent erections and in others only elements of the internal structure of a temple, have very different aspects, yet their character is universally recognised as that of closed masses devoted to the preservation or concealment of sacred objects."—W. v. Humboldt, Kevi-Sprache, i. 114.

1840.—"We performed pradakshîna round the Dâgobas, reclining on the living couches of the devotees of Nirwân."—Letter of Dr. John Wilson, in Life, 282.

1853.—"At the same time he (Sakya) foresaw that a dâgoba would be erected to Kantaka on the spot..."—Hardy, Manual of Buddhism, 160.

1855.—"All kinds and forms are to be found... the bell-shaped pyramid of dead brickwork in all its varieties... the bluff knob-like dome of the Ceylon Dagobas..."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 35.

1872.—"It is a remarkable fact that the line of mounds (at Nalanda in Bihar) still bears the name of 'dagop' by the country people. Is not this the dâgoba of the Pâli annals?"—Broadley, Buddh. Remains of Bihâr, in J.A.S.B. xi., Pt. i. 305.

DAGON, n.p. A name often given by old European travellers to the place now called Rangoon, from the great Relic-shrine or dâgoba there, called Shwe (Golden) Dagôn. Some have suggested that it is a corruption of dâgoba, but this is merely guesswork. In the Pâli language tâkhân signifies 'athwart,' and, after the usual fashion, a legend had grown up connecting the name with the story of a tree lying athwart the hill-top, which supernaturally indicated where the sacred relics of one of the Buddhas had been deposited (see J.A.S.B. xxviii. 477). Prof. Forchhammer recently (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Burma, No. 1) explained the true origin of the name. Towns lying near the sacred site had been known by the successive names of Asitaâna-nagara and Ukkalanagara. In the 12th century the last name disappears and is replaced by Trikumbha-nagara, or in Pâli form Tikumhaba-nagara, signifying '3-Hill-city.' * The Kâlyâni inscription near Pegu contains both forms. Tikumhaba gradually in popular utterance became Tikum, Takum, and Tâkum, whence Dagon. The classical name of the great Dagoba is Tikumhaba-chetri, and this is still in daily Burman use.

* Kâlyâni means an earthen pot, and also the "frontal globe on the upper part of the forehead of the elephant." The latter meaning was, according to Prof. Forchhammer, that intended, being applied to the hillocks on which the town stood, because of their form. But the Burmese applied it to 'alms-bowls,' and invented a legend of Buddha and his two disciples having buried their alms-bowls at this spot.
When the original meaning of the word Tākum had been effaced from the memory of the Talaiings, they invented the fable alluded to above in connection with the word tākkān. [This view has been disputed by Col. Temple (Ind. Ant., Jan. 1893, p. 27). He gives the reading of the Kalyāni inscription as Tīgumpānagara and goes on to say: "There is more in favour of this derivation (from dagoba) than of any other yet produced. Thus we have dağoba, Singhalése, admitted from dhātugabbha, and as far back as the 16th century we have a persistent word tīgumpa or digumpa (dagon, dagon) in Burma with the same meaning. Until a clear derivation is made out, it is, therefore, not unsafe to say that dagon represents some medieval Indian current form of dhātugabbha. This view is supported by a word gompa, used in the Himalayas about Sikkim for a Buddhist shrine, which looks primò vicie like the remains of some such word as gabbha, the latter half of the compound dhātugabbha. . . .

Neither Trikumbha-nagara in Skt. nor Tīkumbo-nagara in Pali would mean ‘Three-hill-city,’ kumbha being in no sense a ‘hill’ which is kāta, and there are not three hills on the site of the Shwe-Dagon Pagoda at Rangoon."

c. 1548.—"He hath very certaine intelligence, how the Zemindoo hath raised an army, with an intent to fall upon the Towns of Cosmin and Dala (DALA), and to gain all along the rivers of Digon and Meido, the whole Province of Danaptea, even to An-sela (hod. Donabyu and Henzada)."—F. M. Pinto, tr. by H. C. 1653, p. 288.

c. 1585.—"After landing we began to walk, on the right side, by a street some 50 paces wide, all along which we saw houses of wood, all gilt, and set off with beautiful gardens in their fashion, in which dwell all the Talapins, which are their Friars, and the rulers of the Papole or Varella of Dogon."—Gaspar Balbi, f. 96.

c. 1587.—"About two days journey from Pegu there is a Varella (see VARELLA) or Pagode, which is the pilgrimage of the Peguans: it is called Dogonne, and is of a wonderfull bignesse and all gilded from the foot to the toppe."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 398, [389].

c. 1755.—Dagon and Dagon occur in a paper of this period in Dalrymple's Oriental Repository, i. 141, 177; [Col. Temple adds: "The word is always Digon in Flouest's account of his travels in 1756 (Tayung Paq, vol. i. Les Francais en Birmanie au xviie Siècle, pavis). It is always Digon (except once: "Digone capitale del Pegh," p. 149) in Qurialis's Vitae di Monstignor G. M. Percoto, 1781; and it is Digon in a map by Antonio Zultae e figli Venezia, 1785. Symes, Embassy to Ava, 1803 (pp. 18, 23) has Dagon. Crawford, 1829, Embassy to Ava (pp. 346-7), calls it Dagong. There is further a curious word, "Too Degon," in one of Mortier's maps, 1740."]

DAIBUL, n.p. See DIULSIND.

DAIMIO, s. A feudal prince in Japan. The word appears to be approximately the Jap. pronunciation of Chin. taiming, 'great name.' ["The Daimyōs were the territorial lords and barons of feudal Japan. The word means literally 'great name.' Accordingly, during the Middle Ages, warrior chiefs of less degree, corresponding as one might say, to our knights or baronets, were known by the correlative title of Shōmyō, that is, 'small name.' But this latter fell into disuse. Perhaps it did not sound grand enough to be welcome to those who bore it." (Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 101 seq.).]

DAISEYE, s. This word, representing Desai, repeatedly occurs in Kirkpatrick's Letters of Tipoo (e.g. p. 196) for a local chief of some class. See DESSAYE.

DALA, n.p. This is now a town on the (west) side of the river of Rangoon, opposite to that city. But the name formerly applied to a large province in the Delta, stretching from the Rangoon River westward.

1546.—See Pinto, under DAGON.

1585.—"The 2d November we came to the city of Dala, where among other things there are 10 halls full of elephants, which are here for the King of Pegu, in charge of various attendants and officials."—Gaspar Balbi, f. 95.

DALAWAY, s. In S. India the Commander-in-chief of an army; [Tam. talawāyi, Skt. dala, 'army,' valh, 'to lead?'; Can. and Mal. dhalawāyi and dalawāyi. Old Can. dhala, H. dal, 'an army.'

1615.—"Caeterum Deleuans... vehe- menter à rege contendit, ne comitteret vt vltum condenda nova hac urbe Arcomaganosis portus antiquissimus detrimentum caperet."—Jarric, Theaurum, i. p. 179.

1700.—"Le Talavai, c'est le nom qu'on donne au Prince, qui gouverne aujourd'hui DAM.

le Royaume sous l'autorité de la Reine."—

Letters Edif. x. 162. See also p. 178 and xi. 90.

c. 1747.—"A few days after this, the Dulwai sent for Hydar, and seating him on a musnad with himself, he consulted with him on the re-establishment of his own affairs, complaining bitterly of his own distress for want of money."—H. of Hydar Nâkî, 44. (See also under DHURMA.)

1754.—"You are imposed on, I never wrote to the Maissore King or Dolloway any such thing, nor they to me; nor had I a knowledge of any agreement between the Nabob and the Dolloway."—Letter from Gov. Saunders of Madras to French Deputies in Cambridge's Act. of the War, App. p. 29.

1763-78.—He (Haidar) has lately taken the King (Mysore) out of the hands of his Uncle, the Dolloway."—Orme, iii. 636.

[1810.—"Two manuscripts... preserved in different branches of the family of the ancient Dolloways of Mysoor."—Willis, Mysore, Pref. ed. 1869, p. x.]

DALOYET, DELOYET, s. An armed attendant and messenger, the same as a Peon. H. dhâlât, dhâlayût, from dhâl, 'a shield.' The word is never now used in Bengal and Upper India.

1772.—"Suppose every farmer in the province was enjoined to maintain a number of good serviceable bullocks... obliged to furnish the Government with them on a requisition made to him by the Collector in writing (not by sepoys, déleâcts (sic), or hercarras") (see HURCARA.)—W. Hastings, to G. Vansittart, in Glegy, i. 257.

1809.—"As it was very hot, I immediately employed my deleâ奇特 to keep off the crowd."—Lt. Valention, i. 399. The word here and elsewhere in that book is a misprint for delogets.

DAM, s. H. dâm. Originally an actual copper coin, regarding which we find the following in the Aîn, i. 31, ed. Blochmann:—"1. The Dâm weighs 5 tôâns, i.e. 1 toleah, 8 máshâs, and 7 surkhs; it is the fortieth part of a rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah, and also Baâlahi; now it is known under this name (dâm). On one side the place is given where it was struck, on the other the date. For the purpose of calculation, the dâm is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jétdal. This imaginary division is only used by accountants.

2. The adhelah is half of a dâm.
3. The Pârsâlah is a quarter of a dâm.
4. The damrî is an eighth of a dâm."

It is curious that Akbar's revenues were registered in this small currency, viz. in laks of dâmîs. We may compare the Portuguese use of réis [see REAS].

The tendency of denominations of coins is always to sink in value. The jétdal [see JEETUL], which had become an imaginary money of account in Akbar's time, was, in the 14th century, a real coin, which Mr. E. Thomas, chief of Indian numismatologists, has unearthed [see Chron. Pathan Kings, 281]. And now the dâm itself is imaginary. According to Elliot the people of the N.W.P. not long ago calculated 25 dâmîs to the paisa, which would be 1600 to a rupee. Carney gives the Oudh popular currency table as:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>26 kaurîs = 1 damrî</th>
<th>1 damrî = 3 dâm</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>20 &quot; = 1 ândî</td>
<td>25 dâm = 1 pice.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

But the Calcutta Glossary says the dâm is in Bengal reckoned 14 of an ândî, i.e. 320 to the rupee. ["Most things of little value, here as well as in Bhagalpur (writing of Behar) are sold by an imaginary money called Tâkâ, which is here reckoned equal to two Paysâs. There are also imaginary monies called Chadâm and Damrî; the former is equal to 1 Paysâ or 25 cowries, the latter is equal to one-eighth of a Paysâ." (Buchanan, Eastern Ind. i. 382 seq.)]. We have not in our own experience met with any reckoning of dâmîs. In the case of the damrî the denomination has increased instead of sinking in relation to the dâm. For above we have the damrî=3 dâmîs, or according to Elliot (Beames, ii. 296)= 3â4 dâmîs, instead of 4 of a dâmîs as in Akbar's time. But in reality the damrî's absolute value has remained the same. For by Carney's table 1 rupee or 16 anas would be equal to 320 damrîs, and by the Aîn, 1 rupee = 40 x 8 damrîs=320 damrîs. Damrî is a common enough expression for the infinitesimal in coin, and one has often heard a Briton in India say: "No, I won't give a dumrey!" with but a vague notion what a damrî meant, as in Scotland we have heard, "I won't give a plack," though certainly the speaker could not have stated the value of that ancient coin. And this leads to the suggestion that a like expression, often heard from coarse talkers in England as well as in India, originated in the latter country, and that whatever profanity there may be in the animus, there is none in the etymology, when such an one blurs out "I don't care a däm!" i.e. in other words, "I don't care a brass farthing!"

If the Gentle Reader deems this a far-fetched suggestion, let us back it by a second. We find in Chaucer (The Miller's Tale):

"—he rauht he not a kere," which means, "he recked not a crown" (ne floci quidem); an expression which is also found in Piers Plowman:

"Wisdom and witte is nowe not worthe a kresse."

And this we doubt not has given rise to that other vulgar expression, "I don't care a curse";—curiously parallel in its corruption to that in illustration of which we quote it.

[This suggestion about däm was made by a writer in Asiat. Res., ed. 1803, vii. 461: "This word was perhaps in use even among our forefathers, and may innocently account for the expression 'not worth a fig,' or a dam, especially if we recollect that ba-dam, an almond, is to-day current in some parts of India as small money. Might not dried figs have been employed anciently in the same way, since the Arabic word fooaloos, a halfpenny, also denotes a cassia bean, and the root fals means the scale of a fish. Mankind are so apt, from a natural depravity, that 'flesh is heir to,' in their use of words, to pervert them from their original sense, that it is not a convincing argument against the present conjecture our using the word curse in vulgar language in lieu of dam." The N.E.D. disposes of the matter: "The suggestion is ingenious, but has no basis in fact." In a letter to Mr. Ellis, Macaulay writes: "How they settle the matter I care not, as the Duke says, one twopenny damma"; and Sir G. Trevelyan notes: "It was the Duke of Wellington who invented this oath, so disproportionately to the greatness of its author." (Life, ed. 1878, ii. 257.)]}

1628.—"The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Delhi amounts, according to the Royal registers, to 6 arbs and 30 krons of dams. One arb is equal to 100 krons (a kror being 10,000,000), and a hundred krons of dams are equal to 2 krons and 50 lacs of rupees."—Muhammad Sharif Haniyi, in Elliot, vii. 138.

c. 1840.—"Charles Greville saw the Duke soon after, and expressing the pleasure he had felt in reading his speech (commending the conduct of Capt. Charles Elliot in China), added that, however, many of the party were angry with it; to which the Duke replied,—'I know they are, and I don't care a damn. I have no time to do what is right.'

"A twopenny damn was, I believe, the form usually employed by the Duke, as an expression of value: but on the present occasion he seems to have been less precise."—Autobiography of Sir Henry Taylor, i. 296. The term referred to arms curiously to preserve an unconscious tradition of the pecuniary, or what the idiotical jargon of our time calls the 'monetary,' estimation contained in the expression.

1881.—"A Bavarian printer, jealous of the influence of capital, said that if Gladstone baid millions of money to the beeble to fote for him, and Beegonsfeel would not bay them a tam, so they fote for Gladstone."—A Socialistic Picnic, in St. James's Gazette, July 6.

[1900.—"There is not, I dare wager, a single bishop who cares one twopenny-halfpenny dime' for any of that plenteousness for himself."—H. Bell, Vicar of Muncaster, in Times, Aug. 31.]

DAMAN, n.p. Damān, one of the old settlements of the Portuguese which they still retain, on the coast of Guzerat, about 100 miles north of Bombay; written by them Dāmān.

1554.—"... the pilots said: 'We are here between Diu and Damān; if the ship sinks here, not a soul will escape; we must make sail for the shore.'"—Sidi 'Ali, 80.

[1607-8.—"Then that by no means or ships or men can goo safflie to Suratt, or thare expect any quiett trade for the many dangers likele to happen unto them by the Portugals Cheef Comanders of Diu, and Damān, and places there aboute. ..."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 247.]

1623.—"Il capitan ... sperava che potessimo esser vicini alla città di Daman; lafà estro dentro il golfo di Cambaia a man destra. ..."—P. della Valle, ii. 499 [Hak. Soc. i. 15].

DAMANI, s. Applied to a kind of squall. (See ELEPHANTA.)

DAMMER, s. This word is applied to various resins in different parts of India, chiefly as substitutes for pitch. The word appears to be Malayo-Javanese damar, used generically for resins, a class of substances the origin of which is probably often uncertain. [Mr. Skeat notes that the Malay damar means rosin and a torch made of rosin, the latter consisting of a regular cylindrical case, made of bamboo or other suitable material, filled to the top with resin and ignited.] To one of the dammer-producing trees in the Archipelago the name Dammar a alba, Rumph. (N. O. Coniferae), has been given, and this furnishes the East India Dammer of English varnish-makers. In Burma the dammer used is derived from at least three different genera of the N. O. Dipterocarpaceae; in Bengal it is derived from the sal tree (see SAUL-WOOD) (Shorea robusta) and other Shoreae, as well as by importation from transmarine sources. In S. India "white dammer," "Dammer Pitch," or Piney resin, is the produce of Valeria indica, and "black dammer" of Canarium strictum; in Cutch the dammer used is stated by Liett. Leech. (Bombay Selections, No. xv. p. 215-216) to be made from chandras (or chandras =copal) boiled with an equal quantity of oil. This is probably Fryer's 'rosin taken out of the sea' (infra). [On the other hand Mr. Pringle (Diary, &c., Fort St. George, 1st ser. iv. 178) quotes Crawfurd (Malay Archip. i. 455): (Dammer) "exudes through the bark, and is either found adhering to the trunk and branches in large lumps, or in masses on the ground, under the trees. As these often grow near the sea-side or on banks of rivers, the damar is frequently floated away and collected at different places as drift' ; and adds: "The dammer used for caulking the masula boats at Madras when Fryer was there, may have been, and probably was, imported from the Archipelago, and the fact that the resin was largely collected as drift may have been mentioned in answer to his enquiries." Some of the Malay dammer also seems, from Major McNair's statement, to be, like copal, fossil. [On this Mr. Skeat says: "It is true that it is sometimes dug up out of the ground, possibly because it may form on the roots of certain trees, or because a great mass of it will fall and partially bury itself in the ground by its own weight, but I have never heard of its being found actually fossilised, and I should question the fact seriously.] The word is sometimes used in India [and by the Malays, see above] for 'a torch,' because torches are formed of rags dipped in it. This is perhaps the use which accounts for Haex's explanation below.

1584. — "Demmar (for dammar) from Siaca and Blinton" (i.e. Siak and Billiton). — Barret, in Halk. ii. 43.

1631. — In Haex's Malay Vocabulary: "Damar, Lumen quod accenditur."

1673. — "The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers as ours are, the headed Planks are sewed together with Rope-yarn of the Cocode, and calked with Dammar (a sort of Rosin taken out of the sea)."— Fryer, 37.

"The long continued Current from the Inland Parts (at Surat) through the vast Wildernesses of huge Woods and Forests, wafts great Rafts of Timber for Shipping and Building: and Dammar for Pitch, the finest sented Bitumen (if it be not a gum or Rosin) I ever met with."— Ibid. 121.

1727. — "Damar, a gum that is used for making Pitch and Tar for the use of Shipping."— A. Hamilton, ii. 73; [ed. 1744, ii. 72].

1775. — "A Demar-Boy (Torch-boy)."— Ives, 50.

1817. — "This dammar, which is the general Malayan name for resin, is dug out of the forests by the Malayse, and seems to be the fossilised juices of former growth of jungle."— McNair, Peruk, &c., 188.

1885. — "The other great industry of the place (in Sumatra) is dammar collecting. This substance, as is well known, is the resin which exudes from notches made in various species of coniferous and dipterocarpous trees . . . out of the stem . . . the native cuts large notches up to a height of 40 or 50 feet from the ground. The tree is then left for 3 or 4 months when, if it be a very healthy one, sufficient dammar will have exuded to make it worth while collecting; the yield may then be as much as 94 Amsterdam pounds."— H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 135.

DANA, s. H. dãna, literally 'grain,' and therefore the exact translation of gram in its original sense (q.v.). It is often used in Bengal as synonymous with graine, thus: "Give the horse his dãnã." We find it also in this specific way by an old traveller:

1616. — "A kind of graine called Donna, somewhat like our Pease, which they boyle, and when it is cold give them mingled with coarse Sugar, and twice or thrice in the Weeke, Butter to scourne their Bodies." — Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

DANCING-GIRL, s. This, or among the older Anglo-Indians, Dancing-Wench, was the representative of the (Portuguese Bailadeira) Bayadãre, or Nautch-girl (q.v.), also Cunchunee. In S. India dancing-girls are all Hindus, [and known as Devadãsi or Bhogam-dãsi;] in N. India they are both Hindu, called Rûm-jânî (see RUM-JOHNNY), and Mussulman, called Kanchanī (see CUNCHUNEE). In Dutch the phrase takes a very plain-spoken form, see quotation from Valentijn; [others are equally explicit, e.g. Sir T. Roe (Hak. Soc. i. 145) and P. della Valle, ii. 282.]

1606.—See description by Gouvea, t. 39.

1673.—"After supper they treated us with the Dancing Wenches, and good soops of Brandy and Delf Beer, till it was late enough."—Fryer, 152.

1701.—"The Governor conducted the Nabob into the Consultation Room...after dinner they were diverted with the Dancing Wenches."—In Wheeler, i. 377.

1726.—"Wat de dans-Hoeren (anders Devatasthi (Deva-dasi) ... gemaamd, en an de Goden hunner Pagoden als getrouwd) belaengd."—Valentijn, Chor. 54.

1763-78.—"Mandelslow tells a story of a Nabob who cut off the heads of a set of dancing girls...because they did not come to his palace on the first summons."—Orme, i. 28 (ed. 1803).

1789.—"...dancing girls who display amazing agility and grace in all their motions."—Mauro, Narrative, 73.

c. 1812.—"I often sat by the open window, and there, night after night, I used to hear the songs of the unhappy dancing girls, accompanied by the sweet yet melancholy music of the cithdra."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 423.

[1813.—Forbes gives an account of the two classes of dancing girls, those who sing and dance in private houses, and those attached to temples.—Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 61.]

1815.—"Dancing girls were once numerous in Persia; and the first poets of that country have celebrated the beauty of their persons and the melody of their voices."—Malcolm, II. of Persia, ii. 557.

1838.—"The Maharajah sent us in the evening a new set of dancing girls, as they were called, though they turned out to be twelve of the ugliest old women I ever saw."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 154.

1845.—"We decorated the Temples of the false gods. We provided the dancing girls. We gilded and painted the images to which our ignorant subjects bowed down."—Macaulay's Speech on the Sommuth Proclamation.

DANDY, s.

(a). A boatman. The term is peculiar to the Gangetic rivers. H. and Beng. dándi, from dán or dánd, 'a staff, an oar.'

1685.—"Our Dandees (or boatmen) boiled their rice, and we mopped here."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 175].

1763.—"The oppressions of your officers were carried to such a length that they put a stop to all business, and plundered and seized the Dandies and Mangies" [see MANEE] vessel."—W. Hastings to the Nawab, in Long, 347.

1809.—"Two naked dandys paddling at the head of the vessel."—Ed. Valentia, i. 67.

1824.—"I am indeed often surprised to observe the difference between my dandees (who are nearly the colour of a black teapot) and the generality of the peasants whom we meet."—Bp. Heber, i. 149 (ed. 1844).

—(b). A kind of ascetic who carries a staff. Same etymology. See Salkuns, who gives a plate of such an one.

[1828.—"...the Dandi is distinguished by carrying a small dand, or wand, with several processes or projections from it, and a piece of cloth dyed with red ochre, in which the Brahmancal cord is supposed to be ensnared, attached to it."—H. H. Wilson, Sketch of the Religious Sects of the Hindoos, ed. 1861, i. 193.]

—(c). H. same spelling, and same etymology. A kind of vehicle used in the Himalaya, consisting of a strong cloth slung like a hammock to a bamboo staff, and carried by two (or more) men. The traveller can either sit sideways, or lie on his back. It is much the same as the Malabar muncheel (q.v.), [and P. della Valle describes a similar vehicle which he says the Portuguese call Rete (Hak. Soc. i. 183)].

[1875.—"The nearest approach to travelling in a dandi I can think of, is sitting in a half-reeded top-sail in a storm, with the head and shoulders above the yard."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 103.]

1876.—"In the lower hills when she did not walk she travelled in a dandy."—Kinloch, Large Game Shooting in Thibet, 2nd S., p. vii.

DANGUR, n.p. H. Dhāngar, the name by which members of various tribes of Chittá Nagpūr, but especially of the Orāons, are generally known when they go out to distant provinces to seek employment as labourers ("coolies"). A very large proportion of those who emigrate to the tea-plantations of E. India, and also to Mauritius and other colonies, belong to the Orāon tribe. The etymology of the term Dhāngar is doubtful. The late Gen. Dalton says: "It is a word that from its apparent derivation (dāng or dāṅg, 'a hill') may mean any hill-DARCHEEENE, s. P. dār-chini, "China-stick," i.e. cinnamon.

1563. — "... The people of Ormuz, because this bark was brought for sale there by those who had come from China, called it dār-chini, which in Persian means 'wood of China,' and so they sold it in Alexandria. . . ."—Garcia, f. 59-60.

1621. — "As for cinnamon which you were called by the Arabs dār-sini, I assure you that the dār-sini, as the Arabs say, or dār-chini as the Persians and Turks call it, is nothing but our ordinary *cañella."—P. della Valle, ii. 206-7.

DARJEELING, DARJILING, n.p. A famous sanitarium in the Eastern Himalaya, the cession of which was purchased from the Raja of Sikkim in 1835; a tract largely added to by annexation in 1849, following on an outrage committed by the Sikkim Minister in imprisoning Dr. (afterwards Sir) Joseph Hooker and the late Dr. A. Campbell, Superintendent of Darjeeling. The sanitarium stands at 6500 to 7500 feet above the sea. The popular Tibetan spelling of the name is, according to Jaeschke, T Dor-je-glín, "Land of the Dorje," i.e. "of the Adamant or thunderbolt," the ritual sceptre of the Lamas. But according to several titles of books in the Petersburg list of MSS. it ought properly to be spelt Dar-rgyas-glín (Th. Eng. Dict. p. 287).

DARÓGA, s. P. and H. dāroghá. This word seems to be originally Mongol (see Kovalevsky's Dict. No. 1673). In any case it is one of those terms brought by the Mongol hosts from the far East. In their nomenclature it was applied to a Governor of a province or city, and in this sense it continued to be used under Timur and his immediate successors. But it is the tendency of official titles, as of denominations of coin, to descend in value; and that of dāroghá has in later days been bestowed on a variety of humbler persons. Wilson defines the word thus: "The chief native officer in various departments under a superintendent, a manager: but in later times he is especially the head of a police, customs, or excise station." Under the British Police system, from 1793 to 1862-63, the Darogha was a local Chief of Police, or Head Constable, [and this is still the popular title in the N.W.P. for the officer in charge of a Police Station.] The word occurs in the sense of a Governor in a Mongol inscription, of the year 1314, found in the Chinese Province of Shen-si, which is given by Panthier in his M. Pol., p. 773. "The Mongol Governor of Moscow, during a part of the Tartar domination in Russia, is called in the old Russian Chronicles Daroga (see Hammer, Golden Horde, 384). And according to the same writer the word appears in a Byzantine writer (unnamed) as Dároga (ibid. 238-9). The Byzantine form and the passages below of 1404 and 1665 seem to imply some former variation in pronunciation. But Clavijo has also derroga in § cli.

c. 1220.—"Tuli Khan named as Darugha at Merv one called Barmas, and himself marched upon Nishapur."—Abulpházi, by Desmasonse, 135.

c. 1404.—"And in this city (Tauris) there was a kinsman of the Emperor as Magistrate thereof, whom they call Derrega, and he treated the said Ambassadors with much respect."—Clavijo, xxxi. Comp. Markham, 90.

c. 1411.—"... I reached the city of Kerman. . . . The derogah (governor) the Emir Hadji Mohamed Kalashirin, being then absent. . . ."—Abdurrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 5.

c. 1500.—"The officers and servants attached to the Imperial Stables. 1. The Atbegi . . . 2. The Darogha. There is one appointed for each stable."—Avn., tr. Blockmann, i. 137.

c. 1621.—"The 10th of October, the darogá, or Governor of Isphahan, Mir Abdulanzim, the King's son-in-law, who, as was afterwards seen in that charge of his, was a downright madman. . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 166.

c. 1665.—"There stands a Derega, upon each side of the River, who will not suffer any person to pass without leave."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 52; [ed. Ball], i. 117.

c. 1673.—"The Droger, or Mayor of the City, or Captain of the Watch, or the Rounds; It is his duty to preside with the Main Guard a-nights before the Palace-gates."—Fryer, 339.
DATURĀ. 298

1673. — "The Droger being Master of his Science, persists; what comfort can I reap from your Disturbance?"—Fryer, 389.

1682. — "I received a letter from Mr. Hill at Rajemaul advising ye Droga of ye Mint would not obey a Copy, but required at least a sight of ye Original."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 57].

c. 1781. — "About this time, however, one day being very angry, the Darogha, or master of the mint, presented himself, and asked the Nawab what device he would have struck on his new copper coinage. Hydur, in a violent passion, told him to stamp an obscene figure on it."—Hydur Naik, tr. by Miles, 488.

1812. — "Each division is guarded by a Darogha, with an establishment of armed men."—Fifth Report, 44.

DATUNCH, s. This word is used in old books of Travel and Trade for a steel Yard employed in China and the Archipelago. It is given by Leyden as a Malay word for 'balance,' in his Comp. Vocab. of Barmah, Malay and Thai, Serampore, 1810. It is also given by Crawford as dachin, a Malay word from the Javanese. There seems to be no doubt that in Peking dialect ch'eng is 'to weigh,' and also 'steel-yard,' and that in Amoy a small steel-yard is called ch'èn; and that in Canton dialect the steel-yard is called tok'êng. Some of the Dictionaries also give ta chêng, 'large steel-yard.' Datchin or dotchins may therefore possibly be a Chinese term; but considering how seldom traders' words are really Chinese, and how easily the Chinese monosyllables lend themselves to plausible combinations, it remains probable that the Canton word was adopted from foreigners. It has sometimes occurred to us that it might have been adopted from Achin (d'Achîn); see the first quotation. [The N.E.D., following Prof. Giles, gives it as a corruption of the Cantonese name toh-chêng (in Court dialect toh-kêng) from toh 'to measure,' chêng, 'to weigh.' Mr. Skeat notes: "The standard Malay is doching, the Javaneese dachin (v. Klînkert, s.v.). He gives the word as of Chinese origin, and the probability is that the English word is from the Malay, which in its turn was borrowed from the Chinese. The final suggestion, d'Achîn, seems out of the question." Favre's Malay Dict. gives (in French) "daxing (Ch. pa-chen), steel-yard, balance," also "ber-daxing, to weigh," and Javan. "daxin, a weight of 100 kâtis." Gericke's Javan. Dict. also gives "datsin-Picol," with a reference to Chinese. [With reference to Crawford's statement quoted above, Mr. Pringle (Diary, F. St. George, 1st ser. iv. 179) notes that Crawford had elsewhere adopted the view that the yard and the designation of it originated in China and passed from whence to the Archipelago (Malay Archip. i. 275). On the whole, the Chinese origin seems most probable.]

1564. — At Malacca. "The baar of the great Dachem contains 200 cates, each cate weighing two arratels, 4 ounces, 5 eighths, 15 grains, 3 tenths... the Baar of the little Dachem contains 200 cates; each cate weighing two arratels."—A. Nunes, 39.

[1684-5. — "... he replied that he was now content yt ye Honble Company should solely enjoy ye Customes of ye Place on condition yt ye People of ye Place be free from all duties & Customes and yt ye Profit of ye Dutchin be his..."—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 12.]

1696. — "For their Dotchin and Ballance they use that of Japan."—Bowyer's Journal at Cochin-China, in Dalrymple, O. R. i. 88.

1711. — "Never weigh your Silver by their Dotchins, for they have usually two Pair, one to receive, the other to pay by."—Lockyer, 113.

..."In the Dotchin, an expert Weigher will cheat two or three per cent, by placing or shaking the Weight, and minding the Motion of the Pole only."—Ibid. 115.

..."... every one has a Chopchin and Dotchin to cut and weigh silver."—Ibid. 141.

1748. — "These scales are made after the manner of the Roman balance, or our English Stilliards, called by the Chinese Litang, and by us Dot-chin."—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748, &c., London, 1762, p. 324. The same book has, in a short vocabulary, at p. 265, "English scales or dodgeons... Chinese Litang."

DATURĀ, s. This Latin-like name is really Skt. dhattūra, and so has passed into the derived, vernaculars. The widely-spread Datura Stramonium, or Thorn-apple, is well known worldwide, but is not regarded as indigenous to India; though it appears to be wild in the Himalaya from Kashmir to Sikkim. The Indian species, from which our generic name has been borrowed, is Datura alba, Nees (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 415) (D. fastuosa, L.). Garcia de Orta mentions the common use of this by thieves in India. Its effect on the victim was to produce temporary alienation of mind, and violent laughter, permitting the thief to act unopposed. He describes his own practice in dealing with such cases, which he had always found successful. Datura was also often given as a practical joke, whence the Portuguese called it Burladura ("Jaker"). De Orta strongly disapproves of such pranks. The criminal use of datura by a class of Thugs is rife in our own time. One of the present writers has judicially convicted many. Coolies returning with fortunes from the colonies often become the victims of such crimes. [See details in Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 179 seqq.]

1563. "Maidservant. A black woman of the house has been giving datura to my mistress; she stole the keys, and the jewels that my mistress had on her neck and in her jewel box, and has made off with a black man. It would be a kindness to come to her help."—Garcia, Colloquios, f. 83.

1578. "They call this plant in the Malabar tongue ummadu andha (ummadu-kibya) . . . in Canarese Datyro . . ."—Avada, 87.

1598. "They name [have] likewise an herbe called Duetra, which beareth a seede, whereof bruising out the sap, they put it into a cup, or into a vessell, and give it to their husbands, eyther in meate or drink, and presently therewith the Man is as though hee were half out of his wits."—Lischoten, 60; [Hak. Soc. i. 209].

1605-10. "Mais ainsi de mesme les femmes quand elles s'ennuent que leurs maris en entretiennent quelqu'autre, elles s'en desfont par poison ou autrement, et se servent fort a celo de la seconde de Datura, qui est d'vne estrange vertu. Ce Datura ou Duroa, essece de Stramonium, est vne plante grande et haute qui porte des fleurs blanches en Campane, comme le Cim 실효, mais plus grande."—Mocquet, Voyages, 312.

1610. "In other parts of the Indies it is called Dutroa."—Pygarg de Lavall, Hak. Soc. ii. 114.

1621. "Garcias ab Horto . . . makes mention of an hearb called Datura, which, if it be eaten, for 24 hours following, takes away all sense of grief, makes them incline to laughter and mirth."—Burton, Anatomy of Mel.., Pt. 2, Sec. 5 Mem. 1. Subs. 5.

1673. "Duty, the deadliest sort of Solanum (Solanum) or Nightshade."—Fryer, 32.

1690. "And many of them (the Moors) take the liberty of mixing Dutra and Water together to drink . . . which will intoxicate almost to Madness."—Ovington, 235.

1810. "The datura that grows in every part of India."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 135.

1874. "Datura. This plant, a native of the East Indies, and of Abyssinia, more than a century ago had spread as a naturalized plant through every country in Europe except Sweden, Lapland, and Norway, through the aid of gipsy quacks, who used the seed as anti-spasmodics, or for more questionable purposes."—R. Brown in Chin. Magazine, i. 371. Note.—The statements derived from Hamburgh and Pluckeger in the beginning of this article disagree with this view, both as to the origin of the European Datura and the identity of the Indian plant. The doubts about the birthplace of the various species of the genus remain in fact undetermined. [See the discussion in Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 29 seqq.]

DAWAT, YELLOW, and YELLOW THISTLE. These are Bombay names for the Argemone mexicana, fico del inferno of Spaniards, introduced accidentally from America, and now an abundant and pestilent weed all over India.

DAWK, s. H. and Mahr. dak, Post, i.e. properly transport by relays of men and horses, and thence the mail or letter-post, as well as any arrangements for travelling, or for transmitting articles by such relays. The institution was no doubt imitated from the barīd, or post, established throughout the empire of the Caliphs by Mo'āwia. The barīd is itself connected with the Latin veredus, and verēdus.

1310. "It was the practice of the Sultan (Alā-uddin) when he sent an army on an expedition to establish posts on the road, wherever posts could be maintained. . . At every half or quarter kas runners were posted . . . the securing of accurate intelligence from the court on one side and the army on the other was a great public benefit."—Ziā-uddin Barnī, in Elliot, iii. 203.

c. 1340. "The foot-post (in India) is thus arranged: every mile is divided into three equal intervals which are called Dawah, which is as much as to say 'the third part of a mile' (the mile itself being called in India Korah). At every third of a mile there is a village well inhabited, outside of which are three tents where men are seated ready to start. . ."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 95.

1809.—"He advised me to proceed immediately by Dawk. . ."—La. Valentia, i. 62.

1824.—"The dāk or post carrier having passed me on the preceding day, I dropped a letter into his leathern bag, requesting a friend to send his horse on for me."—Sir J. Wonders of Ellora, ch. iv. A letter so sent by the post-runner, in the absence of any receiving office, was said to go "by outside dawk."

Dawk. s. Name of a tree. See DHAWK.

Dawk, To lay a, v. To cause relays of bearers, or horses, to be posted on a road. As regards palankin bearers this used to be done either through the post-office, or through local chowdries (q.v.) of bearers. During the mutiny of 1857-58, when several young surgeons had arrived in India, whose services were urgently wanted at the front, it is said that the Head of the Department to which they had reported themselves, directed them immediately to lay a dawk. One of them turned back from the door, saying: 'Would you explain, Sir; for you might just as well tell me to lay an egg?'

Dawk Bungalow. See under Bungalow.

Daye, Dhye, s. A wet-nurse; used in Bengal and N. India, where this is the sense now attached to the word. Hind. dāē, Skt. dātrikā; conf. Pers. dāγah, a nurse, a midwife. The word also in the earlier English Regulations is applied, Wilson states, to "a female commissioner employed to interrogate and swear native women of condition, who could not appear to give evidence in a Court."
DEANER.

[1568.—"No Christian shall call an infidel Dyaa at the time of her labour."—Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. iv. p. 265.]

1578.—"The whole plant is commonly known and used by the Dayas, or as we call them comadres" ("gossips," midwives).—Acosta, Tractado, 282.

1613.—"The medicines of the Malays... ordinarily are roots of plants... horns and claws and stones, which are used by their leeches, and for the most part by Dayas, which are women physicians, excellent herbalists, apprentices of the schools of Java Major."—Godinho de Eredoia, f. 37.

1782.—In a Table of monthly Wages at Calcutta, we have:—

"Dy (Wet-nurse) 10 Rs."

India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1808.—"If the bearer hath not strength what can the Daee (midwife) do?"—Guzerati Proverb, in Drummond's Illustrations, 1803.

1810.—"The Dyhe is more generally an attendant upon native ladies."—Willison, V.M. i. 341.

1883.—"... the 'dyah' or wet-nurse is looked on as a second mother, and usually provided for life."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

[1887.—"I was much interested in the Dhaais ("midwives") class."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life in India, 337.]

DEANER, s. This is not an Anglo-Indian, but it is a curious word of English Thieves' cant, signifying 'a shilling.' It seems doubtful whether it comes from the Italian donaro or the Arabic dinár (q.v.), but both eventually derived from the Latin denarius.

DEBAL, n.p. See DIUL-SIND.

DECCAN, n.p. and adj. Hind. Dakhn, Dakkhn, Dakhan, Dakhkan; dakchna, the Prakr, form of Skt. dakshina, 'the South'; originally 'on the right hand'; compare deker, dereš. The Southern part of India, the Peninsula, and especially the Table-land between the Eastern and Western Ghauts. It has been often applied also, politically, to specific States in that part of India, e.g. by the Portuguese in the 16th century to the Mahomedan Kingdom of Bijapur, and in more recent times by ourselves to the State of Hyderabad. In Western India the Deccan stands opposed to the Concan (q.v.), i.e. the table-land of the interior to the maritime plain; in Upper India the Deccan stands opposed to Hindústán, i.e. roundly speaking, the country south of the Nerbudda to that north of it. The term frequently occurs in the Skt. books in the form dakshinapatha ('Southern region,' whence the Greek form in our first quotation), and dakshinátya ('Southern'—qualifying some word for 'country'). So, in the Púchchatantra: "There is in the Southern region (dakshinátya janapada) a town called Mihiláropya."

c. A.D. 80-90.—"But immediately after Barygaza the adjoining continent extends from the North to the South, wherefore the region is called Dachinabádéś (Dákñva-bádha), for the South is called in their tongue Dachanos (Dákñvar)."—Periplus M.E., Geog. Gr. Min. i. 254.

1510.—"In the said city of Deccan there reigns a King, who is a Mahommedan."—Varthama, 117. (Here the term is applied to the city and kingdom of Bijapur.)

1517.—"On coming out of this Kingdom of Guzarat and Cambay towards the South, and the inner parts of India, is the Kingdom of Dacani, which the Indians call Deccan."—Barbosa, 69.

1552.—"Of Deccani or Daqué as we now call it."—Castanheda, ii. 50.

"He (Mahmúd Sháh) was so powerful that he now presumed to style himself King of Canara, giving it the name of Deccan. And the name is said to have been given to it from the combination of different nations contained in it, because Dacani in their language signifies 'monk.'"—De Barros, Dec. ii. liv. v. cap. 2. (It is difficult to discover what has led astray here the usually well-informed De Barros).

1608.—"For the Portugalls of Daman had wrought with an ancient friend of theirs a Raga, who was absolute Lord of a Province (betweene Daman, Guzerat, and Deccan) called Cruly, to be ready with 200 Horsemen to stay my passage."—Capt. W. Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 209.

[1612.—"The Desanins, a people bordering on them (Portuguese) have besieged six of their port towns."—Dawers, Letters, i. 258.]

1616.—"... his son Sultan Coron, who he designed, should command in Deccan."—Sir T. Roe.

["There is a resolution taken that Sultan Caronne shall go to the Deccan Warses."—Ibdt. Hak. Soc. i. 192.]

[1623.—"A Moor of Deccan."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 225.]

1667.—"But such as at this day, to Indians known, In Malabar or Deccan spreads her arms."—Paradise Lost, ix. [1102-3].

1726.—"Deccan [as a division] includes Decan, Coonhem, and Balagutta."—Valentijs, v. 1.
DECCANY, adj., also used as subst. Properly dakhini, dakhkini, dakhni. Coming from the Deccan. A (Mahommedan) inhabitant of the Deccan. Also the very peculiar dialect of Hindustani spoken by such people.

1516.—"The Decani language, which is the natural language of the country."—Barbour, 77.

1572.—"... Decany, Orias, que e esperanca Tem de sua salvacao nas resonantes Aguas do Gange. ..."—Caesares, vii. 20.

1578.—"The Decanins (call the Betel-leaf) Pan."—Acosta, 189.

c. 1590.—"Hence Dakhinis are notorious in Hindustan for stupidity. ..."—Author quoted by Blochmann, Ain, i. 443.

[1813.—"... and the Decanne-bean (butea superbula) are very conspicuous."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 195.]

1861.—"Ah, I rode a Deccanee charger, with a saddle-cloth gold laced, And a Persian sword, and a twelve-foot spear, and a pistol at my waist."—Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

DECK, s. A look, a peep. Imp. of Hind. dekh-nd, 'to look.'

[1830.—"When on a sudden, coming to a check, Thompson's mahout called out, 'Dekhi! Sahib, Dekh!'"—Or. Sporting Mag., ed. 1873, i. 350.]

1854.—"... these formed the whole assemblage, with the occasional exception of some officer, stopping as he passed by, returning from his morning ride 'just to have a dekh at the steamer.' ..."—W. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 85.

DEEN, s. Ar. Hind. din, 'the faith.' The cry of excited Mahommedans, Din, Din!

c. 1580.—"... crying, as is their way, Dim, Dim, Mafumade, so that they filled earth and air with terror and confusion."—Primor et Honra, &c., f. 19.

c. 1760.—"The sound of ding Mahomed."—Orme, Military Trans. Madras reprint, ii. 339.

[1764.—"When our seapoys observed the enemy they gave them a ding or huza."

Carraccioli, Life of Clive i. 57.]

DELI, n.p. The famous capital of the great Moghuls, in the latter years of that family; and the seat under various names of many preceding dynasties, going back into ages of which we have no distinct record. Dilli is, according to Cunningham, the old Hindu form of the name; Dilli is that used by Mahommedans. According to Panjab Notes and Queries (ii. 117 seq.), Dilpat is traditionally the name of the Dilli of Prithvi Raja. Dil is an old Hind word for an eminence; and this is probably the etymology of Dilpat and Dilli. The second quotation from Correa curiously illustrates the looseness of his geography. [The name has become unpleasantly familiar in connection with the so-called 'Delli boat,' a form of Oriental sore, similar to Biskra Button, Aleppo Evil, Lahore or Multan Sore (see Delhi Gazetteer, 15, note.)] 1205.—(Muhammad Ghori marched "towards Delli (may God preserve its prosperity, and perpetuate its splendour!), which is among the chief (mother) cities of Hind."—Hasan Nizami, in Elliot, ii. 216.

c. 1321.—"Hanc terram (Tana, near Bombay) regunt Sarraceni, nunc subjecantes dal dilli. ... Audiens ipsa imperator dol Dali ... misit et ordinavit ut ipsa Lomelie penitus caperetur. ..."—Fr. Odoric. See Cathay, &c., App., pp. v. and x.

c. 1380.—"Dilli ... a certain traveller relates that the brick-built walls of this great city are loftier than the walls of Hamath; it stands in a plain on a soil of mingled stones and sand. At the distance of a parasang runs a great river, not so big, however, as Euphrates."—Abulfeda, in Goldsmiester, 189 seq.

c. 1384.—"The wall that surrounds Dilli has no equal. ... The city of Dilli has 28 gates ..." &c.—Ibn Batuta, iii. 147 seq.

c. 1375.—The Carta Catalana of the French Library shows ciudad de Dilli and also Lo Rey Dilli, with this rubric below it: "Acu estra un soldat gran e poderos molt rics. Aquest soldat ha d'or i or efis i c multia homens a cavall sot a seu imperi. Ha encara paus seus nombre. ..."

1518.—"This king of Deli confines with Tatars, and has taken many lands from the King of Cambay; and from the King of Delly, his servants and captains with many of his people, took much, and afterwards in time they revolted, and set themselves up as kings."—Barbosa, p. 100.

1533.—"And this kingdom to which the Badur proceeded was called the Dely; it was very great, but it was all disturbed by wars and the risings of one party against another, because the King was dead, and the sons were fighting with each other for the sovereignty."—Correa, iii. 500.

"This Kingdom of Dely is the greatest that is to be seen in those parts, for one point that it holds is in Persia, and the other is in contact with the Loochoos (or Lequios) beyond China."—Ibid. iii. 572.

c. 1568.—"About sixteen years past this King (of Cuttaack), with his Kingdom, were destroyed by the King of Pat- tane, which was also King of the greatest part of Bengal. But to this tyrant that enjoyed his Kingdom but a small time, but was conquered by another tyrant, which was the great Mogol King of Agra, Delly, and of all Cambay."—Caesar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 358.

1611.—"On the left hand is seen the carkasse of old Dely, called the nine castles and fittie-two gates, now inhabited only by Googers. . . . The city is 2° betweene Gate and Gate, begirt with a strong wall, but much ruinate. . . ."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 430.

DELING, s. This was a kind of hammock conveyance, suspended from a pole, mentioned by the old travellers in Pegu. The word is not known to Burmese scholars, and is perhaps a Persian word. Meninski gives "deleng, adj. pendulus, suspensus." The thing seems to be the Malayalam Manchil. (See MUNKCHEE and DANDY.)

1569.—"Carried in a closet which they call Deling, in which a man shall be very well accommodated, with cushions under his head."—Caesar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 367.

1585.—"This Delingo is a strong cotton cloth doubled, . . . as big as an ordinary rug, and having an iron at each end to attach it by, so that in the middle it hangs like a pouch or purse. These irons are attached to a very thick cane, and this is borne by four men. . . . When you go on a journey, a cushion is put at the head of this Delingo, and you get in, and lay your head on the cushion."&c.—Gasparo Bulbi, f. 990.

1587.—"From Cirion we went to Macao, which is a pretie towne, where we left our boats and Paroos, and in the morning taking Delingegees, which are a kind of Coches made of cords and cloth quilted, and carried upon a stang between 3 and 4 men: we came to Pegu the same day."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 391.

DELLY, MOUNT. n.p. Port. Monte D'Eli. A mountain on the Malabar coast which forms a remarkable object from seaward, and the name of which occurs sometimes as applied to a State or City adjoining the mountain. It is prominently mentioned in all the old books on India, though strange to say the Map of India in Keith Johnstone's Royal Atlas has neither name nor indication of this famous hill. [It is shown in Constable's Hand Atlas.] It was, according to Correa, the first Indian land seen by Vasco da Gama. The name is Malayal. Eli mala, 'High Mountain.' Several erroneous explanations have however been given. A common one is that it means 'Seven Hills.' This arose with the compiler of the local Skt. Mahatmyya or legend, who rendered the name Septasaiia, 'Seven Hills,' confounding eli with elu, 'seven,' which has no application. Again we shall find it explained as 'Rat-hill,' but here eli is substituted for elu. [The Madras Gloss. gives the word as Mal. ezhimala, and explains it as 'Rat-hill,' 'because infested by rats.'] The position of the town and port of Ely or Hili mentioned by the older travellers is a little doubtful, but see Marco Polo, notes to Bk. III. ch. xxiv. The Ely-Maide of the Puntin- gerian Tables is not unlikely to be an indication of Ely.

1298.—"Eli is a Kingdom towards the west, about 300 miles from Comari. . . . There is no proper harbour in the country, but there are many rivers with good estuaries, wide and deep."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 24.

c. 1330.—"Three days journey beyond this city (Manjarir, i.e. Mangalore) there is a great hill which projects into the sea, and is descried by travellers from afar, the promontory called Hili."—Abulfeda, in Gildeemeister, 185.

c. 1343.—"At the end of that time we set off for Hili, where we arrived two days later. It is a large well-built town on a great bay (or estuary) which big ships enter."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 81.

c. 1440.—"Proceeding onwards he . . . arrived at two cities situated on the sea shore, one named Facamuria, and the other Helly."—Niccolo Conti, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 6.

1516.—"After passing this place along the coast is the Mountain Delly, on the edge of the sea; it is a round mountain, very lofty, in the midst of low land; all the ships of the Moors and the Gentiles . . .
sight this mountain... and make their reckoning by it."—Barbosa, 149.

c. 1562.—"In twenty days they got sight of land, which the pilots foretold before that they saw it, this was a great mountain which is on the coast of India, in the Kingdom of Canaror, which the people of the country in their language call the mountain Deli, elly meaning 'the rat';* and they call it Mount Deli, because in this mountain there are so many rats that they could never make a village there."—Correa, Three Voyages, &c., Hak. Soc. 145.

1579.—"... Malik Ben Habebo... proceeded first to Quilion... and after erecting a mosque in that town and settling his wife there, he himself journeyed to [Hill Marâwî],..."—Rowlandson's Tr. of Tahfifat-Mujahidin, p. 54. (Here and elsewhere in this ill-edited book Hill Marâwî is read and printed Hadbace Maravee).

1623.—"... a high Hill, inland near the seashore, call'd Monte Deli."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 355.

1638.—"Sur le midy nous passassè le veiie de Monte-Leone, qui est vne haute montagne dont les Malabares soussourrent de loin les vaisseaux, qu'ils penuent attaquèr avec avantage."—Mandelslo, 275.

1727.—"And three leagues south from Mount Delly is a spacious deep River called Balliapatam, where the English Company had once a Factory for Pepper."—A. Hamilton, i. 291; [ed. 1744, ii. 293].

1759.—"We are further to remark that the late troubles at Tellicherry, which proved almost fatal to that settlement, took rise from a dispute with our linguist and the Prince of that Country, relative to lands he, the linguist, held at Mount Dilly."—Court's Letter of March 23. In Long, 198.

DEOLL, s. A broker; H. from Ar. dâllâl; the literal meaning being one who directs (the buyer and seller to their bargain). In Egypt the word is now also used in particular for a broker of old clothes and the like, as described by Lane below. (See also under NEBLÂM.)

[c. 1665.—"He spared also the house of a deceased Delale or Gentile broker, of the Dutch."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 188. In the first English trans. this passage runs: "He has also regard to the House of the Deceased De Lade."]

1854.—"Five Delolls, or Brokers, of Decca, after they had been with me went to Mr. Beard's chamber. ..."—Hedges, Diary, July 25; [Hak. Soc. i. 152].

1754.—"Mr. Baillie at Jugdea, accused by these villains, our dulols, who carried on for a long time their most flagrant rascality. The Dulols at Jugdea found to charge the Company 15 per cent. beyond the price of the goods."—Fort Wm. Cons. In Long, p. 58.

1824.—"I was about to answer in great wrath, when a dalal, or broker, went by, loaded with all sorts of second-hand clothes, which he was hawking about for sale."—Hajji Buba, ed. i. 183; [ed. 1851, p. 81].

1835.—"In many of the shops in Cairo, auctions are held... once or twice a week. They are conducted by 'dellâls' (or brokers). The 'dellâls' carry the goods up and down, announcing the sums bidden by the cries of 'harig.'"—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, p. 317; [5th ed. ii. 13].

DEMIJOHN, s. A large glass bottle holding 20 or 30 quarts, or more. The word is not Anglo-Indian, but it is introduced here because it has been supposed to be the corruption of an Arabic word, and suggested to have been taken from the name of Damaghân in Persia. This looks plausible (compare the Persian origin of carboy, which is another name for just the same thing), but no historical proof has yet been adduced, and it is doubted by Mr. Marsh in his Notes on Wedgwood's Dictionary, and by Dozy (Sup. aux Dict. Arabes). It may be noticed, as worthy of further enquiry, that Sir T. Herbert (192) speaks of the abundance and cheapness of wine at Damaghân. Niebuhr, however, in a passage quoted below, uses the word as an Oriental one, and in a note on the 5th ed. of Lane's Mod. Egyptians, 1860, p. 149, there is a remark quoted from Hammer-Purgstall as to the omission from the detail of domestic vessels of two whose names have been adopted in European languages, viz. the garra or jarra, a water 'jar,' and the demijahn or demijên, 'la dame-jeanne.' The word is undoubtedly known in modern Arabic. The Mohit of B. Bistânî, the chief modern native lexicron, explains Dâmijânâ as 'a great glass vessel, big-bellied and narrow-necked, and covered with wicker-work; a Persian word.* The vulgar use the forms damajânâ and daman-jânâ. Dame-jeanne appears in P. Richelet, Dict. de la Langue France. (1759), with this definition: "[Lagena amplior] Nom que les matelots donnent à une grande bouteille couverte

* A correction is made here on Lord Stanley's translation.

* Probably not much stress can be laid on this last statement. [The N.E.D. thinks that the Arabic word came from the West].
DEODAR, s. The name applied to a kind of fever. The term is of West Indian, not East Indian, origin, and has only become known and familiar in India within the last 30 years or more. The origin of the name which seems to be generally accepted is, that owing to the stiff unbending carriage which the fever induced in those who suffered from it, the negroes in the W. Indies gave it the name of 'dandy' fever; and this name, taken up by the Spaniards, was converted into dengy or dengue. [But according to the N.E.D. both 'dandy' and 'dengue' are corruptions of the Swahili term, ka denga peyo, 'sudden cramp-like seizure by an evil spirit.]

Some of its usual characteristics are the great suddenness of attack; often a red eruption; pain amounting sometimes to anguish in head and back, and shifting pains in the joints; excessive and sudden prostration; after-pains of rheumatic character. Its epidemic occurrences are generally at long intervals.

Omitting such occurrences in America and in Egypt, symptoms attach to an epidemic on the Coromandel coast about 1790 which point to this disease; and in 1824 an epidemic of the kind caused much alarm and suffering in Calcutta, Berhampore, and other places in India. This had no repetition of equal severity in that quarter till 1871-72, though there had been a minor visitation in 1853, and a succession of cases in 1868-69. In 1873 it was so prevalent in Calcutta that among those in the service of the E. I. Railway Company, European and native, prior to August in that year, 70 per cent. had suffered from the disease; and whole households were sometimes attacked at once. It became endemic in Lower Bengal for several seasons. When the present writer (H. Y.) left India (in 1862) the name dengue may have been known to medical men, but it was quite unknown to the lay European public.

1885.—THE CONTAGION OF DENGUE FEVER.

"In a recent issue (March 14th, p. 551) under the heading Dengue Fever in New Caledonia," you remark that, although there had been upwards of nine hundred cases, yet, "curiously enough," there had not been one death. May I venture to say that the 'curiosity' would have been much greater had there been a death? For, although this disease is one of the most infectious, and as I can testify from unpleasant personal experience, one of the most painful that there is, yet death is a very rare occurrence. In an epidemic at Bermuda in 1882, in which about five hundred cases came under my observation, not one death was recorded. In that epidemic, which attacked both whites and blacks impartially, inflammation of the cellular tissue, affecting chiefly the face, neck, and scrotum, was especially prevalent as a sequel, none but the lightest cases escaping. I am not aware that this is noted in the text-books as a characteristic of the disease; in fact, the descriptions in the books then available to me, differed greatly from the disease as I then found it, and I believe that was the experience of other medical officers at the time. . . . During the epidemic of dengue above mentioned, an officer who was confined to his quarters, convalescing from the disease, wrote a letter home to his father in England, about three days after the receipt of the letter, that gentleman complained of being ill, and eventually, from his description, had a rather severe attack of what, had he been in Bermuda, would have been called dengue fever. As it was, his medical attendant was puzzled to give a name to it. The disease did not spread to the other members of the family, and the patient made a good recovery."—Henry J. Barnes, Surgeon, Medical Staff, Fort Pitt, Chatam." From British Medical Journal, April 25.

DEODAR, s. The Cedrus deodara, Loud., of the Himalaya, now known as an ornamental tree in England for some seventy-five years past. The finest specimens in the Himalaya are often found in clumps shadowing a small temple. The Deodar is now regarded by botanists as a variety of Cedrus Libani. It is confined to the W. Himalaya from Nepal to Afghanistain; it reappears as the Cedar of Lebanon in Syria, and on through Cyprus and Asia Minor; and emerges U once more in Algeria, and thence westwards to the Riff Mountains in Morocco, under the name of C. Atlantica. The word occurs in Avicenna, who speaks of the Deodur as yielding a kind of turpentine (see below). We may note that an article called Deodarwood Oil appears in Dr. Forbes Watson's "List of Indian Products." (No. 2941) and see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 235.

Deodar is by no means the universal name of the great Cedar in the Himalaya. It is called so (Dewdar, Dīdr, or Dydr [Drew, Jummo, 100]) in Kashmir, where the deodar pillars of the great mosque of Srinagar date from A.D. 1401. The name, indeed (devadar, 'timber of the gods'), is applied in different parts of India to different trees, and even in the Himalaya to more than one. The list just referred to (which however has not been revised critically) gives this name in different modifications as applied also to the pencil Cedar (Juniperus excelsa), to Guatteria (or Uvaria) longifolia, to Sthitha Indica, to Erythrozyon areolatum, and (on the Rāvī and Sutlej) to Cupressus torulosa.

The Deodar first became known to Europeans in the beginning of the last century, when specimens were sent to Dr. Roxburgh, who called it a Pīnus. Seeds were sent to Europe by Capt. Gerard in 1819; but the first that grew were those sent by the Hon. W. Leslie Melville in 1822.

c. 1030.—"Deudur (or rather Dīdur) est ex genere abbel (i.e. juniper) quae dieitur pinus Inda, et Syr deudur (Milk of Deodar) est ejus lac (turpentine)."—Avicenna, Lat. Transl. p. 297.

c. 1220.—"He sent for two trees, one of which was a... white poplar, and the other a deodar, that is a fir. He planted them both on the boundary of Kashmir."—Chack Nāma in Elliot, i. 134.

DERRISHACST, adj. This extraordinary word is given by C. B. P. (MS.) as a corruption of P. daryāšikast, 'destroyed by the river.'

DERVISH, s. P. darvāsh; a member of a Mahomedan religious order. The word is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians, fakīr [see FAKIR] having taken its place. On the Mahomedan confraternities of this class, see Herklots, 179 seqq.; Lane, Mod. Egyptians, Brown's Dervishes, or Oriental Spiritualism; Capt. E. de Neve, Les Kouans, Ordres Religieux chez les Musulmans (Paris, 1846).

c. 1540.—"The dog Cōna Aem... crying out with a loud voice, that every one might hear him... To them, To them, for as we are assured by the Book of Flowers, wherein the Prophet Noby doth promise eternal delights to the Dāroees of the House of Mecca, that he will keep his word both with you and me, provided that we bathe ourselves in the blood of these dogs without Lane!"—Pinto (cap. i.), in Cogan, 72.

1554.—"Hic multa didicius am monachis Turcicis, quos Dervis vocant."—Bisbeq, Epist. 1. p. 93.

1616.—"Among the Mahometans are many called Dervises, which relinquish the World, and spend their days in Solitude."—Terry, in Parkeas, ii. 1477.

[c. 1630.—"Dervissi." See TALISMAN.]

1653.—"Il estoit Dervische ou Fakir et menoit une vie solitaire dans les bois."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 182.

1670.—"Aureng-Zebe... was reserved, crafty, and exceedingly versed in dissembling, insomuch that for a long time he made profession to be a Fakire, that is, Poor, Dervich, or Devout, renouncing the World."—Berner, E.T. 3; [ed. Constable, 10].

1673.—"The Dervises professing Poverty, assume this Garb here (i.e. in Persia), but not with that state they ramble up and down in India."—Fryer, 392.

DESSAYE, s. Mahir. dēsā'ī; in W. and S. India a native official in charge of a district, often held hereditarily; a petty chief. (See DISSAVE.)

1590-91.—"... the Desayes, Mukaddams, and inhabitants of several parganahs made a complaint at Court."—Order in Mirat-ul-Ahkād (Bird's Tr.), 408.

[1811.—"Daisey."—Kirkpatrick, Letters of Tipppo, p. 196.]

1883.—"The Desai of Sawantwari has arrived at Delhi on a visit. He is accompanied by a European Assistant Political Officer and a large following. From Delhi His Highness goes to Agra, and visits Calcutta before returning to his territory, viz Madras."—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 24.

The regular title of this chief appears to be Sar-Desāīi.

DESTOOR, s. A Parsee priest; P. dastār, from the Pahlavi dastobār, 'a prime minister, councillor of State... a high priest, a bishop of the Parsees; a custom, mode, manner' (Hawy, Old Pahlavi and Paved Glossary). [See DUSTOOR.]
DEUTI, DUTY. 307

DEUTI, DUTY. 307

DEUTI, DUTY, s. H. ditfi, deuti, deot, Skt. dida, ‘a lamp’; a lampstand, but also a link-bearer.

DEVIL-BIRD, s. A pettj whirlwind, or circular storm, is often so called. (See PISACHEE, SHAITAN, TYPHOON.)

DEVIL-BIRD, s. A name used in Ceylon for a bird believed to be a kind of owl—according to Haeckel, quoted below, the Symbrium Indutans of Sykes, or Brown Wolf Owl of Jerdon. Mr. Mitford, quoted below, however, believes it to be a Podargus, or Night-hawk.

DEVA-DASI, s. H. ‘Slave-girl of the gods’; the official name of the poor girls who are devoted to dancing and prostitution in the idol-temples of Southern India especially. “The like existed at ancient Corinth under the name of ἱππόβουλος, which is nearly a translation of the Hindi name...” (See Strabo, VIII. 9.)

—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 338. These appendages of Aphrodite worship, borrowed from Phoenicia, were the same thing as the κέλδεσθος repeatedly mentioned in the Old Testament, e.g. Deut. xxiii. 18: “Thou shalt not bring the wages of a κέλδεσθος... into the House of Jehovah.” [See Cheyne, in Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1964 seq.] Both male and female ἱππόβουλος are mentioned in the famous inscription of Citium in Cyprus (Corp. Inscr. Semit. No. 86); the latter under the name of ‘alma, curiously near that of the modern Egyptian ‘alima. (See DANCING-GIRL.)

1702.—“Pett de temps aprés je baptisé une Deva-Dachi, ou Esclave Divine, c’est ainsi qu’on appelle les femmes dont les Prêtres des idoles abusent, sous prétexte que leurs dieux les demandent.”—Lettres Edifiantes, x. 245.

DEVI, s. 1790.—“La principale occupation des devedaschies, est de danser devant l’image de la divinité qu’elles servent, et de chanter ses louanges, soit dans son temple, soit dans les rues, lorsqu’on porte l’idole dans des processions. ...”—Hauffier ii. 105.

1868.—“The Dási, the dancing girls attached to Pagodas. They are each of them married to an idol when quite young. Their male children... have no difficulty in acquiring a decent position in society. The female children are generally brought up to the trade of their mothers.... It is customary with a few castes to present their superfluous daughters to the Pagodas....”—Nelson’s Madura, Pt. 2, p. 79.

DEVI, s. A petty whirlwind, or circular storm, is often so called. (See PISACHEE, SHAITAN, TYPHOON.)

1608-10.—“Often you see coming from afar great whirlwinds which the sailors call dragons.”—Pygourd de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 11.

1813.—“... we were often surrounded by the little whirlwinds called bugudas, or Devila.”—Forbes, Or. Men. 2nd ed. i. 118.

DEVIL, s. This is a name used in Ceylon for a bird believed to be a kind of owl—according to Haeckel, quoted below, the Symbrium Indutans of Sykes, or Brown Wood Owl of Jerdon. Mr. Mitford, quoted below, however, believes it to be a Podargus, or Night-hawk.

1328.—“Quid dicam? Diabolus ibi etiam loquitur, saepe et saepius, hominibus, nocturnis temporibus, sicut ego audivi.”—Jordanii Mirabilia, in Rec. de Voyages, iv. 53.

1681.—“This for certain I can affirm, that oftentimes the Devil doth cry with an audible Voice in the Night; ‘tis very shrill, almost like the barking of a Dog. This I have often heard myself; but never heard that he did anybody any harm. ... To believe that this is the Voice of the Devil these reasons urge, because there is no Creature known to the Inhabitants, that cry like it, and because it will on a sudden depart from one place, and make a noise in another, quicker than any fowl could fly; and because the very Dogs will tremble and shake when they hear it.”—Knöz’s Ceylon, 78.

1849.—“Devil’s Bird (Strix Gaulama or Ulama, Singh.). A species of owl. The wild and wailing cry of this bird is considered a sure presage of death and misfortune, unless measures be taken to avert its infernal threats, and refuse its warning. Though often heard even on the tops of their houses, the natives maintain that it has never been caught or distinctly seen, and they consider it to be one of the most annoying of the evil spirits which haunt their country.”—Pridham’s Ceylon, p. 737-8.
1860.—"The Devil-Bird, is not an owl... its ordinary note is a magnificent clear shout like that of a human being, and which can be heard at a great distance. It has another cry like that of a hen just caught, but the sounds which have earned for it its bad name... are indescribable, the most appalling that can be imagined, and scarcely to be heard without shuddering; I can only compare it to a boy in torture, whose screams are being stopped by being strangled."—Mr. Mitford's Note in Tennent's Ceylon, i. 167.

1881.—"The uncanny cry of the devilbird, Surniun Indrani..."—Haeckel's Visit to Ceylon, 235.

DEWAL'S REACH, n.p. This was the old name of a reach on the Hoogly R. a little above Pulta (and about 15 miles above Calcutta). On that reach are several groups of dewals, or idol-temples, which probably gave the name.

1864.—"August 28—I borrowed the late Dutch Fiscall's Budgero (see BUDGEROW), and went in Company with Mr. Beard, Mr. Littleton (etc.) "as far as ye Devil's Reach, where I caused ye tents to be pitched in expectation of ye President's arrival and lay here all night."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 168.

1711.—"From the lower Point of Devil's Reach you must keep mid-channel, or nearest the Starboard Shore, for the Lardboard is shoal until you come into the beginning of Pulta or Punto Reach, and there abreast of a single great Tree, you must edge over to the East Shore below Pulta."—The English Pilot, 54.

DEVIL WORSHIP. This phrase is a literal translation of bhûtâ-pûjâ, i.e. worship of bhûtas [see BHUT], a word which appears in slightly differing forms in various languages of India, including the Tamil country. A bhûta, or as in Tamil more usually, pûy, is a malignant being which is conceived to arise from the person of anyone who has come to a violent death. This superstition, in one form or another, seems to have formed the religion of the Dravidian tribes of S. India before the introduction of Brahmanism, and is still the real religion of nearly all the low castes in that region, whilst it is often patronized also by the higher castes. These superstitions, and especially the demonolatrous rites called 'devil-dancing,' are identical in character with those commonly known as Shamanism [see SHAMAN], and which are spread all over Northern Asia, among the red races of America, and among a vast variety of tribes in Ceylon and in Indo-China, not excluding the Burmese. A full account of the demon-worship of Tinnevelly was given by Bp. Caldwell in a small pamphlet on the "Tinnevelly Shanars" (Madras 1849), and interesting evidence of its identity with the Shamanism of other regions will be found in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 579 seq.); see also Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 79 seq. ; [Oppert. Orig. Inhabit. of Bharatavarsha, 554 seq.]

DÉWAL, DÉWALÉ, s. H. dêwal, Skt. deva-âlîka; a Temple or pagoda. This, or Dewalgarh, is the phrase commonly used in the Bombay territory for a Christian church. In Ceylon Dewâlî is a temple dedicated to a Hindu god.

1681.—"The second order of Priests are those called Köppûna, who are the Priests that belong to the Temples of the other Gods (i.e. other than Buddha, or Buddha). Their Temples are called Dewals."—Knox, Ceylon, 79.

[1797.—"The Company will settle... the dewal or temple charge."—Treaty, in Logan, Madr. iii. 285.

[1813.—"They plant it (the nayna tree) near the dewals or Hindoo temples, improperly called Pagodas."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 15].

DEWALEEÀ, s. H. diwâliyâ, 'a bankrupt,' from dewâli, 'bankruptcy,' and that, though the etymology is disputed, is alleged to be connected with diya, 'a lamp'; because "it is the custom... when a merchant finds himself failing, or failed, to set up a blazing lamp in his house, shop, or office, and abscond therefrom for some time until his creditors are satisfied by a disclosure of his accounts or dividend of assets."—Drummond's Illustrations (s.v.).

DEWALLY, s. H. dîvalî, from Skt. di-pa-âlîka, 'a row of lamps,' i.e. an illumination. An autumnal feast attributed to the celebration of various divinities, as of Lakshmî and of Bhavâni, and also in honour of Krishna's slaying of the demon Naraka, and the release of 16,000 maidens, his prisoners. It is held on the last two days of the dark half of the month Âśvina or Âśā, and on the new moon and four following days of Kartika, i.e.
usually some time in October. But there are variations of Calendrier in different parts of India, and feasts will not always coincide, e.g. at the three Presidency towns, nor will any curt expression define the dates. In Bengal the name Dipawali is not used; it is Kāli Pājā, the feast of that grim goddess, a midnight festival on the most moonless nights of the month, celebrated by illuminations and fireworks, on land and river, by feasting, carousing, gambling, and sacrifice of goats, sheep, and buffaloes.

1623.—"October the four and twentieth was the Davali, or Feast of the Indian Gentiles."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 206.

1651.—"In the month of October, eight days after the full moon, there is a feast held in honour of Vistnou, which is called Dipāvāli."—A. Roqueiras, De Open-Deure.

1671. — "In October they begin their yeare with great feasting, Jollity, Sending Presents to all they have any busynes with, which time is called Dually."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxiv.

1673.—"The first New Moon in October is the Banyan's Dually."—Fryer, 110.

1690.—"... their Grand Festival Season, called the Dually Time."—Ovington, 401.

1820.—"The Dewalee, Deepaullee, or Time of Lights, takes place 20 days after the Dussera, and lasts three days; during which there is feasting, illumination, and fireworks."—T. Coats, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., ii. 211.

1843.—"Nov. 5. The Diwali, happening to fall on this day, the whole river was bright with lamps..." Ever and anon some votary would offer up his prayers to Lakshmi the Fortune, and launch a tiny raft bearing a cluster of lamps into the water,—then watch it with fixed and anxious gaze. If it floats on till the far distance hides it, thrice happy he... but if, caught in some wild eddy of the stream, it disappears at once, so will the bark of his fortunes be engulfed in the whirlpool of adversity."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 84.

1883.—"The Divali is celebrated with splendid effect at Benares... At the approach of night small earthen lamps, fed with oil, are prepared by millions, and placed quite close together, so as to mark out every line of mansion, palace, temple, minaret, and dome in streaks of fire."—Monier Williams, Religious Thought and Life in India, 432.

DEWAUN, s. The chief meanings of this word in Anglo-Indian usage are: (1) Under the Mahommedan Governments which preceded us, "the head financial minister, whether of the state or a province... charged, in the latter, with the collection of the revenue, the remittance of it to the imperial treasury, and invested with extensive judicial powers in all civil and financial causes" (Wilson). It was in this sense that the grant of the Dewaun (q.v.) to the E. I. Company in 1765 became the foundation of the British Empire in India. (2) The prime minister of a native State, (3) The chief native officer of certain Government establishments, such as the Mint; or the native manager of a Zemindary. (4) (In Bengal) a native servant in confidential charge of the dealings of a house of business with natives, or of the affairs of a large domestic establishment. These meanings are perhaps all reducible to one conception, of which 'Steward' would be an appropriate expression. But the word has had many other ramifications of meaning, and has travelled far.

The Arabian divân is, according to Lane, an Arabicized word of Persian origin (though some hold it for pure Arabic), and is in original meaning nearly equivalent to Persian daftar (see DUFFER), i.e. a collection of written leaves or sheets (forming a book for registration); hence 'a register of accounts'; a 'register of soldiers or pensioners'; a 'register of the rights or dues of the State, or relating to the acts of government, the finances and the administration'; also any book, and especially a collection of the poems of some particular poet. It was also applied to signify 'an account'; then a 'writer of accounts'; a 'place of such writers of accounts'; also a 'council, court, or tribunal'; and in the present day, a 'long seat formed of a mattress laid along the wall of a room, with cushions, raised or on the floor'; or two or more of such seats. Thus far (in this paragraph) we abstract from Lane.

The Arabian historian Bilâdûrî (c. 860) relates as to the first introduction of the diwân that, when 'Omar was discussing with the people how to divide the enormous wealth derived from the conquests in his time, Walid bin Hishâm bin Moghâira said to the caliph, 'I have been in Syria, and saw that its kings make a diwân; do thou the like.' So 'Omar accepted his advice, and sent for two men of the Persian tongue, and said to them: 'Write down the people according to their rank' (and corresponding pensions)."

We must observe that in the Mahomedan States of the Mediterranean the word diwan became especially applied to the Custom-house, and thus passed into the Romance languages as aduan, douane, dogana, &c. Littre indeed avoids any decision as to the etymology of douane, &c. And Hyde (Note on Abr. Peritso, in Syntagma Dissert. i. 101) derives dogana from docan (i.e. P. dukán, 'officina, a shop'). But such passages as that below from Ibn Jubaib, and the fact that, in the medieval Florentine treaties with the Mahomedan powers of Barbary and Egypt, the word diwan in the Arabic texts constantly represents the dogana of the Italian, seem sufficient to settle the question (see Amari, Diplom. Arabi del Real Archivio, &c.; e.g. p. 104, and (Latin) p. 305, and in many other places).† The Spanish Dict. of Cobarruvis (1611) quotes Ureña as saying that," from the Arabic noun Divanan, which signifies the house where the duties are collected, we form diuana, and hence aduiana, and lastly aduana."

At a later date the word was re-imported into Europe in the sense of a hall furnished with Turkish couches and cushions, as well as of a couch of this kind. Hence we get cigar-divans, and hoc genus omne. The application to certain collections of poems is noticed above. It seems to be especially applied to assemblages of short poems of homogeneous character. Thus the Odes of Horace, the Sonnets of Petrarch, the In Memoriam of Tennyson, answer to the character of Diwan so used. Hence also Goethe took the title of his West-Ostliche Divan.

c. A. D. 636.—"... in the Caliphate of Omar the spoils of Syria and Persia began in ever-increasing volume to pour into the treasury of Medina, where it was distributed almost as soon as received. What was easy in small beginnings by equal sharing or discretionary preference, became now a heavy task... At length, in the 2nd or 3rd year of his Caliphat, Omar determined that the importation should be regulated on a fixed and systematic scale... To carry out this vast design, a Register had to be drawn and kept up of every man, woman, and child, entitled to a stipend from the State... The Register itself, as well as the office for its maintenance and for pensionary account, was called the Dewan or Department of the Exchequer."—Mair's Annals, &c., pp. 228-9.

[1690.—"Fearing miscarriage of ye Original farrcuette [fārīgh-khafī], Ar. 'a deed of release,' variously corrupted in Indian technical use we have here!th Sent you a Copyy Attested by Hugly Caze, hoping ye Duan may be Satisfieth therein."—MS. Letter in India Office, from Job Charnock and others at Chuttanute to Mr. Ch. Eyre at Baltasore.

c. 1718.—"Even the Divan of the Qalissah Office, who is, properly speaking, the Minister of the finances, or at least the accoumtant general, was become a mere cypher, or a body without a soul."—Seir Mutaghiriin, i. 110.

1762.—"A letter from Dacca states that the Hon'ble Company's Dewan (Manikchand) died on the morning of this letter. As they apprehend he has died worth a large sum of money which the Government's people (i.e. of the Nawab) may be desirous to possess to the injury of his lawful heirs, they request the protection of the flag... to the family of a man who has served the Company for upwards of 30 years with care and fidelity."—Ft. Wm. Cons., Nov. 29. In Long, 293.

1766.—"There then resided at his Court a Gentoo named Allum Chund, who had been many years Dewan to Soujah Khan, by whom he was much revered for his great age, wisdom, and faithful services."—Holwell, Hist. Events, i. 74.

1771.—"By our general address you will be informed that we have to be dissatisfied with the administration of Mahomet Reza Cawn, and will perceive the expediency of our divesting him of the rank and influence he holds as Naib Duan of the Kingdom of Bengal."—Court of Directors to W. Hastings, in Ogyg, i. 121.

1789.—"The Committee, with the best intentions, best abilities, and steadiness of application, must after all be a tool in the hands of their Duan."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 74.

* We owe this quotation, as well as that below from Ibn Jubaib, to the kindness of Prof. Robertson Smith. On the proceedings of Omar see also Sir Wm. Mair's Annals of the Early Caliphate in the chapter quoted below.

† At p. 6 there is an Arabic letter, dated A. D. 1290, from Abdurrahman Ibn Ali Tahir, 'al-nasir bā-adiwan Jīrgīya', inspector of the dogana of Africa. But in the Latin version this appears as Rector omnium Christianorum qui vintit in totam provinciam de Africa (p. 270). In another letter, without date, from Yusuf Ibn Mahomed Sīth dibān Tuna wal-Mahdia, Amari renders 'preposto della dogana di Tunis,' &c. (p. 311).
1834.—"His (Raja of Ulwar’s) Dewanjee, Balmochun, who chanced to be in the neighbourhood, with 6 Risalas of horse . . . was further ordered to go out and meet me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, ii. 132.

[1861.—See quotation under AMEEN.]

In the following quotations the identity of diwan and douane or dogana is shown more or less clearly.

A.D. 1178.—"The Moslem were ordered to disembark their goods (at Alexandria), and what remained of their stock of provisions; and on the shore were officers who took them in charge, and carried all that was landed to the Diwan. They were called forward one by one; the property of each was brought out, and the Diwan was straitened with the crowd. The search fell on every article, small or great; one thing got mixt up with another, and hands were thrust into the midst of the packages to discover if anything were concealed in them. Then, after this, an oath was administered to the owners that they had nothing more than had been found. Amid all this, in the confusion of hands and the greatness of the crowd many things went amiss. At length the passengers were dismissed after a scene of humiliation and great ignominy, for which we pray God to grant an ample recompense. But this, past doubt, is one of the things kept hidden from the great Sultan Salâh-ud-dîn, whose well-known justice and benevolence are such that, if he knew it, he would certainly abolish the practice" [viz. as regards Mecca pilgrims].—Ibn Jubair, orig. in Wright’s ed., p. 36.

c. 1340.—"Doana in all the cities of the Saracens, in Sicily, in Naples, and throughout the Kingdom of Apulia . . . Dazio at Venice; Gabelita throughout Tuscany; . . . Costumà throughout the Island of England. . . . All these names mean duties which have to be paid for goods and wares and other things, imported to, or exported from, or passed through the countries and places in question. . . ."—Francesco Balducci Pegolotti, see Cathay, &c., ii. 285-6.

c. 1348.—"They then order the skipper to state in detail all the goods that the vessel contains. . . . Then everybody lands, and the keepers of the custom-house (al-diwan) sit and pass in review whatever one has."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 265.

The following medieval passage in one of our note-books remains a fragment without date or source:

* The present generation in England can have no conception how closely this description applies to what took place at many an English port before Sir Robert Peel’s great changes in the import tariff. The present writer, in landing from a P. & O. steamer at Portsmouth in 1848, after four or five days’ quarantine in the Solent, had to go through five to six hours of such treatment as Ibn Jubair describes, and his feelings were very much the same as the Moor’s.—(H. Y.)

1440.—The Handbook of Giovanni da Uzzano, published along with Pegolotti by Pagnini (1765-66) has for custom-house Duana, which corroborates the identity of Dogana with Dwân.

A Council Hall:

1367.—"Husyn, fearing for his life, came down and hid himself under the tower, but his enemies . . . surrounded the mosque, and having found him, brought him to the (Dyvan-Khane) Council Chamber."—Mem. of Timur, tr. by Stewart, p. 130.

1554.—"Utenque sit, cum mane in Divanum (is concilii vt alias dixi locus est) imprudens omnium venisset. . . ."—Busbequii Epistolae, ii. p. 138.

1676.—"On the side that looks towards the River, there is a Divan, or a kind of out-jutting Balcony, where the King sits."—Taverner, E.T. ii. 49; [ed. Balf., i. 108].

1785.—"It seems to have been intended for a Duan Konna, or eating room."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 383.

A Collection of Poems:

1783.—"One (writer) died a few years ago at Benares, of the name of Souda, who composed a Dewan in Moors."—Trigunmouth, Mem. i. 105.

DEWAUNY, DEWAUNNY, &c., s. Properly, divânî; popularly, dewânî. The office of divân (Dewaan); and especially the right of receiving as divân the revenue of Bengal, Behar, and Oriissa, conferred upon the E. I. Company by the Great Mogul Shâh ’Alam in 1765. Also used sometimes for the territory which was the subject of that grant.

1765.—(Lord Clive) visited the Vezer, and having exchanged with him some sumptuous entertainments and curious and magnificent presents, he explained the project he had in his mind, and asked that the Company should be invested with the Dewanish (no doubt in orig. Diwâni) of the three provinces. . . ."—Seir Mutaghiri, ii. 384.

1783.—(The opium monopoly) is stated to have begun at Patna so early as the year 1761, but it received no considerable degree of strength until the year 1765; when the acquisition of the Duane opened a wide field for all projects of this nature."—Report of a Committee on Affairs of India, in Burke’s Life and Works, vi. 447.
DEWAUNY, DEWANNY, adj. Civil, as distinguished from Criminal; e.g. Divwnt 'Adlal as opposite to Fanjádri Adlal. (See ADAWULT). The use of Divwnt for civil as opposed to criminal is probably modern and Indian. For Kämpfer in his account of the Persian administration at the end of the 17th century, has: "Diwaen begi, id est, Supremus crimin-alis Judicii Dominus . . . de latrocinis et homicidiis non modo in hác Regiá metropoli, verum etiam in toto Regno disponendi facultatem habet." — Amoenit. Æcot. 80.

DHALL, DOLL, s. Hind. dál, a kind of pulse much used in India, both by natives as a kind of porridge, and by Europeans as an ingredient in kedgeree (q.v.), or to mix with rice as a breakfast dish. It is best represented in England by what are called 'split peas.' The proper dál, which Wilson derives from the Skt. root dal, 'to divide' (and which thus corresponds in meaning also to 'split pea'), is, according to the same authority, Phaseolus aureus; but, be that as it may, the dáls most commonly in use are varieties of the shrubby plant Cajanus Indicus, Spreng., called in Hind. arbar, rahar, &c. It is not known where this is indigenous; [De Candolle thinks it probably a native of tropical Africa, introduced perhaps 3,000 years ago into India;] it is cultivated throughout India. The term is also applied occasionally to other pulses, such as mung, wurd, &c. (See MOONG, OORD.) It should also be noted that in its original sense dál is not the name of a particular pea, but the generic name of pulses prepared for use by being broken in a hand-mill; though the peas named are those commonly used in Upper India in this way.

1673.—"At their coming up out of the Water they bestow the largess of Rice or Doll (an Indian Bean)." — Fryer, 101.

1690.—"Kitcheree . . . made of Doll, that is, a small round Pea, and Rice boiled together, and is very strengthening, tho' not very savoury." — Ovington, 310.

1727.—"They have several species of Legumen, but those of Doll are most in use, for some Doll and Rice being mingled together and boiled, make Kitcheree." — A. Hamilton, i. 162; [ed. 1744].

1776.—"If a person hath bought the seeds of . . . doll . . . or such kinds of Grain, without Inspection, and in ten Days discovers any Defect in that Grain, he may return such Grain." — Halhed, Code, 178.

1778.—". . . the essential articles of a Sepoy's diet, rice, doll (a species of pea), ghee (an indifferent kind of butter), &c., were not to be purchased." — Acc. of the Gallant Defence made at Mangalore.

1809.—". . . doll, split country peas." — Maria Graham, 25.

[1813.—"Tuar (cytisus octjan Lin. . . . is called Dohl. . . ." — Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. li. 35.]

DHAWK, s. Hind. dhák; also called palas. A small bushy tree, Butea frondosa (N. O. Leguminosae), which forms large tracts of jungle in the Punjab, and in many dry parts of India. Its deep orange flowers give a brilliant aspect to the jungle in the early part of the hot weather, and have suggested the occasional name of 'Flame of the Forest.' They are used for dying bosanto, bosanti, a fleeting yellow; and in preparing Holí (see HOOLY) powder. The second of the two Hindi words for this tree gave a name to the famous village of Plassy (Pälsti), and also to ancient Magadh or Behar as Palasá or Parásá, whence Pärásyap, a man of that region, which, if Gen. Cunningham's suggestion be accepted, was the name represented by the Prasi of Strabo, Pliny, and Arrian, and the Pharrasii of Curtius (Anc. Geog. of India, p. 454). [The derivation of the word from Skt. Prátykhya 'Inhabitants of the east country,' is supported by McCrindle, Ancient India, 365 seq. So the dhák tree possibly gave its name to Dacca].

1761.—"The pioneers, agreeably to orders, dug a ditch according to custom, and placed along the brink of it an abattis of dhák trees, or whatever else they could find." — Saiyid Ghulám 'Ali, in Elliot, viii. 400.

DHBOY, DOBIE. s. A washerman; H. dobí, [from dhóná, Skt. dhák, 'to wash.'] In colloquial Anglo-Indian use all over India. A common H. proverb runs: Dúbhi ká kuttá ká sá, na ghar ká na ghat ká, i.e. "Like a Dhoby's dog belonging neither to the house nor to the river side." [Dhoby's] itch is a troublesome cutaneous disease supposed to be communicated by clothes from the wash, and Dhoby's earth is a whitish-grey sandy effor- escence, found in many places, from which by boiling and the addition of quicklime an alkali of considerable strength is obtained.

[c. 1804.—"Dobes." See under Dir-Zee].

DHOOLY, DOOLIE. s. A covered litter; Hind. dōlī. It consists of a cot or frame, suspended by the four corners from a bamboo pole, and is carried by two or four men (see figure in Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, pl. vii. fig. 4). Dōlī is from dolā, 'to swing.' The word is also applied to the meat- (or milk-) safe, which is usually slung to a tree, or to a hook in the verandah. As it is lighter and cheaper than a palankin it costs less both to buy or hire and to carry, and is used by the poorer classes. It also forms the usual ambulance of the Indian army. Hence the familiar story of the orator in Parliament who, in celebrating a battle in India, spoke of the "ferocious Doolies rushing down from the mountain and carrying off the wounded"; a story which, to our regret, we have not been able to verify. [According to one account the words were used by Burke: "After a sanguinary engagement, the said Warren Hastings had actually ordered ferocious Doolys to seize upon the wounded" (2nd ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 367).]

[But Burke knew too much of India to make this mistake. In the Calcutta Review (Dec. 1846, p. 286, footnote) Herbert Edwardes, writing on the first Sikh War, says: "It is not long since a member of the British Legislature, recounting the incidents of one of our Indian fights, informed his countrymen that 'the ferocious Dōlī' rushed from the hills and carried off the wounded soldiers."]

Dālā occurs in Ibn Batuta, but the translators render 'palanquin,' and do not notice the word.

c. 1343.—"The principal vehicle of the people (of Malabar) is a dūlī, carried on the shoulders of slaves and hired men. Those who do not ride in a dāla, whoever they may be, go on foot."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 73.

c. 1590.—"The Kāhārs or Pakā-bears. They form a class of foot servants peculiar to India. With their pālēka ... and dūlīs, they walk so evenly that the man inside is not inconvenienced by any jolting."—Ahn, i. 251; [and see the account of the sukhdāsan, ibid. ii. 122].

1609.—"He turned Moore, and bereaved his elder Brother of this holie by this stratageme. He invited him and his women to a Banket, which his Brother requiring with like imitation of him and his, in steed of women he sends choice Souldiers well appointed, and close covered, two and two in a Dowle."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 435.

1662.—"The Rājāh and the Phńskans travel in singhāsans, and chiefs and rich people in dūlis, made in a most ridiculous way."—Mir Jumlah's Invasion of Assam, tr. by Blochmann, in J. As. Soc. Ben., xli. pt. i. 80.

1702.—"... un Douli, c'est une voiture moins honorable que le palanquin."—Letters Édifi. xi. 143.

c. 1760.—"Doolies are much of the same material as the andolas [see ANDOR]; but made of the meanest materials."—Grose, i. 155.

c. 1768.—"... leaving all his wounded ... on the field of battle, telling them to be of good cheer, for that he would send Doolies for them from Astrara."—H. of Hyder Naik, 226.

1774.—"If by a dooley, chairs, or any other contrivance they can be secured from the fatigues and hazards of the way, the expense is to be no objection."—Letter of W. Hastings, in Markham's Tibet, 18.

1785.—"You must despatch Doolies to Dhârvâr to bring back the wounded men."—Letters of Tipoo, 133.

1789.—"... doolies, or sick beds, which are a mean representation of a palanquin: the number attached to a corps is in the proportion of one to every ten men, with four bearers to each."—Memoirs, Narrative, 184.

1845.—"Head Qurs., Kurrachee, 27 Dec., 1845.

"The Governor desires that it may be made known to the Doolie-wallas and Camel-men, that no increase of wages shall be given to them. They are very highly paid. If any man deserts, the Governor will have him pursued by the police, and if caught he shall be hanged."—G. O. by Sir Charles Napier, 113.

1872.—"At last ... a woman arrived from Dargānagar with a dūli and two bearers, for carrying Mālāti."—Govinda Samanta, ii. 7.

1880.—"The consequence of holding that this would be a Trust enforceable in a Court of Law would be so monstrous that persons would be probably startled ... if it be a Trust, then every one of these persons in England or in India—from persons of the highest rank down to the lowest dhoolie-bearer, might file a bill for the administration of the Trust."—Ed. Justice James, Judgment on the Kirwee and Banda Prize Appeal, 15th April.

1883.—"I have great pleasure here in bearing my testimony to the courage and devotion of the Indian dooly-bearers. I never knew them shrink from the dangers of the battle-field, or neglect or forsake a wounded European. I have several times seen one of these bearers killed and many of them disabled while carrying a wounded soldier out of action."—Surgeon-DHOON. 314 DHOW, DOW.

General Munro, C.B., Reminiscences of Mil. Service with the 93rd Sutherland Highlanders, p. 193.

DHOON, s. Hind. dàn. A word in N. India specially applied to the flat valleys, parallel to the base of the Himalaya, and lying between the rise of that mountain mass and the low tertiary ranges known as the sub-Himalayan or Siwālīk Hills (q.v.), or rather between the interior and exterior of these ranges. The best known of these valleys is the Dùn of Dehra, below Mussoorie, often known as "the Dhoon"; a form of expression which we see by the second quotation to be old.

1596.—"In the language of Hindustân they call a Jālga [or dâle] Dùn. The finest running water in Hindustân is that in this Dùn."—Baber, 299.

1654-55.—"Khalilu-lla Khan . . . having reached the Dùn, which is a strip of country lying outside of Srinagar, 20 fow long and 5 broad, one extremity of its length being bounded by the river Jumna, and the other by the Ganges."—Shāh-Jahān-Nāma, in Elliot, vii. 106.

1814.—"Me voici in the far-famed Dhoon, the Temple of Asia. . . . The fort stands on the summit of an almost inaccessible mountain . . . it will be a tough job to take it; but by the 1st proximo I think I shall have it, auspice Deo."—In Asiatic Journal, ii. 151; ext. of letter from Sir Rollo Gillespie before Kalanga, dated 29th Oct. He fell next day.

1879.—"The Sub-Himalayan Hills . . . as a general rule . . . consist of two ranges, separated by a broad flat valley, for which the name 'Dun' (Doon) has been adopted. . . . When the outer of these ranges is wanting, as is the case below Naini Tal and Darjiling, the whole geographical feature might escape notice, the inner range being confounded with the spurs of the mountains."—Manual of the Geology of India, 251.

DHOTY, s. Hind. dhôti. The loin-cloth worn by all the respectable Hindu castes of Upper India, wrapt round the body, the end being then passed between the legs and tucked in at the waist, so that a festoon of calico hangs down to either knee. [It is mentioned, not by name, by Arrian (Indika, 16) as "an under garment of cotton which reaches below the knee, half way to the ankle"; and the Orissa dhôti of 1200 years ago, as shown on the monuments, does not differ from the mode of the present time, save that men of rank wore a jewelled girdle with a pendant in front. (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187.) The word dutte in old trade lists of cotton goods is possibly the same; [but at the present time a coarse cotton cloth woven by Dhers in Surat is known as Doti.]

[1609.—"Here is also a strong sort of cloth called Dhootie."—Danvers, Letters, i. 29.

[1614.—"20 corge of strong Dutties, such as may be fit for making and mending sails."—Forster, Letters, ii. 219.

[1815.—"200 peece Dutta. —Cocks’s Diary, i. 83.]

1622.—"Price of caliccces, duttees fixed." * * *

"List of goods sold, including diamonds, pepper, bastas, (read bafius), duttes, and silks, from Persia."—Court Minutes, &c., in Sainjvary, iii. 24.

1810.—". . . a dotee or waist-cloth."—Williamson, V. M. i. 247.

1872.—"The human figure which was moving with rapid strides had no other clothing than a dhuti wrapped round the waist, and descending to the knee-joints."—Govinda Samanta, i. 8.

DHOW, DOW, s. The last seems the more correct, though not perhaps the more common. The term is common in Western India, and on various shores of the Arabian sea, and is used on the E. African coast for craft in general (see Burton, in J.R.G.S. xxix. 239); but in the mouths of Englishmen on the western seas of India it is applied specially to the old-fashioned vessel of Arab build, with a long grab stem, i.e. rising at a long slope from the water, and about as long as the keel, usually with one mast and lateen-rig. There are the lines of a dow, and a technical description, by Mr. Edie, in J. R. As. Soc., vol. i. p. 11. The slaving dow is described and illustrated in Capt. Colomb’s Slave-catching in the Indian Ocean; see also Capt. W. F. Owen’s Narrative (1833), p. 385, [i. 384 seq.]. Most people suppose the word to be Arabic, and it is in (Johnson’s) Richardson (dâo) as an Arabic word. But no Arabic scholar whom we have consulted admits it to be genuine Arabic. Can it possibly have been taken from Pers. daw, ‘running’? [The N.E.D. remarks that if Tāta (in Ath. Nicītīn, below) be the same, it would tend to localise the word at Ormus in the Persian Gulf.] Capt. Burton identifies it with the word zabra applied in the Roteiro de Vasco’s Voyage (p. 37) to a native vessel at Mombasa. But zabra or zawra was apparently a Basque name for a kind of craft in Biscay (see s.v. Bluteau, and the Decr. de la Lingua Castel, vol. vi. 1739). Dho or Dâva is indeed in Molesworth’s Mahr. Dict. as a word in that language, but this gives no assurance of origin. Anglo-Indians on the west coast usually employ dhow and buggalow interchangeably. The word is used on Lake V. Nyanza.

e. 1470.—“I shipped my horses in a Tava, and sailed across the Indian Sea in ten days to Moshkat.”—Ath. Nikitin, p. 8, in India in X Vth Cent.

“...So I embarked in a tava, and settled to pay for my passage to Hormuz two pieces of gold.”—Ibid. 30.

1755.—“A Dow, the property of Rutn Jee and Jeeewun Doss, merchants of Muzcat, having in these days been dismasted in a storm, came into Byte Koal (see BACUL), a seaport belonging to the Sircar...”—Tippo’s Letters, 181.

1756.—“We want 10 shipwrights acquainted with the construction of Dows. Get them together and despatch them hither.”—Tippo to his Agent at Muskat, ibid. 224.

1810.—“Close to Calcutta, it is the busiest scene we can imagine; crowded with ships and boats of every form,—here a fine English East Indianman, there a grab or a dow from Arabia.”—Maria Graham, 142.

1814.—“The different names given to these ships (at Jeddah), as Say, Seine, Mer-keb, Sambok [see SAMBOOKE], Dow, denote their size; the latter only, being the largest, perform the voyage to India.”—Burchhardt, Tr. in Arabia, 1829, 4to, p. 22.

1837.—“Two young princes...nephews of the King of Hinzuian or Joanna... came in their own dhow on a visit to the Government.”—Smith, Life of Dr. J. Wilson, 253.

1844.—“I left the hospitable village of Takaunug in a small boat, called a Daw by the Suthilis...the smallest sea-going vessel.”—Krafft, p. 117.

1865.—“The goods from Zanzibar (to the Seychelles) were shipped in a dhow, which ran across in the month of May; and this was, I believe, the first native craft that had ever made the passage.”—*Pelly, in J.R.G.S. xxxv. 294.

1873.—“If a pear be sharpened at the thin end, and then cut in half longitudinally, two models will have been made, resembling in all essential respects the ordinary slave dhow.”—Colomb, 35.

1880.—“The third division are the Mozambiques or African slaves, who have been brought into the country from time immemorial by the Arab slave-trading dhows.”—Sibree’s Great African Island, 182.

1888.—“Dhau is a large vessel which is falling into disuse... Their origin is in the Red Sea. The word is used vaguely, and is applied to baghlas (see EUGGALOW).”—Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. 117 seq.

DHURMSALLA. s. H. and Mahr. dharm-sâld, ‘pious edifice’; a rest-house for wayfarers, corresponding to the S. Indian Choultry or Chuttrum (q.v.).

1826.—“We alighted at a durhmsallah where several horsemen were assembled.”—Pandurang Hari, 254; [ed. 1873, ii. 66].

DHURNA. TO SIT, v. In H. *dharnâ denâ or batkhnd, Skt. dhrst to hold.’ A mode of extorting payment or compliance with a demand, effect by the complainant or creditor sitting at the debtor’s door, and there remaining without tasting food till his demand shall be complied with, or (sometimes) by threatening to do himself some mortal violence if it be not complied with. Traces of this custom in some form are found in many parts of the world, and Sir H. Maine (see below) has quoted a remarkable example from the Irish Brehon Laws. There was a curious variety of the practice, in arrest for debt, current in S. India, which is described by Marco Polo and many later travellers (see M. P., 2nd ed., ii. 327, 335, [and for N. India, Crooke, Pop. Rel. and Folklore, ii. 42, seq.]). The practice of dharnâ is made an offence under the Indian Penal Code. There is a systematic kind of dharnâ practised by classes of beggars, e.g. in the Punjab by a class called Tasmívalsâs, or ‘strap-riggers’, who twist a leather strap round the neck, and throw themselves on the ground before a shop, until alms are given; Dorrâvalsâs, who threaten to hang themselves; Dandîvalsâs, who rattle sticks, and stand cursing till they get alms; Urinârs, who simply stand before a shop all day, and Gurmsârs and Chharîmsârs, who cut themselves with knives and spiked clubs] (see Ind. Antig. i. 162, [Herkliota, Qanoon-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. 193 seq.]). It appears from Elphinstone (below) that the custom sometimes received the Ar.
DHURNA. 316

DHURNA.

Pers. name of takāza, 'dunning' or 'importunity.'

c. 1747.—"While Nundi Raj, the Dulwai (see DALAWAY), was encamped at Sutti Mangul, his troops, for want of pay, placed him in Dhurna. . . . Hurree Singh, forgetting the tinges of salt or gratitude to his master, in order to obtain his arrears of pay, forbade the sleeping and eating of the Dulwai, by placing him in Dhurna . . . and that in so great a degree as even to stop the water used in his kitchen. The Dulwai, losing heart from this rigour, with his clothes and the vessels of silver and gold used in travelling, and a small sum of money, paid him off and discharged him." —H. of Hydur Naik, 41 seq.

c. 1794.—"The practice called dharma, which may be translated caption, or arrest."
—Sir J. Shore, in As. Res. iv. 144.

1808.—"A remarkable circumstance took place yesterday. Some Sirdars put the Maharaja (Sindia) in dharma. He was angry, and threatened to put them to death. Bhagwan Ratan Bha, by his head, said, 'Sit still; put us to death.' Sindia was enraged, and ordered him to be paid and driven from camp. He refused to go. . . . The bazaars were shut the whole day; troops were posted to guard them and defend the tents. . . . At last the mutineers marched off, and all was settled." —Elphinstone's Diary, in Life, t. 179 seq.

1809.—"Seendhiya (i.e. Sindia), who has been lately plagued by repeated Dhurnas, seems now resolved to partake also in the active part of the amusement; he had permitted this same Patunkur, as a signal mark of favour, to borrow 50 rupees from the Khauger, or private treasurer. . . . The time elapsed without the agreement having been fulfilled; and Seendhiya immediately dispatched the treasurer to sit Dhurna on his behalf at Patunkur's tents." —Broughton, Letters from a Mahattta Camp, 169 seq.; [ed. 1892, 127].

1819.—"It is this which is called takaza * by the Mahatttas. . . . If a man have demand from (i. upon) his inferior or equal, he places him under restraint, prevents his leaving his house or eating, and even compels him to sit in the sun until he comes to some accommodation. If the debtor were a superior, the creditor had first recourse to supplications and appeals to the honour and sense of shame of the other party; he laid himself on his threshold, threw himself in his road, clamoured before his door, or he employed others to do this for him; he would even sit down and fast before the debtor's door, during which time the other was compelled to fast also; or he would appeal to the gods, and invoke their curses upon the person by whom he was injured." —Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 87.

1837.—* "Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do . . . by inducing . . . that person to believe that he . . . will become . . . by some act of the offender, an object of the divine displeasure if he does not do the thing . . . shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both."

(b) A threatens Z. that unless Z. performs a certain act A. will kill one of A.'s own children, under such circumstances that the killing would be believed to render Z. an object of the divine displeasure. 1875.—"If you have a legal claim against a man of a certain rank and you are desirous of compelling him to discharge it, the Senchus Mor tells you 'to fast upon him.' . . . The institution is unquestionably identical with one widely diffused throughout the East, which is called by the Hindoos 'sitting dhurna.' It consists in sitting at the debtor's door and starving yourself till he pays. From the English point of view the practice has always been considered barbarous and immoral, and the Indian Penal Code expressly forbids it. It suggests, however, the question—what would follow if the debtor simply allowed the creditor to starve? Undoubtedly the Hindoo supposes that some supernatural penalty would follow; indeed, he generally gives definiteness to it by retaining a Brahmin to starve himself vicariously, and no Hindoo doubts what would come of causing a Brahmin's death."
—Maunce, Hist. of Early Institutions, 40. See also 297-304.

1885.—"One of the most curious practices in India is that still followed in the native states by a Brahman creditor to compel payment of his debt, and called in Hindi dhurma, and in Sanskrit dharura, 'customary proceeding,' or Prapopana, 'sitting down to die by hunger.' This procedure has long since been identified with the practice of 'fasting upon' (trusced for) a debtor to God or man, which is so frequently mentioned in the Irish so-called Brehon Laws . . . In a MS. in the Bodleian . . . there is a Middle-Irish legend which tells how St. Patrick 'fasted upon' Loegaire, the unbelieving over-king of Ireland. Loegaire's pious queen declares

* This is the date of the Penal Code, as originally submitted to Lord Auckland, by T. B. Macaulay and his colleagues; and in that original form this passage is found as § 283, and in chap. xv, of Offences relating to Religion and Caste. that she will not eat anything while Patrick is fasting. Her son Enna seeks for food.

'It is not fitting for thee,' says his mother, 'to eat food while Patrick is fasting upon you.' . . . It would seem from this story that Ireland the wife and children of the debtor, and, a fortori, the debtor himself, had to fast so long as the creditor fasted.'— Letter from Mr. Whitley Stokes, in Academy, Sept. 12th.

A striking story is told in Forbes's Rās Mālo (ii. 393 seq.; [ed. 1878, p. 657]) of a farther proceeding following upon an unsuccessful dharmā, put in practice by a company of Chārans, or bards, in Kathiawār, to enforce payment of a debt by a chief of Jaila to one of their number. After fasting three days in vain, they proceeded from dharmā to the further rite of trāgā (q.v.). Some hacked their own arms; others decapitated three old women of their party, and hung their heads up as a garland at the gate. Certain of the women cut off their own breasts. The bards also pierced the throats of four of the older men with spikes, and took two young girls and dashed their brains out against the town-gate. Finally the Chāran creditor soaked his quilted clothes in oil, and set fire to himself. As he burned to death he cried out, 'I am now dying, but I will become a headless ghost (Kavīs) in the Palace, and will take the chief's life, and cut off his posterity!'

DIAMOND HARBOUR, n.p. An anchorage in the Hooghly below Calcutta, 30 m. by road, and 41 by river. It was the usual anchorage of the old Indiamen in the mercantile days of the E. I. Company. In the oldest charts we find the "Diamond Sand," on the western side of what is now called Diamond Harbour, and on some later charts, Diamond Point.

1683.—"We anchored this night on ye head of ye Diamond Sand."

"Jan. 26. This morning early we weighed anchor . . . but got no further than the Point of Kegoria Island" (see KEDGEREE).—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94. (See also ROGUE'S RIVER.)

DIGGORY, DĪGRĪ, DEGREE, s. Anglo-Hindustani word of law-court jargon for 'decree.'

[1866.—"This is grand, thought bold Bhuwanee Singh, digtree to pāk, lekān rūpyeə to mɔrɔpɔs but, 'He has got his decree, but I have the money.'"—Confessions of an Orderly, 138.]

DIKK, s. Worry, trouble, botheration; what the Italians call seccaturra. This is the Anglo-Indian use. But the word is more properly adjective, Ar.-P.-H. dıkk, dikk, 'vexed, worried,' and so dikk hond, 'to be worried.' [The noun dikk-dārī, 'worry,' in vulgar usage, has become an adjective.]

1873.—"And Beaufort learned in the law,
And Atkinson the Sage,
And if his locks are white as snow,
'Tis more from dikk than age!"

Wilfred Hervey, A Lay of Modern Darjeeling.

[1889.—"Were the Company's pumps to be beaten by the vagaries of that dikkdārī, Tarachundra nuddeu?"—R. Kipling, In Black and White, 52.]

DINAPORE, n.p. A well-known cantonment on the right bank of the Ganges, being the station of the great city of Patna. The name is properly Dānpur. Ives (1755) writes Dnapoour (p. 167). The cantonment was established under the government of Warren Hastings about 1772, but we have failed to ascertain the exact date. [Cruso, writing in 1785, speaks of the cantonments having cost the Company 25 lakhs of rupees. (Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445). There were troops there in 1773 (Gleig, Life of Warren Hastings, i. 297.)]

DĪNĀR, s. This word is not now in any Indian use. But it is remarkable as a word introduced into Skt. at a comparatively early date. "The names of the Arabic pieces of money . . . are all taken from the coins of the Lower Roman Empire. Thus, the copper piece was called fols from follis; the silver dīrham from drachma, and the gold dīnār, from denarius, which, though properly a silver coin, was used generally to denote coins of other metals, as the denarius aether, and the denarius aureus, or aureus" (James Prinsep, in Essays, &c., ed. by Thomas, i. 19). But it was long before the rise of Islam that the knowledge and name of the denarius as applied to a gold coin had reached India. The inscription on the east gate of the great temple at Sanchi is probably the oldest instance preserved, though the date of that is a matter greatly disputed. But in the Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500) we have 'dinare pi cha nishkah,' i.e. 'a nishkah (or gold coin) is the same as dinara.' And in the Kalpasutra of Bhadrabahu (of about the same age) § 36, we have 'dinare mālāya,' 'a necklace of dinars,' mentioned (see Max Müller below). The dinar in modern Persia is a very small imaginary coin, of which 10,000 make a tomaun (q.v.). In the Middle Ages we find Arabic writers applying the term dinār both to the staple gold coin (corresponding to the gold mohur of more modern times) and to the staple silver coin (corresponding to what has been called since the 16th century the rupee). [Also see Yule, Cathay, ii. 439 seqq. See DEANER.]

A.D. (?) "The son of Amuka . . . having made salutation to the eternal gods and goddesses, has given a piece of ground purchased at the legal rate; also five temples, and twenty-five (thousand) dinars (an act of grace and benevolence of the great emperor Chandragupta)."—Inscription on Gateway at Sanchi (Prinsep's Essays, i. 246).

A.D. (?) "Quelque temps après, à Patali-putra, un autre homme dévoût aux Brahmanes renversa une statue de Bouddha aux pieds d'un mendiant, qui la mit en pièces. Le roi (Agoka) . . . fit proclamer cet ordre: Celui qui m'appartient la tête d'un mendiant brahmanique, recevra de moi un Dinara."—Tr. of Divya avadāna, in Burnouf; Int. à l'Hist. du Bouddhisme Indien, p. 422.

c. 1333. "The hat is a sum of 100,000 dinārs (i.e. of silver); this sum is equivalent to 10,000 dinars of gold, Indian money; and the Indian (gold) dinar is worth 24 dinārs in money of the West (Maghrab)."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 106.

1859.—"Cosmas Indicopleustes remarked that the Roman denarius was received all over the world; * and how the denarius came to mean in India a gold ornament we may learn from a passage in the 'Life of Mahāvīra.' There it is said that a lady had around her neck a string of grains and golden dinars, and Stevenson adds that the custom of stringing coins together, and adorning with them children especially, is still very common in India."—Max Müller, Hist. of Sanskrit Literature, 247.

DINGY, DINHY, s. Beng. dingy; [H. dīngi, dēngi, another form of dōngi, Skt. dṛṇa, 'a trough.'] A small boat or skiff; sometimes also 'a canoe,' i.e. dug out of a single trunk. This word is not merely Anglo-Indian; it has become legitimately incorporated in the vocabulary of the British navy, as the name of the smallest ship's boat; [in this sense, according to the N.E.D., first in Middle English Easy (1360)]. Dingā occurs as the name of some kind of war-boat used by the Portuguese as the defence of Hughli in 1631 ("Sixty-four large dingās"; Elliot, vii. 34). The word dīngi is also used for vessels of size in the quotation from Tipppo. Sir J. Campbell, in the Bombay Gazetteer, says that dhangi is a large vessel belonging to the Mekran coast; the word is said to mean 'a log' in Biluchi. In Guzerat the larger vessel seems to be called dāngā; and besides this there is dāngī, like a canoe, but built, not dug out.

[1610.—"I have brought with me the pinnace and her ginge for better performance."—Dawers, Letters, i. 61.]

1705.—". . . pour aller à terre on est obligé de se servir d'un petit Bateau dont les bords sont très hauts, qu'on appelle Dingues . . ."—Lullier, 39.

1785.—"Propose to the merchants of Muscat . . . to bring hither, on the Dingies, such horses as they may have for sale; which, being sold to us, the owner can carry back the produce in rice."—Letters of Tipppo, 6.

1810.—"On these larger pieces of water there are usually canoes, or dingies."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 59.

1813.—"The Indian pomegranates . . . are by no means equal to those brought and the Persian silver drachma, both of which were at hand, and to judge for himself which suggested the greater monarch. "Now the nomisma was a coin of right good ring and fine ruddy gold, bright in metal and elegant in execution, for such coins are picked on purpose to take bittier, whilst the miliarion or (drachma), to say it in one word, was of silver, and of course bore no comparison with the gold coin," &c. In another passage he says that elephants in Taprobane were sold at from 50 to 100 nomismata and more, which seems to imply that the gold denarii were actually current in Ceylon. See the passages at length in Cathay, &c., pp. clxxix-clxxx.

[1623.—"The street, which they call Terzi Caravan-serai, is that the Tayler's Inn."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 95.]

c. 1804.—"In his place we took other servants, Dirges and Dobas, and a Saís for Mr. Sherwood, who now got a pony."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 283.

1810.—"The dirijees, or tailors, in Bombay, are Hindoos of respectable caste."—Maria Graham, 30.

DISPATCHADORE, s. This curious word was apparently a name given by the Portuguese to certain officials in Cochin-China. We know it only in the document quoted :

1696.—"The 23 I was sent to under the Under-Dispatchatore, who found me with my Servantes before him. I having the key, he desired me to open it."—Boyer's Journal at Cochin China, in Datrumple, Or. Rep. i. 77; also "was made Under-Customer or Dispatchatore" (ibid. 81); and again: "The Chief Dispatchatore of the Strangers (84).

DISSAVE, DISSAVA, &c., s. Singh, diswa (Skt. āša, 'a country'); &c., 'Governor of a Province,' under the Candyan Government. Dissave, as used by the English in the gen. case, adopted from the native expression diswa mahatmya, 'Lord of the Province.' It is now applied by the natives to the Collector or 'Government Agent.' (See DESSAVE.)

1681.—"Next under the Adigars are the Dissavas who are Governors over provinces and counties of the land."—Knor, p. 50.

1685.—"... un Dissava qui est comme un General Chinguals, ou Gouverneur des armées d'une province."—Ribeyro (Fr. tr.), 102.

1803.—"... the Dissavas ... are governors of the corés or districts, and are besides the principal military commanders."—Percival's Ceylon, 258.

1860.—"... the dissave of Oovah, who had been sent to tranquilize the disturbed districts, placed himself at the head of the insurgents" (in 1817).—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 91.

DITCH, DITCHER. Disparaging sobriquets for Calcutta and its European citizens, for the rationale of which see MAHRATTA DITCH.

DIU, n.p. A port at the south end of Peninsular Guzerat. The town stands on an island, whence its name, from Skt. dvipa. The Portuguese were allowed to build a fort here by treaty with Bahadur Shâh of Guzerat, in 1535. It was once very famous for the sieges which the Portuguese successfully withstood (1538 and 1545) against the successors of Bahadur Shâh [see the account in LÏmschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 37 seq.]. It still belongs to Portugal, but is in great decay. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 35) dwells on the advantages of its position.]

c. 700.—Chinese annals of the T'ang dynasty mention Tiyu as a port touched at by vessels bound for the Persian Gulf, about 10 days before reaching the Indus. See Deshiques, in Mem. de l'Acad. Inscript. xxxii. 367.

1516.—"... there is a promontory, and joining close to it is a small island which contains a very large and fine town, which the Malabars call Diuxa and the Moors of the country call it Diu. It has a very good harbour," &c.—Barbon, 59.

1572.—"Succedore Ihe-ha alli Castro, que o estandarte Portuguez tera sempre levantado, Conforme successor ao succedido; Que hum ergue Dio, outro o defende e guio."—Câmões, x. 67.

By Burton:

"Castro succeeds, who Lusias estandard shall bear for ever in the front to wave; Successor the Succeeded's work: who endeth; that buildeth Diu, this builded Diu defendeth."

1648.—"At the extremity of this Kingdom, and on a projecting point towards the south lies the city Diu, where the Portuguese have 3 strong castles; this city is called by both Portuguese and Indians Dive (the last letter, e, being pronounced somewhat softly), a name which signifies 'Island.'"—Van Twist, 13.

1727.—"Diu is the next Port. ... It is one of the best built Cities, and best fortified by Nature and Art, that I ever saw in India, and its stately Buildings of free Stone and Marble, are sufficient Witnesses of its ancient Grandeur and Opulence; but at present not above one-fourth of the City is inhabited."—A. Hamilton, i. 137; [ed. 1744, i. 136].
DIUL-SIND, n.p. A name by which Sind is often called, in early European narratives, taken up by the authors, no doubt, like so many other prevalent names, from the Arab traders who had preceded them. Dewal or Dabul was a once celebrated city and seaport of Sind, mentioned by all the old Arabian geographers, and believed to have stood at or near the site of modern Katteh. It had the name from a famous temple (devāya), probably a Buddhist shrine, which existed there, and which was destroyed by the Mahommedans in 711. The name of Dewal long survived the city itself, and the specific addition of Sind or Sindis being added, probably to distinguish it from some other place of resembling name, the name of Dewal-Sind or Sind came to be attached to the delta of the Indus.

C. 700.—The earliest mention of Dewal that we are aware of is in a notice of Chinese Voyages to the Persian Gulf under the T'ang dynasty (7th and 8th centuries) quoted by DuQuesne. In this the ships, after leaving Tiya (Diu) sailed 10 days further to another Tiya near the great river Milan or Sintat. This was, no doubt, Dewal near the great Mahrān or Sind, i.e. Indus.—Mém. de l'Acad. des Ins., xxxii. 987.

C. 880.—"There was at Debail a lofty temple (budd) surmounted by a long pole, and on the pole was fixed a red flag, which when the breeze blew was unfurled over the city... Muhammad informed Hajjāj of what he had done, and solicited advice... One day a reply was received to this effect:—'Fix the manjānīk... call the manjānīk-master, and tell him to aim at the flagstaff of which you have given a description.' So he brought down the flagstaff, and it was broken; at which the infidels were sore afflicted."—*Bilad-er-i, in Elliot, i. 120.

C. 900.—"From Nārmasirā to Debail is 8 days' journey, and from Debail to the junction of the river Mahrān with the sea, is 2 parasangs."—*Ibn Khordādbeh, in Elliot, i. 15.

976.—"The City of Debail is to the west of the Mahrān, towards the sea. It is a large mart, and the port not only of this, but of the neighbouring regions..."—*Ibn Haukal, in Elliot, i. 37.

C. 1150.—"The place is inhabited only because it is a station for the vessels of Sind and other countries... ships laden with the productions of Ummân, and the vessels of China and India come to Debail."—*Idrisī, in Elliot, i. p. 77.

1228.—"All that country down to the seashore was subdued. Malik Sinâh-ud-din Habs, chief of Dewal and Sind, came and did homage to the Sultan."—*Tabakāt-i-Nasir, in Elliot, ii. 326.

[1513. — "And thence we had sight of Diulcindy."—*Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 239.]

1516.—"Leaving the Kingdom of Ormuz... the coast goes to the South-east for 172 leagues as far as Diulcinde, entering the Kingdom of Ulcinde, which is between Persia and India."—*Barbosa, 49.

1553.—"From this Cape Jasque to the famous river Indus are 200 leagues, in which space are these places Guadel, Calara, Calamante, and Diul, the last situated on the most westerly mouth of the Indus."—*De Barros, Dec. 1. liv. ix. cap. i.

C. 1554.—"If you guess that you may be drifting to Jaked... you must try to go to Karasuh, or to enter Khur (the estuary of) Diul Sind."—*The Mokht, in J. A. Soc. Beng. v. 463.

1572.—"Olha a terra de Ulcinde fertillisimaa E da Jaqueta a intima enseada."—Camões, x. cvi.

1614.—"At Diulcinde the Expedition in her former Voyage had delievered Sir Robert Sherley the Persian Embassadour."—*Capt. W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

1616.—"The river Indus doth not powre himself into the sea by the bay of Cambaya, but far westward, at Sindu."—*Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 122.]

C. 1650.—Diul is marked in Blaeu's great Atlas on the W. of the most westerly mouth of the Indus. C. 1666.—"... la ville la plus Méridionale est Diul. On la nomme encore Diul-Sind, et autrefois on l'appelée Dohil... Il y a des Orientiaux qui donnent le nom de Diul au Pais de Sinde."—*Thevenot, v. 158.

1727.—"All that shore from Jasques to Sindio, inhabited by uncivilized People, who admit of no Commerce with Strangers, tho' Guadell and Diul, two Sea-porta, did about a Century ago afford a good Trade."—*A. Hamilton, i. 115; [ed. 1744].

1758.—"Celui (le bras du Sind) de la droite, après avoir passé à Fairuz, distant ce Manorsa de trois journées selon Edrisì, se rend à Debél ou Divl, auquel nom on ajoute quelque fois celui de Sindio... La ville est située sur une langue de terre en forme de peninaule, d'où je pense que lui vient son nom actuel de Diul ou Divl, DOAB. s. and n.p. P.—H. doab, 'two waters,' i.e. 'Mesopotamia,' the tract between two confluent rivers. In Upper India, when used absolutely, the term always indicates the tract between the Ganges and Jumna. Each of the like tracts in the Punjab has its distinctive name, several of them compounded of the names of the limiting rivers, e.g. Richud Doab, between Râvi and Chenâb, Jech Doab, between Jelam and Chenâb, &c. These names are said to have been invented by the Emperor Akbar. [Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii, 311 seq.] The only Doab known familiarly by that name in the south of India is the Ravîchâr Doab in the Nizam's country, lying between the Kistna and Tungabhadra.

DOAI! DWYE! Interj. Properly H. dokâi, or dohâti, Gujarâtî dovâthâi, an exclamation (hitherto of obscure etymology) shouted aloud by a petitioner for redress at a Court of Justice, or as any one passes who is supposed to have it in his power to aid in rendering the justice sought. It has a kind of analogy, as Thavenot pointed out over 200 years ago, to the old Norman Haro! Haro! viens à mon aide, mon Prince!* but does not now carry the privilege of the Norman cry; though one may conjecture, both from Indian analogies and from the statement of Ibn Batuta quoted below, that it once did. Every Englishman in Upper India has often been saluted by the calls of, 'Dohâi Khudâwând ki! Dohâi Mahârâj! Dohâi Kompanî Bahâdûr!' 'Justice, my Lord! Justice, O King! Justice, O Company!'—perhaps in consequence of some oppression by his followers, perhaps in reference to some grievance with which he has no power to interfere. "Until 1860 no one dared to ignore the appeal of dohâi to a native Prince within his territory. I have heard a serious charge made against a person for calling the dohâi needlessly" (M. Gen. Keatinge).

Wilson derives the exclamation from da, 'two' or repeatedly, and hâi 'alas,' illustrating this by the phrase 'dohâi tikhâi karnâ,' 'to make exclamation (or invocation of justice) twice and thrice.' [Platts says, do-hâtâ, Skt. hri-hâtâ; a crying twice "alas!] This phrase, however, we take to be merely an example of the 'striving after meaning,' usual in cases where the real origin of the phrase is forgotten. We cannot doubt that the word is really a form of the Skt. droha, 'injury, wrong.' And this is confirmed by the form in Ibn Batuta, and the Mahr. durâhi; "an exclamation or expression used in prohibiting in the name of the Raja... implying an imprecation of his vengeance in case of disobedience" (Molèsworth's Dict.); also Tel. and Canar. durâi, 'protest, prohibition, caveat, or veto in arrest of proceedings' (Wilson and C. P. B., MS.)

C. 1340.—"It is a custom in India that when money is due from any person who is favoured by the Sultan, and the creditor wants his debt settled, he lies in wait at the Palace gate for the debtor, and when the latter is about to enter he assails him with the exclamation DARÔhai us-Sultan/ 'O Enemy of the Sultan.—I swear by the head of the King thou shalt not enter till thou hast paid me what thou owest.' The debtor cannot then stir from the spot, until he has satisfied the creditor, or has obtained his consent to the respite."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 412. The signification assigned to the words by the Moorish traveller probably only shows that the real meaning was unknown to his Musulman friends at Delhi, whilst its form strongly corroborates our etymology, and shows that it still kept close to the Sanskrit.

1609.—"He is severe enough, but all helpeth not; for his poore Riats or clowns complaine of Injustice done them, and cry for justice at the King's hands."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 223.

C. 1666.—"Quand on y veut arrêter une personne, on crie seulement Dôa padechâ; cette clameur a autant de force que celle de haro en Normandie; et si on defended quelqu'un de sortir, du lieu où il est, en disant Dôa padecha, il ne peut partir sans se rendre criminel, et il est obligé de se presenter à la Justice."—Thesvent, v. 61.

1834.—"The servant woman began to make a great outcry, and wanted to leave the ship, and cried Dôaaee to the Company, for she was murdered and kidnapped."—The Baboo, ii. 242.

DOAR, n.p. A name applied to the strip of moist land, partially cultivated with rice, which extends at the foot of... the Himalaya mountains to Bhotan. It corresponds to the Terai further west; but embraces the conception of the passes or accesses to the hill country from this last verge of the plain, and is apparently the Skt. dvēra, a gate or entrance. [The E. Dwars of Goalpara District, and the W. Dwars of Jalpaiguri were annexed in 1864 to stop the raids of the Bhutias.]

DOBUND, s. This word is not in the Hind. Dicts. (nor is it in Wilson), but it appears to be sufficiently elucidated by the quotation:

1787.—"That the power of Mr. Fraser to make dobunds, or new and additional embankments in the age of the old ones ... was a power very much to be suspected, and very improper to be entrusted to a contractor who had already covenanted to keep the old pools in perfect repair," &c.—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, v. 38.

DOLLY, s. Hind. ḍālī. A complimentary offering of fruit, flowers, vegetables, sweetmeats and the like, presented usually on one or more trays; also the daily basket of garden produce laid before the owner by the Malay or gardener ("The Molly with his dolly"). The proper meaning of ḍālī is a 'branch' or 'twig' (Skt. dār); then a 'basket,' a 'tray,' or a 'pair of trays slung to a yoke,' as used in making the offerings. Twenty years ago the custom of presenting ḍālīs was innocent and merely complimentary; but, if the letter quoted under 1882 is correct, it must have grown into a gross abuse, especially in the Punjab. [The custom has now been in most Provinces regulated by Government orders.]

[1832.—"A Dhaluli is a flat basket, on which is arranged in neat order whatever fruit, vegetables, or herbs are at the time in season."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 333.]

1880.—"Brass dishes filled with pistachio nuts are displayed here and there; they are the oblations of the would-be visitors. The English call these offerings dollyes; the natives ḍālī. They represent in the profuse East the visiting cards of the meagre West."—Ali Baba, 84.

1882.—"I learn that in Madras dallyes are restricted to a single gilded orange or lime, or a tiny sugar pagoda, and Madras officers who have seen the baskets of fruit, nuts, almonds, sugar-candy ... &c., received by single officials in a single day in the N.W. Provinces, and in addition the number of bottles of brandy, champagne, liquors, &c., received along with all the preceding in the Punjab, have been ... astounded that such practice should be countenanced by Government."—Letter in Pioneer Mail, March 15.

DOME, DHOME; in S. India commonly Dombaree, Dombar, s. Hind. Dōm or Dōmā. The name of a very low caste, representing some old aboriginal race, spread all over India. In many places they perform such offices as carrying dead bodies, removing carrion, &c. They are often musicians; in Oudh sweepers; in Chāmpārān professional thieves (see Elliot's Races of the N.W.P., [Hesley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, s.v.]). It is possible, as has been suggested by some one, that the Gypsy Ṛomany is this word.

c. 1328.—"There be also certain others which be called Dumbri who eat carrion and carcasses; who have absolutely no object of worship; and who have to do the drudgeries of other people, and carry loads."—Friar Jordanus, Hak. Soc. p. 21.

1817.—"There is yet another tribe of vagrants, who are also a separate sect. They are the class of mountebanks, buffoons, posture-masters, tumblers, dancers, and the like. ... The most insolent body is that of the Dumbars or Dumbaru."—Abbe Dubois, 408.

DONDERA HEAD, n.p. The southernmost point of Ceylon; called after a magnificent Buddhist shrine there, much frequented as a place of pilgrimage, which was destroyed by the Portuguese in 1587. The name is a corruption of Dewa-nagara, in Elu (or old Singalese) Devu-nuwara; in modern Sinhalese Dewundara (Ind. Antiq. i. 329). The place is identified by Tennent with Ptölemy’s “Dagana, sacred to the moon.” Is this name in any way the origin of the opprobrious ‘dunderhead’? [The N.E.D. gives no countenance to this, but leaves the derivation doubtful; possibly akin to dunner]. The name is so written in Dunn’s Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 59; also in a chart of the Bay of Bengal, without title or date in Dalrymple’s Collection.

1344.—"We travelled in two days to the city of Dinawar, which is large, near the sea, and inhabited by traders. In a vast temple there, one sees an idol which bears the same name as the city. ... The city and its revenues are the property of the idol."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 184.

[1553.—"Tanabaré." See under GALLE, POINT DE.]
DONEY, DHONY, s. In S. India, a small native vessel, properly formed (at least the lower part of it) from a single tree. Tamil, थुण्ड्रा. Dr. Gundert suggests as the origin Skt. थरु, 'a wooden vessel.' But it is perhaps connected with the Tamil 'vindu, 'to scoop out'; and the word would then be exactly analogous to the Anglo-American 'dug-out.' In the J.R.A.S. vol. i. is a paper by Mr. Edye, formerly H.M.'s Master Shipwright in Ceylon, on the native vessels of South India, and among others he describes the Doni (p. 13), with a drawing to scale. He calls it "a huge vessel of ark-like form, about 70 feet long, 20 feet broad, and 12 feet deep; with a flat bottom or keel part, which at the broadest place is 7 feet ... the whole equipment of these rude vessels, as well as their construction, is the most coarse and unseaworthy that I have ever seen." From this it would appear that the doney is no longer a 'dug-out,' as the suggested etymology, and Pyrard de Laval's express statement, indicate it to have been originally.

1552.— Castanheda already uses the word as Portuguese: "foi logo côtra ho tõe."— iii. 22.

1553.— "Vasco da Gama having started ... on the following day they were surprised rather than received a league and a half from Calicut, when they came towards them more than 60 tones, which are small vessels, crowded with people."—Barros, I. iv., xi.

1561.— The word constantly occurs in this form (toné) in Correa, e.g. vol. i. pt. 1, 403, 502, &c.

[1698.— "... certaine scutes or Skiffes called Tones."— Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 56.]

1606.— There is a good description of the vessel in Correa, f. 29.

c. 1610.— "Le basteau s'appelloit Donny, c'est à dire oiseau, pourquoy qu'il estoit pro- viste de voiles."— Pyrard de Laval, i. 65; [Hak. Soc. i. 86].

" ... "La part de leurs vaisseaux sont d'une seule piece, qu'ils appellent Tonny, et les Portugais Almèdes (Almadia)."— Ibid. i. 278; [Hak. Soc. i. 989].

1644.— "They have in this city of Cochin certain boats which they call Tones, in which they navigate the shallow rivers, which have 5 or 6 palms of depth, 12 or 20 cubits in length, and with a broad para of 5 or 6 palms, so that they build above an upper story called Bayllens, like a little house, thatched with Ola (Ollah), and closed at the sides. This contains many passengers, who go to amuse themselves on the rivers, and there are spent in this way many thousands of cruzados."— Bocarro MS.

1666.— "... with 110 paraoas, and 100 cattas (see PROW, CATUS) and 80 tonnes of broad beam, full of people ... the enemy displayed himself on the water to our caravels."— Parias y Sowas, Asia Portig. i. 66.

1672.— "... four fishermen from the town came over to us in a Tony."— Dut- duens, Ceylon (Dutch ed.), 89.

[1821.— In Travels on Foot through the Island of Ceylon, by J. Haafner, translated from the Dutch (Phillip's New Voyages and Travels, v. 6, 79), the words "thonij," "thonys" of the original are translated Funny, Funnies; this is possibly a misprint for Tummies, which appears on p. 66 as the rendering of "thonijs." See Notes and Queries, 9th ser., iv. 183.]

1860.— "... Amongst the vessels at anchor (at Galle) lie the dows of the Arabs, the Patamars of Malabar, the dhonays of Coromandel."— Tenants' Ceylon, ii. 193.

DOOB, s. H. dōb, from Skt. dārvā. A very nutritious creeping grass (Cynodon dactylon, Pers.), spread very generally in India. In the hot weather of Upper India, when its growth is scanty, it is eagerly sought for horses by the 'grass-cutters.' The natives, according to Roxburgh, quoted by Drury, cut the young leaves and make a cooling drink from the roots. The popular etymology, from धूप, 'sunshine,' has no foundation. Its merits, its lowly gesture, its spreading quality, give it a frequent place in native poetry.

1810.— "The doob is not to be found everywhere; but in the low countries about Dacca ... this grass abounds; attaining to a prodigious luxuriance."— Williamson, V. M. i. 238.

DOOCAUN, s. Ar. dukkaun, Pers. and H. dukān, 'a shop'; dukāndār, 'a shopkeeper.'

1554.— "And when you buy in the dukains (os ducões), they don't give picnicas (see PICOTA), and so the Dukandars (os Ducamdares) gain ...."— A. Nunes, 22.

1810.— "L'estrade élevée sur laquelle le marchand est assis, et d'oh il montre sa marchandise aux acheteurs, est proprement ce qu'on appelle dukān; mot qui signifie, suivant son étymologie, une estrade ou plateforme, sur laquelle on se tenant assis, et que nous traduisons improprement par boutique."— Note by Silvestre de Sacy, in Relation de l'Egypte, 594.

[1832.— "The Dukhauns (shops) small, with the whole front open towards the street."— Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, ii. 36.]
DOORMUND, n. p. Door-summ'mUND, a corrupt form of Dūrāsamudra (Gate of the Sea), the name of the capital of the Balalás, a medieval dynasty in S. India, who ruled a country generally corresponding with Mysore. [See Rice, Mysore, ii. 353.] The city itself is identified with the fine ruins at Halabídú [Hale-bidu, 'old capital'], in the Hassian district of Mysore.
DORADO.

s. Port. A kind of fish; apparently a dolphin (not the cetaceous animal so called). The Coryphaena hippurus of Day's Fishes is called by Cuvier and Valenciennes C. dorado. See also quotation from Drake. One might doubt, because of the praise of its flavour in Bontius, whilst Day only says of the C. hippurus that "these dolphins are eaten by natives." Fryer, however, uses an expression like that of Bontius:—"The Dolphin is entolled beyond these,"—i.e. Bonito and Albicore (p. 12).

1578.—"When he is chased of the Bonito, or great mackerel (whom the Aurata or Dolphin also pursueth)."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 32.

1631.—"Piscis Dorados dicti a Portugalensisibus, ab auroo quen funerit in cute colore hic piscis est longe optimi saporis, Bonitos bonitate excellens."—Luc. Bontii, Lib. V. cap. xix. 73.

DORAY, DURAI, s. This is a South Indian equivalent of Sahib (q.v.); Tel. dora, Tam. turai, 'Master.' Sinhalese, 'small gentleman' is the equivalent of Choha Sahib, a junior officer; and Tel. doraiseni, Tam. turaiseni (corruptly doreseni) of 'Lady' or 'Madam.'

1890.—"The delivery of three Iron guns to the Deura of Ramacole at the rate of 15 Pagodas per cundy is ordered ... which is much more than what they cost."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., Aug. 5. In Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 31.

1837.—"The Vakeels stand behind their masters during all the visit, and discuss with them all that A—says. Sometimes they tell him some barefaced lie, and when they find he does not believe it, they turn to me grinning, and say, 'Ma'am, the Doory plenty cunning gentleman.'"—Letters from Madras, 86.

1882.—"The appellation by which Sir T. Munro was most commonly known in the Ceded Districts was that of 'Colonel Dora.' And to this day it is considered a sufficient answer to inquiries regarding the reason for any Revenue Rule, that I was laid down by the Colonel Dora."—Arthuthot's Memoir of Sir T. M., p. xcviii.

"A village up the Godavery, on the left bank, is inhabited by a race of people known as Doraylu, or 'gentlemen.' That this is the understood meaning is shown by the fact that their women are called Doresandu, i.e. 'ladies.' These people rifle their arrow feathers, i.e. give them a spiral. "(Reference lost.) [These are perhaps the Kois, who are called by the Telengas Koidhakas, "the word thorna meaning 'gentleman' or Sahib."—(Central Proe. Gaz. 500; also see Ind. Ant. viii. 94)].

DORIA, s. H. doriya, from dor, dori, 'a cord or leash'; a dog-keeper.

1781.—"Stolen ... The Dog was taken out of Capt. Law's Baggage Boat ... by the Durreer that brought him to Calcutta."—India Gazette, March 17.

[Doriya is also used for a kind of cloth. "As the characteristic pattern of the charkhâna is a check, so that of the doriya is stripes running along the length of the thân, i.e. in warp threads. The doriya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tasar, and other combinations" (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 94).]

[D. 1590.—In a list of cotton cloths, we have "Doriiyah, per piece, 6R. to 2M."—Ain, i. 95.

[D. 1683.—"... 3 pieces Dooreas."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.]

DOSOTY, s. H. do-sûti, do-sûta, 'double thread;' a kind of cheap cotton stuff woven with threads doubled.

[1843.—"The other pair (of travelling baskets) is simply covered with dosootee (a coarse double-threaded cotton)."—Davidson, Diary in Upper India, i. 10.]

DOUBLE-GRILL, s. Domestic H. of the kitchen for 'a devil' in the culinary sense.

DOUR, s. A foray, or a hasty expedition of any kind. H. dour, 'a run.' Also to dour, 'to run,' or 'to make such an expedition.'

1853.—"'Halloa! Oakfield,' cried Perkins, as he entered the mess tent ... 'don't look down in the mouth, man; Attok taken, Chutter Sing dauring down like the devil—march to-morrow. ..."—Oakfield, ii. 67.

DOW, s. H. dào, [Skt. dâtra, dã, 'to cut']. A name much used on the Eastern frontier of Bengal as well as by Europeans in Burma, for the hewing knife or bill, of various forms, carried by the races of those regions, and used both for cutting jungle and as a sword. Dhā is the true Burmese name for their weapon of this kind, but we do not know if there is any relation but an accidental one with the Hind. word. [See drawing in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, p. 84.]

[1870.—"The Dao is the hill knife. . . . It is a blade about 18 inches long, narrow at the haft, and square and broad at the tip; pointless, and sharpened on one side only. The blade is set in a handle of wood; a bamboo root is considered the best. The fighting dao is differently shaped; this is a long pointless sword, set in a wooden or ebony handle; it is very heavy, and a blow of almost incredible power can be given by one of these weapons. . . . The weapon is identical with the 'parang latok' of the Malays. . . ."—Levi, Wild Races of S.E. India, 35 seq.

DOWLE, s. H. daul, daoulā. The ridge of clay marking the boundary between two rice fields, and retaining the water; called commonly in S. India a bund. It is worth noting that in Sussex doole is "a small conical heap of earth, to mark the bounds of farms and parishes in the downs" (Wright, Dict. of Obs. and Prov. English). [The same comparison was made by Sir H. Elliot (Supp. Gloss, s.v. Doula); the resemblance is merely accidental; see N.E.D. s.v. Dool.]

1851.—"In the N.W. corner of Suffolk, where the country is almost entirely open, the boundaries of the different parishes are marked by earthen mounds from 3 to 6 feet high, which are known in the neighbourhood as dools."—Notes and Queries, 1st Series, vol. iv. p. 161.

DOWRA, s. A guide. H. daurāhā, daurāhā, daurā, 'a village runner, a guide,' from daurā, 'to run,' Skt. drava, 'running.'

[DRABI, DRABY, s. The Indian camp-followers' corruption of the English 'driver.'

[1900.—"The mule race for Drabis and grass-cutters was entertaining."—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

DRAVIDIAN, adj. The Skt. term Dravīḍa seems to have been originally the name of the Conjevaram Kingdom (4th to 11th cent. A.D.), but in recent times it has been used as equivalent to 'Tamil.' About A.D. 700 Kumārila Bhaṭṭa calls the language of the South Andhadrāvīḍa-hēshā, meaning probably, as Bishop Caldwell suggests, what we should now describe as 'Telegu-Tamil-language.' Indeed he has shown reason for believing that Tamil and Dravīḍa, of which Dravīḍa (written Tiramīḍa), and Dravīḍa are old forms, are really the same word. [Also see Oppert, Orig. Inhab. 25 seq., and Dravīḍa, in a quotation from Al-birūnī under MALABAR.] It may be suggested as possible that the Tropina of Pliny is also the same (see below). Dr. Caldwell proposed Dravīḍian as a convenient name for the S. Indian languages which belong to the Tamil family, and the cultivated members of which are Tamil, Malayāḷam, Canarese, Tulu, Kudagu (or Coorg), and Telegu; the uncultivated Tuda, Kōta, Gōnd, Khond, Orāṇ, Rājmahālī. [It has also been adopted as an ethnological term to designate the non-Aryan races of India (see Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. Intro. xxxi.).]

c. A.D. 70.—"From the mouth of Ganges where he entereth into the sea unto the cape Calignon, and the town Danagula, are counted 726 miles; from thence to Tropina where standeth the chief mart or towne of merchandise in all India, 1225 miles. Then to the promontory of Perimula they reckon 750 miles, from which to the towne above said Patale . . . 620."—Pliny, by Phil. Holland, vi. chap. xx.

A.D. 404.—In a south-western direction are the following tracts . . . Surashtrians, Bāḍaras, and Drāvīḍas.—Vardāḥa-mihira, in J.R.A.S., 2nd ser. v. 84.

. . . "The eastern half of the Narbadda district . . . the Pulindas, the eastern half of the Drāvīḍas . . . of all these the Sun is the Lord."—Ibid. p. 251.

C. 1045.—"Moreover, chief of the sons of Bharata, there are, the nations of the South, the Drāvīḍas . . . the Karnatākas, Māhishākas . . . "—Vīśvaku Purāṇa, by H. H. Wilson, 1865, ii. 177 seq.

1856.—"The idioms which are included in this work under the general term 'Dravīḍian' constitute the vernacular speech of the great majority of the inhabitants of S. India."—Caldwell, Comp. Grammar of the Dravīḍian Languages, 1st ed.

1869.—"The people themselves arrange their countrymen under two heads; five termed Panch-gaurā, belonging to the Hindi, DRAWERS, LONG, s. An old-fashioned term, probably obsolete except in Madras, equivalent to pyjamas (q.v.).

1794.—"The contractor shall engage to supply ... every patient ... with ... a clean gown, cap, shirt, and long drawers."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 115.

DRESSING-BOY, DRESS-BOY, s. Madras term for the servant who acts as valet, corresponding to the bearer (q.v.) of N. India.

1837.—See Letters from Madras, 106.

DRUGGERMAN, s. Neither this word for an 'interpreter,' nor the Levantine dragoman, of which it was a quaint old English corruption, is used in Anglo-Indian colloquial; nor is the Arab tarjumân, which is the correct form, a word usual in Hindustâni. But the character of the two former words seems to entitle them not to be passed over in this Glossary. The Arabic is a loan-word from Aramaic târgêmân, met-târgêmân, 'an interpreter'; the Jewish Tarqyam, or Chaldee paraphrases of the Scriptures, being named from the same root. The original force of the Aramaic root is seen in the Assyrian râgûm, 'to speak,' rîgûm, 'the word.' See Proc. Soc. Bibl. Arch., 1883, p. 73, and Delitsch, The Hebrew Lang. viewed in the Light of Assyrian Research, p. 50. In old Italian we find a form somewhat nearer to the Arabic. (See quotation from Pegolotti below.)

c. 1150?.—"Quorum lingua cum prae-nominato Iohanni, Indorum patriarchae, nimis esset obscura, quod neque ipse quod Romani dicerent, neque Romani quod ipse dicereint intelligerent, interpretae interposito, quem Achivi drogomanum vocant, de mutuo statu Romanorum et Indicæ regionès ad invicem quereres cooperaunt."—De Adventu Patriarchæ Indorum, printed in Zunncke, Der Priester Johannes, i. 12. Leipzig, 1879.

c. 1270.—"After this my address to the assembly, I sent my message to Eix by a dragoman (trujaman) of mine."—Chron. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, ii. 558.

Villehardoun, early in the 13th century, uses drogument, and for other early forms see N. E. D. s.v. Dragomani.

c. 1309.—"Il avoit gens illec qui savoient le Sarrasinois et le français que l'on appelle drugemens, qui enromanoient le Sarrasinois au Conte Perron."—Joinville, ed. de Wailly, 182.

c. 1343.—"And at Tana you should furnish yourself with dragomans (turcimanni)."—Pegolotti's Handbook, in Cathey, &c., ii. 291, and App. iii.

1404.—"... el maestro en Teologia dixo por su Truximan que dixesse al Señor q' aquella carta que su fijo el rey le embiara non la sabia otro leal, salvo el ..."—Clavijo, 446.

1585.—... e dopo m'esserì pronisti di vn buonissimo dragomano, et interprete, fu inteso il suono delle trombette le quali annuntiauano l'udienza del Rè "(di Pegù).—Gasparo Balbi, f. 102v.

1613.—"To the Trojan Shoare, where I landed Feb. 22 with fourteene English men more, and a few or Druggerman."—T. Coryat, in Purchas, ii. 1813.

1615.—"E dietro, a cavallo, i dragomanni, cioè interpreti della repubblica e con loro tutti i dragomanni degli altri ambasciatori ai loro luoghi."—P. della Valle, i. 89.

1738.—"Till I cried out, you prove yourself so able, Pity! you was not Druggerman at Babel! For he, they found a linguist half so good, I make no question that the Tower had stood."—Pope, after Dante, Sat. iv. 81.

Other forms of the word are (from Span. trujaman) the old French trombement, Low Latin drocmandus, turchimannus, Low Greek ὀργόμανος, &c.

DRUMSTICK, s. The colloquial name in the Madras Presidency for the long slender pods of the Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertner, the Horse- Radish Tree (q.v.) of Bengal.

c. 1790.—"Mon domestique étot occupé à me préparer un plat de morongas, qui sont une espèce de fèves longues, auxquelles les Européens ont donné, à cause de leur forme, le nom de baguettes à tambou."—Hauffner, ii. 25.

DUB, s. Telugu dabbu, Tam. idappu, a small copper coin, the same as the doody (see CASH), value 20 cash; whence it comes to stand for money in general. It is curious that we have also an English provincial word, "Dubs= money," E. Sussex." (Holloway, Gen. Dist. of Provincialisms, Lewes, 1838). And the slang 'to dub up,' for to pay up, is common (see slang Dict.).
DUBASH, DOBASH, DEBASH.

s. H. dubbášiYá, dobáší (lit. 'man of two languages'), Tam. 'upáší. An interpreter; obsolete except at Madras, and perhaps there also now, at least in its original sense; [now it is applied to a dressing-boy or other servant with a European.] The Dubash was at Madras formerly a usual servant in every household; and there is still one attached to each mercantile house, as the broker transacting business with natives, and corresponding to the Calcutta banyan (q.v.). According to Drummond the word has a peculiar meaning in Guzerat: 'A Doobsheeo in Guzerat is viewed as an evil spirit, who by telling lies, sets people by the ears.' This illustrates the original meaning of dubash, which might be rendered in Bunyan's fashion as Mr. Two-Tongues.

[1566.—"Bring toopaz and interpreter, Antonio Fernandes."—India Office MSS. Gaveta's agreement with the jangadas of the fort of Quilon, Aug. 13.]

[1664.—"Per nosa conta a ambos por manilha 400 fanoin e ao tapay 50 fanoin."—Letter of Zamorin, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 1.]

1673.—"The Moors are very grave and haughty in their Demeanor, not vouchsafing to return an Answer by a slave, but by a Dubash."—Fryer, 30.

[1673.—"The Dubass of this Factory having to regain his freedom."—S. Master, in Man. of Kistna Dist. 123.]

1683.—"The chief Dubash was ordered to treat... for putting a stop to their proceedings."—Wheeler, i. 279.

1750.—"He ordered his Dubash to give the messenger two pagodas (sixteen shillings);—it was poor reward for having received two wounds, and risked his life in bringing him intelligence."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1800.—"The Dubash ere ought to be hanged for having made difficulties in collecting the rice."—Letter of Sir A. Wellesley, in do. 259.

[1804.—"I could neither understand them nor they me; but they would not give me up until a Dubash, whom Mrs. Sherwood had hired... came to my relief with a palanquin."—Autobiog. of Mrs. Sherwood, 272.]

1809.—"He (Mr. North) drove at once from the coast the tribe of Aumils and Debashees."—Ibid. Valentina, i. 315.

1810.—"In this first boat a number of debashes are sure to arrive."—Williamson, V. M. i. 133.

"The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of caste, and absolute destruction to any Bramin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their sacred language."—Morton's Life of Leyden, 30.

1860.—"The mudliars and native officers... were superseded by Malabar Dubashes, men aptly described as enemies to the religion of the Singhalese, strangers to their habits, and animated by no impulse but extortion."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 72.

DUBBER, s. P.—H. dabir, 'a writer or secretary.' It occurs in Pehlevi as debir, connected with the old Pers. di'pî, 'writing.' The word is quite obsolete in Indian use.

1760.—"The King... referred the adjustment to his Dubbeer, or minister, which, amongst the Indians, is equivalent to the Duan of the Mahomedan Princes."—Orme, ii. § i. 601.

DUBBER, s. Hind. (from Pers.) dabbah; also, according to Wilson, Guzerati dâbâra; Mahr. dâbara. A large oval vessel, made of green buffalo-hide, which, after drying and stiffening, is used for holding and transporting ghee or oil. The word is used in North and South alike.

1554.—"Butter (d màmêtiga, i.e. ghee) sells by the maund, and comes hither (to Ormuz) from Bacoara and from Reyssel (see RISHIRE); the most (however) that comes to Ormuz is from Dui and from Mangalor, and comes in certain great jars of hide, dabaas."—A. Nunes, 23.

1673.—"Did they not boil their Butter it would be rank, but after it has passed the Fire they keep it in Duppers the year round."—Fryer, 118.

1727.—(From the Indus Delta.) "They export great quantities of Butter, which they gently melt and put up in Jars called Duppas, made of the Hides of Cattle, almost in the Figure of a Glob, with a Neck and Mouth on one side."—A. Hamilton, i. 126; [ed. 1744, i. 127].

1828.—"Purhhoodas Shet of Brench, in whose books a certain Mahratta Sirdar is said to stand debtor for a Crore of Rupees... in early life brought... ghee in dubbers upon his own head hither from Baroda, and retailed it... in open Bazar."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.
1810.—"... dubbaus or bottles made of green hide."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 139.

1845.—"I find no account made out by the prisoner of what became of these dubbas of ghee."—G. O. by Sir C. Napier, in Sird, ii.

DUCKS, s. The slang distinctive name for gentlemen belonging to the Bombay service; the correlative of the Mulls of Madras and of the Qui-His of Bengal. It seems to have been taken from the term next following.

1803.—"I think they manage it here famously. They have neither the comforts of a Bengal army, nor do they rough it, like the Ducks."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 53.

1860.—"Then came Sire Jhone by way of Balagh and Hormuz to yé Costys of Ynde... And atte what Place yé Knyghte came to Londe, thayre yé fofike clepen ducks (quasi DUÇES INDIAE)."—Extract from a MS. of the Travels of Sir John Maunderill in the E. Indies, lately discovered (Calcutta).

In the following word is a corruption of the Tam. tikku, a weight equal to 1½ viss, about 3 lbs. 13 oz.

1787.—"We have fixed the produce of each vine at 4 ducks of wet pepper."—Portman of Tippoo Sultan, in Logan, Jalalabur, iii. 125.

DUCKS, BOMBAY. See BUMBOY.

1860.—"A fish nearly related to the salmon is dried and exported in large quantities from Bombay, and has acquired the name of Bombay Ducks."—Mason, Burmah, 273.

DUFFADAR, s. Hind. (from Arabo-Pers.) daftar or daftardar, the exact rationale of which name it is not easy to explain, dafta, 'a small body, a section,' daftardar, 'a person in charge of a small body of troops.' A petty officer of native police (v. burkundauze, v.) and in regiments of Irregular Cavalry, a non-commissioned officer corresponding in rank to a corporal or naik.

1803.—"The pay... for the duffadars ought not to exceed 35 rupees."—Wellington, ii. 242.

DUFTERY, s. Ar.—H. daftar. Colloquially 'the office,' and interchangeable with cutcherry, except that the latter generally implies an office of the nature of a Court. Daftarkhana is more accurate, [but this usually means rather a record-room where documents are stored]. The original Arab. daftar is from the Greek δεφθερα—membranae, 'a parchment,' and thin 'paper' (whence also diphtheria), and was applied to loose sheets filed on a string, which formed the record of accounts; hence daftar becomes 'a register,' a public record. In Arab. any account-book is still a daftar, and in S. India daftar means a bundle of connected papers tied up in a cloth, [the basta of Upper India].

1810.—"... Honest experienced officers upon whose forehead the stamp of correctness shines, write the agreement upon loose pages and sheets, so that the transaction cannot be forgotten. These loose sheets, into which all sanads are entered, are called the daftar."—Ain, i. 260, and see Blockmann's note there.

1757.—"... that after the expiration of the year they take a discharge according to custom, and that they deliver the accounts of their Zemindarry agreeable to the stated forms every year into the Daftar Cana of the Sircar. "—Sanad for the Company's Zemindarry, in Werest, View of Bengal, App. 147.]

DUFTERDAR, s. Ar. — P. — H. daftardar, is or was "the head native revenue officer on the Collector's and Sub-Collector's establishment of the Bombay Presidency." (Wilson.) In the provinces of the Turkish Empire the Daftardar was often a minister of great power and importance, as in the case of Mahommed Bey Daftardar, in Egypt in the time of Mahommed 'Ali Pasha (see Lane's Mod. Egypt., ed. 1860, pp. 127-128). The account of the constitution of the office of Daftardar in the time of the Mongol conqueror of Persia, Hulagü, will be found in a document translated by Hammer-Purgstall in his Gesch. der Goldenen Horde, 497-501.

DUFTEE, s. Hind. daftari. A servant in an Indian office (Bengal), whose business it is to look after the condition of the records, dusting and binding them; also to pen-mending, paper- ruling, making of envelopes, &c. In Madras these offices are done by a Moochy. [For the military sense of the word in Afghanistan, see quotation from Ferrier below.]

1810.—"... The Duftoree or office-keeper attends solely to those general matters in an office which do not come within the notice of the eunuchs, or *clerks."—Williamson, V. M. i. 275.
[1858.—"The whole Afghan army consists of the three divisions of Kabul, Kandahhar, and Herat; of these, the troops called Defteris (which receive pay), present the following effective force."—Ferrier, H. of the Afghans, 315 seq.]

DUGGIE. s. A word used in the Pegu teak trade, for a long squared timber. Milburn (1813) says: "Duggies are timbers of teak from 27 to 30 feet long, and from 17 to 24 inches square." Sir A. Phayre says the word to be a corruption of the Burmese ktāp-gyi. The first syllable means the cross-beam of a house, the second, big; hence big-beam.

DUGONG, s. The cetaceous mam-al, Halicore dugong. The word is Malay dāyung, also Javan: dugung; Macassar: ruyung. The etymology we do not know. [The word came to us from the name Duyung, used in the Philippine island of Leyte, and was popularised in its present form by Buffon in 1765. See N.E.D.]

DUMBCOW, v., and DUMB-cowed, participle. To brow-beat, to cow; and cowed, brow-beaten, sakedown. This is a capital specimen of Anglo-Indian dialect. Dam khānā, to eat one's breath, is a Hind. idiom for to be silent. Hobson-Jobson converts this into a transitive verb, to damkhāo, and both spelling and meaning being affected by English suggestions of sound, this comes in Anglo-Indian use to imply cowing and silencing. [A more probable derivation is from Hind. dhāmākānā; to chide, scold, threaten, to repress by threats or reproof (Platts, H. Diet.).]

DUMDUM, n.p. The name of a military cantonment 41/2 miles N.W. of Calcutta, which was for seventy years (1783-1853) the head-quarters of that famous corps the Bengal Artillery.
The name, which occurs at intervals in Bengal, is no doubt P.-H. dam-dama, a mound or elevated battery.
At Dumdum was signed the treaty which restored the British settlements after the re-capture of Calcutta in 1757. [It has recently given a name to the dumdum or expanding bullet, made in the arsenal there.]

[1830.—Prospectus of the "Dumdum Golting Club."—"We congratulate them on the prospect of seeing that noble and gentleman-like game established in Bengal."
—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 407.

1848.—"'Pooh! nonsense,' said Joe, highly flattered. 'I recollect, sir, there was a girl at Dumdum, a daughter of Cutler of the Artillery . . . who made a dead set at me in the year '4.'—Vanity Fair, i. 25.
ed. 1867.]

[1886.—"The Kirańchī (see CRANCHEE) has been replaced by the ordinary Dumbdummer, or Pālki carriage ever since the year 1856."—Sat. Review, Jan. 23.

[1900.—"A modern murderer came forward proudly with the dumdum."—Ibid.
Aug. 4.]

DUMPOKE, s. A name given in the Anglo-Indian kitchen to a baked dish, consisting usually of a duck, boned and stuffed. The word is Pers.
dampukht, 'air-cooked,' i.e. baked.
A recipe for a dish so called, as used in Akbar's kitchen, is in the first quotations:

c. 1590.—"Dampukht. 10 sers meat; 2 s.
ghi; 1 s. onions; 11 m. fresh ginger; 10 m. pepper; 2 d. cardamoms."—Āhn., i. 61.

1673.—"These eat highly of all Flesh Dumposed, which is baked with Spice in Butter."—Fryer, 93.

1689.—"... and a dumposed Fowl, that is boil'd with Butter in any small Vessel, and stuff with Raisins and Almonds is another (Dish)."—Ovington, 397.

DUMREE, s. Hind. damrī, a copper coin of very low value, not now existing. (See under DAM.)

1823.—In Malwa "there are 4 cowries to a gunda; 3 guendas to a dumrie; 2 dumries to a chedawm; 3 dumries to a tundumrie; and 4 dumries to an adillah or half pice."— Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 194; [86 note].

DUNGAREE, s. A kind of coarse and inferior cotton cloth; the word is not in any dictionary that we know.
[Platts gives H. dunnī ḍī, 'a coarse kind of cloth,' the Madras Gloss. gives Tel. dangidi, which is derived from Dāngidi, a village near Bombay. Molesworth in his Mahr. Dict. gives: "Dōngārī Kāpar, a term originally for the common country cloth sold in the quarter contiguous to the Dōngārī Killa (Fort George, Bombay), applied now to poor and low-priced cotton cloth. Hence in the corruption Dua-DURIAN, DORIAN.

1673.—"Along the Coasts are Bombaim... Carwar for Dungarees and the weightiest pepper."—Fryer, 86.

1812.—"The Prince's Messenger... told him, 'Come, now is the time to open your purse-strings; you are no longer a merchant or in prison; you are no longer to sell Dungaree (a species of coarse linen).'

1813.—"Dungarees (pieces to a ton) 400."—Milbourn, ii. 221.

1859.—"In addition to those which were real... were long lines of sham batteries, known to sailors as Dungaree forts, and which were made simply of coarse cloth or canvas, stretched and painted so as to resemble batteries."—L. Oliphant, Narr. of Lt. Elgin's Mission, ii. 6.

1868.—"Such dungerees as you now pay half a rupee a yard for, you could then buy from 20 to 40 yards per rupee."—Miss Freere's Old Deccan Days, p. xxiv.

1900.—"From this thread the Dongari Tasar is prepared, which may be compared to the organzine of silk, being both twisted and doubled."—Yussuf Ali, Mem. on Silk, 35.

DURBAR, s. A Court or Leeye. Pers. darbär. Also the Executive Government of a Native State (Carnegie). "In Kattywar, by a curious idiom, the chief himself is so addressed: 'Yes, Darbar'; 'no, Darbar' being simple reply to him."—(M. Gen. Keatings).

1609.—"On the left hand, thorow another gate you enter into an inner court where the King keeps his Darbar."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 432.

1616.—"The tenth of January, I went to Court at foure in the evening to the Darbar, which is the place where the Mogoll sits out daily, to entertain strangers, to receive Petitions and Presents, to give commands, to see and to be seen."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541; [with some slight differences of reading, in Hak. Soc. i. 106].

1633.—"This place they call the Derba (or place of Council) where Law and Justice was administered according to the Custome of the Countrey."—W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 51.

1750.—"... it faut se rappeller ces tems d'humiliation ou le Francois etoient forces pour le bien de leur commerce, d'allier timidement porter leurs presets et leurs hommages a de petits chefs de Bourgades que nous n'admettons aujourd'hui a nos Durbars que lorsque nos interess l'exigent."—Letter of M. de Buury, in Cambridge's Account, p. xxix.

1793.—"At my durbar yesterday I had proof of the affection entertained by the natives for Sir William Jones. The Professors of the Hindu Law, who were in the habit of attendance upon him, burst into unrestrained tears when they spoke to me."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 289.

1809.—"It was the durbar of the native Gentoo Princes."—Ld. Valentia, i. 362.

1826.—"... a Durbar, or police-officer, should have men in waiting..."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 126.

1875.—"Sitting there in the centre of the durbar, we assisted at our first naucht."—Sir M. E. Grant Duft, in Contemp. Rev., July.

1881.—"Near the centre (at Amritsar) lies the sacred tank; from whose midst rises the Darbar Sahib, or great temple of the Sikh faith."—Imperial Gazetteer, i. 188.

DURGAH, s. P. durgāh. Properly a royal court. But the habitual use of the word in India is for the shrine of a (Mahommedan) Saint, a place of religious resort and prayer.

1782.—"Adjoining is a durgaw or burial place, with a view of the river."—Hodges, 102.

1807.—"The dhurgaw may invariably be seen to occupy those sites pre-eminent for comfort and beauty."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 24.

1828.—"... he was a relation of the... superior of the Durghah, and this is now a sufficient protection."—The Kuzzilbash, ii. 273.

DURIAN, DORIAN, s. Malay dūrān, Molucca form dūriyān, from dūrī, 'a thorn or prickle, [and An, the common substantival ending; Mr. Skeat gives the standard Malay as dūriyan or dūriyan]; the great fruit of the tree (N. O. Bombacae) called by botanists Durio zibethinus, D. C. The tree appears to be a native of the Malay Peninsula, and the nearest islands; from which it has been carried to Tenasserim on one side and to Mindanao on the other.
The earliest European mention of this fruit is that by Nicolò Conti. The passage is thus rendered by Winter Jones: “In this island (Sumatra) there also grows a green fruit which they call duriano, of the size of a cucumber. When opened five fruits are found within, resembling oblong oranges. The taste varies like that of cheese.” (In India in the XVth Cent., p. 9.) We give the original Latin of Poggio below, which must be more correctly rendered thus: “They have a green fruit which they call dorian, as big as a water-melon. Inside there are five things like elongated oranges, and resembling thick butter, with a combination of flavours.” (See Carletti, below.)

The dorian in Sumatra often forms a staple article of food, as the jack (q.v.) does in Malabar. By natives and old European residents in the Malay regions in which it is produced the dorian is regarded as incomparable, but novices have a difficulty in getting over the peculiar, strong, and offensive odour of the fruit, on account of which it is usual to open it away from the house, and which procured for it the indecent Dutch nickname of stancker. “When that aversion, however, is conquered, many fall into the taste of the natives, and become passionately fond of it.” (Crawfurd, H. of Ind. Arch. i. 419.) [Wallace (Malay Arch. 57) says that he could not bear the smell when he “first tried it in Malacca, but in Borneo I found a ripe fruit on the ground, and, eating it out of doors, I at once became a confirmed Durian eater . . . the more you eat of it the less you feel inclined to stop. In fact to eat Durians is a new sensation, worth a voyage to the East to experience.”] Our forefathers had not such delicate noses, as may be gathered from some of the older notices. A Governor of the Straits, some forty-five years ago, used to compare the Dorian to ‘carrion in custard.’

c. 1440.—“Fructum viridem habent nomine durianum, magnitude cucumeris, in quo sunt quinque velut mala rio oblonga, varii saporis, instar butyri coagulati.”—Poggii, de Varietate Fortunae, Lib. iv.

1552.—“Durions, which are fashioned like artichokes” (!)—Castanheda, ii. 355.

1553.—“Among these fruits was one kind now known by the name of durions, a thing greatly esteemed, and so luscious that the Malacca merchants tell how a certain trader came to that port with a ship load of great value, and he consumed the whole of it in guzzling durions and in gallantries among the Malay girls.”—Barros, ii. vi. 95.

1563.—“A gentleman in this country (Portuguese India) tells me that he remembers to have read in a Tuscan version of Pliny, ‘nobiles durianes.’ I have since asked him to find the passage in order that I might trace it in the Latin, but up to this time he says he has not found it.”—Garcia, f. 85.

1588.—“There is one that is called in the Malacca tongue durion, and is so good that I have heard it affirmed by manie that have gone about the world, that it doth exceede in savour all others that ever they had seene or tasted . . . Some do say that have seene it that it seemeth to be that wherewith Adam did transgres, being carried away by the singular savour.”—Parke's Mendocia, ii. 318.

1598.—‘Duryen is a fruit ýt only groweth in Malacca, and is so much comèd by those which have proued ye same, that there is no fruite in the world to bee compared with it.”—Linschoten, 102; [Hak. Soc. i. 51].

1599.—The Dorian, Carletti thought, had a smell of onions, and he did not at first much like it, but when at last he got used to this he liked the fruit greatly, and thought nothing of a simple and natural cud could be tasted which possessed a more complex and elaborate variety of odours and flavours than this did.—See Viaggi, Florence, 1701; Pt. ii. p. 211.

1601.—“Duryen . . . ad apertionem primam . . . putridum cope redolent, sed dotem tamen divinam illam omnem gustui profundum.”—Debry, iv. 33.

[1610.—“The Darion tree nearly resembles a pear tree in size.”—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 366.]

1615.—“There groweth a certaine fruit, prickled like a ches-nut, and as big as one’s fist, the best in the world to eate, these are somewhat costly, all other fruits being at an easie rate. It must be broken with force and therein is contained a white liqour like unto creame, never the lesse it yields a very vseinouy sent like to a rotten oynion, and it is called Esturion” [probably a misprint].—De Monfort, 27.

1737.—‘The Durian is another excellent Fruit, but offensive to some People’s Noses, for it smells very like . . . but when once tasted the smell vanishes.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 81; [ed. 1744, ii. 80].

1855.—“The fetid Dorian, prince of fruits to those who like it, but chief of abominations to all strangers and novices, does not grow within the present territories of Ava, but the King makes great efforts to obtain a supply in his unstable condition from the Ta-nasserim Coast. King Tharawadi used to lay post-horses from Martaban to Ava, to lay his odoriferous delicacy.”—Yule, Mission to Ava, 161.
1878.—"The Durian will grow as large as a man's head, is covered closely with terribly sharp spines, set hexagonally upon its hard skin, and when ripe it falls; if it should strike any one under the tree, severe injury or death may be the result."—M'Naik, Perak, 60.

1885.—"I proceeded ... under a continuous shade of tall Durian trees from 35 to 40 feet high. ... In the flowering time it was a most pleasant shady wood; but later in the season the chance of a fruit now and then descending on one's head would be less agreeable." Note.—"Of this fruit the natives are passionately fond ... and the elephants flock to its shade in the fruiting time; but, more singular still, the tiger is said to devour it with avidity."—Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 240.

DURJUN, s. H. darjan, a corr. of the English dozen.

DURWAUN, s. H. from P. farwan, darbhn. A doorkeeper. A domestic servant so called is usual in the larger houses of Calcutta. He is porter at the gate of the compound (q.v.).

[c. 1590.—"The Daráns, or Porters. A thousand of these active men are employed to guard the palace."—Ain, i. 258.]

c. 1755.—"Derwan."—List of servants in Iees, 50.

1781.—(After an account of an alleged attempt to seize Mr. Hicky's Darwán).—Mr. Hicky begs leave to make the following remarks. That he is clearly of opinion that these horrid Assassins wanted to dispatch him whilst he lay a sleep, as a Door-van is well known to be the alarm of the House, to prevent which the Villains wanted to carry him off, and their precipitate flight the moment they heard Mr. Hicky's Voice puts it past a Doubt."—Reflections on the consequence of the late attempt made to Assassinate the Printer of the original Bengal Gazette (in the same, April 14).

1784.—"Yesterday at daybreak, a most extraordinary and horrid murder was committed upon the Dirwan of Thomas Martin, Esq."—In Seton-Karr, i. 12.

"In the entrance passage, often on both sides of it, is a raised flour with one or two open cells, in which the Darwans (or doorkeepers) sit, lie, and sleep—in fact dwell."—Calc. Review, vol. Ix. p. 207.

DURWAUZA-BUND. The formula by which a native servant in an Anglo-Indian household intimates that his master or mistress cannot receive a visitor—'Not at home'—without the untruth. It is elliptical for darwāza band hai, 'the door is closed.'

[1877.—"When they did not find him there, it was Darwaza bund."—Allardyce, The City of Sunshine, i. 125.]

DUSSEERA, DASSORA, DASHEHA, s. Skt. daśaharā, H. dasharā, Mahr. dasrā; the 'nine-nights' (or ten days) festival in October, also called Durgā-pūjā (see DOORGA-P.). In the west and south of India this holiday, taking place after the close of the wet season, became a great military festival, and the period when military expeditions were entered upon. The Maharattas were alleged to celebrate the occasion in a way characteristic of them, by destroying a village! The popular etymology of the word and that accepted by the best authorities, is das, 'ten (sins)' and har, 'that which takes away (or expiates). It is, perhaps, rather connected with the ten days' duration of the feast, or with its chief day being the 10th of the month (Aśvina); but the origin is decidedly obscure.

c. 1590.—"The autumn harvest he shall begin to collect from the Desheher, which is another Hindoo festival that also happens differently, from the beginning of Virgo to the commencement of Libra."—Ajeen, tr. Gladwin, ed. 1800, i. 307; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 46].

1783.—"On the anniversary of the Dushararah you will distribute among the Hindoos, composing your escort, a goat to every ten men."—Tipoo's Letters, 162.

1812.—"The Courts ... are allowed to adjourn annually during the Hindoo festival called dussarah."—Fifth Report, 37.

1813.—"This being the desserah, a great Hindoo festival ... we resolved to delay our departure and see some part of the ceremonies."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 97; [2nd ed. ii. 450].

DUSTOOR, DUSTOORY, s. P.—H. dastār, 'custom' [see DESTOOR.] dastāri, 'that which is customary. That commission or percentage on the money passing in any cash transaction which, with or without acknowledgment or permission, sticks to the fingers of the agent of payment. Such 'customary' appropriations are, we believe, very nearly as common in England as in India; a fact of which newspaper correspondence from time to time makes us aware, though Europeans in India, in condemning the natives, often forget, or are ignorant of this. In India the practice is perhaps more distinctly recognised, as the word denotes. Ibn Batuta tells us that at the Court of Delhi, in his time (c. 1340), the custom was for the officials to deduct a of every sum which the Sultan ordered to be paid from the treasury (see I. B. pp. 408, 426, &c.).

[1616.—"The dusturia in all bought goods ... is a great matter."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 350.]

[1648.—"The usual Dustore shall be equally divided."—S. Master, in Krishna Adv. 136.]

1660.—"It is also ordered that in future the Vakils (see VAKEEL), Mootsudees (see MOOTSBUDY), or Writers of the Tagadgers,* Dumiers, (!) or overseers of the Weavers, and the Picars and Podars shall not receive any monthly wages, but shall be content with the Dustoor ... of a quarter anna in the rupee, which the merchants and weavers are to allow them. The Dustoor may be divided twice a year or oftener by the Chief and Council among the said employers."—Pt. St. Geo. Cons., Dec. 2. In Notes and Extracts, No. ii. p. 61.

1681.—"For the fame of Dustoory on cooley hire at Pagodas 20 per annum received a part ... (Pag.) 13 00 0."—Ibid. Jan. 10; Ibid. No. III. p. 45.

[1684.—"The Honble. C°m°. having order'd ... that the Dustore upon their Investment ... be brought into the Generall Books."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 69.]

1750.—"It never can be in the power of a superintendent of Police to reform the numberless abuses which servants of every Denomination have introduced, and now support on the Broad Basis of Dustoor."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 26.

1785.—"The Public are hereby informed that no Commission, Brokerage, or Dustoor is charged by the Bank, or permitted to be taken by any Agent or Servant employed by them."—In Seton-Karr, i. 130.

1795.—"All servants belonging to the Company's Shed have been strictly prohibited from demanding or receiving any fees or dustoors on any pretence whatever."—Ibid. ii. 16.

1824.—"The profits however he made during the voyage, and by a dustoor on all the alms given or received ... were so considerable that on his return some of his confidential disciples had a quarrel with him."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 198.

1866.—"... of all taxes small and great the heaviest is dustooree."—Trevelyan, Dakk Bengalow, 217.

DUSTOOR, DUSTOORY.

DUSTUCK. s. P. dustak, ['a little hand, hand-clapping to attract attention, a notice']. A pass or permit. The dustucks granted by the Company's covenanted servants in the early half of the 18th century seems to have been a constant instrument of abuse, or bone of contention, with the native authorities in Bengal. [The modern sense of the word in N. India is a notice of the revenue demand served on a defaulter.]

1716.—"A passport or dustuck, signed by the President of Calcutta, should exempt the goods specified from being visited or stopped."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 21.

1748.—"The Zeminard near Pultah having stopped several boats with English Dusticks and taken money from them, and disregarding the Phoudar's orders to clear them. ..."—In Long, 6.

[1762.—"Dusticks." See WRITER.]

1793.—"The dignity and benefit of our Dustucks are the chief badges of honour, or at least interest, we enjoy from our Phirmaund."—From the Chief and Council at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 210.

1796.—"Dusticks." See under HOS-BOLHOOKUM.

1796.—"It is a practice of the Revenue Courts of the sircar to issue Dustuck for the malgoozaree the very day the kist (instalment) became due."—Confessions of an Orderly, 132.

DWARKA. n.p. EAGLE-WOOD. 8. The name of an aromatic wood from Camboja and some other Indian regions, chiefly trans-gangetic. It is the "odorous wood" referred to by Camoes in the quotation under CHAMPA. We have somewhere read an explanation of the name as applied to the substance in question, because this is flecked and mottled, and so supposed to resemble the plumage of an eagle! [Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 395; Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 120, 150.] The word is in fact due to a corrupt form of the Skt. name of the wood, agaru, aguru. A form, probably, of this is aril, akil, which Gundert gives as the Malayal. word.* From this the Portuguese must have taken their aquila, as we find it in Barbosa (below), or pao (wood) d'aquila, made into aquila, whence French bois d'aigle, and Eng. eagle-wood. The Malays call it Kayu (wood)-gahru, evidently the same word, though which way the etymology flowed is difficult to say. [Mr. Skeat writes: "the question is a difficult one. Klinkert gives garu (garoe) and gaharu (garhoaré), whence the trade names 'Garroo' and 'Garroo'; and the modern standard Malay certainly corresponds to Klinkert's forms, though I think gaharau should rather bewritten gharu, i.e. with an aspirated g, which is the way the Malays pronounce it. On the other hand, it seems perfectly clear that there must have been an alternative modern form agaru, or perhaps even aguru, since otherwise such trade names as 'ugar' and (?) 'tugger' could have not arisen. They can scarcely have come from the Skt. In Ridley's Plant List we have gaharu and gagaheu, which is the regular abbreviation of the reduplicated form gahru-gahru identified as Aquilaria Malaccensis, Lam." [See CAMBULAC.]

The best quality of this wood, once much valued in Europe as incense, is the result of disease in a tree of the N. O. Leguminosae, the Aloesylon agallochum, Loureiro, growing in Camboja and S. Cochin China, whilst an inferior kind, of like aromatic qualities, is produced by a tree of an entirely different order, Aquilaria agallocha, Roxb. (N. O. Aquiliaraceae), which is found as far north as Sihlet.* Eagle-wood is another name for aloes-wood, or aloes (q.v.) as it is termed in the English Bible. [See Encycl. Bibl. i. 120 seq.] It is curious that Bluteau, in his great Portuguese Vocabularia, under 'Pao d'Aguila, jumps up this afores-wood with Socotrina Aloes. Αγάλλουν was known to the ancients, and is described by Dioscorides (c. a.d. 65). In Liddell and Scott the word is rendered "the bitter aloe", which seems to involve the same confusion as that made by Bluteau.

Other trade-names of the article given by Forbes Watson are Garroo- and Garroo-wood, agila-wood, uger-, and tugger- (?) wood.

ELEPHANT, s. This article will be confined to notes connected with the various suggestions which have been put forward as to the origin of the word—a sufficiently ample subject.

The oldest occurrence of the word (έφες—φερος) is in Homer. With him, and so with Hesiod and Pindar, the word means 'ivory.' Herodotus first uses it as the name of the animal (iv. 191). Hence an occasional, probably an erroneous, assumption that the word ἐφες originally meant only the material, and not the beast that bears it.

In Persian the usual term for the beast is fil, with which agree the Aramaic pil (already found in the Chaldee and Syriac versions of the O. T.), and the Arabic fil. Old etymologists tried to develop elephant out of fil; and it is natural to connect with it the Spanish for 'ivory' (marfil, Port. marfim), but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the first syllable of that word. More certain is the fact that in early Swedish and Danish the word for 'elephant' is fil, in Icelandic fill; a term supposed to have been introduced by old traders from the East via Russia. The old Swedish for 'ivory' is filöben.*

The oldest Hebrew mention of ivory is in the notice of the products brought to Solomon from Ophir, or India. Among these are ivory tusks—shen-habbim, i.e. 'teeth of habbim,' a word which has been interpreted as from Skt. īha, elephant.† But it is entirely doubtful what this habbim, occurring here only, really means.‡ We know

* Fīlū, for elephant, occurs in certain Sanskrit books, but it is regarded as a foreign word.
† See Lassen, i. 313; Aox Müller’s Lectures on Se. of Language, 1st S. p. 189.
‡ "As regards the interpretation of habbim, a ḫāṭeq ley., in the passage where the state of the text, as shown by comparison with the LXX, is very unsatisfactory, it seems impossible to say anything that can be of the least use in clearing from other evidence that ivory was known in Egypt and Western Asia for ages before Solomon. And in other cases the Hebrew word for ivory is simply sheen, corresponding to Aeneis in Ovid and other Latin writers. In Ezekiel (xxvii. 15) we find karnoth sheen = 'cornua dentis.'

The use of the word 'horns' does not necessarily imply a confusion of these great curved tusks with horns; it has many parallels, as in Pliny's, "cum arbores exaequant limentque cornua elephanti" (xviii. 7); in Martial's "Indicoque cornu" (i. 73); in Aelian's story, as alleged by the Mauritanians, that the elephants there shed their horns every ten years ('δεκατη χρονος τα κέρατα εκ- πεσων'—xiv. 5); whilst Cleasby quotes from an Icelandic saga 'olifant-horn' for 'ivory.'

We have mentioned Skt. ibha, from which Lassen assumes a compound ibhadantā for ivory, suggesting that this, combined by early traders with the Arabic article, formed al-ibha- dantā, and so originated elefarrinos. Pott, besides other doubts, objects that ibhadantā, though the name of a plant (Tiaridium indicum, Lehm.), is never actually a name of ivory.

Pott's own etymology is olaf-hindi, 'Indian ox,' from a word existing in sundry resembling forms, in Hebrew and in Assyrian (alif, alap). This has met with favour; though it is a little hard to accept any form like Hindi as earlier than Homer.

Other suggested origins are Pictet's from airāvata (lit. 'proceeding from water'), the proper name of the elephant of Indra, or Elephant of the Eastern Quarter in the Hindu Cosmology. This is felt to be only too ingenious, but as improbable. It is, however, suggested, it would seem independently, by Mr. Kittel (Indian Antiquary, i. 128), who supposes the first part of the word to be Dravidian, a transformation from dēna, 'elephant.'

Pictet, finding his first suggestion not accepted, has called up a Singhalese word aliyə, used for 'elephant,' which he takes to be from dla, 'great'; thence aliyə, 'great creature'; and proceeding further, presents a combination of dla, 'great,' with Skt. phata, sometimes signifying 'a tooth,' thus ali-phata, 'great tooth' = elephantus.

Hodgson, in Notes on Northern Africa (p. 19, quoted by Pott), gives elef ameγran ('Great Boar,' elef being 'boar') as the name of the animal among the Kabyles of that region, and appears to present it as the origin of the Greek and Latin words.

Again we have the Gothic ulbandus, 'a camel,' which has been regarded by some as the same word with elephantus. To this we shall recur.

Pott, in his elaborate paper already quoted, comes to the conclusion that the choice of etymologies must lie between his own aluf-hindi and Lassen's al-ibha-dantā. His paper is 50 years old, but he repeats this conclusion in his Würzel-Wörterbuch der Indo-Germanische Sprachen, published in 1871, nor can I ascertain that there has been any later advance towards a true etymology. Yet it can hardly be said that either of the alternatives carries conviction.

Both, let it be observed, apart from other difficulties, rest on the assumption that the knowledge of glefas, whether as fine material or as monstrous animal, came from India, whilst nearly all the other or less-favoured suggestions point to the same assumption.

But knowledge acquired, or at least taken cognizance of, since Pott's latest reference to the subject, puts us in possession of the new and surprising fact that, even in times which we are entitled to call historic, the elephant existed wild, far to the westward of India, and not very far from the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean. Though the fact was indicated from the wall-paintings by Wilkinson some 65 years ago, and has more recently been amply displayed in historical works which have circu- lated by scores in popular libraries, it is singular how little attention or interest it seems to have elicited.*

The document which gives precise Egyptian testimony to this fact is an inscription (first interpreted by Ebers in 1873)† from the tomb of Amenemhi, a captain under the great conqueror Thotmes III. [Thümmosis], who reigned B.C. c. 1600. This warrior, speaking from his tomb of the great deeds of his master, and of his own right arm, tells how the king, in the neighbourhood of Nî, hunted 120 elephants for the sake of their tusks; and how he himself (Amenemhi) encountered the biggest of them, which had attacked the sacred person of the king, and cut through its trunk. The elephant chased him into the water, where he saved himself between two rocks; and the king bestowed on him rich rewards.

The position of Nî is uncertain, though some have identified it with Nineveh.‡ [Maspero writes: “Nî, long confounded with Nineveh, after Champollion (Gram. égyptienne, p. 150), was identified by Lenormant (Les Origines, vol. iii. p. 316 et seq.) with Ninus Vetus, Membidj, and by Max Müller (Asien und Europa, p. 267) with Balis on the Euphrates: I am inclined to make it Kefer-Naya, between Aleppo and Turmanin” (Struggle of the Nations, 144, note.)] It is named in another inscription between Arinath and Akerith, as all, three cities of Naharain or Northern Mesopotamia, captured by Amenhotep II., the son of Thotmes III. Might not Nî be Nisibis? We shall find that Assyrian inscriptions of later date have been interpreted as placing elephant-hunts in the land of Harran and in the vicinity of the Chaboras.

If then these elephant-hunts may be located on the southern skirts of Taurus, we shall more easily understand how a tribute of elephant-tusks should have been offered at the court of Egypt by the people of Rutennu or Northern Syria, and also by the people of the adjacent Asêbi or Cyprus, as we find repeatedly recorded on the Egyptian monuments, both in hieroglyphic writing and pictorially.*

What the stones of Egypt allege in the 17th cent. B.C., the stones of Assyria 500 years afterwards have been alleged to corroborate. The great inscription of Tighlath-Pileser I., who is calculated to have reigned about B.C. 1120-1100, as rendered by Lotz, relates:

"Ten mighty Elephants
Slew I in Harran, and on the banks of the Haboras.
Four Elephants I took alive;
Their hides,
Their teeth, and the live Elephants
I brought to my city Assur."†

The same facts are recorded in a later inscription, on the broken obelisk of Assurnazirpal from Kouyunjik, now in the Br. Museum, which commemorates the deeds of the king’s ancestor, Tighlath Pileser.‡

In the case of these Assyrian inscriptions, however, elephant is by no means an undisputed interpretation. In the famous quadruple test exercise on this inscription in 1857, which gave the death-blow to the doubts which some sceptics had emitted as to the genuine character of the Assyrian interpretations, Sir H. Rawlinson, in this passage, rendered the animals slain and taken alive as wild buffaloes. The ideogram given as teeth he had not interpreted. The question is argued at length by Lotz in the work already quoted, but it is a question for cuneiform experts, dealing, as it does, with the interpretation of more than one ideogram, and enveloped as yet in uncertainties. It is to be observed, that in 1857 Dr. Hincks, one of the four test-translators,§ had rendered the passage almost exactly as Lotz has done 23 years later, though I cannot see that Lotz makes any allusion to this fact. [See Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1262.] Apart from arguments as to decipherment and ideograms, it is certain that probabilities are much affected by the publication of the Egyptian inscription of Amenhotep, which gives a greater plausibility to the rendering 'elephant' than could be ascribed to it in 1857. And should it eventually be upheld, it will be all the more remarkable that the sagacity of Dr. Hincks should then have ventured on that rendering.

In various suggestions, including Pott's, besides others that we have omitted, the etymology has been based on a transfer of the name of the ox, or some other familiar quadruped. There would be nothing extraordinary in such a transfer of meaning. The reference to the bos Luca* is trite; the Tibetan word for ox (glan) is also the word for 'elephant'; we have seen how the name 'Great Boar' is alleged to be given to the elephant among the Kabyles; we have heard of an elephant in a menagerie being described by a Scotch rustic as 'a muckle sow'; Pausanias, according to Bochart, calls rhinoceroses 'Aethiopic bulls' [Bk. ix. 21, 2]. And let me finally illustrate the matter by a circumstance related to me by a brother officer who accompanied Sir Neville Chamberlain on an expedition among the turbulent Pathan tribes c. 1860. The women of the villages gathered to gaze on the elephants that accompanied the force, a stranger sight to them than it would have been to the women of the most secluded village in Scotland. 'Do you see these?' said a soldier of the Frontier Horse; 'do you know what they are? These are the Queen of England's buffaloes that give 5 maunds (about 160 quarts) of milk a day!'

Now it is an obvious suggestion, that if there were elephants on the skirts of Taurus down to B.C. 1100, or even (taking the less questionable evidence) down only to B.C. 1600, it is highly improbable that the Greeks would have had to seek a name for the animal, or its tusk, from Indian trade. And if the Greeks had a vernacular name for the elephant, there is also a probaibility, if not a presumption, that some tradition of this name would be found, mutatis mutandis, among other Aryan nations of Europe.

Now may it not be that ólφας—φαντος in Greek, and ulbandus in Moeso-Gothic, represent this vernacular name? The latter form is exactly the modification of the former which Grimm's law demands. Nor is the word confined to Gothic. It is found in the Old H. German (olfend,) in Anglo-Saxon (olfend, olfend, &c.); in Old Swedish (aelpand, alvandyr, ulfvald); in Icelandic (ulfalts). All these Northern words, it is true, are used in the sense of camel, not of elephant. But instances already given may illustrate that there is nothing surprising in this transfer, all the less where the animal originally indicated had long been lost sight of. Further, Jülg, who has published a paper on the Gothic word, points out its resemblance to the Slav forms wolbonds, welblond, or weblad, also meaning 'camel' (compare also Russian verblivd). This, in the last form (wielblad), may, he says, be regarded as resolvable into 'Great beast.' Herr Jülg ends his paper with a hint that in this meaning may perhaps be found a solution of the origin of elephant (an idea at which Pictet also transiently pointed in a paper referred to above), and half promises to follow up this hint; but in thirty years he has not done so far as I can discover. Nevertheless it is one which may yet be pregnant.

Nor is it inconsistent with this suggestion that we find also in some of the Northern languages a second series of names designating the elephant—not, as we suppose ulbandus and its kin to be, common vocables descending from a remote age in parallel development—but adoptions from Latin at a much more recent period. Thus, we have in Old and Middle German Elefant and Helfant, with elfenbein and helfenbein for ivory; in Anglo-Saxon, ylpend, elpend, with shortened forms ylp and elp, and ylpban for ivory; whilst the Scandinavian tongues adopt and retain jil. [The N.E.D. regards the derivation as doubtful, but considers the theory of Indian origin improbable.

[A curious instance of misapprehension is the use of the term 'Chain elephants.' This is a misunderstanding. of the ordinary location zanjir-i-fin when speaking of elephants. Zanjir is literally a 'chain,' but is here akin to our expressions, a 'pair,' 'couple,' 'brace' of anything. It was used, no doubt, with reference to the iron chain by which an elephant is hobbled. In an account 100 elephants would be entered thus: Fil, Zanjir, 100. (See NUMERICAL AFFIXES.)

[1826.—"Very frequent mention is made in Asiatic histories of chain-elephants; which always mean elephants trained for war; but it is not very clear why they are so denominated."—Ranking, Hist. Res. on the Wars and Sports of the Mongols and Romans, 1826, Intro. p. 12.]

a. n.p. An island in Bombay Harbour, the native name of which is Ghârâpûri (or sometimes, it would seem, shortly, Purî), famous for its magnificent excavated temple, considered by Burgess to date after the middle of the 8th cent. The name was given by the Portuguese from the life-size figure of an elephant, hewn from an isolated mass of trap-rock, which formerly stood in the lower part of the island, not far from the usual landing-place. This figure fell down many years ago, and was often said to have disappeared. But it actually lay in situ till 1864-5, when (on the suggestion of the late Mr. W. E. Frere) it was removed by Dr. (now Sir) George Birdwood to the Victoria Gardens at Bombay, in order to save the relic from destruction. The elephant had originally a smaller figure on its back, which several of the earlier authorities speak of as a young elephant, but which Mr. Erskine and Capt. Basil Hall regarded as a tiger. The horse mentioned by Fryer remained in 1712; it had disappeared apparently before Niebuhr's visit in 1764. [Compare the recovery of a similar pair of elephant figures at Delhi, Cunningham, Archaeol. Rep. i. 225 seqq.]

c. 1321.—"In quod dum sic ascendissem, in xxxviii. dietis me transituli usque ad Tanam ... haec terra multum bene est situta ... Haec terra antiquitus fuit valde magna. Nam ipsa fuit terra regis Pori, qui cum rege Alexandro praebuit maximum commissit."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App. p. v.

We quote this because of its relation to the passages following. It seems probable that the alleged connection with Porus and Alexander may have grown out of the name Purî or Pori.

[1539.—Mr. Whiteway notes that in João de Castro's Log of his voyage to Diu will be found a very interesting account with measurements of the Elephant Caves.]

1548.—"And the Isle of Pory, which is that of the Elephant (do Alfânte), is leased to João Pirez by arrangements of the said Governor (dom João de Castro) for 150 pardoas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 158.

1580.—"At 3 hours of the day we found ourselves abreast of a cape called Bombain, where is to be seen an ancient Roman temple, hollowed in the living rock. And above the said temple are many tamarind-trees, and below it a living spring, in which they have never been able to find bottom. The said temple is called Alefante, and is adorned with many figures, and inhabited by a great multitude of bats; and here they say that Alexander Magnus prayed, and for memorial thereof caused this temple to be made, and further than this he advanced not."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 62c.-63.

1598.—"There is yet an other Pagode, which they hold and esteem for the highest and chiefest Pagode of all the rest, which standeth in a little Iland called Pory; this Pagode by the Portingalls is called the Pagode of the Elephant. In that Iland standeth an high hill, and on the top thereof there is a hole, that goeth down into the hill, digged and carved out of the hard rock or stones as big as a great cloyster ... round about the walls are cut and formed, the shapes of Elephants, Lions, tigers, & a thousand such like wide and cruel beasts ..."—Linschoten, ch. xliv.; [Hak. Soc. i. 291.]

1616.—Diogo de Couto devotes a chapter of 11 pp. to his detailed account "do muito notável e esplêndido Pagode do Elefante." We extract a few paragraphs:

"This notable and above all others astonishing Pagoda of the Elephant stands on a small islet, less than half a league in compass, which is formed by the river of Bombain, where it is about to discharge itself southward into the sea. It is so called because of a great elephant of stone, which one sees in entering the river. They say that it was made by the orders of a heathen king called Banasur, who ruled the whole country inland from the Ganges. ... On the left side of this chapel is a doorway 6 palms in depth and 5 in width, by which one enters a chamber which is nearly square and very dark, so that there is nothing to be seen there; and with this ends the fabric of this great pagoda. It has been in many parts demolished; and what the soldiers have left is so maltreated that it is grievous to see destroyed in such fashion one of the Wonders of the World. It is now 50 years since I went to see this marvellous Pagoda; and as I did not then visit it with such curiosity as I should now feel in doing so, I failed to remark many particulars which exist no longer. But I do remember me to have seen a certain Chapel, not to be seen now, open on the whole façade (which was more than 40 feet in length), and which along the rock formed a plinth the whole length of the edifice, fashioned like our altars both as to breadth and height; and on this plinth were many remarkable things as may be seen. Among others I remember to have noticed the story of Queen Pasiphae and the bull; also the Angel with naked sword thrusting forth from below a tree two beautiful figures of a man and a woman, who were naked, as the Holy Scripture paints for us the appearance of our first parents Adam and Eve."—Conto, Dec. VII. liv. iii. cap. xi.

1644.—"... an islet which they call Ilheu do Ellefanté... In the highest part of this islet is an eminence on which there is a mast from which a flag is unfurled when the wind (porao) about, as often happens, to warn the small unarmed vessels to look out... There is on this island a pagoda called that of the Elephant, a work of extraordinary magnitude, being cut out of the solid rock," &c.—Bourrou, MS.

1673.—"... We steered by the south side of the Bay, purposely to touch at Elephanto, so called from a monstrous Elephant cut out of the main Rock, bearing a young one on its Back; not far from it the Effigies of a Horse stuck up to the Belly in the Earth in the Valley; from thence we clambered up the Highest Mountain on the Island, on whose summit was a miraculous Piece hewed out of solid Stone: It is supported with 42 Corinthian Pillars," &c.—Fryer, 75.

1690. —"At 3 Leagues distance from Bombay is a small Island called Elephant, from the Statue of an Elephant cut in Stone. ... Here likewise are the just dimensions of a Horse Carved in Stone, so lively ... that many have rather fancied it, at a distance, a living Animal. ... But that which adds the most Remarkable Character to this Island, is the Fam'd Pagode at the top of it; so much spoke of by the Portuguese, and at present admird by the present Queen Dowager, that she cannot think any one has seen this part of India, who comes not Freightcd home with some Account of it."—Ovington, 158-9.

1712.—"The island of Elephant ... takes its name from an elephant in stone, with another on its back, which stands on a small hill, and serves as a sea mark. ... As they advanced towards the pagoda through a smooth narrow pass cut in the rock, they observed another hewn figure which was called Alexander's horse."—From an account written by Captain Pyke, on board the Stringer East Indianan, and ill'd. by drawings. Read by A. Dalrymple to the Soc. of Antiiquaries, 10th Feb. 1780, and pub'd. in Archaeologia, vii. 323 seqq. One of the plates (xxi.) shows the elephant having on its back distinctly a small elephant, whose proboscis comes down into contact with the head of the large one.

1727.—"A league from thence is another larger, called Elephanto, belonging to the Portuguese, and serves only to feed some Cattle. I believe it took its name from an Elephant carved out of a great black Stone, about Seven Foot in Height."—A. Hamilton, i. 240; [ed. 1744, i. 241].

1760.—"Le lendemain, 7 Decembre, des que le jour parut, je me transportai au bas de la seconde montagne, en face de Bombay, dans un coin de l'Ile, oh est l'Elephant qui a fait donner a Gallipour le nom d'Elephanto. L'animal est de grandeur naturelle, d'une pierre noire, et detachee du sol, et paroit porter son petit sur son dos."—Anquetil du Perver, i. ccxcii.

1761.—"... The work I mention is an artificial cave cut out of a solid Rock, and decorated with a number of pillars, and gigantic statues, some of which discover ye work of a skilful artist; and I am inform'd by an acquaintance who is well read in ye antient history, and has minutely considered figures, that it appears to be ye work of King Sesostris after his Indian Expedition."—MS. Letter of James Rennell.

1764. —"Plusieurs Voyageurs font bien mention du vieux temple Payeur sur la petite ile Elephanto près de Bombay, mais ils n'en parlent qu'en passant. Je le trouvai si curieux et si digne de l'attention des Amateurs d'Antiquités, que j'y fis trois fois le Voyage, et que j'y dessinais tout ce que j'y trouve de plus remarquable...."—Carsten Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 25.

1780.—"That which has principally attracted the attention of travellers is the small island of Elephanto, situated in the east side of the harbour of Bombay. ... Near the south end is the figure of an elephant rudely cut in stone, from which the island has its name. ... On the back are the remains of something that is said to have formerly represented a young elephant, though no traces of such a resemblance are now to be found."—Account, &c. By Mr. William Hunter, Surgeon in the E. Indies, Archaeologia, vii. 286.

1783. —In vol. viii. of the Archaeologia, p. 251, is another account in a letter from Hector Macneil, Esq. He mentions "the elephant cut out of stone," but not the small elephant, nor the horse.

paws, and also the junction of its belly with the larger animal, were perfectly distinct; and the appearance it offered is represented on the annexed drawing made by Captain Hall (Pl. II.), who from its appearance conjectured that it must have been a tiger rather than an elephant; an idea in which I feel disposed to agree. — Ibid. 208.

b. s. A name given, originally by the Portuguese, to violent storms occurring at the termination, though some travellers describe it as at the setting-in, of the Monsoon. [The Portuguese, however, took the name from the H. hathiyd, Skt. hastā, the 13th lunar Asterism, connected with hastin, an elephant, and hence sometimes called the sign of the elephant. The hathiyd is at the close of the Rains.]

1564. — "The Dhamasp, that is to say a violent storm arose; the kind of storm is known under the name of the Elephant; it blows from the west." — Sidi 'Ali, p. 75.

[1611. — "The storm of Ofante doth begin." — Dunmers, Letters, i. 126.]

c. 1616. — "The 20th day (August), the night past fell a storme of raine called the Oliphant, usual at going out of the raines." — Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 549; [Hak. Soc. i. 247].

1659. — "The boldest among us became dismayed; and the more when the whole culminated in such a terrific storm that we were compelled to believe that it must be that yearly raging tempest which is called the Elephant. This storm, annually, in September and October, makes itself heard in a frightful manner, in the Sea of Bengal." — Walter Schusse, 67.

c. 1665. — "Il y fait si mauvais pour le Vaisseaux au commencement de ce mois à cause d'un Vent d'Orient qui y souffle en ce temps-là avec violence, et qui est toujours accompagné de gros nuages qu'on appelle Elephants, parce-qu'ils en ont la figure. . . ." — Thevenot, v. 38.

1673. — "Not to deviate any longer, we are now winding about the South-West part of Ceilim; where we have the Tail of the Elephant full in our mouth; a constellation by the Portugals called Rabo del Elephanto, known for the breaking up of the Munsoons, which is the last Flory this season makes." — Freyer, 48.

[1690. — "The Mussoons (Monsoon) are rude and Boisterous in their departure, as well as at their coming in, which two seasons are called the Elephant in India, and just before their breaking up, take their farewell for the most part in very rugged puffing weather." — Ovington, 137].

1786. — "9th (October). We had what they call here an Elephant, which is an exces-

ELL'ORA, (though very commonly called Ellora), n.p. Properly Elburā, [Tel. elw, 'rule,' elur, 'village;'] otherwise Vérulē, a village in the Nizam's territory, 7 m. from Daulatabād, which gives its name to the famous and wonderful rock-caves and temples in its vicinity, excavated in the crescent-shaped scarpe of a plateau, about 1½ m. in length. These works are Buddhist (ranging from a.d. 450 to 700), Brahminical (c. 650 to 700), and Jain (c. 800-1000).

c. 1665. — "On m'avait fait une Sourat grande estime des Pagodes d'Elorâ . . . (and after describing them) . . . Quoiqu'il en soit, si l'on considère cette quantité de Temples spacieux, remplis de pilastres et de colonnes, et tant de milliers de figures, et le tout taillé dans le roc vif, on peut dire avec vérité que ces ouvrages surpassent la force humaine; et qu'au moins les gens du siècle dans lequel ils ont été faits, n'étaient pas tout-à-fait barbares." — Thevenot, v. i. 222.

1684. — "Muhammad Shâh Malik Jâmâ, son of Tughilk, selected the fort of Deogir as a central point whereat to establish the seat of government, and gave it the name of Daulatabād. He removed the inhabitants of Delhi thither. . . Ellora is only a short distance from this place. At some very remote period a race of men, as if by magic, excavated caves high up among the defiles of the mountains. These rooms extended over a breadth of one kos. Carvings of various designs and of correct execution adorned all the walls and ceilings; but the outside of the mountain is perfectly level, and there is no sign of any dwelling. From the long period of time these Pagans re-

ELU, HELU, n.p. This is the name by which is known an ancient form of the Singhalese language from which the modern vernacular of Ceylon is immediately derived, "and to which" the latter "bears something of the same relation that the English of to-day bears to Anglo-Saxon. Fundamentally Elu and Singhalese are identical, and the difference of form which they present is due partly to the large number of new grammatical forms evolved by the modern language, and partly to an immense influx into it of Sanskrit nouns, borrowed, often without alteration, at a comparatively recent period. . . . The name Elu is no other than Sinhala much corrupted, standing for an older form, Ḫēḷa or Ḫēḷu, which occurs in some ancient works, and this again for a still older, Sēḷa, which brings us back to the Pali Sīhala." (Mr. R. C. Childers, in J.R.A.S., N.S., vii. 36.) The loss of the initial sibilant has other examples in Singhalese. (See also under CEYLON.)

ENGLISH-BAZAR, n.p. This is a corruption of the name (Angrezbaḍāḥ = 'English-town') given by the natives in the 17th century to the purlieus of the factory at Malda in Bengal. Now the Head-quarters Station of Malda District.

1683.—"I departed from Cassumbazaar with designe (God willing) to visit ye factory at Englesavad."—Hedges, Diary, May 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 89; also see i. 71].

1875.—"These ruins (Gaur) are situated about 8 miles to the south of Angrezbaḍāḥ (English Bâzar), the civil station of the district of Malda. . . ."—Ravenshaw's Gaur, p. 1.

EURASIAN, a. A modern name for persons of mixt European and Indian blood, devised as being more euphemistic than Half-caste and more precise than East-Indian. [*No name has yet been found or coined which correctly represents this section. Eurasian certainly does not when the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association was established 17 years ago, the term Anglo-Indian, after much consideration, was adopted as best designating this community."—(Proc. Imperial Anglo-Indian Ass., in Pioneer Mail, April 13, 1900.])

1844.—"The Eurasian Belle," in a few Local Sketches by J. M., Calcutta.—6th ser. Notes and Queries, xii. 177.

1866.—See quotation under KHUDD.

1880.—"The shovel-hats are surprised that the Eurasian does not become a missionary or a schoolmaster, or a policeman, or something of that sort. The native papers say, 'Deport him'; the white prints say, 'Make him a soldier'; and the Eurasian himself says, 'Make me a Commissioner; give me a pension.'—Ati Baba, 128.

EUROPE, adj. Commonly used in India for "European," in contradistinction to country (q.v.) as qualifying goods, viz. those imported from Europe. The phrase is probably obsolescent, but still in common use. "Europe shop" is a shop where European goods of sorts are sold in an up-country station. The first quotation applies the word to a man. [A "Europe morning" is lying late in bed, as opposed to the Anglo-Indian's habit of early rising.]

1673.—"The Enemies, by the help of an Europe Engineer, had sprung a Mine to blow up the Castle."—Fryer, 87.

1862-3.—"Ordered that a sloopp be sent to Comimero with Europe goods. . . ."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 14.]

EYSHAM, EHSHÁM, s. Ar. ʾahšám, pl. of ʾhashm, 'a train or retinue.' One of the military technicalities affected by Tippoo; and according to Kirkpatrick (Tippoo's Letters, App. p. cii.) applied to garrison troops. Miles explains it as "Irregular infantry with swords and matchlocks." (See his tr. of H. of Hydar Naik, p. 308, and tr. of H. of Tipú Sultan, p. 61.) [The term was used by the latter Moghuls (see Mr. Irvine below).

[1896. — "In the case of the Ahšám, or troops belonging to the infantry and artillery, we have a little more definite information under this head." — W. Irvine, Army of the Indian Moghuls, in J.R.A.S., July 1896, p. 528.]

FACTOR, s. Originally a commercial agent; the executive head of a factory. Till some 55 years ago the Factors formed the third of the four classes into which the covenanted civil servants of the Company were theoretically divided, viz. Senior Merchants, Junior Merchants, factors and writers. But these terms had long ceased to have any relation to the occupation of these officials, and even to have any application at all except in the nominal lists of the service. The titles, however, continue (through vis inertiae of administration in such matters) in the classified lists of the Civil Service for years after the abolition of the last vestige of the Company's trading character, and it is not till the publication of the E. I. Register for the first half of 1842 that they disappear from that official publication. In this the whole body appears without any classification; and in that for the second half of 1842 they are divided into six classes, first class, second class, &c., an arrangement which, with the omission of the 6th class, still continues. Possibly the expressions Factor, Factory, may have been adopted from the Portuguese Feitor, Feitoria. The formal authority for the classification of the civilians is quoted under 1675.

1501. — "With which answer night came on, and there came aboard the Captain Mér that Christian of Calecut sent by the Factor (feitor) to say that Cojebequi assured him, and he knew it to be the case, that the King of Calecut was arming a great fleet." — Correa, i. 250.

1582. — "The Factor and the Cattual having seen these parcels began to laugh thereat." — Castanheta, tr. by N. L., f. 460.

1600. — "Capt. Middleton, John Havard, and Francis Barne, elected the three principal Factors. John Havard, being present, willingly accepted." — Seraigny, i. 111.

c. 1610. — "Les Portugais de Malacca ont des commis et facteurs par toutes ces Isles pour le trafic." — Pyrrard de Laval, i. 106. [Hak. Soc. ii. 170].

1666. — "The Viceroy came to Cochín, and there received the news that Antonio de Sá, Factor (Fator) of Coulam, with all his officers, had been slain by the Moors." — Faria y Sousa, i. 35.

1675-6. — "For the advancement of our Apprentices, we direct that, after they have served the first five years, they shall have £10 per annum, for the last two years; and having served these two years, to be entered one year longer, as Writers, and have Writers' Sallary: and having served that year, to enter into ye' degree of Factor, which otherwise would have been ten yeares. And knowing that a distinction of titles is, in many respects necessary, we do order that when the Apprentices have served their times, they be stiled Writers; and when the Writers have served their times, they be stiled Factors, and Factors having served their times, to be stiled Seniors; and Merchants having served their times to be stiled Senior Merchants." — Ext. of Court's Letter in Bruce's Annals of the E. I. Co., ii. 374-5.
1869.—"These are the chief Places of Note and Trade where their Presidents and Agents reside, for the support of whom, with their Writers and Factors, large Privileges and Salaries are allowed."—Orme, 386. (The same writer tells us that Factors got \( £40 \) a year; junior Factors, \( £15 \); Writers, \( £7 \); Poms got 4 rupees a month. P. 392.)

711. — Lockyer gives the salaries at Madras as follows: "The Governor, \( £200 \) and \( £100 \) gratuity; 6 Counsellors, of whom the chief (2nd fol.) had \( £100 \), 3d. \( £70 \), 4th. \( £50 \), the others \( £40 \), which was the salary of 6 Senior Merchants. 2 Junior Merchants \( £30 \) per annum; 5 Factors, \( £15 \); 10 Writers, \( £5 \); 2 Ministers, \( £100 \); 1 Surgeon, \( £36 \).

"Attorney-General has 50 Pagodas per Annum gratuity.
"Scavenger 100 do."

(p. 14.)

1748.—"He was appointed to be a Writer in the Company's Civil Service, becoming ... after the first five (years) a factor."—Orme, Fragments, viii.

1781.—"Why we should have a Council and Senior and Junior Merchants, factors and writers, to load one ship in the year (at Penang), and to collect a very small revenue, appears to me perfectly incomprehensible."—Corresp. of Lt. Cornwallis, i. 390.

1786.—In a notification of Aug. 10th, the subsistence of civil servants out of employ is fixed thus:—
A Senior Merchant—\( £400 \) sterling per annum.
A Junior Merchant—\( £300 \) per annum.
Factors and Writers—\( £200 \) per annum.

Company," and "Robert Burton, The English Acquisitions in Guinea and East India, 1728," which contains (p. 184) a long list of English Factories. It has not been possible to submit our list as yet to proper criticism. The letters attached indicate the authorities, viz. M. Milburn, S. Sainsbury, C. Charters, B. Burton.

FAKEER. 347

FAKEROOF, s. Ar.—H. falsaf, from φαίλοςφος. But its popular sense is a "crafty schemer," an "artful dodger." FILOSOF, in Manila, is applied to a native who has been at college, and returns to his birthplace in the provinces, with all the importance of his acquisitions, and the affectation of European habits (Blumentritt, Vocabular.).

FAKEER, s. Hind. from Arab. fa'fîr ("poor"). Properly an indigent person, but specially "one poor in the sight of God," applied to a Mahomedan religious mendicant, and then, loosely and inaccurately, to Hindu devotees and naked ascetics. And this last is the most ordinary Anglo-Indian use.

c. 1660.—"I have often met in the Field, especially upon the Lands of the Rajaus, whole squadrons of these Faquiers, altogether naked, dreadful to behold. Some held their Arms lifted up . . . ; others had their terrible Hair hanging about them . . . ; some had a kind of Hercules's Club; others had dry and stiff Tiger-skins over their Shoulders . . ."—Bernier, E.T. p. 102; [ed. FALAU.N, s. Ar. fulân, fulän, and H. fulâna, fulâna, ‘such an one,’ ‘a certain one’; Span. and Port. fulano, Heb. Fuluni (Ruth iv. 1). In Elphinston’s Life we see that this was the term by which he and his friend Strachey used to indicate their master in early days, and a man whom they much respected, Sir Barry Close. And gradually, by a process of Hobson-Jobson, this was turned into FORLORN.

FANÁM, s. The denomination of a small coin long in use in S. India, Malayal, and Tamil payam, ‘money,’ from Skt. pāṇa, [rt. pany, ‘to barter’]. There is also a Dekhani form of the word, fulam. In Telugu it is called rūka. The form fanam was probably of Arabic origin, as we find it long prior to the Portuguese period. The fanam was anciently a gold coin, but latterly of silver, or sometimes of base gold. It bore various local values, but according to the old Madras monetary system, prevailing till 1818, 42 fanams went to one star pagoda, and a Madras fanam was therefore worth about 2d. (see Prinsep’s Useful Tables, by E. Thomas, p. 18). The weights of a large number of ancient fanams given by Mr. Thomas in a note to his Pathan Kings of Delhi show that the average weight was 6 grs. of gold (p. 170). Fanams are still met with on the west coast, and as late as 1862 were received at the treasuries of Malabar and Calicut. As the coins were very small they were used to be counted by means of a small board or dish, having a large number of holes or pits. On this a pile of fanams was shaken, and then swept off, leaving the holes filled. About the time named Rs. 5000 worth of gold fanams were sold off at those treasuries. [Mr. Logan names various kinds of fanams: the virāy, or gold, of which 4 went to a rupee; new virāy, or gold, 3⁰⁄₃ to a rupee; in silver, 5 to a rupee; the rasi fanam, the most ancient of the indigenous fanams, now of fictitious value; the suktāni fanam of Tippoo in 1790-92, of which 3⁰⁄₃ went to a rupee (Malabar, ii. Gloss. clxxix.).]

c. 1348.—“And these latter (Malabar Christians) are the Masters of the public steelyard, from which I derived, as a perquisite of my office as Pope’s Legate, every month a hundred gold fan, and a thousand when I left.”—John Marignolli, in Cathay, 343.

1442.—“In this country they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloy . . . the third called风扇, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last mentioned coin” (partab, vid. pardao).—Abdurrazak, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 26.

1803.—"The pay I have given the boatmen is one gold fanam for every day they do not work, and two gold fanams for every day they do."—From Sir A. Wellestey, in Life of Munro, i. 342.

FANÂM.

FAN-PALM, s. The usual application of this name is to the Borassus flabelliformis, L. (see BRAB, PALMYRA), which is no doubt the type on which our ladies' fans have been formed. But it is also sometimes applied to the Talipot (q.v.); and it is exceptionally (and surely erroneously) applied by Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S. xxv. 232) to the "Traveller's Tree," i.e. the Madagascar Ravenala (Urania speciosa).

FANQUI, s. Chin. fan-kuvèi, 'foreign demon'; sometimes with the affix tsé or tèi, 'son'; the popular Chinese name for Europeans. ["During the 15th and 16th centuries large numbers of black slaves of both sexes from the E. I. Archipelago were purchased by the great houses of Canton to serve as gate-keepers. They were called 'devil slaves,' and it is not improbable that the term 'foreign devil,' so freely used by the Chinese for foreigners, may have had this origin."—Ball, Things Chinese, 535.]

FARÂSH, FERÂSH, FRAâSH, s. Ar.—H. farrâsh, [farsch, 'to spread (a carpet')]. A menial servant whose proper business is to spread carpets, pitch tents, &c., and, in fact, in a house, to do housemaid's work; employed also in Persia to administer the bastinado. The word was in more common use in India two centuries ago than now. One of the highest hereditary officers of Sindhi's Court is called the Farâsh-khâna-wâlâ. [The same word used for the tamarisk tree (Tamarix gallica) is a corr. of the Ar. farrâs.]

c. 1300.—"Sa grande richesse apparten en un pavillon que li roys d'Ermenie envoya au roy de France, qui valoit bien cinq cus livres; et li manda li roye de Hermanio que uns ferrais au Soudanc dou Coyne il avoit donnei. Ferrais est cel qui tient les pavillons au Soudanc et qui li nettoie ses messons."—Johan, Seigneur de Joinville, ed. De Wailty, p. 78.

c. 1513.—"And the gentlemen rode . . . upon horses from the king's stables, attended by his servants whom they call farazes, who groom and feed them."—Correr, Lendas, ii. 364. (Here it seems to be used for Syce (q.v.) or groom).

[1548.—"Pfarazes." See under Batta, a.]

c. 1590.—"Besides, there are employed 1000 Farrâshes, natives of Irân, Turân, and Hindostân."—Afr., i. 47.
FEDEA, FUDDEA, s. A denomination of money formerly current in Bombay and the adjoining coast; Mahr. p'hadya (qu. Ar. fadda, ransom?). It constantly occurs in the account statements of the 16th century, e.g. of Nunez (1554) as a money of account, of which 4 went to the silver tanga, [see TANGA] 20 to the Pardao. In Milburn (1813) it is a pee or copper coin, of which 50 went to a rupee. Prof. Robertson Smith suggests that this may be the Ar. denomination of a small coin used in Egypt, fadda (i.e. silverling). It may be an objection that the letter zawd used in that word is generally pronounced in India as z. The fadda is the Turkish para, ⅙ of a piastre, an infinitesimal value now. [Burton (Arabian Nights, xi. 98) gives 2000 faddahs as equal about 1s. 2d.] But, according to Lane, the name was originally given to half-dirhems, coined early in the 15th century, and these would be worth about 5⅔d. The fedea of 1554 would be about 4⅔d. This rather indicates the identity of the names.

FERÁZEE, s. Properly Ar. fu'rāzī, from furdāz (pl. of furz) 'the divine ordinances.' A name applied to a body of Mahomedan Puritans in Bengal, kindred to the Wahābis of Arabia. They represent a reaction and protest against the corrupt condition and pagan practices into which Mahom-Raynouard himself has in a French passage of 1446: "par leurs sorceries et faitvuries."

c. 1539.—"E que já por duas vezes o tinhão têtado cò arroydo feytico, só a fim de elle sayr fora, e o matarem na briga . . . ."—Pinto, ch. xxxiv.

1552.—"They have many and various idolatries, and deal much in charms (feitiçoes) and divinations."—Castanheda, ii. 51.

1553.—"And as all the nation of this Ethiopia is much given to sorceries (feiticos) in which stands all their trust and faith . . . and to satisfy himself the more surely of the truth about his son, the king ordered a feitico which was used among them (in Congo). This feitico being tied in a cloth was sent by a slave to one of his women, of whom he had a suspicion."

—Barros, I. ii. 10.

1600.—"If they find any Fettisos in the way as they goe (which are their idolatrous gods) they give them some of their fruit."—In Purchas, ii. 940, see also 961.

1606.—"They all determined to slay the Archbishop . . . they resolved to do it by another kind of death, which they hold to be not less certain than by the sword or other violence, and that is by sorceries (feyticos), making these for the places by which he had to pass."—Gouvea, f. 47.

1613.—"As feiticeiras usão muyto de rayzes de ervas plantas e arvores e animaes para feitiço e transfigurações . . . ."—Godinho de Evisa, f. 93.

1673.—"We saw several the Holy Office had branded with the names of Feticeros or Charmers, or in English Wizards."—Fryer, 155.

1690.—"They (the Africans) travel nowhere without their Fateish about them."

—Ovington, 67.

1878.—"The word fetishism was never used before the year 1760. In that year appeared an anonymous book called Du Cule des Dieux Fétiches, ou Parallèle de l'Ancienne Religion de l'Egypte avec la Rel. actuelle de la Nigrirtie. It is known that this book was written by . . . the well known President de Brosses . . . Why did the Portuguese navigators . . . recognise at once what they saw among the Negroes of the Gold Coast as feitiços? The answer is clear. Because they themselves were perfectly familiar with a feitico, an amulet or talisman."—Max Müller, Hibbert Lectures, 56-57.

FIREFLY, s. Called in South Indian vernaculars by names signifying 'Lightning Insect.'

A curious question has been discussed among entomologists, &c., of late years, viz. as to the truth of the alleged rhythmical or synchronous flashing of fireflies when visible in great numbers. Both the present writers can testify to the fact of a distinct effect of this kind. One of them can never forget an instance in which he witnessed it, twenty years or more before he was aware that any one had published, or questioned, the fact. It was in descending the Chándor Ghát, in Nasik District of the Bombay Presidency, in the end of May or beginning of June 1843, during a fine night preceding the rains. There was a large amphitheatre of forest-covered hills, and every leaf of every tree seemed to bear a firefly. They flashed and intermitted throughout the whole area in apparent rhythm and sympathy. It is, we suppose, possible that this may have been a deceptive impression, though it is difficult to see how it could originate. The suggestions made at the meetings of the Entomological Society are utterly unsatisfactory to those who have observed the phenomenon. In fact it may be said that those suggested explanations only assume that the sociable observers did not observe what they alleged. We quote several independent testimonies to the phenomenon.

1579.—"Among these trees, night by night, did show themselves an infinite swarne of fierie seeming worms flying in the aire, whose bodies (no bigger than an ordinarie flie) did make a shew, and give such light as evry twigge on euerie tree had beene a lighted candle, or as if that place had beene the starry sphere."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc. 149.

1675.—"We . . . left our burnt Wood on the Right-hand, but entred another made us better Sport, deluding us with false Flashes, that you would have thought the Trees on a Flame, and presently, as if untouch'd by Fire, they retained their wonted Verdure. The Coolies beheld the Sight with Horror and Amazement . . . where we found an Host of Flies, the Subject both of our Fear and Wonder. . . . This gave my Thoughts the Contemplation of that Miraculous Business, or the Fire that consumes everything seeming rather to dress than offend it."—Fryer, 141-142.

1682.—"Fireflies (de vuur-vliegen) are so called by us because at eventide, whenever they fly they burn so like fire, that from a distance one fancies to see so many lanterns; in fact they give light enough to write by.
... They gather in the rainy season in great multitudes in the bushes and trees, and live on the flowers of the trees. There are various kinds."—Nieuhoff, ii. 291.

1764.—
"Ere fireflies trimmed their vital lamps, and ere Dun Evening trod on rapid Twilight's heel,
His knell was rung."—Grainger, Bk. i. 1824.—
"Yet mark! as fade the upper skies,
Each thicket opes ten thousand eyes.
Before, behind us, and above,
The fire-fly lights his lamp of love,
Retreating, chasing, sinking, soaring,
The darkness of the copse exploring."
Heber, ed. 1844, i. 258.

1865.—"The bushes literally swarm with fireflies, which flash out their intermittent light almost contemporaneously; the effect being that for an instant the exact outline of all the bushes stands prominently forward, as if lit up with electric sparks, and next moment all is jetty dark—darker from the momentary illumination that preceded. These flashes succeed one another every 3 or 4 seconds for about 10 minutes, when an interval of similar duration takes place; as if to allow the insects to regain their electric or phosphoric vigour."—Cameron, Our Tropical Possessions in Malayan India, 80-81.

The passage quoted from Mr. Cameron's book was read at the Entom. Soc. of London in May 1865, by the Rev. Hamlet Clarke, who added that:

"Though he was utterly unable to give an explanation of the phenomenon, he could so far corroborate Mr. Cameron as to say that he had himself witnessed this simultaneous flashing; he had a vivid recollection of a particular glen in the Organ Mountains where he had on several occasions noticed the contemporaneous exhibition of their light by numerous individuals, as if they were acting in concert."

Mr. McLachlan then suggested that this might be caused by currents of wind, which by inducing a number of the insects simultaneously to change the direction of their flight, might occasion a momentary concealment of their light.

Mr. Bates had never in his experience received the impression of any simultaneous flashing... he regarded the contemporaneous flashing as an illusion produced probably by the swarms of insects flying among foliage, and being continually, but only momentarily, hidden behind the leaves.

Fifteen years later at the same Society:

"Sir Sidney Saunders stated that in the South of Europe (Corfu and Albania) the simultaneous flashing of Luciola italica, with intervals of complete darkness for some seconds, was constantly witnessed in the dark summer nights, when swarming myriads were to be seen... He did not concur in the hypothesis propounded by Mr. McLachlan... the flashes are certainly intermittent... the simultaneous character of these coruscations among vast swarms would seem to depend upon an instinctive impulse to emit their light at certain intervals as a protective influence, which intervals became assimilated to each other by imitative emulation. But whatever be the causes... the fact itself was incontestable."—Ibid. for 1880, Feb'y. 21, p. ii; see also p. vii.

1888.—"At Singapore, the little luminous beetle commonly known as the firefly, Lampyris, is common... clustered in the foliage of the trees, instead of keeping up an irregular twinkle, every individual shines simultaneously at regular intervals, as though by a common impulse; so that their light pulsates, as it were, and the tree is for one moment illuminated by a hundred brilliant points, and the next is almost in total darkness. The intervals have about the duration of a second, and during the intermission only one or two remain luminous."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 255.

1850.—"HARRINGERS OF THE MONSOON.
—One of the surest indications of the approach of the monsoon is the spectacle presented nightly in the Mawul taluka, that is, at Khandalla and Lanoli, where the trees are filled with myriads of fireflies, which flash their phosphoric light simultaneously. Each tree suddenly flashes from bottom to top. Thousands of trees presenting this appearance simultaneously, afford a spectacle beautiful, if not grand, beyond conception. This little insect, the female of its kind, only appears and displays its brilliant light immediately before the monsoon."—Deccan Herald. (From Pioneer Mail, June 17.)

FIRINGHEE. s. Pers. Faranq, Firing; Fr. Al-Faranji, Ifranq, Faranji, i.e. a Frank. This term for a European is very old in Asia, but when now employed by natives in India is either applied (especially in the South) specifically to the Indian-born Portuguese, or, when used more generally, for 'European,' implies something of hostility or disparagement. (See Sonnerat and Elphinstone below.) In South India the Tamil Paranj, the Singhalese Parangi, mean only 'Portuguese,' [or natives converted by the Portuguese, or by Mahommedans, any European (Madras Gloss, s.v.). St. Thomas's Mount is called in Tam. Paraangi Malai, from the original Portuguese settlement. Pirings is in Tel. = 'cannon,' (C. B. P.), just as in the medieval Mahommedan historians we find certain mangonels for sieges called maghribi or 'Westerns.' [And so Farhangi or Phirangi is used for the straight cut and thrust swords introduced by the Portuguese into India, or made there in imitation of the foreign weapon (Sir W. Elliot, Ind. Antiq. xv. 30)]. And it may be added that Baber, in describing the battle of Panipat (1526) calls his artillery Farangihā (see Autob. by Leyden and Erskine, p. 306, note. See also paper by Gen. R. Maclagan, R.E., on early Asiatic fire-weapons, in J.A.S. Beng. xlv. Pt. i. pp. 66-67).

c. 930.—"The Afranjah are of all those nations the most warlike . . . the best organised, the most submissive to the authority of their rulers."—Mas'udi, iii. 66.

c. 1340.—"They call Franchi all the Christians of these parts from Romania westward."—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c., 292.

c. 1350.—"— Franks. For so they term us, not indeed from France, but from Frank-land (non a Franci sed a Frandiqui)."—Marignoli, ibid. 396.

In a Chinese notice of the same age the horses carried by Marignoli as a present from the Pope to the Great Khan are called "horses of the kingdom of Fulang," i.e. of Farang or Europe.

FLORICAN, FLORIKIN. s. A name applied in India to two species of small bustard, the 'Bengal Florican' (Sypheotes bengalensis, Gmelin), and the Lesser Florican (S. auritus, Latham), the lith of Hind., a word which is not in the dictionaries. [In the N.W.P. the common name for the Bengal Florican is charas, P. charas. The name Cur- moor in Bombay (see quotation from Forbes below) seems to be khar-mor, the 'grass peacock.' Another Mahr. name, tanamora, has the same meaning.] The origin of the word Florican is exceedingly obscure; see Jerdon below. It looks like Dutch. [The N.E.D. suggests a connection with Flanderkin, a native of Flanders.] Littre has: "Florican... Nom à Ceylon d'un grand échas- sier que l'on presume être un grue." This is probably mere misapprehension in his authority.

1780.—"The floriken, a most delicious bird of the buzzard (sic!) kind."—Mauro's Narrative, 199.

1785.—"A floriken at eve we saw
And kill'd in yonder glen,
When lo! it came to table raw,
And roused (sic) the rage of Ben."

In Seton-Kerr, i. 98.

1807.—"The floriken is a species of the bustard. . . . The cock is a noble bird, but its flight is very heavy and awkward . . . if only a wing be broken . . . he will run off at such a rate as will baffle most spaniels. . . . There are several kinds of the floriken . . . the bastard floriken is much smaller. . . . Both kinds . . . delight in grassy plains, keeping clear of heavy cover."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 104.

1813.—"The florican or curmoor (Otis bowbun, Lin.) exceeds all the Indian wild fowl in delicacy of flavour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 275; [2nd ed. i. 501].

1824.—". . . bringing with him a brace of florikens, which he had shot the previous day. I had never seen the bird before; it is somewhat larger than a blackcock, with brown and black plumage, and evidently of the bustard species."—Heber, i. 258.

1862.—"I have not been able to trace the origin of the Anglo-Indian word 'Florikin,' but was once informed that the Little Bustard in Europe was sometimes called Flanderkin. Latham gives the word 'Fletcher' as an English name, and this, apparently, has the same origin as Florikin."—Jerdon's Birds, 2nd ed. ii. 625. (We doubt if Jerdon has here understood Latham correctly. What Latham writes is, in describing the Passarage Bustard, which, he says, is the size of the Little Bustard: "Inhabits India. Called Passarage Plover. . . . I find that it is known in India by the name of Oorol by some of the English called Fletcher." (Suppl. to Gen. Synopsis of Birds, 1787, 229.) Here we understand "the English" to be the English in India, and Fletcher to be a clerical error for some form of "floriken." [Fletcher is not in N.E.D.]

1875.—"In the rains it is always matter of emulation at Rajkot, who shall shoot the first purple-crested florican."—Wyllie's Essays, 358.

FLOWERED SILVER. A term applied by Europeans in Burma to the standard quality of silver used in the ingot currency of Independent Burma, called by the Burmese gouvet-ni or 'Red-leaf. The English term is taken from the appearance of stars and radiating lines, which forms on the surface of this particular alloy, as it cools in the crucible. The Ava standard is, or was, of about 15 per cent. alloy, the latter containing, besides copper, a small proportion of lead, which is necessary, according to the Burmese, for the production of the flowers or stars (see Yule, Mission to Ava, 259 seq.).

[1744. — "Their way to make flower'd Silver is, when the Silver and Copper are mix'd and melted together, and while the Metal is liquid, they put it into a Shallow Mould, of what Figure and Magnitude they please, and before the Liquidity is gone, they blow on it through a small wooden Pipe, which makes the Face, or Part blown upon, appear with the Figures of Flowers or Stars, but I never saw any European or other Foreigner at Pegu, have the Art to make those Figures appear, and if there is too great a Mixture of Alloy, no Figures will appear."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 41.]

FLY. s. The sloping, or roof part of the canvas of a tent is so called in India; but we have not traced the origin of the word; nor have we found it in any English dictionary. [The N.E.D. gives the primary idea as "something attached by the edge," as a strip on a garment to cover the button-holes.] A tent such as officers generally use has two flies, for better protection from sun and rain. The vertical canvas walls are called Kanat (see CANAUT). [Another sense of the word is "a quick-travelling carriage" (see quotation in Forbes below).]

[1784.—"We all followed in fly-palansins."—Sir J. Day, in Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 88.]

1810.—"The main part of the operation of pitching the tent, consisting of raising the flies, may be performed, and shelter afforded, FLYING-FOX, s. Popular name of the great bat (Pteropus Edwardsi, Geoff). In the daytime these bats roost in large colonies, hundreds or thousands of them pendent from the branches of some great ficus. Jerdon says of these bats: "If water is at hand, a tank, or river, or the sea, they fly cautiously down and touch the water, but I could not ascertain if they took a sip, or merely dipped part of their bodies in." (Mammals of India, p. 18). The truth is, as Sir George Yule has told us from his own observation, that the bat in its skimming flight dips its breast in the water, and then imbibles the moisture from its own wet fur. Probably this is the first record of a curious fact in natural history. "I have been positively assured by natives that on the Odyapore lake in Rajputana, the crocodiles rise to catch these bats, as they follow in line, touching the water. Fancy fly-fishing for crocodile with such a fly!" (Communication from M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge). [On the other hand Mr. Blanford says: "I have often observed this habit: the head is lowered, the animal pauses in its flight, and the water is just touched, I believe, by the tongue or lower jaw. I have no doubt that some water is drunk, and this is the opinion of both Tickell and M'Master. The former says that flying-foxes in confinement drink at all hours, lapping with their tongues. The latter has noticed many other bats drink in the evening as well as the flying-foxes." (Mammalia of India, 258).]

1298.—"... all over India the birds and beasts are entirely different from ours, all but ... the Quail. ... For example, they have bats—I mean those birds that fly by night and have no feathers of any kind; well, their birds of this kind are as big as a goshawk!"—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

c. 1328:—"There be also bats really and truly as big as kites. These birds fly no-whither by day, but only when the sun sets. Wonderful! By day they hang themselves up on trees by the feet, with their bodies downwards, and in the daytime they look just like big fruit on the tree." — Friar Jordanus, p. 19.

1555:—"On the road we occasionally saw trees whose top reached the skies, and on which one saw marvellous bats, whose wings stretched some 14 palms. But these bats were not seen on every tree."—Siddi 'Ali, 91.

[c. 1590:—Writing of the Sarkār of Kābul, 'Abul Fażī says: "There is an animal called a flying-fox which flies upward about the space of a yard." This is copied from Baber, and the animal meant is perhaps the flying squirrel.—Avi, ed. Jarrett, ii. 406.

[1623:—"I saw Bats as big as Crows."—P. della Valle, Hac. Soc. i. 103.]

1813.—"The enormous bats which darken its branches frequently exceed 6 feet in length from the tip of each wing, and from their resemblance to that animal are not improperly called flying-foxes."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 246; [2nd ed. ii. 299.]

1829.—"... They (in Batchian) are almost the only people in the Archipelago who eat the great fruit-eating bats called by us 'flying foxes'... they are generally cooked with abundance of spices and condiments, and are really very good eating, something like hare."—Wallace, Malay Archip., ed. 1859, p. 259.

1882.—"... it is a common belief in some places that emigrant coolies hang with heads downward, like flying-foxes, or are ground in mills for oil."—Pioneer Mail, Dec. 13, p. 579.

FOGASS, s. A word of Port. origin used in S. India; fogassa, from fogo, 'fire,' a cake baked in embers. It is composed of minced radish with chillies, &c., used as a sort of curry, and eaten with rice.

1554:—"... fecimus iter per amoenas et non infrigiferas Bulgarrorum convales: quo fere tempore pani usus sumus subnunciario, fugacias vocant."—Busbecuip Epist. i. p. 42.

FOLIUM INDICUM. (See MALABATHRUM.) The article appears under this name in Milburn (1813, i. 253), as an article of trade.

FOOL'S RACK, s. (For Rack see ARRACK.) Fool Rack is originally, as will be seen from Garcia and Acosta, the name of the strongest distillation from toddy or sura, the 'flower' (phîd, in H. and Mahr.) of the spirit. But the 'striving after meaning' caused the English corruption of this name to be applied to a peculiarly abominable and.

Williamson, V. M. ii. 452.
pernicious spirit, in which, according to the statement of various old writers, the stinging sea-blubber was mixed, or even a distillation of the same, with a view of making it more ardent.

1563. — "...this cura they distil like brandy (aqua ardentia); and the result is a liquor like brandy; and a rag steoped in this will burn as in the case of brandy; and this fine spirit they call fula, which means 'flower'; and the other quality that remains they call orraca, mixing with it a small quantity of the first kind.” — García, f. 67.

1578. — "... a la qual (sura) en vasos despues distilian, para hazer agua ardentiente, de la qual una, a que ellos llaman Fula, quiere desear 'flor,' es mas fina... y la segunda, que llaman Orraca, no tanto.” — Acosta, p. 101.

1598. — "This Sura being [bees] distilled, is called Fula or Nipe [see NIPA], and is as excellent aqua vitae as any is made in Dort of their best renish [rennish] wine, but this is of the finest kind of distillation.” — Linschoten, 101 [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

1631. — "Dunæus... Apparat et etiam a vino adusto, nec Aracini, abhorreor? Bontius. Usum commendó, absusum abominor... at cane pejus et angue vitandum est quod Chinenses avarsissimi simul et astutissimi bipedum, mixtix Hormitiis in mari fluctuabuntibus, parant... eaque tam excentris sunt caloris ut solo attactu vestas in cute excitent..." — Jac. Bontius, Hist. Nat. et Med. Ind., Dict. iii.

1673. — "Among the worst of these (causes of disease) Fool Rack (Brandy made of Blubber, or Careil, by the Portugals, because it seems always in a Blubber, as if nothing else were in it; but touch it, and it stings like nettles; the latter, because sailing on the Waves it bears up like a Portuguese Careil (see CARAVEL): It is, being taken, a Gelly, and distilled causes those that take it to be Fools...” — Fryer, 68-69.

[1753. — "... that fiery, single and simple distilled spirit, called Fool, with which our seamen were too frequently intoxicated.” — Ives, 457.]

[1868. — "The first spirit that passes over is called 'phil.'" — B. H. Powell, Handbook, Econ. Prod. of Punjab, 311.]

FOOZILOW, TO. The imperative phuslato of the H. verb phusladna, 'to flatter or cajoile,' used, in a common Anglo-Indian fashion (see BUNNOW, PUCKAROW, LUGOW), as a verbal in-\footnote{The text is not clear here, but it seems to refer to the use of the verb in a specific manner.}

FORAS LANDS. This is a term peculiar to the island of Bombay, and an inheritance from the Portuguese. They are lands reclaimed from the sea, by the construction of the Vellard (q.v.) at Breech-Candy, and other embankments, on which account they are also known as ‘Salt Batty [see BATTIA] (i.e. rice) -grounds.' The Court of Directors, to encourage reclamation, in 1703 authorised these lands to be leased rent-free to the reclaimers for a number of years, after which a small quit-rent was to be fixed. But as individuals would not undertake the maintenance of the embankments, the Government stepped in and constructed the Vellard at considerable expense. The lands were then let on terms calculated to compensate the Government. The tenure of the lands, under these circumstances, for many years gave rise to disputes and litigation as to tenant-right, the right of Government to resume, and other like subjects. The lands were known by the title Foras, from the peculiar tenure, which should perhaps be Foros, from foro, 'a quit-rent.' The Indian Act VI. of 1851 arranged for the termination of these differences, by extinguishing the disputed rights of Government, except in regard to lands taken up for public purposes, and by the constitution of a Foras Land Commission to settle the whole matter. This work was completed by October 1853. The roads from the Fort crossing the "Flats," or Foras Lands, between Malabar Hill and Parell were generally known as "the Foras Roads"; but this name seems to have passed away, and the Municipal Commissioners have superseded that general title by such names as Clerk Road, Bellasis Road, Falkland Road. One name, 'Comatte-poora Forest Road,' perhaps preserves the old generic title under a disguise.

Forasdars are the holders of Foras Lands. See on the whole matter Bombay Selections, No. III., New Series, 1854. The following quaint quotation is from a petition of Forasdars of Mahim and other places regarding some points in the working of the Commission:

1852. — "... that the case with respect to the old and new salt butt grounds, may it please your Honble. Board to consider deeply, is totally different, because in their original state the grounds were not of the nature of other sweet waste grounds on the island, let out as foras, nor these grounds were of that state as one could saddle himself at the first undertaking thereof with leases or grants even for that smaller rent as the foras is under the denomination of FOUJDAAR, PHOUSDAR. 358  FRAZALA, FARASOLA.

Foujdar is same other denomination to it, because the depth of these grounds at the time when sea-water was running over them was so much that they were a perfect sea-bay, admitting fishing-boats to float towards Farell."—In Selections, as above, p. 29.

Foujdar, Phousdar, &c., s.  Properly a military commander (P. fouj, 'a military force;' fouj-dar, 'one holding such a force at his disposal'), or a military governor of a district. But in India, an officer of the Moghul Government who was invested with the charge of the police, and jurisdiction in criminal matters. Also used in Bengal, in the 18th century, for a criminal judge. In the Ain, a Foujdar is in charge of several pargunnahs under the Sipah-salur, or Viceroy and C.-in-Chief of the Sulta (Gladwin's Ayesen, i. 294; [Jarrett, ii. 40]).

1683.—"The Fousdar received another Perwanna directed to him by the Nabob of Deaca...forbidding any merchant whatsoever trading with any Interlopers."—Hedges, Diary, Nov. 8; [Hak. Soc. 1. 136].

1857.—"Mullick Burcooordar Phousdardar of Hughly."—Ibid. ii. lxv.

1890.—"...If any Thefts or Robberies are committed in the Country, the Fousdar, another officer, is obliged to answer for them..."—Ovington, 292.

1702.—"...Perwanna directed to all Foujders."—Wheeler, i. 405.

1727.—"Fouziadar." See under HOOGLY.

1754.—"The Phousdar of Vellore...made overtures offering to acknowledge Mahomed Ally."—Orme, i. 372.

1757.—"Phousdar..."—Ives, 157.

1783.—"A complaint was made that Mr. Hastings had sold the office of phousdar of Hoogly to a person called Khan Jehan Khan, on a corrupt agreement."—11th Report on Affairs of India, in Burke, vi. 545.

1786.—"...the said phousdar (of Hoogly) had given a receipt of bribe to the patron of the city, meaning Warren Hastings, to pay him annually 36,000 rupees a year."—Articles agst. Hastings, in ibid. vii. 76.

1809.—"The Foujdar, being now in his capital, sent me an excellent dinner of fowls, and a pillau."—Ed. Valencia, i. 409.

1810.—"For ease the harase'd Foujdar prays When crowded Courts and sultry days Exhale the noxious fume, While poring o'er the cause he hears The lengthened lie, and doubts and fears The culprit's final doom."—Lines by Warren Hastings.

1824.—"A messenger came from the Foujah (chatellain) of Suromunugur, asking why we were not content with the quarters at first assigned to us."—Heber, i. 292. The form is here plainly a misreading; for the Bishop on next page gives Foujdar.

FOUJDARRY, PHOUSDARRY, s. P. foujdr, a district under a foujdar (see FOUJDAAR); the office and jurisdiction of a foujdar; in Bengal and Upper India, 'police jurisdiction,' 'criminal' as opposed to 'civil' justice. Thus the chief criminal Court at Madras and Bombay, up to 1863, was termed the Foujdar Adawlut, corresponding to the Nizamat Adawlut of Bengal. (See ADAWULT.)

[1802.—"The Governor in Council of Fort St. George has deemed it to be proper at this time to establish a Court of Fozdarry Adawlut."—Procl. in Logan, Malabar, ii. 350; iii. 351.]

FOWRA, s. In Upper India, a mattock or large hoe; the tool generally employed in digging in most parts of India. Properly speaking (H.) phdor. (See MAMOOTY.)

[1679.—(Speaking of diamond digging) "Others with iron pawraes or spades heave it up to a heap."—s. Mader, in Kistna Man. 147.]

[1848.—"On one side Bedullah and one of the grasscutters were toiling away with fowrah, a kind of spade-pickaxe, making water-courses."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, i. 373.]

1880.—"It so fell out the other day in Cawnpore, that, when a patwari endeavoured to remonstrate with some cultivators for taking water for irrigation from a pond, they knocked him down with the handle of a phora and cut off his head with the blade, which went an inch or more into the ground, whilst the head rolled away several feet."—Pioneer Malta, March 4.

FOX, FLYING. (See FLYING-FOX.)

FRAZALA, FARASOLA, FRAZIL, FRAIL, s. Ar. firasola, a weight formerly much used in trade in the Indian seas. As usual, it varied much locally, but it seems to have run from 20 to 30 lbs., and occupied a place intermediate between the (smaller) maund and the Bahar; the farasola being generally equal to ten (small) maunds, the bahar equal to 10, 15, or 20 farasolas. See Barbosa (Hak. Soc.) 224; Milburn, i. 83, 87, &c.; Prinsep's Useful Tables, by Thomas, pp. 116, 119.

1510.—"They deal by farasola, which farasola weighs about twenty-five of our lire."—Varthena, p. 170. On this Dr.
Badger notes: "Farasola is the plural of farasaia . . . still in ordinary use among the Arabs of the Red Sea and Persian Gulf; but I am unable to verify its origin." Is the word, which is sometimes called fraill, the same as a frail, or basket, of figs? And again, is it possible that farasaia is the same word as 'parcel,' through Latin particella? We see that this is Sir R. Burton's opinion (Camden, iv. 390; [Arab. Nights, v. 312]). [The N. E. D. says: "O. F. frayel of unknown origin."]

[1516. — "Farazola." See under EAGLE-WOOD.]

1554. — "The baar (see BAHAR) of cloves in Ormuz contains 20 faraçola, and besides these 20 faraçolas it contains 3 maunds (můor) more, which is called picota (see PICOTA)." — A. Núnez, p. 5.

[1611. — "The weight of Mocha 25 lbs. 11 oz. every frasula, and 15 frasulas makes a baar." —Dawers, Letters, i. 123.]

FREGUEZIA, s. This Portuguese word for 'a parish' appears to have been formerly familiar in the west of India.

c. 1760. — "The island . . . still continues divided into three Roman Catholic parishes, or Freguezias, as they call them; which are Bombay, Makin, and Velicanam." —Grose, i. 45.

FULEETA, s. Properly P. palita or fatila, 'a slow-match,' as of a matchlock, but its usual colloquial Anglo-Indian application is to a cotton slow-match used to light cigars, and often furnished with a neat or decorated silver tube. This kind of cigar-light is called at Madras Ramasammy (q.v.).

FULEETA-PUP, s. This, in Bengal, is a well-known dish in the repertory of the ordinary native cook. It is a corruption of 'fritter-puff'!

FURLOUGH, s. This word for a soldier's leave has acquired a peculiar citizenship in Anglo-Indian colloquial, from the importance of the matter to those employed in Indian service. It appears to have been first made the subject of systematic regulation in 1796. The word seems to have come to England from the Dutch Verlof, 'leave of absence,' in the early part of the 17th century, through those of our countrymen who had been engaged in the wars of the Netherlands. It is used by Ben Jonson, who had himself served in those wars:

1625. — "Pennyboy, Jun. Where is the deed? hast thou it with thee?"

Picklock. No.

It is a thing of greater consequence

Than to be borne about in a black box

Like a Low-Country vorlof, or Welsh brief."

The Staple of News, Act v. sc. 1.

FURNAVESE, n.p. This once familiar title of a famous Mahratta Minister (Nana Furnavese) is really the Persian fard-navis, 'statement writer,' or secretary.

[1824. — "The head civil officer is the Furnavese (a term almost synonymous with that of minister of finance) who receives the accounts of the renters and collectors of revenue." —Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 591.]

FUSLY, adj. Ar.— P. fašlī, relating to the fašl, season or crop. This name is applied to certain solar eras established for use in revenue and other civil transactions, under the Mahommedan rule in India, to meet the inconvenience of the lunar calendar of the Hijra, in its want of correspondence with the natural seasons. Three at least of these eras were established by Akbar, applying to different parts of his dominions, intended to accommodate themselves as far as possible to the local calendars, and commencing in each case with the Hijra year of his accession to the throne (A.H. 963 = A.D. 1555-56), though the month of commencement varies. [See Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 30.] The Fašlī year of the Deccan again was introduced by Shah Jehān when settling the revenue system of the Mahratta country in 1636; and as it starts with the Hijra date of that year, it is, in numeration, two years in advance of the others.

Two of these fašlī years are still in use, as regards revenue matters, viz. the Fašli of Upper India, under which the Fašli year 1286 began 2nd April 1878; and that of Madras, under which Fašli year 1286 began 1st July 1877.

FUTWA, s. Ar. fatwā. The decision of a council of men learned in Mahommedan law, on any point of Moslem law or morals. But technically and specifically, the deliverance of a Mahommedan law-officer on a case put before him. Such a deliverance was, as a rule, given officially and in writing, by such an officer, who was attached to the Courts of British India up to a little later than the middle of last century, and it was more or less a basis of the judge's decision. (See more particularly under ADAWLUT, CAZEE and LAW-OFFICER.)

1796.—"In all instances wherein the Putwah of the Law-officers of the Nizamit-Adcadat shall declare the prisoners liable to more severe punishment than under the evidence, and all the circumstances of the case shall appear to the Court to be just and equitable. . . ."—Regn. VI. of 1796, § ii.

1836.—"And it is hereby enacted that no Court shall, on a Trial of any person accused of the offence made punishable by this Act require any Putwa from any Law-Officer. . . ."—Act XXX. of 1836, regarding Thugges, § iii.

GALEE, s. H. gâtî, abuse; bad language.

[1813. — " . . . the grossest gâlee, or abuse, resounded throughout the camp."—Droughton, Letters from a Makr. Camp., ed. 1892, p. 205.]

[1877.—"You provoke me to give you gali (abuse), and then you cry out like a neglected wife."—Ailardyc, The City of Sunshine, ii. 2.]

GALLEEC, s. Domestic Hindustani gâllum, 'a pair of braces,' from the old-fashioned gallows, now obsolete, except in Scotland, [S. Ireland and U.S.], where the form is gallowses.

GALLE, POINT DE, n.p. A rocky cape, covering a small harbour and a town with old fortifications, in the S.W. of Ceylon, familiar to all Anglo-Indians for many years as a coaling-place of mail-steamers. The Portuguese gave the town for crest a cock (Gallo), a legitimate pun. The serious derivations of the name are numerous. Pridham says that it is Galla, 'a Rock,' which is probable. But Chitty says it means 'a Pound,' and was so called according to the Malabars (i.e. Tamil people) from " . . . this part of the country having been anciently set aside by Ravana for the breeding of his cattle" (Ceylon Gazetteer, 1832, p. 92). Tennent again says it was called after a tribe, the Gallas, inhabiting the neighbouring district (see ii. 105, &c.). [Prof. Childers (5 ser. Notes & Queries, iii. 155) writes: "In Sinhalese it is Galâ, the etymology of which is unknown; but in any case it can have nothing to do with 'rock,' the Sinhalese for which is gala with a short a and a single l." ] Tennent has been entirely misled by Reinand in supposing that Galle could be the Kala of the old Arab voyages to China, a port which certainly lay in the Malay seas. (See CALAY.)

1518.—"He tried to make the port of Columbo, before which he arrived in 3 days, but he could not make it because the wind was contrary, so he attacked about for 4 days till he made the port of Galle, which is in the south part of the island, and entered it with his whole squadron; and then our people went ashore killing cows and plundering whatever they could find."—Correa, ii. 540.

1553.—"In which Island they (the Chinese), as the natives say, left a language which they call Chingâlîa, and the people themselves Chingâlîas, particularly those who dwell from Ponta de Galle onwards, facing the south and east. For adjoining that point they founded a City called Tanabarâr (see DONDERA HEAD), of which a large part still stands; and from being hard by that Cape of Galle, the rest of the people, who dwelt from the middle of the Island upwards, called the inhabitants of this part Chingâlîa, and their language the same, as if they would say language or people of the Chins of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. cap. 1. (This is, of course, all fanciful.)

[1554.—"He went to the port of Gabaliquama, which our people now call Porto de Galle."—Castanheda, ii. ch. 23.]

c. 1568.—"Il piotta s'ingannâ per cioèchô il Capo di Galli dell' Isola di Seilan butta assai in mare."—Cesare de' Federici, in Ramusio, ii. 396c.

1585.—"Dopo haver navigato tre giorni senza veder terra, al primo di Maggio fummo in vista di Punta di Galle, laquelle è assai pericolosa da costeggiare."—G. Balbi, f. 18.

1661.—"Die Stadt Punto-Gale ist im Jahr 1649 vermittelt Gottes gnadigem Seegen durch die Täferkeit des Commandanten Jacob Koster den Neiden zu entflammen."—W. Schulze, 190.

1691.—"We passed by Cape Comorny, and came to Punogale."—Valentijn, ii. 540.

GALLEGALLE, s. A mixture of lime and linseed oil, forming a kind of mortar impenetrable to water (Shakespeare), Hind. galgal.

1621.—"Also the justis, Taccomon Döne, sent us word to geve ouer making gallegalle in our howse we hired of China Capt., because the white lyme did trouble the player or singing man, next neighbour. . . .”
—Cock’s Diary, ii. 190.

Gallevat. s. The name applied to a kind of galley, or war-boat with oars, of small draught of water, which continued to be employed on the west coast of India down to the latter half of the 18th century. The work quoted below under 1717 explains the galleyatits to be “large boats like Gravesend Tilt-boats; they carry about 6 Carvel-Guns and 60 men at small arms, and Oars; they sail with a Peak Sail like the Mizzen of a Man-Of-War, and row with 30 or 40 Oars. . . . They are principally used for landing Troops for a Descent. . . .” (p. 22). The word is highly interesting from its genealogical tree; it is a descendant of the great historical and numerous family of the Galle (galley, galiot, galleon, galeass, galleida, galeoneico, &c.), and it is almost certainly the immediate parent of the hardly less historical Jolly-boat, which plays so important a part in British naval annals. [Prof. Skeat takes jolly-boat to be an English adaptation of Danish jolle, ‘a yawl’; Mr. Foster remarks that jollyvat as an English word, is at least as old as 1495-97 (Oppenheim, Naval Accounts and Inventories, Navy Rec. Soc. viii. 193) (Letters, iii. 296).] If this be true, which we can hardly doubt, we shall have three of the boats of the British man-of-war owing their names (quod minimum reris!) to Indian originals, viz. the Cutter, the Dingy, and the Jolly-boat to catur, dingy and gallevat. This last derivation we take from Sir J. Campbell’s Bombay Gazetteer (xiii. 417), a work that one can hardly mention without admiration. This writer, who states that a form of the same word, galbet, is now generally used by the natives in Bombay waters for large foreign vessels, such as English ships and steamers, is inclined to refer it to jalba, a word for a small boat used on the shores of the Red Sea (see Dozy and Engr., p. 276), which appears below in a quotation from Ibn Batuta, and which vessels were called by the early Portuguese gellus. Whether this word is the parent of galley and its derivatives, as Sir J. Campbell thinks, must be very doubtful, for galley is much older in European use than he seems to think, as the quotation from Asser shows. The word also occurs in Byzantine writers of the 9th century, such as the Continuator of Theophanes quoted below, and the Emperor Leo. We shall find below the occurrence of galley as an Oriental word in the form jalia, which looks like an Arabized adoption from a Mediterranean tongue. The Turkish, too, still has kâlyân for a ship of the line, which is certainly an adoption from galeone. The origin of galley is a very obscure question. Amongst other suggestions mentioned by Diez (Etym. Wortherb., 2nd ed. i. 198-199) is one from γαλέων, a shark, or from γαλέων, a sword-fish—the latter very suggestive of a galley with its aggressive beak; another is from γαλα, a word in Hesychius, which is the apparent origin of ‘gallery.’ It is possible that galeota, galioe, may have been taken directly from the shark or sword-fish, though in imitation of the galea already in use. For we shall see below that galiot was used for a pirate. [The N.E.D. gives the European synonymous words, and regards the ultimate etymology of galley as unknown.]

The word gallevat seems to come directly from the galeota of the Portuguese and other S. European nations, a kind of inferior galley with only one bank of oars, which appears under the form galion in Joinville, infra (not to be confounded with the galleons of a later period, which were larger vessels), and often in the 13th and 14th centuries as galeota, galiotes, &c. It is constantly mentioned as forming part of the Portuguese fleets in India. Bluteau defines galeota as “a small galley with one mast, and with 15 or 20 benches a side, and one oar to each bench.”

c. 865.—“And then the incursion of the Russians (*των Πα&) afflicted the Roman territory (these are a Scythian nation of rude and savage character), devastating Pontus . . . and investing the City itself when Michael was away engaged in war with the Ishmaelites. . . . So this incursion of these people afflicted the empire on the one hand, and on the other the advance of the fleet on Crete, which with some 20 cymbaria, and 7 galleys (γαλεάς), and taking with it cargo-vessels also, went about, descending sometimes on the Cyclades Islands, and sometimes on the whole coast (of the main) right up to Proconnesus.”—Theophanis Continuatio, Lib. iv. 33-34.

1243.—Under this year Matthew Paris puts into the mouth of the Archbishop of York a punning couplet which shows the difference of accent with which galea in its two senses was pronounced:

"In terris galeas, in aquis formido galeias: Inter eas et eas consulto cautus eas."

1249.—"Lors s'esmut notre gale, et alames bien ne grant lieuex avant que li uns ne parlass a l'autre. . . . 1542.—"They said that the Turk had sent orders to certain lords at Alexandria to make him up gallyes (gales) in wrought timber, to be sent on cannon to Suez; and this they did with great diligence . . . in somuch that every day a galleay was put together at Suez . . . where they were making up 50 galleys, and 12 galeons, and also small rowing-vessels, such as caturis, much swither than ours."—Correa, iv. 237.

1612.—". . . and coming to Malaca and consulting with the General they made the best arrangements that they could for the enterprise, adding a flotilla . . . sufficient for any need, for it consisted of seven Galeots, a calammute (?), a sangunciel, five bantins,† and one jalia. —Bocarro, 101.

1615.—"You must know that in 1605 there had come from the Reino (i.e. Portugal) one Sebastian Goncalves Tiba... of humble parentage, who betook himself to Bengal and commenced life as a soldier; and afterwards became a factor in cargoes of salt (which forms the chief traffic in those parts), and acquiring some capital in this business, with that he bought a jalia, a kind of vessel that is there used for fighting and trading at once."—Ibid. 431.

1634.—"Many others (of the Firingis) who were on board the ghrâbs, set fire to their vessels, and turned their faces towards hell. Out of the 64 large dinings, 51 ghrâbs, and 200 jallyas, one ghrâb and two jallyas escaped."—Capture of Hoogly in 1634, Badshah Namâ, in Elliot, vii. 34.

c. Jalba, Jeloa, &c.

1330.—"We embarked at this town (Jedda) on a vessel called jelba which belonged to Rashid- eddin al-alfi al-Yamani, a native of Hâbeh."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 158. The Translators comment: "A large boat or gondola made of planks stitched together with coco-nut fibre."

1518.—"And Mercoem, Captain of the fleet of the Grand Sultan, who was in Cambaya . . . no sooner learned that Goa was taken . . . than he gave up all hopes of bringing his mission to a fortunate termination, and obtained permission from the King of Cambaya to go to Judá . . . and from that port set out for Suez in a shallop (gelua).—Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 19.

1538.—". . . before we arrived at the Island of Rocks, we discerned three vessels on the other side, that seemed to us to be Geloas, or Terradas, which are the names of the vessels of that country."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 7.

1690.—"In this is a Creek very convenient for building Grabbis or Geloas.—Ovington, 467.

d. Galliot.

In the first quotation we have galiot in the sense of "pirate."

c. 1232.—"L'en leur demanda de quel terre; il répondirent de Flandres, de Hollande et de Frise; et ce estoit voirs que il avoient esté galiot et ulague de mer, bien huit anz; et s'estoient repenti et pour penitence venoient en pelerinage en Jeruzalem."—Guill. de Tyr, as above, p. 117.

GANDA.

1552. — "As soon as this news reached the Sublime Porte, the Sandjak of Katif was ordered to send Murad-Beg to take command of the fleet, enjoining him to leave in the port of Bassora one or two ships, five galleys, and a galiolet." — Sidi 'Ali, p. 48.

"They (the Portuguese) had 4 ships as big as carracks, 3 ghurabs or great (rowing) vessels, 6 Portuguese caravels and 12 smaller ghurabs, i.e. galioits with oars." —Ibid. 67-68. Unfortunately the translator does not give the original Turkish word for galioit.

c. 1610. — "Es grandes Galerés il y pent deux et trois cents hommes de guerre, et en d'autres grandes Galioites, qu'ils nomment Fregates, il y en peut cent..." — Pyrard de Laval, ii. 72; [Hak. Soc. ii. 118].

[1665. — "He gave a sufficient number of galioits to escort them to sea." —Tavernier, ed. Bult, i. 193.]

1689. — "He embarked about the middle of October in the year 1542, in a galioit, which carried the new Captain of Comorin."—Dryden, Life of Xavier. (In Works, ed. 1821, xvi. 87.)

c. 1760. — "Of these armed boats called Gallewats, the Company maintains also a competent number, for the service of their marine."—Grose, ii. 62.

1763. — "The Gallewats are large row-boats, built like the grab, but of smaller dimensions, the largest rarely exceeding 70 tons; they have two masts... they have 40 or 50 stout oars, and may be rowed four miles an hour."—Orme, i. 409.

[1813. — "... here they build vessels of all sizes, from a ship of the line to the smallest grabs and gallivats, employed in the Company's services."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 94-5.]

GAMBIER, s. The extract of a climbing shrub (Uncaria Gambier, Roxb. ? Nauclea Gambier, Hunter; N.O. Rubiaceae) which is a native of the regions about the Straits of Malacca, and is much grown in plantations in Singapore and the neighbouring islands. The substance in chemical composition and qualities strongly resembles cutch (q.v.), and the names Catechu and Terra Japonica are applied to both. The plant is mentioned in Debye, 1601 (iii. 99), and by Rumphius, c. 1690 (v. 63), who describes its use in mastication with betel-nut; but there is no account of the catechu made from it, known to the authors of the Pharmacographia, before 1780. Crawfurd gives the name as Javanese, but Hanbury and Flickiger point out the resemblance to the Tamil name for catechu, Katta Kâmbu (Pharmacographia, 298 seqq.). [Mr. Skeat points out that the standard Malay name is gambir, of which the origin is uncertain, but that the English word is clearly derived from it.]

GANDA, s. This is the H. name for a rhinoceros, gaineda, ganda from Skt. ganda (giving also gandaka, gandâna, gajendra). The note on the passage in Barbosa by his Hak. Soc. editor is a marvel in the way of error. The following is from a story of Correa about a battle between "Bober Mirza" (i.e. Sultan Baber) and a certain King "Cacandar" (Sikandar ?), in which I have been unable to trace even what events it misrepresents. But it keeps Ferran Mendez Pinto in countenance, as regards the latter's statement about the advance of the King of the Tartars against Peking with four score thousand rhinoceroses!

"The King Cacandar divided his army into five battles well arrayed, consisting of 140,000 horse and 280,000 foot, and in front of them a battle of 800 elephants, which fought with swords upon their tusks, and on their backs castles with archers and musketeers. And in front of the elephants 80 rhinoceroses (gandas), like that which went to Portugal, and which they call bhêkâ (?) these on the horn which they have over the snout carried three-pronged iron weapons with which they fought very stoutly... and the Mogors with their arrows made a great discharge, wounding many of the elephants and the gandas, which as they felt the arrows, turned and fled, breaking up the battles."—Correa, iii. 573-574.

1516. — "The King (of Guzerat) sent a Ganda to the King of Portugal, because they told him that he would be pleased to see her."—Barbosa, 58.

1553. — "And in return for many rich presents which this Diogo Fernandez carried to the King, and besides others which the King sent to Affonso Alboquerque, there was an animal, the biggest which Nature has created after the elephant, and the great enemy of the latter ... which the natives of the land of Cambaya, whence this one came, call Ganda, and the Greeks and Latins Rhinoceroses. And Affonso d’Alboquereque sent this to the King Don Manuel, and it came to this Kingdom, and it was afterwards lost on its way to Rome, when the King sent it as a present to the Pope."—Barros, Dec. II. liv. x. cap. 1. [Also see d’Alboquereque, Hak. Soc. iv. 104 seq.]

GANTON, s. This is mentioned by some old voyagers as a weight or measure by which pepper was sold in the Malay Archipelago. It is presumably Malay gantang, defined by Crawfurd as "a dry measure, equal to about a gallon." [Klinkert has: "gantang, a measure of capacity 5 katis among the Malays; also a gold weight, formerly 6 suku, but later 1 bongkal, or 8 suku." Gantang-gantang is 'cartridge-case.']

1554.—"Also a candy of Goa, answers to 140 gantans, equivalent to 15 paraas, 30 medidas at 42 medidas to the paraa."—A. Nunes, 39.

[1615.—"... 1000 gantans of pepper."—Foster, Letters, i. 108.]

"I sent to borrow 4 or five gantans of yole of Yasemon Dono. ... But he returned answer he had none; when I knew to the contrary, he bought a parcell out of my handes the other day."—Cocks’s Diary, i. 6.

GANZA, s. The name given by old travellers to the metal which in former days constituted the inferior currency of Pegu. According to some it was lead; others call it a mixt metal. Lead in rude lumps is still used in the bazaars of Burma for small purchases. (Yule, Mission to Ava, 259.) The word is evidently Skt. kasa, ‘bell-metal,’ whence Malay gango, which last is probably the word which travellers picked up.

1564.—"In this Kingdom of Pegu there is no coined money, and what they use commonly consists of dishes, pans, and other utensils of service, made of a metal like frosleyra (!), broken in pieces; and this is called gama."—A. Nunes, 38.

"... vn altra statua cosi fatta di Ganza; che è vn metallo di che fanno le lor monete, fatte di rame e di piombo mescolati insieme."—Caesar Frederick, in Ramusio, iii. 594.

1567.—"The current money that is in this City, and throughout all this kingdom, is called Gansa or Ganza, which is made of copper and lead. It is not the money of the king, but every man may stampe it that will."—Caesar Frederick, E.T., in Purchas, iii. 1717-18.

1726.—"Rough Peguan Gans (a brass mixt with lead). ..."—Valentijn, Chor. 54.

1727.—"Plenty of Gans or Lead, which passeth all over the Pegu Dominions, for Money."—A. Hamilton, ii. 41; [ed. 1744, ii. 40.]

GARCE, s. A cubic measure for rice, &c., in use on the Madras coast, as usual varying much in value. Buchanan (infra) treats it as a weight. The word is Tel. gäriše, gärise, Can. garasi, Tam. karisai. [In Chingleput salt is weighed by the Garee of 124maunds, or nearly 5152 tons (Crole, Man. 58); in Salem, 400 Markals (see MERCALL) are 185'2 cubic feet, or 18 quarters English (Le Fanu, Man. ii. 399); in Malabar, 120 Paras of 25 Macleod seers, or 10,800 lbs. (Logan, Man. ii. clxix.). As a superficial measure in the N. Circars, it is the area which will produce one Garee of grain.

[1684-5.—"A Generall to Conimeer of this day date enordering them to provide 200 gars of salt."—Pringle, Diary Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 40, who notes that a still earlier use of the word will be found in Note and Exts. i. 97.]

1752.—"Grain Measures.
1 Measure weighs about 26 lb. 1 oz. avd.

1 Garse 8400
1759.—"... a garce of rice."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 120.

1784.—"The day that advice was received ... (of peace with Tippoo) at Madras, the price of rice fell there from 115 to 80 pagodas the garce."—In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1807.—"The proper native weights used in the Company’s Journal are as follows: 10 Vara hoon (Pogadas)=1 Polam, 40 Polams =1 Visay, 8 Visay (Vees)=1 Mannins, 20 Mannings (Maunds)=1 Barwys, 20 Barwaes (Candies)=1 Gursay, called the English Garse. The Vara hoon or Star Pagoda weighs 523 grains, therefore the Visay is nearly three pounds avoirdupois (see VISS); and the Garse is nearly 1265 lbs."—F. Buchanan, Mystore, &c., i. 6.

By this calculation, the Garse should be 9600 lbs. instead of 1265 as printed.

GARDEE, s. A name sometimes given, in 18th century, to native soldiers disciplined in European fashion, i.e. sepoy (q.v.). The Indian Vocabulary (1788) gives: "Gardee—a tribe inhabiting the provinces of Bijapore, &c., esteemed good foot soldiers." The word may be only a corruption of GAUM, GONG.

1772.—"The place of my residence at present is a garden-house of the Nabob, about 4 miles distant from Mooreshedabad."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 34.

1782.—"A body of Hyder's horse were at St. Thomas's Mount on the 29th ult. and Gen. Munro and Mr. Brodie with great difficulty escaped from the General's Gardens. They were pursued by Hyder's horse within a mile of the Black Town."—India Gazette, May 11.

1809.—"The gentlemen of the settlement live entirely in their garden-houses, as they very properly call them."—Ld. Valentia, i. 389.

1810.—"... Rural retreats called Garden-houses."—Williamson, V. M. i. 137.

1873.—"To let, or for sale, Serle's Gardens at Adyar.—For particulars apply," &c.—Madras Mail, July 3.

GARRY, GHARRY, s. H. gārī, a cart or carriage. The word is used by Anglo-Indians, at least on the Bengal side, in both senses. Frequently the species is discriminated by a distinctive prefix, as palke-garry (palankin carriage), seq-garry (chaise), rel-garry (railway carriage), &c. [The modern dawk-garry was in its original form called the "Equirotal Carriage," from the four wheels being of equal dimensions. The design is said to have been suggested by Lord Ellenborough. (See the account and drawing in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 3 seq.).]

1810.—"The common ghorry... is rarely, if ever, kept by any European, but may be seen plying for hire in various parts of Calcutta."—Williamson, V. M. i. 326.

1811.—The Gāry is represented in Solvyns' engravings as a two-wheeled rath [see RUT] (i.e. the primitive native carriage, built like a light hackery) with two ponies.

1866.—"My husband was to have met us with a two-horse gharee."—Freelyyan, Dawk Bungalow, 384:

[1892.—"The brām gārī, brougham; the fiton gārī, phaeton or barouche; the vāngā, waggonette, are now built in most large towns. The vāngā seems likely to be the carriage of the future, because of its capacity."—R. Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 193.]

GAUM, GONG. s. A village, H. gādn, from Skt. grāma.

1519.—"In every one of the said villages, which they call grābāoos."—Goa Proclam. in Arch. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, 38.

Gāumén occurs in the same vol. (p. 75), under the forms ganaare and guwacare, for the village heads in Port. India.

GARDENS, GARDEN-HOUSE. s. In the 18th century suburban villas at Madras and Calcutta were so called. 'Garden Reach' below Fort William took its name from these.

1682.—"Early in the morning I was met by Mr. Littleton and most of the Factory, near Hugly, and about 9 or 10 o'clock by Mr. Vincent near the Dutch Garden, who came attended by several Boats and Budge-rowers guarded by 35 Firelocks, and about 50 Rashputs and Peons well armed."—Hedges, Diary, July 24; [Hak. Soc. i. 32].

1855.—"The whole Council... came to attend the President at the garden-house..."—Pringle, Diary, Fort St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 115; in Wheeler, i. 139.

1747.—"In case of an Attack at the Garden House, if by a superior Force they should be oblig'd to retire, according to the orders and send a Horseman before them to advise of the Approach..."—Report of Council of War at Fort St. David, in India Office MS. Records.

1758.—"The guard of the redoubt retreated before them to the garden-house."—Orme, ii. 393.

1772.—"Mahomed Iisof... rode with a party of horse as far as Maskelyne's garden."—Ibid. iii. 425.

'guard,' but probably the origin assigned in the second quotation may be well founded; 'Guard' may have shaped the corruption of Gharbi. The old Bengal sepoys were commonly known in the N.W. as Parbias or Easterns (see POORUB). [Women in the Amazon corps at Hyderabad (Deccan), known as the Zafar Palton, or 'Victorious Battalion,' were called gardunee (Gardanii), the feminine form of Gard or Guard.]
GAURIAN, adj. This is a convenient name which has been adopted of late years as a generic name for the existing Aryan languages of India, i.e. those which are radically sprung from, or cognate to, the Sanskrit. The name (according to Mr. E. L. Brandreth) was given by Prof. Hoernle; but it is in fact an adoption and adaptation of a term used by the Pundits of Northern India. They divide the colloquial languages of (civilised) India into the 5 Gauras and 5 Draviras [see DRAVIDIAN]. The Gauras of the Pundits appear to be (1) Bengalee (Bangâli) which is the proper language of Gauḍa, or Northern Bengal, from which the name is taken (see GOUR c.), (2) Oriya, the language of Orissa, (3) Hindi, (4) Panjâbî; their Dravira languages are (1) Telinga, (2) Karnâṭaka (Canarese), (3) Marâṭhî, (4) Gurjara (Gujarâtî), (5) Drâviḍa (Tamil). But of these last (3) and (4) are really to be classed with the Gaurian group, so that the latter is to be considered as embracing 7 principal languages. Kashmiri, Singalese, and the languages or dialects of Assam, of Nepal, and some others, have also been added to the list of this class.

The extraordinary analogies between the changes in grammar and phonology from Sanskrit in passing into those Gaurian languages, and the changes of Latin in passing into the Romance languages, analogies extending into minute details, have been treated by several scholars; and a very interesting view of the subject is given by Mr. Brandreth in vols. xi. and xii. of the J.R.A.S., N.S.

GAUTAMA, n.p. The surname, according to Buddhist legend, of the Sakya tribe from which the Buddha Sakya Muni sprang. It is a derivative from Gotama, a name of "one of the ancient Vedic bard-families" (Oldenberg). It is one of the most common names for Buddha among the Indo-Chinese nations. The Sommorda-codom of many old narratives represents the Pali form of Sramaya Gautama, "The Ascetic Gautama."

1545.—"I will pass by them of the sect of Godomem, who spend their whole life in crying day and night on those mountains, Godomem, Godomem, and desist not from it until they fall down stark dead to the ground."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogan, p. 222.

c. 1590.—See under Godavery passage from Aüm, where Gotam occurs.

1688.—"J'ai cru devoir expliquer toutes ces choses avant que de parler de Sommorna-khodom (c'est ainsi que les Siamois appellent le Dieu qu'ils adorent à présent)."—Voy. de Siâm, Des Pères Jesuites, Paris, 1686, p. 397.

1687-88.—"Now tho' they say that several have attained to this Felicity (Nirvâna, i.e. Nirvana) . . . yet they honour only one alone, whom they esteem to have surpassed all the rest in Vertue. They call him Sommorna-Codom; and they say that Codom was his Name, and that Sommorna signifies in the Balte Tongue a Talapoin of the Woods."—Hist. Rel. of Siâm, by De La Loubere, E.T. i. 130.

[1727.—". . . inferior Gods, such as Somma Cuddom. . . ."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 54.]

1800.—"Gotma, or Goutum, according to the Hindoos of India, or Gauđa among the inhabitants of the more eastern parts, is said to have been a philosopher . . . he taught in the Indian school the Heresox religion and philosophy of Boodh. The image that represents Boodh is called Gau̇tama, or Goutum. . . ."—Symes, Embassy, 299.

1828.—"The titles or synonyms of Buddha, as they were given to me, are as follow: "Kotamo (Gautama). . . Sommorna-kotamo, agreeably to the interpretation given me, means in the Pali language, the priest Gautama."—Crawford, Emb. to Siâm, p. 367.

GAVEE, s. Topsail. Nautical jargon from Port. gaxe, the top. (Roebuck).

GAVIDIA, s. This is a name adopted by zoologists for one of the alligators of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, Gaviais gangeticus, &c. It is the less dangerous of the Gangetic saurians, with long, slender, sub-cylindrical jaws expanding into a protuberance at the muzzle. The name must have originated in some error, probably a clerical one, for the true word is Hindi. ghariyal, and gavial is nothing. The term (gariydll) is used by Baber (p. 410), where the translator's note says: "The geriali is the round-mouthed crocodile," words which seem to indicate the magar GAZAT. 367  GENTOO.

(see MUGGUR) (Crocidilus biporcatus) not the gharial.

e. 1809.—"In the Brohmoputro as well as in the Ganges there are two kinds of crocodile, which at Goyalpara are both called Kumir; but each has a specific name. The Crocidilus Gangeticus is called Ghoriyal, and the other is called Bongcha."—Buchanan’s Rangpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 551-2.

GAZAT, s. This is domestic Hind. for ‘dessert.’ (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 184).

GECKO, s. A kind of house lizard. The word is not now in Anglo-Indian use; it is a naturalist’s word; and also is French. It was no doubt originally an onomatopoeia from the creature’s reiterated utterance. Marcel Devic says the word is adopted from Malay gekok [gekoq]. This we do not find in Crawford, who has tākel, tākel, and gokel, all evidently attempts to represent the utterance. In Burma the same, or a kindred lizard, is called tokté, in like imitation.

1631.—Bontius seems to identify this lizard with the Guana (q.v.), and says its bite is so venomous as to be fatal unless the part be immediately cut out, or cauterized. This is no doubt a fable. "Nostratis ipsum animal apposito vocabulo gecco vacant; quippe non secus ac Coccyx apud nos sumum cantum iterat, etam gecko assiduo sonat, prius edito stridore qualem Picus emittit."—Lib. V. cap. 5, p. 57.

1711.—"Chaccos, as Cuckoos receive their Names from the Noise they make. . . . They are much like lizards, but larger. ‘Tis said their Dung is so venomous," &c.—Lockey, 84.

1727.—"They have one dangerous little Animal called a Jackoas, in shape almost like a Lizard. It is very malicious . . . and wherever the Liquor lights on an Animal Body, it presently cankers the Flesh."—A. Hamilton, ii. 181; [ed. 1744, ii. 136].

This is still a common belief. (See BISCOPRA).

1883.—"This was one of those little house lizards called geckos, which have pellets at the ends of their toes. They are not repulsive brutes like the garden lizard, and I am always on good terms with them. They have full liberty to make use of my house, for which they seem grateful, and say chuck, chuck, chuck."—Tribes on My Frontier, 93.

GENTOO, s. and adj. This word is a corruption of the Portuguese Gentio, ‘a gentile’ or heathen, which they applied to the Hindus in contradistinction to the Moros or ‘Moors,’ i.e. Mahomedans. [See MOOR.] Both terms are now obsolete among English people, except perhaps that Gentoo still lingers at Madras in the sense b; for the terms Gentio and Gentoo were applied in two senses:

a. To the Hindūs generally.

b. To the Telugu-speaking Hindūs of the Peninsula specially, and to their language.

The reason why the term became thus specifically applied to the Telugu people is probably because, when the Portuguese arrived, the Telugu monarchy of Vijayanagara, or Bijanagar (see BISNAGAR, NARSINGA) was dominant over great part of the Peninsula. The officials were chiefly of Telugu race, and thus the people of this race, as the most important section of the Hindūs, were par excellence the Gentiles, and their language the Gentile language. Besides these two specific senses, Gentio was sometimes used for heathen in general. Thus in F. M. Pinto: "A very famous Corsair who was called Himinilau, a Chinese by nation, and who from a Gentio as he was, had a little time since turned Moor. . . ."—Ch. L.

1548.—"The Religious of this territory spend so largely, and give such great aids at the cost of your Highness’s administration that it disposes of a good part of the funds. . . . I believe indeed they do all this in real zeal and sincerity . . . but I think it might be reduced a half, and all for the better; for there are some of them who often try to make Christians by force, and worry the Gentoons (gentio) to such a degree that it drives the population away."—Simao Botelho Carias, 35.

1563.—". . . Among the Gentiles (Gentios) Rão is as much as to say ‘King.”—Garcia, f. 556.

. . . "This ambergris is not so highly valued among the Moors, but it is highly prized among the Gentiles."—Ibid. f. 14.

1582.—"A gentile . . . whose name was Canaca."—Castañeda, trans. by N. L., f. 31.

1588.—In a letter of this year to the Viceroy, the King (Philip II.) says he "understands the Gentios are much the best persons to whom to farm the alfandegas (customs, &c.), paying well and regularly, and it does not seem contrary to canon-law to farm them, but on this he will consult the learned."—In Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. 3, 135.

c. 1610.—"Ils (los Portugais) exercent ordinairement de semblables cruautes lors qu’ils sortent en troupe le long des costes, bruslans et saccageans ces pauvres Gentils qui ne desirent que leur bonne grace, et leur amitié mais ils n'en ont pas plus de pitié pour cela."—Mocquey, 249.

1860.—"... which Gentiles are of two sorts... first the purer Gentiles... or else the impure or vulcanic Gentiles... such are the husbandmen or inferior sort of people called the Coules."—H. Lord, Display, &c., 85.

1673.—"The finest Dames of the Gentuex disdained not to carry Water on their Heads."—Fryer, 116.

1679.—In Fort St. Geo. Cons. of 29th January, the Black Town of Madras is called "the Gentue Town."—Notes and Exts., No. ii. 3.

1682.—"This morning a Gentoo sent by Bullehund, Governor of Hugly and Cassum-bazar, made complaint to me that Mr. Charnock did shamefully—to ye great scandal of our Nation—keep a Gentoo woman of his kindred, which he has had these 19 years."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 1.; [Hak. Soc. i. 111].

1683.—"The ceremony used by these Gentu's in their sickness is very strange; they bring ye sick person... to ye brink of ye River Ganges, on a Cott..."—Ibid. May 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 86].

In Stevens's Trans. of Faria y Sousa (1695) the Hindus are still called Gentiles. And it would seem that the English form Gentoo did not come into general use till late in the 17th century.

1767.—"In order to transact Business of any kind in this Country you must at least have a Smattering of the Language. The original Language of this Country (or at least the earliest we know of) is the Bengala or Gentoo; this is commonly spoken in all parts of the Country. But the politest Language is the Moors or Mussulmans, and Persian."—MS. Letter of James Rennell.

1772.—"It is customary with the Gentooos, as soon as they have acquired a moderate fortune, to dig a pond."—Tegmonth, Mem. i. 36.

1774.—"When I landed (on Island of Bali) the natives, who are Gentooos, came on board in little canoes, with outriggers on each side."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 169.

1776.—"A Code of Gentoo Laws or Ordinations of the Pundits. From a Persian Translation, made from the original written in the Shanskrit Language. London, Printed in the Year 1776."—(Title of Work by Nathaniel Brassey Halhed.)

1778.—"The peculiar patience of the Gentooos in Bengal, their affection to business, and the peculiar cheapness of all productions either of commerce or of necessity, had concurred to render the details of the revenue the most minute, voluminous, and complicated system of accounts which exist in the universe."—Orme, ii. 7 (Reprint).

1781.—"They (Syrian Christians of Travancore) acknowledged a Gentoo Sovereign, but they were governed even in temporal concerns by the bishop of Angamala."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

1784.—"Captain Francis Swain Ward, of the Madras Establishment, whose paintings and drawings of Gentu Architecture, &c., are well known."—In Seton-Karr, i. 31.

1785.—"I found this large concourse (at Chandernagore) of people were gathered to see a Gentoo woman burn herself with her husband."—Ibid. i. 90.

"The original inhabitants of India are called Gentooos."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 122.

1803.—"Peregrine. O mine is an accommodating palate, hostess. I have swallowed burgundy with the French, hollands with the Dutch, sherbet with a Turk, sloe-juice with an Englishman, and water with a simple Gentooo."—Colman's John Bull, i. sc. 1.

1807.—"I was not prepared for the entire nakedness of the Gentoo inhabitants."—Lord Minto in India, 17.

1648.—"The Heathen who inhabit the kingdom of Golconda, and are spread all over India, are called Jentive."—Van Twist, 59.

1673.—"Their Language they call generally Gentu... the peculiar Name of their Speech is Telinga."—Fryer, 33.

1674.—"50 Pogodas gratuity to John Thomas ordered for good progress in the Gentu tongue, both speaking and writing."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., in Notes and Exts., No. i. 32.

[1681.—"He hath the Gentoo language."—In Yale, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ecixxiv.]

1683.—"Thursday, 21st June. The Hon. Company having sent us a Law with reference to the Natives... it is ordered that the first be translated into Portuguese, Gentoo, Malabar, and Moors, and proclaimed solemnly by beat of drum."—Madras Consultation, in Wheeler, i. 314.

1719.—"Bills of sale wrote in Gentoo on Cajan leaves, which are entered in the Register kept by the Town Conicoply for that purpose."—Ibid. ii. 314.

1726.—"The proper vernacular here (Golconda) is the Gentooos (Jentieos) or Telingaas."—Valentin, Chor. 37.

1801.—"The Gentoo translation of the Regulations will answer for the Ceded Districts, for even... the most Canaree part of them understand Gentooo."—Munro, in Life, i. 321.

1669.—"A Grammar of the Gentoo language, as it is understood and spoken by the Gentoo People, residing north and north-westward of Madras. By a Civil Servant under the Presidency of Fort St. George, many years resident in the Northern Circars. Madras, 1807."
1817.—The third grammar of the Telugu language, published in this year, is called a "Gentoo Grammar.

1837.—"I mean to amuse myself with learning Gentoo, and have brought a Moon shoe with me. Gentoo is the language of this part of the country [Godavery delta], and one of the prettiest of all the dialects."
—Letters from Madras, 189.

GHAUT, s. Hind. ghât.

a. A landing-place; a path of descent to a river; the place of a ferry, &c. Also a quay or the like.

b. A path of descent from a mountain; a mountain pass; and hence

c. n.p. The mountain ranges parallel to the western and eastern coasts of the Peninsula, through which the ghâts or passes lead from the table-lands above down to the coast and lowlands. It is probable that foreigners hearing these tracts spoken of respectively as the country above and the country below the Ghâts (see BALAGHAUT) were led to regard the word Ghâts as a proper name of the mountain range itself, or (like De Barros below) as a word signifying range. And this is in analogy with many other cases of mountain nomenclature, where the name of a pass has been transferred to a mountain chain, or where the word for 'a pass' has been mistaken for a word for 'mountain range.' The proper sense of the word is well illustrated from Sir A. Wellesley, under b.

1809.—"The dandys there took to their paddles, and keeping the beam to the current the whole way, contrived to land us at the destined gaut."—Ed. Valentia, i. 185.

1824.—"It is really a very large place, and rises from the river in an amphitheatre form, with many very fine ghâts descending to the water's edge."—Heber, i. 167.

c. 1815.—"In 17 more days they arrived at Gurganw. During these 17 days the Ghâts were passed, and great heights and depths were seen amongst the hills, where even the elephants became nearly invisible."—Amir Khusrâ, in Elliot, iii. 86.

This passage illustrates how the transition from b to c occurred. The Ghâts here meant are not a range of mountains so called, but, as the context shows, the passes among the Vindhya and Sátpûra hills. Compare the two following, in which 'down the ghâuts' and 'down the passes' mean exactly the same thing, though to many people the former expression will suggest 'down through a range of mountains called the Ghâuts.'

1803.—"The enemy are down the ghâuts in great consternation."—Wellington, ii. 333.

"The enemy have fled northward, and are getting down the passes as fast as they can."—M. Elphinstone, in Life by Colbroke, i. 71.

1828.—"Though it was still raining, I walked up the Bohr Ghât, four miles and a half, to Candaulah."—Heber, ii. 136, ed. 1844. That is, up one of the Passes, from which Europeans called the mountains themselves "the Ghâuts."

The following passage indicates that the great Sir Walter, with his usual sagacity, saw the true sense of the word in its geographical use, though misled by books to attribute to the (so-called) 'Eastern Ghâuts' the character that belongs to the Western only.

1827.—"... they approached the Ghâuts, those tremendous mountain passes which descend from the table-land of Mysore, and through which the mighty streams that arise in the centre of the Indian Peninsula find their way to the ocean."—The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1762.—"All the South part of India save the Mountains of Gate (a string of Hills in ye country) is level Land the Mould scarce so deep as in England. . . . As you make use of every expedient to drain the water from your tilled ground, so the Indians take care to keep it in theirs, and for this reason sow only in the level grounds."—MS. Lac. of H. Rennell, March 5.

1826.—"The mountains are nearly the same height . . . with the average of Welsh mountains. . . . In one respect, and only one, the Ghâts have the advantage,—their precipices are higher, and the outlines of the hills consequently bolder."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 136.

GHEE, s. Boiled butter; the universal medium of cookery throughout India, supplying the place occupied by oil in Southern Europe, and more; [the same of Arabia, the raughan of Persia]. The word is Hind. ġhî, Skt. ghrīta. A short but explicit account of the mode of preparation will be found in the English Cyclopaedia (Arts and Sciences), s.v.; [and in fuller detail in Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 491 seqq.].

C. 1590.—"Most of them (Akbar's elephants) get 5 s. (ers) of sugar, 4 s. of ġhî, and half a man of rice mixed with chillies, cloves, &c."—Āv-i-Akbar, i. 130.

1673.—"They will drink milk, and boil'd butter, which they call Ghee."—Fryer, 33.

1785.—"The revenues of the city of Decca . . . amount annually to two kherore (see CRORE), proceeding from the customs and duties levied on ghee."—Carraccioli L. of Olive, i. 172.

1817.—"The great luxury of the Hindu is butter, prepared in a manner peculiar to himself, and called by him ghee."—Mill, Hist. i. 410.

GHILZAI, n.p. One of the most famous of the tribes of Afghanistan, and probably the strongest, occupying the high plateau north of Kandahar, and extending (roundly speaking) eastward to the Sulimâni mountains, and north to the Kâbul River. They were supreme in Afghanistan at the beginning of the 18th century, and for a time possessed the throne of Ispahan. The following paragraph occurs in the article AFGHANISTAN, in the 9th ed. of the Encyc. Britan., 1874 (i. 235), written by one of the authors of this book:

"It is remarkable that the old Arab geographers of the 10th and 11th centuries place in the Ghilzai country (i.e. the country now occupied by the Ghilzais, or nearly so) a people called Khilijis, whom they call a tribe of Turks, to whom belonged a famous family of Delhi Kings. The probability of the identity of the Khilijis and Ghilzais is obvious, and the question touches others regarding the origin of the Afghans; but it does not seem to have been gone into."

Nor has the writer since ever been able to go into it. But whilst he has never regarded the suggestion as more than a probable one, he has seen no reason to reject it. He may add that on starting the idea to Sir Henry Rawlinson (to whom it seemed new), a high authority on such a question, though he would not accept it, he made a candid remark to the effect that the Ghilzais had undoubtedly a very Turk-like aspect. A belief in this identity was, as we have recently noticed, entertained by the traveller Charles Masson, as is shown in a passage quoted below. And it also has been maintained by Surgeon-Major Bellew, in his Races of Afghanistan (1880), [who (p. 100) refers the name to Khilichi, a swordsman. The folk etymology of De Guignes and D'Herbelot is Kahl, 'repose,' atz, 'hungry,' given to an officer by Ogouz Khân, who delayed on the road to kill game for his sick wife].

All the accounts of the Ghilzais indicate great differences between them and the other tribes of Afghanistan; whilst there seems nothing impossible, or even unlikely, in the partial assimilation of a Turki tribe in the course of centuries to the Afghans who surround them, and the consequent assumption of a quasi-Afghan genealogy. We do not find that Mr. Elphinstone makes any explicit reference to the question now before us. But two of the notes to his History (5th ed. p. 322 and 384) seem to indicate that it was in his mind. In the latter of these he says: "The Khiljís . . . though Turks by descent . . . had been so long settled among the Afghans that they had almost become identified with that people; but they probably mixed more with other nations, or at least with their Turki brethren, and would be more civilized than the generality of Afghan mountaineers." The learned and eminently judicious William Erskine was also inclined to accept the identity of the two tribes, doubting (but perhaps needlessly) whether the Khiljí had been really of Turki race. We have not been able to meet with any translated author who mentions both Khiljí and Ghilzai. In the following quotations all the earlier refer to Khiljí, and the later to Ghilzai. Attention may be called to the expressions in the quotation from Ziauddin Barní, as indicating some great difference between the Turk proper and the Khiljí even then. The language of Baber, again, so far as it goes, seems to indicate that by his time the Ghilzais were regarded as an Afghan clan.

c. 950. — "The Khalaj is a Turki tribe, which in ancient times migrated into the country that lies between India and the parts of Sijsjítán beyond the Ghúr. They are a pastoral people and resemble the Turks in their natural characteristics, their dress and their language."—Istakhrí, from De Goeje's text, p. 245.

c. 1030. — "The Afghán and Khiljí having submitted to him (Sabaktígn), he admitted thousands of them . . . into the ranks of his armies."—Al-Übírí, in Elliot, ii. 24.

c. 1150. — "The Khílkhs (read Khílij) are people of Turk race, who, from an early date invaded this country (Díwar, on the banks of the Helmand), and whose dwellings are spread abroad to the north of India and on the borders of Ghaur and of Western Sijsjítán. They possess cattle, wealth, and the various products of husbandry; they all have the aspect of Turks, whether as regards features, dress, and customs, or as regards their arms and manner of making war. They are pacific people, doing and thinking no evil.”—Edrisí, i. 457.

1289. — "At the same time Jalálu-d dín (Khiljí), who was 'Aríz-i-manádítik (Muster-master-general), had gone to Bahárpúr, attended by a body of his relations and friends. Here he held a muster and inspection of the forces. He came of a race different from that of the Turks, so he had no confidence in them, nor would the Turks own him as belonging to the number of their friends . . . The people high and low . . . were all troubled by the ambition of the Khiljís, and were strongly opposed to Jalálu-d dín's obtaining the crown . . . Sultán Jalálu-d dín Fíroz Khiljí ascended the throne in the . . . year 638 A.H. . . . The people of the city (of Delhi) had for 80 years been governed by sovereigns of Turk extraction, and were averse to the succession of the Khiljís . . . they were struck with admiration and amazement at seeing the Khiljís occupying the throne of the Turks, and wondered how the throne had passed from the one to the other."—Zaid-al-dín Barní, in Elliot, iii. 134-136.

14th cent.—The continuator of Rashiddud-dín enumerates among the tribes occupying the country which we now call Afghanistan, Gháris, Herawis, Nígáralis, Sejzí, Khiljí, Balách and Afghánis. See Notice et Extraits, xiv. 941.

c. 1507. — "I set out from Káhul for the purpose of plundering and beating up the quarters of the Ghiljís . . . a good farsang from the Ghiljí camp, we observed a blackness, which was either owing to the Ghiljís being in motion, or to smoke. The young and inexperienced men of the army all set forward full speed; I followed them for two kos, shooting arrows at their horses; and at length checked their speed. When five or six thousand men set out on a pillaging party, it is extremely difficult to maintain discipline . . . A minaret of skulls was erected of the heads of these Afghánis."—Baber, pp. 220-222; see also p. 225.

1812.—"The Ghilji tribes occupy the principal portion of the country between Kándáhar and Ghazní. They are, moreover, the most numerous of the Afghan tribes, and if united under a capable chief might . . . become the most powerful . . . They are brave and warlike, but have a sternness of disposition amounting to ferocity . . . Some of the inferior Ghiljís are so violent in their intercourse with strangers that they can scarcely be considered in the light of human beings, while no language can describe the terrors of a transit through their country, or the indignities which have to be endured. . . . The Ghiljis, although considered, and calling themselves, Afghans, and moreover employing the Pashto, or Afghan dialect, are undoubtedly a mixed race. "The name is evidently a modification or corruption of Khalji or Khilaji, that of a great Turki tribe mentioned by Sherifudin in his history of Taimur. . . ."—Ch. Mason, Narr. of various Journeys, &c., ii. 204, 206, 207.

1854.—"The Ghuri was succeeded by the Khilji dynasty; also said to be of Turki extraction, but which seems rather to have been of Afghan race; and it may be doubted if they are not of the Ghilji Afghans."—Erskine, Böker and Humayun, i. 404.

1880.—"As a race the Ghilji mix little with their neighbours, and indeed differ in many respects, both as to internal government and domestic customs, from the other races of Afghanistan . . . the great majority of the tribe are pastoral in their habits of life, and migrate with the seasons from the lowlands to the highlands with their families and flocks, and easily portable black hair tents. They never settle in the cities, nor do they engage in the ordinary handicraft trades, but they manufacture carpets, felts, &c., for domestic use, from the wool and hair of their cattle. . . . Physically they are a remarkably fine race . . . but they are a very barbarous people, the pastoral class especially, and in their wars excessively savage and vindictive. . . ." Several of the Ghilji or Ghilzai-clans are almost wholly engaged in the carrying trade between India and Afghanistan, and the Northern States of Central Asia, and have been so for many centuries."—Races of Afghanistan, by Bellow, p. 103.

1880.—"In the deserts of Affricke yee shall meet oftentimes with fairies," appearing in the shape of men and women; but they vanish soone away, like fantastical illusions."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, vii. 2.

c. 940.—"The Arabs relate many strange stories about the Ghul and their transformations. . . . The Arabs allege that the two feet of the Ghul are ass's feet. . . . These Ghul appeared to travellers in the night, and at hours when one meets with no one on the road; the traveller taking them for some of their companions followed them, but the Ghul led them astray, and caused them to lose their way."—Mas'udl, iii. 314 seqq. (There is much more after the copious and higgledy-piggledy Plinian fashion of this writer.)

c. 1420.—"In exitu deserti . . . rem mirandum dicti contigisse. 1814.—"The Afghans believe each of the numerous solitudes in the mountains and deserts of their country to be inhabited by a lonely daemon, whom they call Ghoolie Beeabauin (the Golue or Spirit of the Waste); they represent him as a gigantic and frightful spectre (who devours any passenger whom chance may bring within his haunts)."—Elphinstone's Cabul, ed. 1839, i. 291.

GHURRA, s. Hind. gharra, Skt. ghata. A water-pot made of clay, of a spheroidal shape, known in S. India as the chatty.

[1827.—". . . the Rajah sent . . . 60 Gurrahs (earthen vessels holding a gallon) of sugar-candy and sweetmeats."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, 66.]

GHURRY, GURREE, s. Hind. gharī. A clepsydra or water-instrument for measuring time, consisting of a floating cup with a small hole in it, adjusted so that it fills and sinks in a fixed time; also the gong by which the time so indicated is struck. This latter is properly gharryal. Hence also a clock or watch; also the 60th part of a day and night, equal therefore to 24 minutes, was in old Hindu custom the space of time indicated by the clepsydra just mentioned, and was called a ghari. But in Anglo-Indian usage, the word is employed for 'an hour;' [or some indefinite period of time]. The water-instrument is sometimes called Pun-Ghurry (pungharī quasi pāni-gharī); also the Sun-dial, Dhoop-Ghurry (dhip, 'sunshine'); the hour-glass, Rēt-Ghurry (rēt, rēti, 'sand').

(Ancient).—"The magistrate, having employed the first four Ghurries of the day in bathing and praying, . . . shall sit upon the Judgment Seat."—Code of the Gentoos Laws (Halhed, 1776), 104.

[1526.—"Gheri." See under PUHUR.]

[1590.—An elaborate account of this method of measuring time will be found in Ain, ed. Jarrett, iii. 15 seq.]

[1616.—"About a guary after, the rest of my company arrived with the money."—Foster, Letters, iv. 343.]
GINGELLY, GINGELLY, &c. s.

The common trade name for the seed and oil of Sesamum indicum, v. orientale. There is a H. [not in Platts' Dict.] and Mahr. form jinjal, but most probably this also is a trade name introduced by the Portuguese. The word appears to be Arabic al-juljunat, which was pronounced in Spanish al-jonjolin (Dozy and Engelmann, 146-7), whence Spanish aljonjoli, Italian gigiolo, zerdelino, &c., Port. gigelino, zerdelino, &c., Fr. jugeoileine, &c., in the Philippine Islands ajonjoli. The proper H. name is til. It is the σχηρως of Dioscorides (ii. 121), and of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. i. 11).

of that province (Malayālam) green ginger is called inchi and inchi-ver, from inchi, 'root.' Inchi was probably in an earlier form of the language sānchi or chānchi, as we find it in Canarese still sānti, which is perhaps the true origin of the H. south for 'dry ginger.' [more usually connected with Skt. swatika, swatika, 'to dry']

It would appear that the Arabs, misled by the form of the name, attributed zānjābīl or zinjābil, or ginger, to the coast of Zinj or Zanzibar; for it would seem to be ginger which some Arabic writers speak of as 'the plant of Zinj.' Thus a poet quoted by Kazwīnī enumerates among the products of India the shajr al-Zānīy or Arbor Zingitana, along with shisham-wood, pepper, steel, &c. (see Gildemeister, 218). And Abulfeda says also: "At Melinda is found the plant of Zinj." (Geog. by Reinnaud, i. 257.) In Marino Sanudo's map of the world also (c. 1320) we find a rubric connecting Ziniber with Zinj. We do not indeed find ginger spoken of as a product of eastern continental Africa, though Barbosa says a large quantity was produced in Madagascar, and Varthema says the like of the Comoro Islands.

c. A.D. 65. — "Ginger (Zyglyzẹẹps) is a special kind of plant produced for the most part in Trogloodytic Arabia, where they use the green plant in many ways, as we do rue (piγγανον), boiling it and mixing it with drinks and stews. The roots are small, like those of eperus, whitish, and peppery to the taste and smell. . . ." — Dioscorides, lib. cap. 189.

c. A.D. 70. — "This pepper of all kinds is most biting and sharpe. . . . The blacke is more kindly and pleasant. . . . Ginger, s. The root of Zingiber officinale, Roxb. We get this word from the Arabic zānjābil, Sp. agenibbre (al-zanjabil), Port. gingibre, Latin zingiber, Ital. zinsero, gengiovo, and many other old forms.

The Skt. name is sriṅgavera, professedly connected with sriṅga, 'a horn,' from the antler-like form of the root. But this is probably an introduced word shaped by this imaginary etymology. Though ginger is cultivated all over India, from the Himalaya to the extreme south, the best is grown in Malabar, and in the language

GINGERLY, s. A coin mentioned as passing in Arabian ports by Milburn (i. 87, 91). Its country and proper name are doubtful. [The following quotations show that Gingerlee or Gergelin was a name for part of the E. coast of India, and Mr. Whiteway (see GINGELI) conjectures that it was so called because the oil was produced there.] But this throws no light on the gold coin of Milburn.

GINGHAM, s. A kind of stuff, defined in the Draper's Dictionary as made from cotton yarn dyed before being woven. The Indian ginghams were apparently sometimes of cotton mixt with some other material. The origin of this word is obscure, and has been the subject of many suggestions. Though it has long passed into the English language, it is on the whole most probable that, like chintz and calico, the term was one originating in the Indian trade.

We find it hardly possible to accept the derivation, given by Litché, from "Guingamp, ville de Bretagne, où il y a des fabriques de tissus." This is also alleged, indeed, in the Encyc. Britannica, 8th ed., which states, under the name of Guingamp, that there are in that town manufactures of gingham, to which the town gives its name. [So also in 9th ed.] We may observe that the productions of Guingamp, and of the Côtes-du-Nord generally, are of linen, a manufacture dating from the 15th century. If it could be shown that gingham was either originally applied to linen fabrics, or that the word occurs before the Indian trade began, we should be more willing to admit the French etymology as possible.

The Penny Cyclopaedia suggests a derivation from guingais, avry. "The variegated, striped, and crossed patterns may have suggested the name."

'Civilis,' a correspondent of Notes and Queries (5 ser. ii. 366, iii. 30) assigns the word to an Indian term, gingham, a stuff which he alleges to be in universal use by Hindu women, and a name which he constantly found, when in judicial employment in Upper India, to be used in inventories of stolen property and the like. He mentions also that in Sir G. Wilkinson's Egypt, the word is assigned to an Egyptian origin. The alleged Hind. word is unknown to us and to the dictionaries; if used as 'Civilis' believes, it was almost certainly borrowed from the English term.

It is likely enough that the word came from the Archipelago. Jansz's Javanese Dict. gives "ginggang, a sort of striped or chequered East Indian bijwerp," the last word being applied to cotton as well as linen stuffs, equivalent to French toile. The verb ginggang in Javanese is given as meaning to separate, to go away, but this seems to throw no light on the matter; nor can we connect the name with that of a place on the northern coast of Sumatra, a little E. of Acheen, which we have seen written Gingham (see Bennett's Wanderings, ii. 5, 6; also Elmore, Directory to India and China Seas, 1802, pp. 63-64). This place appears prominently as Gingion in a chart by W. Herbert, 1752. Finally, Bluteau gives the following:—

"Gingham. So in some parts of the kingdom (Portugal) they call the excrement of the Silkworm, Bombycis excrementum. Gingão. A certain stuff which is made in the territories of the Mogul. Beirames, guingoens, Canekuis, &c. (Godinho, Viagem da India, 44)."

Wilson gives kindan as the Tamil equivalent of gingham, and perhaps intends to suggest that it is the original of this word. The Tamil Dict. gives "kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered." [The Madras Gloss. gives Can. ginta, Tel. gintena, Tam. kindan, with the meaning of "double-thread texture." The N. E. D., following Scott, Malayan Words in English, 142 seq., accepts the Javanese derivation as given above: "Malay ginggang ... a striped or checkered cotton fabric known to Europeans in the East as 'gingham.' As an adjective, the word means, both in Malay and Javanese, where it seems to be original, 'striped.' The full expression is kâin ginggang, 'striped cloth' (Grasvius). The Tamil 'kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered' (quoted in Yule), cannot be the source of the European forms, nor, I think, of the Malayan forms. It must be an independent word, or a perversion of the Malayan term." On the other hand, Prof. Skeat rejects the Eastern derivation on the ground that "no one explains the spelling. The right explanation is simply that gingham is an old English spelling of Guingamp. See the account of the 'towne of Gynham' in the Paston Letters, ed. Gairdner, iii. 357." (8th ser. Notes and Queries, iv. 386.]

GINGI, JINJEE, &c., n.p. Properly Chenji, [Shenji; and this from Tam. shinjï, Skt. sṛngi, 'a hill']. A once celebrated hill-fortress in S. Arcot, 50 [44] m. N.E. of Cuddalore, 35 m. N.W. from Pondicherry, and at one time the seat of a Mahrañh principality. It played an important part in the wars of the first three-quarters of the 18th century, and was held by the French from 1750 to 1761. The place is now entirely deserted.
GINSENG.

S. A medical root which has an extraordinary reputation in China as a restorative, and sells there at prices ranging from 6 to 400 dollars an ounce. The plant is Aralia Ginseng, Benth. (N.O. Araliaceae). The second word represents the Chinese name Jen-Shen. In the literary style the drug is called simply Shen. And possibly Jen, or Man, has been prefixed on account of the forked radish, man-like aspect of the root. European practitioners do not recognise its alleged virtues. That which is most valued comes from Corea, but it grows also in Mongolia and Manchuria. A kind much less esteemed, the root of Panax quinquefolium, L., is imported into China from America. A very closely-allied plant occurs in the Himalaya, A. Pseudo-Ginseng, Benth. Ginseng is first mentioned by Alv. Semedo (Madrid, 1642). [See Ball, Things Chinese, 266 seq., where Dr. P. Smith seems to believe that it has some medicinal value.]

GIRAFFE, s. English, not Anglo-Indian. Fr. girafe, It. giraffa, Sp. and Port. girafa, old Sp. azorafa, and these from Ar. al-zarafla, a camelopard. The Pers. surndapa, surndapa, seems to be a form curiously divergent of the same word, perhaps nearer the original. The older Italians sometimes make giraffa into seraph. It is not impossible that the latter word, in its biblical use, may be radically connected with giraffe.

The oldest mention of the animal is in the Septuagint version of Deut. xiv. 5, where the word zamdr, rendered in the English Bible 'chamois,' is translated καμηλοπάρδαλις; and so also in the Vulgate camelopardalis, [probably the 'wild goat' of the Targums, not the giraffe (Encycl. Bibl. i. 722)]. We quote some other ancient notices of the animal, before the introduction of the word before us :

c. B.C. 20.—"The animals called camelopards (καμηλοπαρδάλεις) present a mixture of both the animals comprehended in this appellation. In size they are smaller than camels, and shorter in the neck; but in the distinctive form of the head and eyes. In the curvature of the back again they have some resemblance to a camel, but in colour and hair, and in the length of tail, they are like panthers."—Diodorus, ii. 51.

c. A.D. 20.—"Camelleopards (καμηλοπαρδάλεις) are bred in these parts, but they do not in any respect resemble leopards, for their variegated skin is more like the streaked and spotted skin of fallow deer. The hinder quarters are so very much lower than the fore quarters, that it seems as if the animal sat upon its rump. ... It is not, however, a wild animal, but rather like a domesticated beast; for it shows no sign of a savage disposition."—Strabo, Bk. XVII. iv. § 18, E.T. by Hamilton and Falconer.

c. A.D. 210.—Atheneaus, in the description which he quotes of the wonderful procession of Ptolemy Philadephus at Alexandria, besides many other strange creatures, details 130 Ethiope sheep, 20 of Euboea, 12 white kolas, 26 Indian oxen, 8 Aethiopic, a huge white bear, 14 pardales and 16 panthers, 4 lynxes, 3 arketol, one camelopardalis, 1 Ethiopic Rhinoceros.—Bk. V. cap. xxxii.

c. A.D. 520.—"Ευνέπε μου κάκεινα, πολύθρον Μούσα λιγεία, μικτα φότισι θηρών, διχόσανε κεκερασμάν, φώλα, πάραδελν αιολόλυστον ὠμοί ξυνή τε κάμηλην."

Δερή οι οιαγαθ, στικτών δεμας, ονάτα βαϊν, ψυλόν ύπερεθή κάρη, δολιχοί πόδες εὑρέτα ταραθα, κάλων δ' αούκ λοτ μέτρα, πόδες τ' ουδ' πάμπαν ὤμοι, ἄλλ' οι πρόθεν έσαν ἄρελος, ὦ κατάνι ον το πολλόν διλιστὸν ὁπλοίον."—κ. τ. λ.

Oppiani Synnegetica, iii. 461 seqq.

c. 380.—"These also presented gifts, among which besides other things a certain species of animal, of nature both extraordinary and wonderful. In size it was equal to a camel, but the surface of its skin marked with flower-like spots. Its hinder parts and the flanks were low, and like those of a lion, but the shoulders and forelegs and chest were much higher in proportion than the other limbs. The neck was slender, and in regard to the bulk of the rest of the body it was like a swan's throat in its elongation. The head was in form like that of a camel, but in size more than twice that of a Libyan ostrich. Its legs were not moved alternately, but by pairs, those on the right side being moved together, and those on the left together, first one side and then the other. When this creature appeared the whole multitude was struck with astonishment, and its form suggesting a name, it got from the populace, from the most prominent features of its body, the improvised name of camelopardalis."—Heliodorus, Athiophica, x. 27.

c. 940.—"The most common animal in those countries is the giraffe (Zarifa) . . . some consider its origin to be a variety of the camel; others say it is owing to a union of the camel with the panther: others in short that it is a particular and distinct species, like the horse, the ass, or the ox, and not the result of any cross-breed . . . In Persia the giraffe is called Ushtubko (‘camel-cow’). It used to be sent as a present from Nubia to the kings of Persia, as in later days it was sent to the Arab princes, to the first khâlifs of the house of Abbâs, and to the Wâlis of Mîsr . . . The origin of the giraffe has given rise to numerous discussions. It has been noticed that the panther of Nubia attains a great size, whilst the camel of that country is of low stature, with short legs," &c., &c.—Magjidi, iii. 3-5.

c. 1253.—"Entre les autres joauns que il (le Vieil de la Montagne) envoia au Roy, il envoia un olphant de cristal mout bien fait, et que l'on appelle orafe, de cristal aussi."—Joinville, ed. de Wailly, 250.

1271.—"In the month of Jumada II. a female giraffe in the Castle of the Hill (at Cairo) gave birth to a young one, which was nursed by a cow."—Macritzi (by Quatremère), i. pt. 2, 106.

1388.—"Mais bien ont girafes assez qui naissent en leur pays."—Marco Polo, Pantheirs’s ed., p. 701.

1326.—"Vidi in Kadro (Cairo) animal geraffan nomine, in anteriuri parte multum elevatum, longississum collum habens, ita ut de tecto domus communis altitudinis comedere possit. Retro ita demissum est ut dorsum ejus manu hominis tangi possit. Non est ferox animal, sed ad modum jumenti pacificum, colore albo et rubeo pellem habens ordinatissime decoratum."—Gal. de Boldensete, 248-249.

1384.—"Ora racconteremo della giraffa che bestia ella è. La giraffa è fatta quasi come lo struzzolo, salvo che l’imbusto suo non ha penne (‘just like an ostrich, except that it has no feathers on its body!’) anzi ha lanza branchissima . . . ella è veramente a vedere una cosa molto contraffatta."—Simone Sigoli, V. al Monte Saini, 182.

1404.—"When the ambassadors arrived in the city of Khoi, they found in it an ambassador, whom the Sultan of Babylon had sent to Timour Bey. . . . He had also with him 6 rare birds and a beast called jornufa . . ." (then follows a very good description).—Clavijo, by Markham, pp. 80-87.

c. 1430.—"Item, I have also been in Lesser India, which is a fine Kingdom. The capital is called Dily. In this country are many elephants, and animals called surmasa (for surnafe), which is like a stag, but is a tall animal and has a long neck, 4 fathoms in length or longer."—Schiltberger, Hak. Soc. 47.

1471.—"After this was brought forth a giraffe, which they call Giraffa, a beast as long legged as a great horse, or rather more; but the hinder legs are half a foote shorter than the former," &c. (The Italian in Romanüs, ii. f. 102, has "vna Zirapha, la quale essi chiamano Zirnapha ouer Giraffa."—Jomfa Barbero, in Venetauns in Persia, Hak. Soc. 54.

1554.—"Il ne fut onc que les grands seigneurs quelques barbares qu’il aient esté, n’aimassent qu’on leurs presentast les bestes d’estranes pays. Aussi en auons plusieurs au chasteau du Caire . . . entre lesquelies est celle qu’ilz nomment vulgairement Zurnapa."—P. Belon, f. 118. It is remarkable to find Belon adopting this Persian form in Egypt.

GIRJA, s. This is a word for a Christian church, commonly used on the Bengal side of India, from Port. igreja, itself a corruption of ecclesia. Khâfî Khân (c. 1720) speaking of the Portuguese at Hoogly, says they called their places of worship Kâlisa (Elliot, vii. 211). No doubt Kâlisa, as well as igreja, is a form of ecclesia, but the superficial resemblance is small, so it may be suspected that the Muslim writer was speaking from book-knowledge only.

1885.—"It is related that a certain Maulvi, celebrated for the power of his curses, was called upon by his fellow religious to curse a certain church built by the English in close proximity to a Magjid. Anxious to stand well with them, and at the same time not to offend his English rulers, he got out of the difficulty by cursing the building thus:

‘Girjâ ghar! Girjâ ghar! Girjâ!’

(i.e.) ‘Fall down, house! Fall down, house! Fall down!’ or simply ‘Church-house! Church-house! Church!’

—W. J. D’Gryeuth, in Panjab Notes and Queries, ii. 125.
The word is also in use in the Indian Archipelago:

1885.— "The village (of Wai in the Moluccas) is laid out in rectangular plots. . . . One of its chief edifices is the Gredja, whose grandeur quite overwhelmed us; for it is far more elaborately decorated than many a rural parish church at home."—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 294.

GOA, n.p. Properly Gowa, Gova, Mahr. Goven, [which the Madras Gloss. connects with Skt. go, 'a cow,' in the sense of the 'cowherd country']. The famous capital of the Portuguese dominions in India since its capture by Albuquerque in 1510. In earlier history and geography the place appears under the name of Sindabur or Sandabur (Sundapiir?) (q.v.). Govā or Kava was an ancient name of the southern Konkan (see in H. H. Wilson's Works, Vishnu Purana, ii. 164, note 20). We find the place called by the Turkish admiral Sidi 'Ali Gowai-Sandabur, which may mean "Sandabur of Gova."

1391.—In a copper grant of this date (S. 1313) we have mention of a chief city of Kankan (see CONCAN) called Gowa and Govātpura. See the grant as published by Major Legrand Jacob in J. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. iv. 107. The translation is too loose to make it worth while to transcribe a quotation; but it is interesting as mentioning the reconquest of Goa from the T erwokkas, i.e. Turks or foreign Mahommedans. We know from Ibn Batuta that Mahommedan settlers at Hunāwar had taken the place about 1344.

1510 (but referring to some years earlier). "I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island which is about a mile distant from the mainland and is called Goga. . . . In this island there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain who is called Savaui, who has 400 men-hukes, he himself being also a maneluke."—Varthema, 115-116.

c. 1520.—"In the Island of Tisovry, in which is situated the city of Goa, there are 31 aldeas, and these are as follows. . . ."—In Arché. Port. Orient., fasc. 5.

c. 1554.—"At these words (addressed by the Vizir of Guzerat to a Portuguese Envoy) my wrath broke out, and I said: 'Malediction! You have found me with my fleet gone to wreck, but please God in his mercy, before long, under favour of the Fādshāh, you shall be driven not only from Hormuz, but from Diu and Gowa too!"—Sidi 'Ali Kapudān, in J. Asia. Ser. 1. tom. ix. 70.

1602.—"The island of Goa is so old a place that one finds nothing in the writings of the Canaras (to whom it always belonged) about the beginning of its population. But we find that it was always so frequented by strangers that they used to have a proverbial saying: 'Let us go and take our ease among the cool shades of Goa moat,' which in the old language of the country means 'the cool fertile land.'"—Couto, IV. x. cap. 4.

1648.—"All those that have seen Europe and Asia agree with me that the Port of Goa, the Port of Constantiopoli, and the Port of Toulon, are three of the fairest Ports of all our vast continent."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 74; [ed. Ball, i. 186].

GOA PLUM. The fruit of Parinari exsulsum, introduced at Goa from Mozambique, called by the Portuguese Matomba. "The fruit is almost pure brown sugar in a paste" (Birdwood, M.S.).

GOA POTATO. Dioscorea aculeata (Birdwood, M.S.).

GOA POWDER. This medicine, which in India is procured from Goa only, is invaluable in the virulent eczema of Bombay, and other skin diseases. In eczema it sometimes acts like magic, but smartly like the cutting of a knife. It is obtained from Andira Araroba (N.O. Leguminosae), a native (we believe) of S. America. The active principle is Chrysophanic acid (Commn. from Sir G. Birdwood).

GOA STONE. A factitious article which was in great repute for medical virtues in the 17th century. See quotation below from Mr. King. Sir G. Birdwood tells us it is still sold in the Bombay Bazar.

1673.—"The Paulistines enjoy the biggest of all the Monasteries at St. Roch; in it is a Library, an Hospital, and an Apothecary's Shop well furnished with Medicines, where Gasper Antonio, a Florentine, a Lay-Brother of the Order, the Author of the Goa-Stones, brings them in 50,000 Xerephins, by that invention annually; he is an Old Man, and almost Blind."—Fryer, 149-150.

1690.—"The double excellence of this Stone (snake-stone) recommends its worth very highly . . . and much excels the deservedly famed Gasper Antonio, or Goa Stone."—Ovington, 262.

1711.—"Goa Stones or Pedra de Gasper Antonio, are made by the Jesuits here: They are from 3 to 8 Ounces each; but the Sise makes no Difference in the Price: We bought 11 Ounces for 20 Ruppes. They are often counterfeited, but 'tis an easy Matter for one who has seen the right Sort, to dis-GODAVERY, n.p. Skt. Godavari, ‘giving kine.’ Whether this name of northern etymology was a corruption of some indigenous name we know not. [The Dravidian name of the river is Goday (Tel. gode, ‘limit’), of which the present name is possibly a corruption.] It is remarkable how the Godavery is ignored by writers and map-makers till a comparatively late period, with the notable exception of D. João de Castro, in a work, however, not published till 1843. Barros, in his trace of the coasts of the Indies (Dec. I. ix. cap. 1), mentions Godavari as a place adjoining a cape of the same name (which appears in some much later charts as C. Gordewar), but takes no notice of the great river, so far as we are aware, in any part of his history. Linschoten also speaks of the Ponto de Guadovery, but not of the river. Nor does his map show the latter, though showing the Kistna distinctly. The small general map of the Ganges Delta, in ‘Cambridge’s Acc. of the War in India,’ 1761, confounds the sources of the Godavery with those of the Mahanadi (of Orissa) and carries the latter on to combine with the western rivers of the Ganges Delta. This was evidently the prevailing view until Rennell published the first edition of his Memoir (1783), in which he writes:

"The Godavery river, or Gonga Godowry, commonly called Gangao in European maps, and sometimes Gango in Indian histories, has generally been represented as the same river with that of Cattack.

"As we have no authority that I can find for supposing it, the opinion must have been taken up, on a supposition that there was no opening between the mouths of the Kistna and Mahanadee (or Cattack river) of magnitude sufficient for such a river as the Ganges; and the latter, in the maps (p. 147) [also in ed. 1744], as to this error see also a quotation from D’Anville under KEDGEREE. It is probable that what that geographer says in his Éclaircissements, p. 135, that he had no real idea of the Godavery. That name occurs in his book only as "la pointe de Gandewari." This point, he says, is about E.N.E. of the "river of Narsapur," at a distance of about 12 leagues; "it is a low land, intersected by several rivers, forming the mouths of which the maps, esteemed to be most correct, call Wensonr; and the river of Narsapur is itself one of those arms, according to a MS. map in my possession." Narsaparam is the name of a taluk on the westernmost delta branch, or Vasishta Godavari [see Morris, Map. of Godavery Dist., 1853]. Wenson appears on a map in Baldaeus (1672), as the most northern of the two mouths of the Eastern or Gautami Godavari, entering the sea near Coringa. It is perhaps the same name as Tajaram on that branch, where there was an English Factory for many years.

In the next map of "Regionum Choromandel, Golconda, et Oria," which is in Baldaeus (1672), there is no indication of it whatever except as a short inlet from the sea called Gondewary.

1538.—"The noblest rivers of this province (Daquem or Deccan) are six in number, to wit: Crusna (Krishna), in many places known as Hinapor, because it passes by a city of this name (Hindapar?); Bivra (read Bima?); these two rivers join on the borders of the Deccan and the land of Canara (q.v.), and after traversing great depths of the sea in the Gulf of Cambay; Malapar (Malparhada?); Guodavam (read Godudavari) otherwise called Gangua; Purnadi; Tapi. Of these the Malapar enters the sea in the Oria territory, and so does the Guodavam; but Purnadi and Tapi enter the Gulf of Cambay at different points."—João de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro da Costa da Índia, pp. 6, 7.
GODOWN. 381

GODOWN. 8. A warehouse for goods and stores; an outbuilding used for stores; a store-room. The word is in constant use in the Chinese ports as well as in India. The H. and Beng. gudam is apparently an adoption of the Anglo-Indian word, not its original. The word appears to have passed to the continent of India from the eastern settlements, where the Malay word gadong is used in the same sense of 'store-room,' but also in that of 'a house built of brick or stone.' Still the word appears to have come primarily from the South of India, where in Telugu gidangi, giddangi, in Tamil kidang, signify a place where goods lie, from kidu, 'to lie.' It appears in Singhalæse also as gudâma. It is a fact that many common Malay and Javanese words are Tamil, or only to be explained by Tamil. Free intercourse between the Coromandel Coast and the Archipelago is very ancient, and when the Portuguese first appeared at Malacca they found there numerous settlers from S. India (see s.v. KLING). Bluteau gives the word as palavra da India, and explains it as a "logea quasi debaixo de chão" ("almost underground"), but this is seldom the case.

[1513.—"... in which all his rice and a Gudam full of mace was burned."—Letter of F. P. Andrade to Albuquerque, Feb. 22, India Office, MSS. Corpo Chronologico, vol. I.]

[1552.—"At night secretly they cleared their Gudams, which are rooms almost under ground, for fear of fire."—Barros, Dec. II. Bk. vi. ch. 3.]

[1552.—"... and ordered them to plunder many godowns (gudoes) in which there was such abundance of clove, nutmeg, mace, and sandal wood, that our people could not transport it all till they had called in the people of Malacca to complete its removal."—Castañeda, iii. 276-7.]

[1561.—"... Godouns (Gudoes), which are strong houses of stone, having the lower part built with lime."—Corret, ii. 236. (The last two quotations refer to events in 1511.)

[1570.—"... but the merchants have all one house or Magazine, which house they call Godon, which is made of bricks."—Cesár Frederik, in Hakt.

[1585.—"In the Palace of the King (at Pegu) are many magazines both of gold and of silver. ... Sandalwood, and lign-aloes, and all such things, have their gottons (gottoni), which is as much as to say separate chambers."—Gusparo Balbi, f. 111.

[c. 1612.—"... if I did not he would take away from me the key of the gadong."—Danvers, Letters, i. 195.]

[1613.—"As fortalezas e fortificações de Malayos ordinariamente erão aedificios de madeira, no qual de havia muitas casas e armeryas ou godones que são aedificios sobterrâneos, em que os mercadores recolhem as roupas de Choromandel e il perigo do fogo."—Godinho de Eредia, 22.

[1615.—"We paid Jno. Dono 70 taies or plate of brass in full payment of the fee symple of the gadon congested over the way, to westward of English house, whereof 100 taies was paid before."—Cocks's Diary, i. 39; [in i. 15 gedone].

[ ] "An old ruined brick house or godung."—Foster, Letters, iii. 109.

[ ] "The same goods to be locked up in the gadones."—Ibid. iii. 159.]

[1634.—"Virão das ruas as secretas minas * * * * *

Das abrazadas casas as ruinas, E das riquezas os gudões desertos,"

Malacca Conquistada, x. 61.

[1680.—"Rent Rowe of Dwelling Houses, Goedowns, etc., within the Garrison in Christian Town."—In Wheeler, i. 253-4.

[1683.—"I went to ye Bankshall to mark out and appoint a Plat of ground to build a Godown for ye Honble. Company's Salt Petre."—Hedges, Diary, March 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].

GODOWN. 8. An absurd corruption which used to be applied by our countrymen in the old settlements in the Malay countries to the young women of the land. It is Malay godis, 'a virgin.'

c. 1772.—

"And then how strange, at night oppressed
By toils, with songs you're lulled to rest;
Of rural goddesses the guest, Delightful!"

W. Marsden, in Memoirs, 14.

1784.—"A lad at one of these entertainments, asked another his opinion of a gadéeses who was then dancing. 'If she were plated with gold,' replied he, 'I would not take her for my concubine, much less for my wife.'"—Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 230.

GODDESS, s. An absurd corruption which used to be applied by our countrymen in the old settlements in the Malay countries to the young women of the land. It is Malay godis, 'a virgin.'

c. 1590.—"Here (in Berar) are rivers in abundance; especially the Ganga of Gotam, which they also call Godovâri. The Ganga of Hindustan they dedicate to Mahadeo, but this Ganga to Gotam. And they tell wonderful legends of it, and pay it great adoration. It has its springs in the Sahyâ Hills near Trimbak, and passing through the Wilayat of Ahmadnagar, enters Berâr and thence flows on to Thîngâna."—Abû-i-Akbar (orig.) i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228.]

We may observe that the most easterly of the Delta branches of the Godavery is still called Gautami.
1696.—"Monday, 3rd August. The Choultry Justices having produced examinations by them concerning the murder of a child in the Black town, and the robbing of a godown within the walls:—it is ordered that the Judge-Advocate do cause a session to be held on Tuesday the 11th for the trial of the criminals."—Official Memorandum, in Wheeler, i. 303.

[1800.—"The cook-room and Zodoun at the Laul Bung are covered in."—Welling-on, i. 66.

1809.—"The Black Hole is now part of a godown or warehouse: it was filled with goods, and I could not see it."—Ld. Valen-tia, i. 237.

1880.—"These 'Godowns'. . . are one of the most marked features of a Japanese town, both because they are white where all else is gray, and because they are solid where all else is perishable."—Misa Bird's Japan, i. 264.

GOGLET, GUGLET. s. A water-bottle, usually earthenware, of globular body with a long neck, the same as what is called in Bengal more commonly a surahi (see SERAL, b., KOOZA). This is the usual form now; the article described by Linschoten and Pyrard, with a sort of cullender mouth and pebbles shut inside, was somewhat different. Corrupted from the Port, gorgoleta, the name of such a vessel.
The French have also in this sense gargoulette, and a word gargouille, our medieval gargoyle; all derivations from gorga, gargie, gorge, 'the throat,' found in all the Romance tongues. Tom Cringle shows that the word is used in the W. Indies.

1598.—"These cruises are called Gorgoletta."—Linschoten, 60; [Hak. Soc. i. 207].

1599.—In Debrý, vii. 23, the word is written Gorgolane.

1610.—"Il y a une pièce de terre fort delicate, et toute percée de petits trous façonnés, et au dedans y a de petites pierres qui ne peuvent sortir, c'est pour nettoyer le vasse. Ils appellent cela gargoulette: l'eau n'en sort que peu à la fois."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 43; [Hak Soc. ii. 74, and see i.
329].

1616.—"... 6 Gorgoletas."—Foster,
Letters, iv. 198.

1648.—"They all drink out of Gorgulan, that is out of a Pot with a Spout, without setting the Mouth thereto."—T. Van Spil-bergen's Voyage, 37.

1670.—"Quand on est à la maison on a des Gourgulettes ou aiguiffres d'une certaine pierre poreuse."—Bernier (ed. Amst.),
i. 214; [and comp. ed. Constable, 356].

1688.—"L'on donne à chacun de ceux que leur malheur conduit dans ces saintes prisons, un pot de terre plein d'eau pour se laver, un autre plus propre de ceux qu'on appelle Gurgueltas, aussi plein d'eau pour boire."—Delon, Rel. de l'Inquisition de Goa, 135.

c. 1690.—"The Siamese, Malays, and Macassar people have the art of making from the larger coco-nut shells most elegant drinking vessels, cups, and those other receptacles for water to drink called Gorgulolla, which they set with silver, and which no doubt by the ignorant are supposed to be made of the precious Maldive cocos.
—Remphius, i. iii.

1698.—"The same way they have of cooling their Liquors, by a wet cloth wrapped about their Gurgueltas and Jars, which are vessels made of a porous Kind of Earth."—Fryer, 47.

1726.—"However, they were much aston-hished that the water in the Gorgoletas in that tremendous heat, especially out of doors, was found quite cold."—Valentijn, Choro. 59.

1766.—"I perfectly remember having said that it would not be amiss for General Curnac to have a man with a Goglet of water ready to pour on his head, whenever he should begin to grow warm in debate.
In Long, 406.

1829.—"Dressing in a hurry, find the drunk a bheesty . . . has mistaken your boot for the goglet in which you carry your water on the line of march."—Skipp's Memoirs, ii. 149.

c. 1830.—"I was not long in finding a bottle of very tolerable rum, some salt junk, some biscuit, and a goglet, or porous earthen jar of water, with some capital cigars."— Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 152.

1852.—"Murwan sent for a woman named Joada, and handing her some virulent poison folded up in a piece of paper, said, 'If you can throw this into Hussun's gugget, he on drinking a mouthful or two of water will instantly bring up his liver piece-meal.'"— Herklotz, Quassou-E-Islam, 156.

1855.—"To do it (gild the Rangoon Pagoda) they have enveloped the whole in an extraordinary scaffolding of bamboos, which looks as if they had been enclosing the pagoda in basketwork to keep it from breaking, as you would do with a water-goglet for a ddk journey."—In Blackwood's Mag., May, 1856.

GOGO, GOGA. n.p. A town on the inner or eastern shore of Kattywar Peninsula, formerly a seaport of some importance, with an anchorage sheltered by the Isle of Peram (the Betram of the quotation from Ibn Batuta). Gogo appears in the Catalan map of 1375.
Two of the extracts will show how this unhappy city used to suffer at the hands of the Portuguese. Gogo is now superseded to a great extent by Bau-nagar, 8 m. distant.

1321.—"Dated from Caga the 12th day of October, in the year of the Lord 1321."
Letter of Fr. Jordanus, in Cathay, &c. i. 228.

c. 1343.—"We departed from Beiram and arrived next day at the city of Kuka, which is large, and possesses extensive bazaars. We anchored 4 miles off because of the ebb tide."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 60.

1353.—"The Governor (Nuno da Cunha)
... took counsel to order a fleet to remain behind to make war upon Cambaya, leaving Antonio de Saldanha with 50 sail, to wit: 4 galleons, and the rest galleys and galoots, and rowing-vessels of the King's, with some private ones eager to remain, in the greed for prize. And in this fleet there stayed 1000 men with good will for the plunder before them, and many honoured gentlemen and captains. And running up the Gulf they came to a city called Goga, peopled by rich merchants; and the fleet entering by the river ravaged by fire and sword, slaying many people. ..."—Correa, iii. 418.

[c. 1590.—"Ghogeh." See under SUR-ATH.]

1602.—"... the city of Goga, which was one of the largest and most opulent in traffic, wealth and power of all those of Cambaya. ... This city lies almost at the head of the Gulf, on the western side, spreading over a level plain, and from certain ruins of buildings still visible, seems to have been in old times a very great place, and under the dominion of certain foreigners."—Couto, IV. vii. cap. 5.

1614.—"The passage across from Surrate to Goga is very short, and so the three fleets, starting at 4 in the morning, arrived there at nightfall. ... The next day the Portuguese returned ashore to burn the city ... and entering the city they set fire to it in all quarters, and it began to blaze with such fury that there was burnt a great quantity of merchandise (fazendas de porte), which was a huge loss to the Moors. ...
After the burning of the city they abode there 3 days, both captains and soldiers content with the abundance of their booty, and the fleet stood for D'ia, taking, besides the goods that were on board, many boats in tow laden with the same."—Bocarro, Decada, 333.

[c. 1660.—"A man on foot going by land to a small village named the Gauges, and from thence crossing the end of the Gulf, can go from D'ia to Surat in four or five days. ..."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 37.]

1727.—"Goga is a pretty large Town ... has some Trade. ... It has the Conveniences of a Harbour for the largest Ships, though they lie dry on soft Mud at low Water."—A. Hamilton, i. 143.

GOGOLLA, GOGALA, n.p. This is still the name of a village on a peninsular sandy spit of the mainland, opposite to the island and fortress of Diu, and formerly itself a fort. It was known in the 16th century as the Villa dos Rumes, because Melique Az (Malik Ayáz, the Mahom. Governor), not much trusting the Rumes (i.e. the Turkish Mercenaries), "or willing that they should be within the Fortress, sent them to dwell there." (Barros, II. iii. cap. 6).

1525.—"Paga dyo e gogolla a el Rey de Cambaya tres layques em tangas ... xij laires."—Lembrança, 34.

1538.—In Botelho, Tombo, 230, 239, we find "Alfandega de Guoguala." 1539.—"... terminating in a long and narrow tongue of sand, on which stands a fort which they call Gogala, and the Portuguese the Villa dos Rumes. On the point of this tongue the Portuguese made a beautiful round bulwark."—João de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, p. 218.

7 GOLAH, s. Hind. golã (from gol, 'round'). A store-house for grain or salt; so called from the typical form of such store-houses in many parts of India, viz. a circular wall of mud with a conical roof. [One of the most famous of these is the Golã at Patna, completed in 1786, but never used.]

[1785.—"We visited the Gola, a building intended for a public granary."—In Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 415.]

1810.—"The golah, or warehouse."—
Williamson, V. M., ii. 343.

1875.—"The villagers, who were really in want of food, and maddened by the sight of those golahs stored with grain, could not resist the temptation to help themselves."— Life in the Mufussil, ii. 77.

GOLD MOHUR FLOWER, s.
Caesalpinia pulcherrima, Sw. The name is a corruption of the H. gulmor, which is not in the dictionaries, but is said to mean 'peacock-flower.'

[1877.—"The crowd began to press to the great Gold-mohur tree."—Allardyce, City of Sunshine, iii. 207.]

GOLE, s. The main body of an army in array; a clustered body of troops; an irregular squadron of horsemen. P.—H. ghol; perhaps a confusion with the Arab. faul (gaul), 'a troop': but Platts connects it with Skt. kula, 'an assemblage'.

Berânghar and Sawânghar ... and are not included in the centre which they call ghâl, the right and left do not belong to the ghâl."—Babar, 227.
GOMBROON.

1803. — "When within reach, he fired a few rounds, on which I formed my men into two gholes. . . . Both gholes attempted to turn his flanks, but the men behaved ill, and we were repulsed." — Skinner, Mil. Mem. i. 298.

1849. — "About this time a large gale of horsemen came on towards me, and I proposed to charge; but as they turned at once from the fire of the guns, and as there was a nullah in front, I refrained from advancing after them." — Brigadier Lockwood, Report of 2nd Cavalry Division at Battle of Gogorri.

GOMASTA, GOMASHTAH. s. Hind. from Pers. gumashtah, part. appointed, delegated. A native agent or factor. In Madras the modern application is to a clerk for vernacular correspondence.

1747. — "As for the Salem Cloth they beg leave to defer settling any Price for that sort till they can be advised from the Goa Masters (!) in that Province." — Ft. St. David Cons., May 11. MS. Records in India Office.

1762. — "You will direct the gentleman, Gomastahs, Mattasvddies (see MOOT-SUDY), and Mooshtes, and other officers of the English Company to relinquish their farms, taluques (see TALOOK), gunges, and golahs." — The Nabob to the Governor, in Van Sittart, i. 229.

1776. — "The Magistrate shall appoint some one person his gomastah or Agent in each Town." — Hoth's Code, 55.

1778. — "The Company determining if possible to restore their investment to the former condition . . . sent gomastahs, or Gentoo factors in their own pay." — Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 57.

C. 1755. — "I wrote an order to my gomastah in the factory of Hughly." — Carraccioli's Life of Clive, iii. 448.

1817. — "The banyan hires a species of broker, called a Gomastah, at so much a month." — Milti's Hist. iii. 13.

1837. — "... (The Rajah) sent us a very good breakfast; when we had eaten it, his gomasahta (a sort of secretary, at least more like that than anything else) came to say . . ." — Letters from Madras, 128.

GOMBROON, n.p. The old name in European documents of the place on the Persian Gulf now known as Bandar 'Abbas, or 'Abbâst. The latter name was given to it when Shah 'Abbâs, after the capture and destruction of the island city of Hormuz, established a port there. The site which he selected was the little town of Gamrin. This had been occupied by the Portuguese, who took it from the 'King of Lar' in 1612, but two years later it was taken by the Shâh.

The name is said (in the Geog. Magazine, i. 17) to be Turkish, meaning 'a Custom House.' The word alluded to is probably gumrûk, which has that meaning, and which is again, through Low Greek, from the Latin commercium. But this etymology of the name seems hardly probable. That indicated in the extract from A. Hamilton below is from Pers. kamrûn, 'a shrimp,' or Port. camarâo, meaning the same.

The first mention of Gombroon in the E. I. Papers seems to be in 1616, when Edmund Connok, the Company's chief agent in the Gulf, calls it "Gomboon, the best port in all Persia," and "that hopeful and glorious port of Gombroon" (Stainbury, i. 484-5; [Foster, Letters, iv. 264]). There was an English factory here soon after the capture of Hormuz, and it continued to be maintained in 1759, when it was taken by the Comte d'Estaing. The factory was re-established, but ceased to exist a year or two after.

1614. — (The Captain-major) "under orders of Dom Luis da Gama returned to succour Comorão, but found the enemy's fleet already there and the fort surrendered... News which was heard by Dom Luis da Gama and most of the people of Ormuz in such way as might be expected, some of the old folks of Ormuz prognosticating at once that in losing Comorão Ormuz itself would be lost before long, seeing that the former was like a barbican or outwork on which the rage of the Persian enemy spent itself, giving time to Ormuz to prepare against their coming thither." — Bocarro, Decada, 349.

1622. — "That evening, at two hours of the night, we started from below that fine tree, and after travelling about a league and a half... we arrived here in Combrû, a place of decent size and population on the sea-shore, which the Persians now-a-days, laying aside as it were the old name, call the 'Port of Abbas,' because it was wrested from the Portuguese, who formerly possessed it, in the time of the present King Abbas." — P. della Valle, ii. 413; [in Hak. Soc. i. 3, he calls it Combu].

C. 1630. — "Gumbrown (or Gormoon, as some pronounce it) is by most Persians Kar' ğeşrîn' called Bandar or the Port Towne... some (but I commend them not) write it Gomrou, others Gormou, and other-some Gommeroon... A Towne it is of no Antiquity, rising daily out of the ruins of late glorious (now most wretched) Ormus." — Sir T. Herbert, 121.
1673.—"The Sailors had stigmatized this place of its Excessive Heat, with this sarcastical Saying, That there was but an Inch-Deal between Gomeroon and Hell."—Fryer, 224.

Fryer in another place (marginal rubric, p. 331) says: "Gomeroon, made of Earth, the best next China." Was this one of the sites of manufacture of the Persian porcelain now so highly prized? ["The main varieties of this Perso-Chinese ware are the following:—(1) A sort of semi-porcelain, called by English dealers, quite without reason, 'Gomeroon ware,' which is pure white and semi-transparent, but, unlike Chinese porcelain, is soft and friable where not protected by the glaze."—Ency. Brit. 9th ed. xix. 621.]

1727.—"This Gomeroon was formerly a Fishing Town, and when Shaw Abas began to build it, had its Appellation from the Portuguese, in Derision, because it was a good place for catching Prawns and Shrimps, which they call Camerong."—A. Hamilton, i. 92; [ed. 1744, i. 93].

1762.—"As this officer (Comte d'Estaing) ... broke his parole by taking and destroying our settlements at Gomeroon, and upon the west Coast of Sumatra, at a time when he was still a prisoner of war, we have laid before His Majesty a true state of the case."—In Long, 283.

GOMUTÍ, s. Malay gumutí [Scott gives gumáti]. A substance resembling horsehair, and forming excellent cordage (the cabos negros of the Portuguese—Marre, Kata-Kata Malayou, p. 92), sometimes improperly called coir (q.v.), which is produced by a palm growing in the Archipelago, Arenga saccharifera, Labill. (Borassus Gomutus, Lour.). The tree also furnishes kalams or reed-pens for writing, and the material for the poisoned arrows used with the blow-tube. The name of the palm itself in Malay is anau. (See SAGWIRE.) There is a very interesting account of this palm in Rumphius, Herb. Amb., i. pl. xiii. Dampier speaks of the fibre thus:

1856.—"... There is another sort of Coire cables ... that are black, and more strong and lasting, and are made of Strings that grow like Horse-hair at the Heads of certain Trees, almost like the Coco-trees. This sort comes mostly from the Island of Timor."—1. 295.

GONG, s. This word appears to be Malay (or, according to Crawford, originally Javanese), gong or agong. ["The word gong is often said to be Chinese. Clifford and Swettenham so mark it; but no one seems to be able to point out the Chinese original." (Scott, Malayen Words in English, 53.)

Its well-known application is to a disk of thin bell-metal, which when struck with a mallet, yields musical notes, and is used in the further east as a substitute for a bell. ["The name gong, agong, is considered to be imitative or suggestive of the sound which the instrument produces" (Scott, loc. cit. 51).] Marcel Devie says that the word exists in all the languages of the Archipelago; [for the variants see Scott, loc. cit.]. He defines it as meaning "instrument de musique aussi appelé tam-tam"; but see under TOM-TOM. The great drum, to which Dampier applies the name, was used like the metallic gong for striking the hour. Systems of gongs variously arranged form harmonious musical instruments among the Burmese, and still more elaborately among the Javanese.

The word is commonly applied by Anglo-Indians also to the H. ghantä (qanta, Dec.) or ghärī, a thicker metal disc, not musical, used in India for striking the hour (see GHURRY). The gong being used to strike the hour, we find the word applied by Fryer (like gurry) to the hour itself, or interval denoted.

c. 1590.—"In the morning before day the Generall did strike his Gonge, which is an instrument of War that soundeth like a Bell."—(This was in Africa, near Benguela. Adent. of Andrew Batell, in Purrac., ii. 970.)

1673.—"They have no Watches nor Hour-Glasses, but measure Time by the dropping of Water out of a Brass Bason, which holds a Ghon, or less than half an Hour; when they strike once distinctly, to tell them it's the First Ghon, which is renewed at the Second Ghon for Two, and so Three at the End of it till they come to Eight; when they strike on [the Brass Vessel] at their liberty to give notice the Pore (see PUIRUR) is out, and at last strike One leisurely to tell them it is the First Pore."—Fryer, 186.

1686.—"In the Sultan's Mosque (at Mindanao) there is a great Drum with but one Head, called a Gong; which is instead of a Clock. This Gong is beaten at 12 a Clock, at 3, 6, and 9."—Dampier, i. 333.

1726.—"These gongs (gongen) are beaten very gently, at the time when the Prince is going to make his appearance."—Valentijn, iv. 58.

1750-52.—"Besides these (in China) they have little drums, great and small kettle drums, gungungs or round brass basons like frying pans."—Olef Toreen, 248.

1817.—"War music bursting out from time to time with gong and tymbalon's tremendous chime."—Lalla Roogh, Mokanna. Tremendous sham poetry!
GOODRY, s. A quilt; H. gudri, [The gudri, as distinguished from the razi (see ROZYE), is the bundle of rags on which Fakirs and the very poorest people sleep.]

1598.—"They make also faire couerlits, which they call Godorins [or] Colchas, which are very faire and pleasant to the eye, stitched with silke; and also of cotton of all colours and stitchinges."—Linschoten, ch. 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 61.]

c. 1610.—"Les matelats et les couvertures sont de soye ou de toile de coton faconnee a toutes sortes de figures et couleur. Ils appellent cela. Gouldrins."—Puyard de Laval, ii 3; [Hak. Soc. ii. 4.]

1653.—"Goudrin est vn terme Indou et Portugais, qui signifie des couvertures piequees de cotton."—De la Boullaye-Le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 539.

1819.—"He directed him to go to his place, and take a godhra of his (a kind of old patched counterpane of shreds, which Fuqueers frequently have to lie down upon and throw over their shoulders)."—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 113.

GOOGUL, s. H. gugal, guggul, Skt. guggula, guggulu. The aromatic gum-resin of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker (Amyris ayallocha, Roxb.), the mukl of the Arabs, and generally supposed to be the bdellium of the ancients. It is imported from the Beyla territory, west of Sind (see Bo. Govt. Selections (N.S.), No. xvii. p. 326).

1525.—(Prices at Cambay). "Gugall d'orummuz (the maund), 16 fedeas."—Lembrança, 43.

1813.—"Gogul is a species of bitumen much used at Bombay and other parts of India, for painting the bottom of ships."—Milburn, i. 197.

GOOJUR, n.p. H. Gôjur, Skt. Guj- jara. The name of a great Hindu clan, very numerous in tribes and in population over nearly the whole of Northern India, from the Indus to Rohilkhand. In the Delhi territory and the Doab they were formerly notorious for thieving propensities, and are still much addicted to cattle-theft; and they are never such steady and industrious cultivators as the Jats, among whose villages they are so largely interspersed. In the Punjab they are Mahommedans. Their extensive diffusion is illustrated by their having given name to Gujarât (see GOOZERAT) as well as to Gujrât and Gujarâmeda in the Punjab. And during the 18th century a great part of Sahâranpur District in the Northern Doab was also called Gujrât (see Elliot's Races, by Beaumes, i. 99 seq.).

1519.—"In the hill-country between Nilâb and Behreh... and adjoining to the hill-country of Kashmir, are the Jats, Gujar, and many other men of similar tribes."—Memoirs of Baber, 250.

1785.—"The road is infested by tribes of banditti called googurs and mewatties."—In Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. II. 426.

G O O L A I L , s. A pellet-bow. H. gulet, probably from Skt. guda, gula, the pellet used. [It is the Arabic Kaus-al-bandâk, by which using the unlucky Prince in the First Kalandar's Tale got into trouble with the Wazir (Burton, Arab. Nights, i. 98.).]

1560.—Busbeek speaks of being much annoyed with the multitude and impudence of kites at Constantinople: "ego interim cum manuitali balista post columnam sto, modo hujus, modo illius caudaee vel alarum, ut casus tulerit, pinnas testaceis globis verberans, donec mortifero ietu unam aut alteram percessam dedit."..."—Busbeek, Epist. iii. p. 169.

[c. 1590.—"From the general use of pellet bows which are fitted with bowstrings, sparrowes are very scarce (in Kashmir)."—Jtn, ed. Javrett, ii. 351. In the original kamaa-i-guraha, guraha, according to Steingass, Dict., being "a ball...ball for a cannon, balista, or cross-bow."]

1600.—"O for a stone-bow to hit him in the eye."—Twelfth Night, ii. 5.

1611.—"Children will shortly take him for a wall, And set their stone-bows in his forehead."—Beaum. & Flot., A King and No King, V.

[1870.—"The Gooleil-bans, or pellet-bow, generally used as a weapon against cows, is capable of inflicting rather severe injuries."—Cheevers, Ind. Med. Jurisprudence, 387.]

GOOLMAUL, G O O L M O O L , s. H. got-mâl, 'confusion, jumble'; got-mâl karnâ, 'to make a mess.'

1877.—"The boy has made such a gomol (uppour) about religion that there is a risk in having anything to do with him."—Allardyce, City of Sunshine, ii. 106.

[GOOMTEE, n.p. A river of the N.W.F., rising in the Shâhjâhanpûr District, and flowing past the cities of Lucknow and Jaunpur, and joining the Ganges between Benares and} Ghazipur. The popular derivation of the name, as in the quotation, is, as if Ghāmtī, from H. ghāmtā, 'to wind,' in allusion to its winding course. It is really from Skt. gomāti, 'rich in cattle.'

[1848.—"The Ghantī, which takes its name from its windings . . ."—Buyers, Recoll. of N. India, 240.]

Q GOONT, s. H. gānth, gāth. A kind of pony of the N. Himalayas, strong but clumsy.

c. 1590.—"In the northern mountainous districts of Hindustan a kind of small but strong horses is bred, which is called gūt; and in the confines of Bengal, near Kich, another kind of horses occurs, which rank between the gūt and Turkish horses, and are called tāngan (see TANGUN); they are strong and powerful."—Am, i. 183; [also see li. 290.]

1609.—"On the further side of Ganges lyeth a very mighty Prince, called Rośāw Rōdonow, holding a mountainous Country . . . thence commeth much Muske, and heere is a great breed of such kind of Horse, called Gants, a true travelling scale-cliff beast."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 438.

1831.—"In Cashmere I shall buy, not with regard to price, the best ghounite in Tibet."—Jacquemont's Letters, E.T. i. 298.

1838.—"Give your gûnth his head and he will carry you safely . . . any horse would have struggled, and been killed; these gûnths appear to understand that they must be quiet, and their master will help them."—Fossey Parkes, Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 226.

GOORKA, GOORKALLY, n.p. H. Gurkhā, Gurkhātī. The name of the race now dominant in Nepal, and taking their name from a town so called 53 miles W. of Kathmandu. [The name is usually derived from the Skt. go-ra-kṣa, 'cow-keeper.' For the early history see Wright, H. of Nepal, 147]. They are probably the best soldiers of modern India, and several regiments of the Anglo-Indian army are recruited from the tribe.

1767.—"I believe, Sir, you have before been acquainted with the situation of Nipal, which has long been besieged by the Goor-cully Rajah."—Letter from Chief at Patna, in Long, 526.

[. . . "The Rajah being now possessed of his country, and shut up in his capital by the Rajah of Goercullah, the usual channel of commerce has been obstructed."—Letter from Council to E.I. Co., in Verdist, View of Bengal, App. 36.]

GOOROO, s. H. guru, Skt. guru; a spiritual teacher, a (Hindu) priest.

(Ancient).—"That brahman is called guru who performs according to rule the rites on conception and the like, and feeds (the child) with rice (for the first time)."—Manu, ii. 142.

c. 1550.—"You should do as you are told by your parents and your Guru."—Rāmāyana of Tulśi Dās, by Groose (1878), 43.

[1567.—"Grous." See quotation under CASIS.]

1626.—"There was a famous Prophet of the Ethnikos, named Goru."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 520.

1700.—". . . je suis fort surpris de voir à la porte . . . le Pénitent au couloir qui demandait à parler au Goorou."—Letters Edif., ii. 95.

1810.—"Persons of this class often keep little schools . . . and then are designated gooroo; a term implying that kind of respect we entertain for pastors in general."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 317.

1822.—"The Adventures of the Gooroo Paramartan; a tale in the Tamul Language" (translated by B. Babington from the original of Padre Beschi, written about 1720-1790), London.

1867.—"Except the guru of Bombay, no priest on earth has so large a power of acting on every weakness of the female heart as a Mormon bishop at Salt Lake."—Dixon's New America, 390.

GOORUL, s. H. gūral, goral; the Himalayan chamois; Nemorhaedus Goral of Jerdon. [Cémas Goral of Blanford (Mammalia, 516).]

[1821.—"The flesh was good and tasted like that of the ghurul, so abundant in the hilly belt towards India."—Lloyd & Gerard's Narr., ii. 112.

1888.—"On Tuesday we went to a new part of the hill to shoot 'gurel,' a kind of deer, which across a khud, looks remarkably small and more like a hare than a deer."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 235.]

GOORZEBURDAR, s. P. goorzebardar, 'a mace-bearer.'

[1665.—"Among the Kours and the Musbodars are mixed many Goorze-bardars, or mace-bearers chosen for their tall and handsome persons, and whose business it is to preserve order in assemblies, to carry the King's orders, and execute his commands with the utmost speed."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 267.

[1717.—"Everything being prepared for the Goorzeburdar's reception."—In Yale, Hobbes' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccclxxix.

[1727.—"Goosberdar. See under HOS-BOLHOOKUM."
GOOZERAT, GUZERAT, n.p. The name of a famous province in Western India, Skt. Gurijara, Gurijara-راسhtra, Prakrit passing into H. and Mahr. Gjurat, Gjurat, taking its name from the Gujar (see GOOJUR) tribe. The name covers the British Districts of Surat, Broach, Kaira, Panch Mahals, and Ahmedabad, besides the territories of the Gaekwar (see GUICOWAR) of Baroda, and a multitude of native States. It is also often used as including the peninsula of Kathiawar or Surashtra, which alone embraces 180 petty States.

c. 640.—Hwen Tisang passes through Kiu-chi-to, i.e. Gurijara, but there is some difficulty as to the position which he assigns to it.—Pélerins Boudellh., iii. 166; [Cunningham, Arch. Rep. ii. 70 seqq.].

1298.—"Gozurat is a great Kingdom. . . . The people are the most desperate pirates in existence. . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 29.

c. 1300.—"Guzerat, which is a large country, within which are Cambay, Somnat, Kanka-Tana, and several other cities and towns."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 67.

1300.—"The Sultan despatched Ulugh Khan to Ma'bar and Gujurat for the destruction of the idol-temple of Somnat, on the site of Khir-ib-awwal, 698 H. . . ."—Amir Khusrâv, in Elliot, iii. 74.

[c. 1380.—"Juzrat." See under LAR.]

1554.—"At last we made the land of Guhrat in Hindustan."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 79.

The name is sometimes used by the old writers for the people, and especially for the Hindu merchants or banyans (q.v.) of Guzerat. See Sainsbury, i. 445 and passim.

[c. 1605.—"And also the Guzzats do sail in the Portugalls ships in every part of the East Indies . . ."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 85.]

GOOZUL-KHANA, s. A bathroom; H. from Ar.—P. ghulm-khâna, of corresponding sense. The apartment so called was used by some of the Great Moghuls as a place of private audience.

1616.—"At eight, after supper he comes down to the guzelcan (v.l. gazelcan), a faire Court wherein in the middest is a Throne erected of freestone."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, ii.; [Hak. Soc. i. 106].

"The thirteenth, at night I went to the Gussell Cham, where is best opportuntie to doe business, and tooke with me the Italian, determining to walk no longer in darknesse, but to prooue the King: . . ."—Ibid. p. 543; [in Hak. Soc. i. 202, Guzel-chan; in ii. 459, Gushel choes].

c. 1660.—"The grand hall of the Am-Kas opens into a more retird chamber, called the gosel-kane, or the place to wash in. But few are suffered to enter there. . . . There it is where the king is seated in a chair . . . and giveth a more particular Audience to his officers."—Bernier, E.T. p. 35; [ed. Constable, 265; ibid. 361 gose-kane].

GOPURA, s. The meaning of the word in Skt. is 'city-gate,' go 'eye,' pura, 'city.' But in S. India the gopuram is that remarkable feature of architecture, peculiar to the Peninsula, the great pyramidal tower over the entrance-gate to the precinct of a temple. See Ferguson's Indian and Eastern Architecture, 325, &c. [The same feature has been reproduced in the great temple of the Seth at Brindâban, which is designed on a S. Indian model. (Gosse, Mathura, 260.) This feature is not, in any of the S. Indian temples, older than the 15th or 16th cent., and was no doubt adopted for purposes of defence, as indeed the Silpa-sâstra ('Books of Mechanical Arts') treatises imply. This fact may sufficiently dispose of the idea that the feature indicates an adoption of architecture from ancient Egypt.

1662.—"The gopurams or towers of the great pagoda."—Markham, Peru and India, 408.

GORA, s. H. gorâ, 'fair-complexioned.' A white man; a European soldier; any European who is not a salib (q.v.). Plural gorâ-log, 'white people.'

[1861.—"The cavalry . . . rushed into the lines . . . declaring that the Gora Log (the European soldiers) were coming down upon them."—Cave Browne, Punjab and Delhi, i. 243.]

GORAWALLAH, s. H. ghora-wâlâ, ghorâ, 'a horse.' A groom or horsekeeper; used at Bombay. On the Bengal side syce (q.v.) is always used, on the Madras side horsekeeper (q.v.).

1680.—Gurrials, apparently for ghorâ-valâs (Gurrials would be alligators, Gavial), are allowed with the horses kept with the Hoogly Factory.—See Port St. Geo. Consns. on Tour, Dec. 12, in Notes and Exts., No. ii. 63.

c. 1848.—"On approaching the different points, one knows Mrs. . . . is at hand, for her Gorahwallas wear green and gold pug-gries."—Chow-Chow, i. 151.
GORAYT. s. H. goret, gorait, [which has been connected with Skt. ghur, 'to shout'] a village watchman and messenger, [in the N.W.P. usually of a lower grade than the chokidar, and not, like him, paid a cash wage, but remunerated by a piece of rent-free land; one of the village establishment, whose special duty it is to watch crops and harvested grain].

[c. 1808.—"Fifteen messengers (gorayits) are allowed for the man of grain, and from 1 to 5 bigahs of land each."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 231.]

GORDOWER, GOORDORE. s. A kind of boat in Bengal, described by Ives as "a vessel pushed on by paddles." Etym. obscure. Ghurdaur is a horse-race, a race-course; sometimes used by natives to express any kind of open-air assemblage of Europeans for amusement. [The word is more probably a corr. of P. girdadā, 'a patrol'; girdāwar, 'all around, a supervisor,' because such boats appear to be used in Bengal by officials on their tours of inspection.]

1757.—"To get two bolias (see BOLIAH), a goordore, and 87 dandies (q.v.) from the Nazr."—Ives, 157.

GOSAIN, GOSSYNE. &c. s. H. and Mahr. Gosain, Gosī, Gosāvī, Gussīn, &c., from Skt. Gosvarī, 'Lord of Passions' (lit. 'Lord of cows'), i.e. one who is supposed to have subdued his passions and to have subdued the world. Applied in various parts of India to different kinds of persons not necessarily celibates, but professing a life of religious mendicancy, and including some who dwell together in convents under a superior, and others who engage in trade and hardly pretend to lead a religious life.

1774.—"My hopes of seeing Teshu Lama were chiefly founded on the Gosain."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 46.

c. 1781.—"It was at this time in the hands of a Gosain, or Hindoo Religious."—Hodges, 112. (The use of this barbarism by Hodges is remarkable, common as it has become of late years.)

[1813.—"Unlike the generality of Hindoos, these Gosains do not burn their dead . . ."
Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 312-3; in i. 544 he writes Gosanee.]

1826.—"I found a lonely cottage with a light in the window, and being attired in the habit of a gossein, I did not hesitate to request a lodging for the night."—Pande, rong Hari, 399; [ed. 1873, ii. 275].

GOSBECK, COSBEAGUE. s. A coin spoken of in Persia (at Gombroon and elsewhere). From the quotation from Fryer it appears that there was a Goss and a Gosbeig, corresponding to Herbert's double and single Cosbeig. Mr. Wollaston in his English-Persian Dict. App. p. 436, among "Moneys now current in Persia," gives "5 dinār = 1 ghāz; also a nominal money." The ghāz, then, is the name of a coin (though a coin no longer), and ghāz-begi was that worth 10 dinārs. Marsden mentions a copper coin, called kazbegi = 50 (nominal) dinārs, or about 31/2d. (Numism. Orient., 456.) But the value in dinārs seems to be in error. [Prof. Browne, who referred the matter to M. Husayn Kuli Khan, Secretary of the Persian Embassy in London, writes: "This gentleman states that he knows no word ghādē-beg, or gāz-beg, but that there was formerly a coin called ghāz, of which 5 went to the shahī; but this is no longer used or spoken of." The ghāz was in use at any rate as late as the time of Hajji Baba; see below.]

[1815.—"The chiefest moneys that is current in Persia is the Abaze, which weigheth 2 metzicales. The second is the munedhe, which is half an abesse. The third is the shahay and is a quarter of an abesse. In the year eight is 12 shayes. In the chenek of Venetia 20 shayes. In a shaye are 2 1/2 biestes or casbeges 10. One biesty is 4 casbeges or 2 tanges. The Abaze, mumede and Shahay and biesty are of silver; the rest are of copper like the pieces of India."—Foster, Letters, iii. 176.]

c. 1630.—"The Abashe is in our money sixteen pence; Larree ten pence; Mamoodee eight pence; Bistee two pence; double Cozbed one penny; single Cozbed one halfpenny; Flores are ten to a Cozbed."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1698, p. 231.

1673.—"A Banyan that seemingly is not worth a Gosbeck (the lowest coin they have)."—Fryer, 113. See also p. 543.

1752.—"10 cosbaugues or Pice (a Copper Coin) are 1 Shatree" (read Sheike).—Brooks, p. 37. See also in Haawary, vol. i. p. 292, Kazbegie; [in ii. 21, Kazbekie].
[1824.—"But whatever profit arose either from these services, or from the spoils of my monkey, he alone was the gainer, for I never touched a ghauz of it."—Haji Baba, 52 seq.]

1825.—"A toman contains 100 mamoo-dies; a new abassee, 2 mamoodies or 4 shakes . . . a shakee, 10 coz or cozbaugues, a small copper coin."—Milburn, 2nd ed. p. 95.

GOSHA. adj. Used in some parts, as an Anglo-Indian technicality, to indicate that a woman was secluded, and canot appear in public. It is short for P. gosha-nishin, 'sitting in a corner' ; and is much the same as parda-nishin (see PURDAH).

GOUNG, s. Burm. gaung ; a village head man. ["Under the Thooghee were Rea-goung, or heads of villages, who aided in the collection of the revenue and were to some extent police officials." (Gazetteer of Burma,
i. 480.)]

a. GOUR, s. H. gaur, gauri gāè, (but not in the dictionaries), [Platts gives gaur, Skt. gaura, 'white, yellow-fish, reddish, pale red']. The great wild ox, Gaurus Gaurus, Jerd. ; [Bos gaurus, Blanford (Mammalia), 484 seq.], the same as the Bison (q.v.). [The classical account of the animal will be found in Forsyth, Highlands of Central India, ed. 1889, pp. 109 seq.]

1896.—"They erect strong fences, but the buffaloes generally break them down.
. . . They are far larger than common buffaloes. There is an account of a similar kind called the Gaur ; there is no distinction between it and the buffalo is the length of the hoof."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 156.

b. GOUR, s. Properly Can. gaud, gaur, gaula. The head man of a village in the Canarese-speaking country; either as corresponding to patel, or to the Zemindar of Bengal.
[See F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 268 ; Rice, Mysore, i. 579.]

c. 1890.—"Every Tehsildary is farmed out in villages to the Gours or head-men."—In Munro's Life, iii. 92.

c. GOUR, n.p. Gaur, the name of a medieval capital of Bengal, which lay immediately south of the modern civil station of Malda, and the traces of which, with occasional Mahommedan buildings, extend over an immense area, chiefly covered with jungle. The name is a form of the ancient Gaua, meaning, it is believed, 'the country of sugar,' a name applied to a large part of Bengal, and specifically to the portion where those remains lie. It was the residence of a Hindu dynasty, the Senas, at the time of the early Mahommedan invasions, and was popularly known as Lakhnadot; but the reigning king had transferred his seat to Nadiya (70 m. above Calcutta) before the actual conquest of Bengal in the last years of the 12th century. Gaur was afterwards the residence of several Mussulman dynasties. [See Ravenshaw, Gaur, its Ruins and Inscriptions, 1878.]

1556.—"But Xercansor [Sīr Khān Sūr, afterwards King of Hindustan as Sīr Shīh] after his success advanced along the river till he came before the city of Gouro to besiege it, and ordered a lodgment to be made in front of certain verandahs of the King's Palace which looked upon the river; and as he was making his trenches certain Rumis who were resident in the city, desiring that the King should prize them highly (d'elles fissent cabalé) as he did the Portuguese, offered their service to the King to go and prevent the enemy's lodgment, saying that he should also send the Portuguese with them."—Correa, i. 720.

[1552.—"Caor." See under BURRAM-PÓTER.]

1553.—"The chief city of the Kingdom of Bengal is called Gouro. It is situated on the banks of the Ganges, and is said to be 3 of our leagues in length, and to contain 200,000 inhabitants. On the one side it has the river for its defence, and on the landward fronts a wall of great height . . . the streets are so thronged with the concourse and traffic of people . . . that they cannot force their way past . . . a great part of the houses of this city are stately and well-wrought buildings."—Barros, IV. ix. cap. 1.

1556.—"From Patanaw I went to Tanda, which is in the land of the Gouren.
It hath in times past been a kingdom, but is now subdued by Zelabdin Ecchebar . . ."—R.
Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 359.

1683.—"I went to see ye famous Ruins of a great City and Pallace called [of] GOWRE
. . . we spent 32 hours in seeing ye ruins especially of the Pallace which has been . . .
in my judgment considerably bigger and more beautifull than the Grand Seignor's Seraglio at Constantinople or any other Pallace that I have seen in Europe."— Hedges, Diary, May 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 88].

GOVERNOR'S STRAITS, n.p.
This was the name applied by the Portuguese (Estreito do Gobernador) to the Straits of Singapore, i.e. the straits south of that island (or New Strait). The reason of the name is given in our first quotation. The Governor in question was the Spaniard Dom Joao da Silva.

1615.—"The Governor sailed from Manila in March of this year with 10 galleons and 2 galleys... Arriving at the Straits of Sinecapur, * * * and passing by a new strait which since has taken the name of Estreito do Governador, there his galleon grounded on the reef at the point of the strait, and was a little grazed by the top of it."—Bocarro, 428.

1727.—"Between the small Carimón and Tanjong-bellang on the Continent, is the entrance of the Straights of Sinecapur before mentioned, and also into the Straights of Governadore, the largest and easiest Passage into the China Sens."—A. Hamilton, ii. 122.

1780.—"Directions for sailing from Malacca to Pulo Timoan through Governor's Straits, commonly called the Straits of Sinecapur."—Dean's N. Directory, 5th ed. p. 474. See also Lettres Edif., 1st ed. ii. 118.

1814.—"Singapore Strait, called Governor Strait, or New Strait, by the French and Portuguese."—Horsburgh, 5th ed. ii. 264.

GOW, GAOU, s. Dak. H. gau. An ancient measure of distance preserved in S. India and Ceylon. In the latter island, where the term still is in use, the gauwea is a measure of about 4 English miles. It is Pait gātēwā, one quarter of a yojana, and that again is the Skt. gāyati with the same meaning. There is in Molesworth's Mahr. Dictionary, and in Wilson, a term gaukos (see COSS), 'a land measure' (for which read 'distance measure'), the distance at which the lowing of a cow may be heard. This is doubtless a form of the same term as that under consideration, but the explanation is probably modern and incorrect. The yojana with which the gau is correlated, appears etymologically to be 'a yoking,' viz. "the stage, or distance to be gone in one harnessing without unyoking" (Williams); and the lengths attributed to it are various, oscillating from 2½ to 9 miles, and even to 8 koram (see COSS). The last valuation of the yojana would correspond with that of the gau at ¾.

1623.—"From Garicota to Tumbre may be about a league and a half, for in that country distances are measured by gau, and each gau is about two leagues, and from Garicota to Tumbre they said was not so much as a gau of road."—P. della Valle, ii. 638; [Hak. Soc. ii. 230].

1676.—"They measure the distances of places in India by Gos and Corees. A Gos is about 4 of our common leagues, and a Core is one league."—Tavernier, B.T. ii. 30; [ed. Ball, i. 47].

1860.—"A gaou in Ceylon expresses a somewhat indeterminate length, according to the nature of the ground to be traversed, a gaou across a mountainous country being less than one measured on level ground, and a gaou for a loaded cooley is also permitted to be shorter than for one unburthened, but on the whole the average may be taken under four miles."—Tennent's Ceylon, 4th ed. i. 467.

GRAB, s. This name, now almost obsolete, was applied to a kind of vessel which is constantly mentioned in the sea- and river-fights of India, from the arrival of the Portuguese down to near the end of the 18th century. That kind of etymology which works from inner consciousness would probably say: 'This term has always been a puzzle to the English in India. The fact is that it was a kind of vessel much used by corsairs, who were said to grab all that passed the sea. Hence,' &c. But the real derivation is different.

The Rev. Howard Malcom, in a glossary attached to his Travels, defines it as "a square-rigged Arab vessel, having a projecting stern (stem?) and no bowsprit; it has two masts." Probably the application of the term may have deviated variously in recent days. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. pt. i. 348.] For thus again in Soleyns (Les Hindous, vol. i.) a grab is drawn and described as a ship with three masts, a sharp prow, and a bowsprit. But originally the word seems, beyond question, to have been an Arab name for a galley. The proper word is Arab. ghurāb, 'a raven,' though adopted into Mahratti and Konkani as gurāb. Jal says, quoting Reinaud, that ghurāb was the name given by the Moors to the true galley, and cites Hyde for the rationale of the name. We give Hyde's words below. Amari, in a work quoted below (p. 397), points out the analogous coretta as perhaps a transfer of ghurāb:

1181.—"A vessel of our merchants... making sail for the city of Tripoli (which God protect) was driven by the winds on the shore of that country, and the crew being in want of water, landed to procure it, but the people of the place refused it unless some corn were sold to them. Meanwhile there came a ghurāb from Tripoli... which took and plundered the crew, and seized all the goods on board the vessel.” —Arabic Letter from Ubaldo, Archbishop and other authorities of Pisa, to the Almohad Caliph Alm Ya'kub Yusuf, in Amari, Diplomi Arabi, p. 8.

The Latin contemporary version runs thus:

c. 1200.—Ghurāb, Cornix, Corvus, galea.

* * * * *

1343.—“Jalansi... sent us off in company with his son, on board a vessel called al-Ukairi, which is like a ghurāb, only more roomy. It has 60 oars, and when it engages is covered with a roof to protect the rowers from the darts and stone-shot.” —Ibn Batuta, iv. 59.

1505.—In the Vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalá, galera is interpreted in Arabic as gurāb.

1554.—In the narrative of Sidi ʿAli Kapudān, in describing an action that he fought with the Portuguese near the Persian Gulf, he says the enemy’s fleet consisted of 4 barques as big as carracks (q.v.), 3 great ghurābs, 6 Karāwals (see CARRAVEL) and 12 smaller ghurābs, or galiots (see GALLEY; VAT) with oars.—In J. As., ser. 1. tom. ix. 67-68.

[c. 1610.—“His royal galley called by them ōgata Gourabe (gourabe means ‘galley’ and ōgata ‘royal’).”—Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 312.]

1660.—“Jani Beg might attack us from the hills, the ghurāb from the river, and the men of Sīhwān from the rear, so that we should be in a critical position.” —Mohammad Māsun, in Elliot, i. 250. The word occurs in many pages of the same history.

[1679.—“My Selfe and Mr. Gapes Grob the stern most.”—In Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. clxxxiv.]

1690.—“Galeria... ab Arabibus tam Asiaticis quam Africans vocatūr... Ghorāb, i.e. Corvus, quasi piecā nigredine,rostro extenso, et velis remisceque sicut alia volans galera: unde et Vlaho Graece dicitur...” —Hyde, Note on Perišol, in Syst. Dissertat. i. 97.

1673.—“‘Our Factors, having concerns in the cargo of the ships in this Road, loaded two Groves and departed.”—Fryer, 153.

1727.—“The Maskat War... obliges them (the Portuguese) to keep an Armada of five or six Ships, besides small Frigates and Grabs of War.”—A. Hamilton, i. 250; [ed. 1744, ii. 253].

1750-52.—“The ships which they make use of against their enemies are called goerabbs by the Dutch, and grabs by the English, have 2 or 3 masts, and are built like our ships, with the same sort of rigging, only their prows are low and sharp as in galleys, that they may not only place some cannons in them, but likewise in case of emergency for a couple of oars, to push the grabb on in a calm.”—Olof Toreen, Voyage, 205.

c. 1754.—“Our E. I. Company had here (Bombay) one ship of 40 guns, one of 20, one Grobat of 18 guns, and several other vessels.” —Ives, 43. Ives explains “Ketches, which they call grabs.” This shows the meaning already changed, as no galley could carry 18 guns.

c. 1760.—“When the Derby, Captain Ansell, was so scandalously taken by a few of Angria’s grabs.” —Grose, i. 81.

1763.—“The grabs have rarely more than two masts, though some have three; those of three are about 300 tons burthen; but the others are not more than 150: they are built to draw very little water, being very broad in proportion to their length, narrowing, however, from the middle to the end, where instead of bows they have a prow, projecting like that of a Mediterranean galley.” —Orme (reprint), i. 408-9.

1810.—“Here a fine English East India-man, there a grab, or a dow from Arabia.” —Maria Graham, 142.

“This Glab (sic) belongs to an Arab merchant of Muscat. The Nakhodah, an Abyssinian slave.” —Elphinstone, in Life, i. 292.

[1820.—“We had scarce set sail when there came in a ghorab (a kind of boat) the Cotwal of Surat...” —Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. ii. 5.]

1872.—“Moored in its centre you saw some 20 or 30 ghurabs (grabs) from Maskat, Baghlahs from the Persian Gulf, Kotiyahs from Kachi’, and Pattinars or Batelas from the Konkan and Bombay.” —Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 83.

GRAM. s. This word is properly the Portuguese grière, i.e. ‘grain,’ but it has been specially appropriated to that kind of vetch (Cicer arietinum, L.) which is the most general grain-(rather pulse)-food of horses all over India, called in H. chanā. It is the Ital. cece, Fr. pois chiche, Eng. chick-pea or Egypt. pea, much used in France and S.
Europe. This specific application of grão is also Portuguese, as appears from Bluteau. The word gram is in some parts of India applied to other kinds of pulse, and then this application of it is recognised by qualifying it as Bengal gram. (See remarks under CALAVANCE.) The plant exudes of pulse, and to walk through a gram-field in a wet morning is destructive to shoe-leather. The natives collect the acid.

[1513.—“And for the food of these horses (exported from the Persian Gulf) the factor supplied grão.”—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 200, Letter of Dec. 4.

[1554.—(Describing Vijayanagar.) “There the food of horses and elephants consists of graos, rice and other vegetables, cooked with jagra, which is palm-tree sugar, as there is no barley in that country.”—Castanheda, Bk. ii. ch. 16.

c. 1610.—“They give them also a certain grain like lentils.”—Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

1729.—“... he confessing before us that their allowance three times a week is but a quart of rice and gram together for five men a day, but promises that for the future it shall be rectified.”—In Wheeler, ii. 10.

1776.—“... Lentils, gram ... mustard seed.”—Hollid’s Code, p. 8 (pt. ii.)

1793.—“... gram, a small kind of pulse, universally used instead of cats.”—Manro’s Narrative, 85.

1804.—“The gram alone, for the four regiments with me, has in some months cost 50,000 pagodas.”—Wellingotn, iii. 71.

1865.—“But they had come at a wrong season, gram was dear, and prices low, and the sale was included in a dead loss.”—Pulgrave’s Arabia, 290.

GRAM-FED. adj. Properly the distinctive description of mutton and beef fattened upon gram, which used to be the pride of Bengal. But applied figuratively to any ‘pampered creature.’

c. 1849.—“By an old Indian I mean a man full of curry and of bad Hindustani, with a fat liver and no brains, but with a self-sufficient idea that no one can know India except through long experience of brandy, champagne, gram-fed mutton, cheroots and hookah.”—Sir C. Napier, quoted in Bos. Smith’s Life of Ed. Lawrance, i. 398.

1880.—“I missed two persons at the Delhi assemblage in 1877. All the gram-fed secretaries and most of the alcoholic chiefs were there; but the famine-haunted villagers and the delirium-shattered opium-eating Chinaman, who had to pay the bill, were not present.”—Ali Baba, 127.

GRANDONIC. (See GRUNTHUM and SANSKRIT).

GRASS-CLOTH. s. This name is now generally applied to a kind of cambric from China made from the Chuma of the Chinese (Boehmoria nivca Hooker, the Rhea, so much talked of now), and called by the Chinese sia-pu, or ‘summer-cloth.’ We find grass-cloths often spoken of by the 16th century travellers, and even later, as an export from Orissa and Bengal. They were probably made of Rhea or some kindred species, but we have not been able to determine this. Cloth and nets are made in the south from the Neilgherry nettle (Girardinia heterophylla, D. C.)

c. 1567.—“Cloth of herbes (panni d’erba), which is a kind of silke, which groweth among the woodes without any labour of man.”—Caesar Frederiki, in Hocti. ii. 355.

1585.—“Great store of the cloth which is made from Grasse, which they call vera” (in Orissa).—R. Fich, in Hocti. ii. 387.

1598.—See under SAREE.

c. 1610.—“Likewise is there plenty of silk, as well that of the silkworm as of the (silk) herb, which is of the brightest yellow colour, and brighter than silk itself.”—Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 328.]

1627.—“Their manufactories (about Balasore) are of Cotton ... Silk and Silk and Cotton Rorals ... ; and of Herba (a Sort of tough Grass) they make Gingham, Pinasco, and several other Goods for Exportation.”—A. Hamilton, i. 397; [ed. 1741].

1813.—Milburn, in his List of Bengal Piece-Goods, has Herba Taffaties (ii. 221).

GRASS-CUTTER. s. This is probably a corruption representing the H. ghâshkhadâ or ghâshkâtâ, ‘the digger, or cutter, of grass’; the title of a servant employed to collect grass for horses, one such being usually attached to each horse besides the syce or horse-keeper. In the north the grass-cutter is a man; in the south the office is filled by the horsekeeper’s wife. Ghâshkat is the form commonly used by Englishmen in Upper India speaking Hindustani; but ghâshkâtâ by those aspiring to purer language. The former term appears in Williamson’s V. M. (1810) as gauskot (i. 186), the latter in Jacquemont’s Correspondence as GRASSHOPPER FALLS. 394

GRASS-WIDOW.

Grassyara. No grasscutters are mentioned as attached to the stables of Akbar; only a money allowance for grass. The antiquity of the Madras arrangement is shown by a passage in Castanheda (1552): "... he gave him a horse, and a boy to attend to it, and a female slave to see to its fodder."—(ii. 58.)

1789.—"... an Horsekeeper and Grass-cutter at two pagodas."—Munro's Narr. 28.

1783.—"Every horse ... has two attendants, one who cleans and takes care of him, called the horse-keeper, and the other the grass-cutter, who provides for his forage."—Dorion's Narr. 242.

1846.—"Every horse has a man and a maid to himself—the maid cuts grass for him; and every dog has a boy. I inquired whether the cat had any servants, but I found he was allowed to wait upon himself."—Letters from Madras, 57.

1850.—"Then there are our servants ... four Sajos and four Ghascuts ..."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 253.

1875.—"I suppose if you were to pick up ... a grasscutter's pony to replace the one you lost, you wouldn't feel that you had done the rest of the army out of their rights."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

[GRASSHOPPER FALLS, n.p.

An Anglo-Indian corruption of the name of the great waterfall on the Sheravati River in the Shimoga District of Mysore, where the river plunges down in a succession of cascades, of which the principal is 890 feet in height. The proper name of the place is Gersoppa, or Gerussappe, which takes its name from the adjoining village; geru, Can., 'the marking nut plant' (semecarpus anacardium, L.), soppu, 'a leaf.' See Mr. Grey's note on P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 218.]

GRASS-WIDOW, s.

This slang phrase is applied in India, with a shade of malignity, to ladies living apart from their husbands, especially as recreating at the Hill stations, whilst the husbands are at their duties in the plains.

We do not know the origin of the phrase. In the Slang Dictionary it is explained: "An unmarried mother; a deserted mistress." But no such opprobrious meanings attach to the Indian use. In Notes and Queries, 6th ser. viii. 414, will be found several communications on this phrase. [Also see ibid. x. 436, 526; xi. 178; 8th ser. iv. 37, 75.] We learn from these that in Moor's Suffolk Words and Phrases, Grace-Widow occurs with the meaning of an unmarried mother. Corresponding to this, it is stated also, is the N.S. (?) or Low German gras-wedewe. The Swedish Gräsincka or *-enka also is used for 'a low dissolute married woman living by herself.' In Belgium a woman of this description is called haecke-wedewe, from haeken, 'to feel strong desire' (to 'hanker'). And so it is suggested gräsenka is contracted from grädesenka, from gradig, 'esuriens' (greedy, in fact). In Danish Dict. græsenka is interpreted as a woman whose betrothed lover is dead. But the German Stroh-Wittwe, 'straw-widow' (which Flügel interprets as 'mock widow'), seems rather inconsistent with the suggestion that grass-widow is a corruption of the kind suggested. A friend mentions that the masc. Stroh-Wittwe is used in Germany for a man whose wife is absent, and who therefore dines at the eating-house with the young fellows. [The N.E.D. gives the two meanings: 1. An unmarried woman who has cohabited with one or more men; a discarded mistress; 2. A married woman whose husband is absent from her. 'The etymological notion is obscure, but the parallel forms disprove the notion that the word is a 'corruption' of grace-widow. It has been suggested that in sense 1. grass (and G. stroh) may have been used with opposition to bed. Sense 2. may have arisen as an etymologizing interpretation of the compound after it had ceased to be generally understood; in Eng, it seems to have first appeared as Anglo-Indian. The French equivalent, Veuve de Malabar, was in allusion to Lemierre's tragedy, produced in 1770.]

1878.—"In the evening my wife and I went out house-hunting; and we pitched upon one which the newly incorporated body of Municipal Commissioners and the Clergyman (who was a Grass-widow, his wife being at home) had taken between them."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 99-100.

1879.—The Indian newspaper's "typical official rises to a late breakfast—probably on herrings and soda-water—and dresses tastefully for his round of morning calls, the last on a grass-widow, with whom he has a tête-à-tête tiffin, where 'pegs' alternate with champagne."—Sindhu Letter in Times, Aug. 16.

GRASSIA, s. Grās (said to mean 'a mouthful') is stated by Mr. Forbes in the Rās Mālā (p. 186) to have been in old times usually applied to alienations for religious objects; but its prevalent sense came to be the portion of land given for subsistence to cadets of chieftains' families. Afterwards the term grās was also used for the blackmail paid by a village to a turbulent neighbour as the price of his protection and forbearance, and in other like meanings. "Thus the title of grassia, originally an honourable one, and indicating its possessor to be a cadet of the ruling tribe, became at last as frequently a term of opprobrium, conveying the idea of a professional robber." (Ibid. Bk. iv. ch. 3); [ed. 1878, p. 568].

c. 1655.—"Nous nous trouvâmes au Village de Bilpar, dont les Habitans qu'on nomme Gratiacies, sont presque tous Volure.—Thevenot, v. 42.

1808.—"The Grassias have been shewn to be of different Sects, Casta, or families, viz., 1st, Colees and their Collaterals; 2nd, Rajpoots; 3rd, Syed Mussulmans; 4th, Mohoms and modern Mahomedans. There are besides many others who enjoy the free usufruct of lands, and permanent emolument from villages, but those only who are of the four aforesaid warlike tribes seem entitled by prescriptive custom . . . to be called Grassias."—Drammond, Illustrations.

1813.—"I confess I cannot now contemplate my extraordinary deliverance from the Gracie machinations without feelings more appropriate to solemn silence, than expression."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 393; [conf. 2nd ed. ii. 357].

1819.—"Grassia, from Grass, a word signifying 'a mouthful.' This word is understood in some parts of Meckran, Sind, and Kutch; but I believe not further into Hindostan than Jaypoor."—Mackmerto, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 270. [On the use in Central India, see Tod, Annals, i. 175; Malcolm, Central India, i. 508.]

GRAVE-DIGGER. (See BEEJOO.)

GREEN-PIGEON. A variety of species belonging to the sub.-fam. Treroninae, and to genera Treron, Crisopus, Osmotreron, and Sphenocerus, bear this name. The three first following quotations show that these birds had attracted the attention of the ancients.

c. 180.—"Daimachus, in his History of India, says that pigeons of an apple-green colour are found in India."—Athenaeus, ix. 51.

c. A.D. 250.—"They bring also greenish (ἐφράσι) pigeons which they say can never be tamed or domesticated."—Aelian, De Nat. Anim. xv. 14.

", "There are produced among the Indians . . . pigeons of a pale green colour (χλωρός πτηλος); any one seeing them for the first time, and not having any knowledge of ornithology, would say the bird was a parrot and not a pigeon. They have legs and bill in colour like the partridges of the Greeks."—Ibid. xvi. 2.

1673.—"Our usual diet was (besides Plenty of Fish) Water-Fowl, Peacocks, Green Pigeons, Spotted Deer, Sabre, Wild Hogs, and sometimes Wild Cows."—Fryer, 176.

1825.—"I saw a great number of phe-fowl, and of the beautiful greenish pigeon common in this country . . . ."—Heber, ii. 19.

GREY PARTRIDGE. The common Anglo-Indian name of the Hind. tītar, common over a great part of India, Ortygornis Ponticerrana, Gmelin. "Its call is a peculiar loud shrill cry, and has, not unaptly, been compared to the word Patèela-pateela-pateela, quickly repeated but preceded by a single note, uttered two or three times, each time with a higher intonation, till it gets, as it were, the key-note of its call."—Jerdon, ii. 506.

GRIBLEE, s. A grapulin or grappling. Lascars' language (Roebuck).

GRIFFIN, GRIFF, GRIFFISH, s.; GRIFFISH, adj. One newly arrived in India, and unacustomed to Indian ways and peculiarities; a Johnny Newcome. The origin of the phrase is unknown to us. There was an Admiral Griffin who commanded in the Indian seas from Nov. 1746 to June 1748, and was not very fortunate. Had his name to do with the origin of the term? The word seems to have been first used at Madras (see Boyd, below). [But also see the quotation from Beaumont & Fletcher, below.] Three references below indicate the parallel terms formerly used by the Portuguese at Goa, by the Dutch in the Archipelago, and by the English in Ceylon.
Here orang barou is Malay orang-baharu, i.e. 'new man'; whilst Orang-lama, 'man of long since,' is applied to old colonials. In connection with these terms we extract the following:—

GRUFF. adj. Applied to bulky goods. Probably the Dutch grof, 'coarse.'

GRUFF, GRIFF, GRIFFISH. 396

The griffin at Goa also in the old days was called by a peculiar name. (See REINOL.)

1631.—"Hae exanthemata (prickly heat-spots) magis afficiunt recenter advenientes ut et Mosquitatum puncturae... its ut deridiculum ergo hic inter nostrates dictionum exatum sit, cum qui hoc modo affectus sit, esse Orang Barou, quod novitium hominem signifit."—Joc. Bontii, Hist. Nat., &c., ii. cap. xviii. p. 33.

1790.—"Si je n'avouais pas été un orlawn, et si un long séjour dans l'Inde ne m'avoir pas accoutumé à cette espèce de flair, j'aurais certainement souffert l'impossible durant cette nuit."—Haafser, ii. 26-27.

On this his editor notes:

"Orlawn est un mot Malais corrompu; il faut dire Orang-lama, ce qui signifie une personne qui a déjà été long-temps dans un endroit, ou dans un pays, et c'est par ce nom qu'on désigne les Européens qui ont habité depuis un certain temps dans l'Inde. Ceux qui ne font qu'arriver, sont appelés Baar; dénomination qui vient du mot Malais Orang-Baru... un homme nouvellement arrivé."

GROUND, s. A measure of land used in the neighbourhood of Madras. [Also called Munny, Tam. manai.] (See under CAWNY.)
GUANA, IGUANA.

GUANH, s. Panjâbî Granth, from Skt. granthâ, lit. 'a knot,' leaves tied together by a string. ‘The Book,’ i.e. the Scripture of the Sikhs, containing the hymns composed or compiled by their leaders from Nânak (1469-1539) onwards. The Granth has been translated by Dr. Trumpp, and published, at the expense of the Indian Government.

1770.—‘As the young man (Nânak) was early introduced to the knowledge of the most esteemed writings of the Mussulmen... he made it a practice in his leisure hours to translate literally or virtually, as his mind prompted him, such of their maxims as made the deepest impression on his heart. This was in the idiom of Pendjab, his maternal language. Little by little he strung together these loose sentences, reduced them into some order, and put them in verses... His collection became numerous; it took the form of a book which was entitled Granth.’—Seir Mutaghéri, i. 89.

1798.—‘A book entitled the Grunth... is the only typical object which the Séiques have admitted into their places of worship.”—G. Forster's Travels, i. 255.

1817.—‘The fame of Nannak's book was diffused. He gave it a new name, Kirrunt.”—Milk's Hist. ii. 377.

c. 1831.—‘... Au centre du quel est le temple d'or où est gardé le Granth ou livre sacré des Sikes.”—Jacquemont, Correspondance, ii. 166.

[1838.—‘There was a large collection of priests, sitting in a circle, with the Grooth, their holy book, in the centre...”—Miss Eden, Up the Country, ii. 7.]

GRUNTHEE, s. Panj. granthâ from granth (see GRUNTH). A sort of native chaplain attached to Sikh regiments. [The name Grunthi appears among the Hindi mendicant castes of the Panjâb in Mr. Maclogan's Census Rep., 1891, p. 300.]

GRUNTHUM, s. This (granthâm) is a name, from the same Skt. word as the last, given in various odd forms to the Sanskrit language by various Europeans writing in S. India during the 16th and 17th centuries. The term properly applied to the character in which the Sanskrit books were written.

1600.—‘In these verses is written, in a particular language, called Gerodan, their Philosophy and Theology, which the Brahmen study and read in Universities all over India.”—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 95.

1646.—‘Cette langue correspond à la nostre Latiné, parcoque les seules Lettrés l'apprennent; il se nomment Guirindans.”—Barretto, Rel. de la Prov. de la Malabar, 257.

1727.—‘... their four law-books, Sama Vedam, Urukku Vedam, Edivaruma Vedam, and Adir Vedam, which are all written in the Girandams, and are held in high esteem by the Brahmins.”—Valentijin, v. (Oeglon), 399.

...‘Girandam (by others called Kerendum, and also Sanskrits) is the language of the Brahmins and the learned.”— Ibid. 396.

1755.—‘Les Indiens du pays se donnent le nom de Females, et on sait que la langue vulgaire différente du Sanskret, et du Grendam, qui sont les langues sacrées, porte le même nom.”—D'Anville, 117.

GUANA, IGUANA, s. This is not properly an Indian term, nor the name of an Indian species, but, as in many other cases, it has been applied by transfer from superficially resembling genera in the new Indies, to the old. The great lizards, sometimes called guanas in India, are apparently moniters. It must be observed, however, that approximating Indian names of lizards have helped the confusion. Thus the large monitor to which the name guana is often applied in India, is really called in Hindi goh (Skt. godhâ), Singhalese goyd. The true iguana of America is described by Oviedo in the first quotation under the name of iuana. [The word is Span. iguana, from Carib iwan, written in early writers iivana, ijianu, iuana or iuana. See N.E.D. and Stanf. Dict.]

1535.—‘There is in this island an animal called Iuana, which is here held to be amphibious (neutra), i.e. doubtful whether fish or flesh, for it frequents the rivers and climbs the trees as well... It is a Serpent, bearing to one who knows it not a horrid and frightful aspect. It has the hands and feet like those of a great lizard, the head much larger, but almost of the same fashion, with a tail 4 or 5 palms in length... And the animal, formed as I have described, is much better to eat than to look at,” &c.—Oviedo, in Ramusio, iii. f. 156v, 157.

1550.—‘We also used to catch some four-footed animals called iguane, resembling our lizards in shape... the females are most delicate food.”—Giróniо Benzoní, p. 140.

1634.—‘De Lacertae quâdam specie, Incolis Liguan. Est... genus venenosissimum,” &c.—Jac. Bontii, Lib. v. cap. 5. p. 57. (See GEOX.)

1673.—‘Guiana, a Creature like a Crocodile, which Robbers use to lay hold on by their 'Tails, when they clamber Houses.'
—Fryer, 116.

1681.—Knox, in his Ceylon, speaks of two creatures resembling the Alligator—one called Kobbera guion, 5 or 6 feet long, and not eatable; the other called tollio guion, very like the former, but "which is eaten, and reckoned excellent meat . . . and I suppose it is the same with that which in the W. Indies is called the guiana" (pp. 30, 31). The names are possibly Portuguese, and Kobberaguiou may be Cabra-guana.

1704.—"The Guano is a sort of Creature some of which are found on the land, some in the water . . . stewed with a little Spice they make good Broth."—Funnell, in Dampier, iv, 51.

1711.—"Here are Monkeys, Gaunias, Lissards, large Snakes, and Alligators."—Lockyer, 47.

1780.—"They have here an amphibious animal called the guana, a species of the crocodile or alligator, of which soup is made equal to that of turtle. This I take upon hearsay, for it is to me of all others the most loathsome of animals, not less so than the toad."—Munro's Narrative, 30.

c. 1830.—"Had I known I was dining upon a guana, or large wood-izard, I scarcely think I would have made so hearty a meal."—Tom Cringle (ed. 1868), 178.

1879.—"Captain Shaw asked the Imam of one of the mosques of Malacca about alligators a few days ago, and his reply was, that the young that went down to the sea became alligators, and those that came up the river became iguanas."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 200.

1881.—"The chief of Mudhol State belongs to the Bhonsli family . . . The name, however, has been entirely superseded by the second designation of Ghorpode, which is said to have been acquired by one of the family who managed to scale a fort previously deemed impregnable, by fastening a cord around the body of a ghorpad or iguana."—Imperial Gazetteer, 437.

1883.—"Who can look on that anachronism, an iguana (I mean the large monitor which Europeans in India generally call an iguana, sometimes a guano!) basking, four feet long, on a sunny bank . . ."—Tribes on My Frontier, 36.

1885.—"One of my moonshis, José Prethoo, a Concana of one of the numerous families descended from Xavier's converts, gravely informed me that in the old days iguanas were used in gaining access to besieged places; for, said he, a large iguana, solid, is so strong that if 3 or 4 men laid hold of its tail he could drag them up a wall or tree!"—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canada, 56.

GUARDAFUI, CAPE, n.p. The eastern horn of Africa, pointing towards India. We have the name from the Portuguese, and it has been alleged to have been so called by them as meaning, 'Take you heed!' (Gardez-vous, in fact.) But this is etymology of the species that so confidently derives 'Bombay' from Boa Bahiú. Bruce, again (see below), gives dogmatically an interpretation which is equally unfounded. We must look to history, and not to the 'moral consciousness' of anybody. The country adjoining this horn of Africa, the Regio Aromatum of the ancients, seems to have been called by the Arabs Hafun, a name which we find in the Periplus in the shape of Opôné. This name Hafun was applied to a town, no doubt the true Opônê, which Barbosa (1516) mentions under the name of Afuni, and it still survives in those of two remarkable promontories, viz. the Peninsula of Râs Hafûn (the Chersonesus of the Periplus, the Zingis of Tulemany, the Cape d'Afûi and d'Orfui of old maps and nautical directories), and the cape of Jard-Hafûn (or according to the Egyptian pronunciation, Gard-Hafîn), i.e. Guardafui. The nearest possible meaning of jard that we can find is 'a wide or spacious tract of land without herbage.' Sir R. Burton (Commentary on Câmões, iv. 489) interprets jard as = Bay, "from a break in the dreadful granite wall, lately provided by Egypt with a lighthouse." The last statement is unfortunately an error. The intended light seems as far off as ever. [There is still no lighthouse, and shipowners differ as to its advantage; see answer by Secretary of State, in House of Commons, Times, March 14, 1902.] We cannot judge of the ground of his interpretation of jard.

An attempt has been made to connect the name Hafûn with the Arabic âfûn, 'pleasant odours.' It would then, be the equivalent of the ancient Reg. Aromatum. This is tempting, but very questionable. We should have mentioned that Guardafui is the site of the mart and Promontory of the Spices described by the author of the Periplus as the furthest point and abrupt termination of the continent of Barbariae (or eastern Africa), towards the Orient (τὸ τῶν Ἀρωματῶν ἐμφόρων καὶ ἀκρωτηρίων τετελευταῖς τῆς βαρβαρικῆς ἡπείρου πρὸς ἀνατολήν ἀποκοπῶν).

According to C. Müller our Guardafui is called by the natives Râs Aser; their Râs Jardafui being a point some 12

... to the south, which on some charts is called Ris Shenarif, and which is also the Tába of the Periplus (Geog. Gr. Minores, i. 263).

1516.—"And that the said ships from his ports (K. of Conlam) shall not go inwards from the Strait and Cape of Guardafuy, nor go to Adem, except when employed in our obedience and service ... and if any vessel on Kappadu, the island, be found inward of the Cape of Guardafuy it shall be taken as good prize of war."—Treaty between Lopo Soares and the K. of Conlam, in Botelho, Tombo, 33.

"After passing this place (Afuni) the next after it is Cape Guardafuin, where the coast ends, and trends so as to double towards the Red Sea."—Barbaron, 16.

c. 1530.—"This province, called of late Arabia, but which the ancients called Trogalidica, begins at the Red Sea and the country of the Abissines, and finishes at Magadasso ... others say it extends only to the Cape of Guardafuini."—Sommarino de Regini, in Ramusio, i. f. 325.

1553.—"Vicente Sadre, being despatched by the King, touched at the Island of Cocotora, where he took in water, and thence passed to the Cape of Guardafuini, which is the most easterly land of Africa."—De Barros, I. vii. cap. 2.

1554.—"If you leave Dabol at the end of the season, you direct yourselves W.S.W. till the pole is four inches and an eighth, from thence true west to Kardafuin."—Sidli 'Ali Kopudin, The Mokit, in J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 464.

"You find such whirlpools on the coasts of Kardafuin...."—The same, in his narrative, Journ. As. soc. I. tom. ix. p. 77.

1572.—"O Cabo vé já Aromata chamado, E agora Guardafuini, dos moradores, Onde começa a boca do affamado Mar Roxo, que do fundo toma as cores."—Camões, x. 97.

Engolished by Burton:

"The Cape which Antients 'Aromatic' clepe behold, yeclted by Moderns Guardafuin; where opens the Red Sea mouth, so wide and deep, the Sea whose ruddy bed lends blushing hue."—De Barros, IV. 1. 4.

1602.—"Eitor da Silveira set out, and without any mishap arrived at the Cape of Guardafuini."—Couto, IV. 1. 4.

1727.—"And having now travelled along the Shore of the Continent, from the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Guardafuy, I'll survey the Islands that lie in the Ethiopian Sea."—A. Hamilton, i. 15; [ed. 1744].

1790.—"The Portuguese, or Venetians, the first Christian traders in these parts, have called it Gardefuini, which has no signification in any language. But in that part of the country where it is situated, it is called Gardefan and means the Straits of Burid, the reason of which will be seen afterwards."—Bruce's Travels, i. 315.

[1823.—"... we soon obtained sight of Cape Gardafuin. ... It is called by the natives Ris Assere, and the high mountain immediately to its south is named Ghel Jordafoon.... Keeping about nine miles off shore we rounded the peninsula of Hafoon.... Hafoon appears like an island, and belongs to a native Somauali prince...."]—Owen, Nunn. i. 353.

GUAVA, s. This fruit (Psidium guayava, L., Ord. Myrtaceae; Span. guayava, Fr. goyavier, [from Brazilian guayaba, Stanf. Dict.]), Guayabo ponifera Indica of Caspar Baulhin, Guayara of Joh. Bauhin, strangely appears by name in Elliot's translation from Amir Khashr, who flourished in the 13th century: "He who has placed only guavas and quinces in his throat, and has never eaten a plantain, will say it is like so much jujube" (iii. 556). This must be due to some ambiguous word carelessly rendered. The fruit and its name are alike American. It appears to be the guavado of Oviedo in his History of the Indies (we use the Italian version in Ramusio, iii. f. 141v.). There is no mention of the guava in either De Orta or Acosta. Amraid, which is the commonest Hindustani (Pers.) name for the guava, means properly 'a pear'; but the fruit is often called safuri aum, 'journey mango' (respecting which see under ANANAS). And this last term is sometimes vulgarly corrupted into supari aum (areca-mango!). In the Deccan (according to Mooden Sheriff) and all over Guzerat and the Central Provinces (as we are informed by M.-Gen. Keatinge), the fruit is called jâm, Mahr. jumb, which is in Bengal the name of Syzygium jambolanum (see JAMOON), and in Guzerat jîmrád, which seems to be a factitious word in imitation of dmrád.

The guava, though its claims are so inferior to those of the pine-apple (indeed except to sew, or make jelly, it is nobis judicibus, an utter impostor), [Sir Joseph Hooker annotates: "You never afe good ones!"] must have spread like that fruit with great rapidity. Both appear in Blochmann's transl. of the A'In (i. 64) as served at Akbar's table; though when the guava is named among the fruits of Turan, doubts again arise as to the fruit intended, for the word used, amrūd, is ambiguous. In 1688 Dampier mentions guavas at Achin, and in Cochin China. The tree, like the custard-apple, has become wild in some parts of India. See Davidson, below.

c. 1550.—"The guava is like a peach-tree, with a leaf resembling the laurel . . . the red are better than the white, and are well-flavoured."—Girol. Bonzoni, p. 88.

1658.—There is a good cut of the guava, as guinaba, in Piso, pp. 152-3.

1673. — "... flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocos, Guavas, a kind of Pear."—Fryer, 40.

1676.—"The N.W. part is full of Guaver Trees of the greatest variety, and their Fruit the largest and best tasted I have met with."—Dampier, ii. 107.

1685.—"The Guava . . . when the Fruit is ripe, it is yellow, soft, and very pleasant. It bakes well as a Pear."—Ibid. i. 222.

c. 1750-60.—"Our guides too made us distinguish a number of goyava, and especially plum-bushes."—Grose, i. 20.

1764.—
"A wholesome fruit the ripened guava yields, Boast of the housewife."

Grainger, Bk. i.

1843.—"On some of these extensive plains (on the Mohur R. in Oudh) we found large orchards of the wild Guava . . . strongly resembling in their rough appearance the pear-trees in the hedges of Worcestershire."
—Col. C. J. Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 271.

GUBBER, s. This is some kind of gold ducat or sequin; Milburn says 'a Dutch ducat.' It may have adopted this special meaning, but could hardly have held it at the date of our first quotation. The name is probably gabr (dindr-i-gabr), implying its being of nurḍel origin.

c. 1590.—"Mirza Jani Beg Sultān made this agreement with his soldiers, that every one who should bring in an enemy's head should receive 500 gabars, every one of them worth 12 mir's . . . of which 72 went to one tanka."—Tārikh-i-Tāhirī, in Elliot, i. 287.

1711.—"Rupees are the most current Coin; they have Venetians, Gubbers, Muggerebes, and Pagodas."—Lockyer, 201.

"When a Parcel of Venetian Ducats are mixt with others the whole goes by the name of Chequeeas at Surat, but when they are separated, one sort is called Venetians, and all the others Gubbers indifferently."—Ibid. 242.

1782.—"Gold and Silver Weights:

| 100 Venetian Ducats | 11 | 0 | 5
|---------------------|----|---|---
| 10 (100?) Gubbers | 10 | 17 | 12 |

Brooks, Weights and Measures.

GUBBROW, v. To bully, to dumbfound, and perturb a person. Made from ghabrād, the imperative of ghabrānā. The latter, though sometimes used transitively, is more usually neuter, 'to be dumbfounded and perturbed.'

GUDDA, s. A donkey, literal and metaphorical. H. gudhā: [Skt. gardabha, 'the roarer']. The coincidence of the Scotch cuddy has been attributed to a loan from H. through the gypsies, who were the chief owners of the animal in Scotland, where it is not common. On the other hand, this is ascribed to a nickname Cuddy (for Cuthbert), like the English Niddy, similarly applied. [So the N.E.D. with hesitation.] A Punjabi proverbial phrase is gādūn khurki, 'Donkeys' rubbing' their sides together, a sort of 'claw me and I'll claw thee.'

13 GUDDY, GUDDEE, s. H. gaddī, Mahr. gaddi. 'The Throne.' Properly it is a cushion, a throne in the Oriental sense, i.e. the seat of royalty, "a simple sheet, or mat, or carpet on the floor, with a large cushion or pillow at the head, against which the great man reclines" (Wilson). "To be placed on the guddān" is to succeed to the kingdom. The word is also used for the pad placed on an elephant's back.

[1809.—"Seendhiya was seated nearly in the centre, on a large square cushion covered with gold brocade; his back supported by a round bolster, and his arms resting upon two flat cushions; all covered with the same costly material, and forming together a kind of throne, called a musnud, or guddie."—Broughton, Letters from a Maharatta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 28.]

GUDGE, s. P.—H. gaz, and corr. gaj; a Persian yard measure or thereabouts; but in India applied to measures of very varying lengths, from the hath, or natural cubit, to the English yard. In the Aīn [ed. Jarrett, ii. 58 seqq.] Abūl Fazl details numerous gas which had been in use under the Caliphs or in India, varying from 18 inches English (as calculated by
J. Prinsep] to 52\(\frac{1}{4}\). The \textit{Nali} gaz of Akbar was intended to supersede all these as a standard; and as it was the basis of all records of land-measurements and rents in Upper India, the determination of its value was a subject of much importance when the revenue surveys were undertaken about 1824. The results of enquiry were very discrepant, however, and finally an arbitrary value of 33 inches was assumed. The \textit{bigha} (see \textit{BEGAH}), based on this, and containing 3600 square \textit{gaz}=\(\frac{3}{4}\) of an acre, is the standard in the N.W.P., but statistics are now always rendered in acres. See Gladwin's \\textit{Ayeen} (1800) i. 302, seqq.; Prinsep's \textit{Useful Tables}, ed. Thomas, 122; \textit{Madras Administration Manual}, ii. 505.

[1532.—"... and if in quantity the measure and the weight, and whether ells, rods or \textit{gazes}.—Archiv. For. Orient. i. 5, p. 1662.

1754.—"Some of the townsmen again demanded of me to open my bales, and sell them some pieces of cloth; but I rather chose to make several of them presents of \(2\frac{1}{4}\) \textit{gaz} of cloth, which is the measure they usually take for a coat."—Halway, i. 125.

1768-71.—"A \textit{gess} or \textit{goss} is \(2\) \textit{cobidos}, being at Chinsurah 2 feet and 10 inches Rhineland measure."—Stanorians, E.T. i. 463.

1814.—"They have no measures but the \textit{gudge}, which is from their elbow to the end of the middle finger, for measuring length."—Pearse, \textit{Ae of the Ways of the Abyssinians}, in \textit{Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo.} ii. 36.

GUICOWAR, n.p. Gâekwâr, the title of the Mahratta kings of Guzerat, descended from Dâmâji and Pilâji Gâekwâr, who rose to distinction among Mahratta warriors in the second quarter of the 18th century. The word means 'Cowherd.'

[1813.—"These princes were all styled Guickwar, in addition to their family name... the word literally means a cowkeeper, which, although a low employment in general, has, in this noble family among the Hindoos, who venerate that animal, become a title of great importance."—Forbes, \textit{Or. Mem.} 2nd ed. i. 375.]

GUINEA-CLOTHS, GUINEA-STUFFS, s. Apparently these were piece-goods bought in India to be used in the West African trade. [On the other hand, Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with \textit{gunny} (Report on old \textit{Recs.}, 224). The manufacture still goes on at Pondicherry.] These are presumably the \textit{Negros-tucher} of Baldaens (1672), p. 154.

[1675.—"Guinea-stuffs," in \textit{Birdwood, ut supra}.

1813.—"The demand for Surat piece-goods has been much decreased in Europe... and from the abolition of the slave trade, the demand for the African market has been much reduced... \textit{Guinea stuffs}, 4\(\frac{1}{2}\) yards each (per ton) 1200 (pieces)."—\textit{Miliburn}, i. 299.

[1878.—"The chief trades of Pondicherry are, spinning, weaving and dyeing the cotton stuffs known by the name of \textit{Guinees}."—\textit{Curtin, Man. of S. Arod,} 426.]

[GUINEA DEER, s. An old name for some species of Chevrotain, in the quotation probably the \textit{Tragulus meminna} or Mouse Deer (Blanford, \textit{Mammalia}, 555).

[1755.—"Common deer they have here (in Ceylon) in great abundance, and also \textit{Guinea Deer."—\textit{Ives}, 57.]

GUINEA-FOWL. There seems to have been, in the 16th century, some confusion between turkeys and Guinea-fowl. See however under \textit{TURKEY}. The Guinea-fowl is the \textit{Meleagris} of Aristotle and others, the \textit{Afræ avis} of Horace.

GUINEA-PIG, s. This was a nick-name given to midshipmen or apprentices on board Indianen in the 18th century, when the command of such a vessel was a sure fortune, and large fees were paid to the captain with whom the youngsters embarked. Admiral Smyth, in his \textit{Sailor's Handbook}, 1867, defines: 'The younger midshipmen of an Indianman.'

[1779.—"I promise you, to me it was no slight penance to be exposed during the whole voyage to the half sneering, satirical looks of the mates and \textit{guinea-pigs}."—\textit{Magistow, Travels}, quoted in \textit{Carey, Old Days}, i. 73.]

GUINEA-WORM, s. A parasitic worm (\textit{Filaria Medinensis}) inhabiting the subcutaneous cellular tissue of man, frequently in the leg, varying from 6 inches to 12 feet in length, and common on the Pers. Gulf, in Upper Egypt, Guinea, &c. It is found in some parts of W. India. "I have known," writes M.-Gen. Keatinge, "villages where half the people were maimed by it after the rains." Matunga, the Head Quarters of the Bombay Artillery, was abandoned, in great measure, on account of this pest." [It is the disease most common in the Damoh District (C. P. Gazetteer, 176, Sleeman, Rambles, &c., ed. V. A. Smith, i. 94). It is the râšha, reshta of Central Asia (Schuyler, Turkestan, i. 147; Wolff, Travels, ii. 407).] The reason of the name is shown by the quotation from Purchas respecting its prevalence in Guinea. The disease is graphically described by Agatharchides in the first quotation.

b. c. 113.—"Those about the Red Sea who are stricken with a certain malady, as Agatharchides relates, besides being afflicted with another novel and unheard-of symptoms, of which one is that small snake-like worms (δρακωντα μυξα) eat through the legs and arms, and peep out, but when touched instantly shrink back again, and winding among the muscles produce intolerable burning pains."—In Dubner's ed. of Plutarch, iv. 872, viz. Table Discussions, Bk. VIII. Quest. ix. 3.

1600.—"The worms in the legs and bodies trouble not every one that goeth to those Countreys, but some are troubled with them and some are not"—(a full account of the disease follows).—Desc. of Guinea, in Purchas, ii. 983.

c. 1630.—"But for their water . . . I may call it Aqua Moris . . . it engenders small long worms in the legs of such as use to drink it . . . by no potion, no unguent to be recycled: they have no other way to destroy them, save by rowling them about a pin or peg, not unlike the treble of Theorbo."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 128.

1664.—". . . nor obliged to drink of those naughty waters . . . full of nastiness of so many people and beasts . . . that do cause such fevers, which are very hard to cure, and which breed also certain very dangerous worms in the legs . . . they are commonly of the bigness and length of a small Vial-stick, and they must be drawn out little by little, from day to day, gently winding them about a little twig, about the bigness of a needle, for fear of breaking them."—Bernier, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 355].

1676.—"Guinea Worms are very frequent in some Places of the West Indies . . . I rather judge that they are generated by drinking bad water."—Dampier, ii. 89-90.

1712.—"Hace vita est Ornusienium, imò civilum totius littoris Persici, ut perpetuas in corpore calamitates ferant ex coeli in-tempere: modo sudore diff uint; modo vexantur furunculis; nunc cibi sunt, mor aquae inopes; suæ ventis uiritibus, som-per sole torrente, squalent et quis omnis reconsent? Unum ex aerumnias gravioribus induo: nimirum Lumbri corum singularum genus, quod non in intestinis, sed in masculis per corporis ambitum natale invenit. Latinii mediici vermem illum nomine donant rov drakontov, s. Dracunculi . . . Guineaenses nigrtae lingua suâ . . . vermes illos vocant fkomôn, ut produnt reducés ex aurifero illo Africane litorio . . . "—Kaempfer, Amoen. Eotic., 524-5. Kaempfer speculates as to why the old physicians called it dracunculus; but the name was evidently taken from the δρακοντων of Agatharchides, quoted above.

1768.—"The less dangerous diseases which attack Europeans in Guinea are, the dry belly-ache, and a worm which breeds in the flesh. . . . Dr. Rouppe observes that the disease of the Guinea-worm is infectious."—End on Diseases of Hot Climates, pp. 53, 54.

1774.—See an account of this pest under the name of "le ser des nerfs (Vena Medinensis), in Niebuh, Desc. de l'Arabie, 117. The name is derived by Niebuh is, as we learn from Kaempfer's remarks, "arab Mediini, the Medina nerve (rather than vein)."

1821.—"The doctor himself is just going off to the Cape, half-dead from the Kotah fever; and, as if that were not enough, the navoot, or guinea-worm, has blanched his cheek and made him a cripple."—Trot, Annals, ed. 1884, ii. 743.

GUJPUTTY, n.p. (See COSPETIR.)

GUM-GUM, s. We had supposed this word to be an invention of the late Charles Dickens, but it seems to be a real Indian, or Anglo-Indian, word. The nearest approximation in Shakespeare's Dict. is gomak, 'sound of the kettledrum.' But the word is perhaps a Malay plural of gong originally; see the quotation from Osbeck. [The quotations from Bowdich and Medley (from Scott, Malay Words, p. 53) perhaps indicate an African origin.]

1659.—". . . The roar of great guns, the sounding of trumpets, the beating of drums, and the noise of the gomgomen of the Indians."—From the account of the Dutch attack (1659) on a village in Ceram, given in Wonder Schonten, Reisgoot naer en door Ost-inden, 4th ed. 1775, i. 55. In the Dutch version, "en het geraas van de gom- gommen der Indianner." The French of 1707 (i. 92) has "au bruit du canon, des trompettes, des tambour et des gomgommes Indiennes."

1731.—"One of the Hottentot Instruments of Music is common to several Negro Nations, and is called both by Negroes and Hottentots, gum-gom . . . is a Bow of Iron, or Olive Wood, strung with twisted Sheep-Gut or Sinews."—Medley, tr. Kolben's Cape of Good Hope, i. 271.]
GUNGE.  403  GUP.

c. 1750-60.—"A music far from delightful, consisting of little drums they call Gum-gums, cymbals, and a sort of file."—Grose, i. 139.

1768-71.—"They have a certain kind of musical instruments called gom-goms, consisting in hollow iron bowls, of various sizes and tones, upon which a man strikes with an iron or wooden stick . . . not unlike a set of bells."—Stavorinus, E. T. i. 215. See also p. 65.

1771.—"At night we heard a sort of music, partly made by insects, and partly by the noise of the Gungung."—Osbeck, i. 185.

[1819.—"The gong-gongs and drums were beat all around us."—Bowditch, Mission to Ashantee, i. 7, 196.]

1836.—"Did you ever hear a tom-tom, Sir?" sternly enquired the Captain . . .
   "A what?" asked Hardy, rather taken aback.
   'A tom-tom.'
   'Never!'
   'Nor a gum-gum?'
   'Never!'
   'What is a gum-gum?' eagerly enquired several young ladies."—Sketches by Boz, The Steam Excursion.

[GUNGE, s. Hind. ganj, 'a store, store-house, market.'
[1782.—See under GOMASTA.
[1772.—"Gunge, a market principally for grain."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s.v.
[1858.—"The term Gunge signifies a range of buildings at a place of traffic, for the accommodation of merchants and all persons engaged in the purchase and sale of goods, and for that of their goods and of the shopkeepers who supply them."—Steenman, Journey through Oudh, i. 278.]

GUNJA, s. Hind. ganjha, ganja. The flowering or fruiting shoots of the female plant of Indian hemp (Cannabis sativa, L.), formerly distinguished as C. indica), used as an intoxicant. (See BANG.)

[c. 1813.—"The natives have two proper names for the hemp (Cannabis sativa), and call it Gangia when young, and Siddhi when the flowers have fully expanded."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 865.]

1874.—"In odour and the absence of taste, ganja resembles bhang. It is said that after the leaves which constitute bhang have been gathered, little shoots sprout from the stem, and that these, picked off and dried, form what is called ganja."—Hanbury & Flückiger, 493.

GUNNY, GUNNY-BAG, s. From Skt. go, 'a sack'; Hind. and Mahr. go, 'a sack, sacking.' The popular and trading name of the coarse sacking and sacks made from the fibre of jute, much used in all Indian trade. Tātā is a common Hind. name for the stuff. [With this word Sir G. Birdwood identifies the forms found in the old records—"Guiny Stuffes (1671)," "Guynie stuffs," "Guinea stuffs," "Gunnye" (Rep. on Old Records, 26, 38, 39, 224); but see under GUINEA-CLOTHS.]

[1750.—"Sircar Ghoghat produces raw silk, gunneys, and plenty of Tanghai horses."—Gladwin's Ayeen, ed. 1800, i. 9; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 123]. (But here, in the original, the term is pārchah-i-tāfband.)

1839.—"Besides the aforementioned articles Goeny-sacks are collected at Palicole."—Havart (9), 14.

1771.—"When Sugar is pack'd in double Gonesy, the outer Bag is always valued in Contract at 1 or 1½ Shāhrees."—Lockyer, 244.

1729.—In a list of goods procurable at Duatzerom: "Goeni-zakken (Gunny bags)."—Valentijn, Chr. 40.

1727.—"Sheldon . . . put on board some rotten long Pepper, that he could dispose of in no other Way, and some damaged Gunies, which are much used in Persia for embalming Goods, when they are good in their kind."—A. Hamilton, ii. 15; [ed. 1742].

1764.—"Baskets, Gunny bags, and dubbers . . . Rs. 24."—In Long, 384.

1785.—"We enclose two parvanehs . . . directing them each to despatch 1000 goonies of grain to that person of mighty degree."—Tipypo's Letters, 171.

1885.—"The land was so covered with them (plover) that the hunters shot them with all kind of arms. We counted 80 birds in the gunny-sack that three of the soldiers brought in."—Boots and Saddles, by Mrs. Custer, p. 37. (American work.)

GUNTA, s. Hind. ghantu, 'a bell or gong.' This is the common term for expressing an European hour in modern Hindūstānī. [See PANDY.]

GUP, s. Idle gossip. P.—H. gap, 'prattle, tattle.' The word is perhaps an importation from Tūrān. Vāmbery gives Orient. Turki gip, geb, 'word, saying, talk'; which, however, Pavet de Courteille suggests to be a corruption from the Pers. guftan, 'to say'; of which, indeed, there is a form guptan. [So Platts, who also compares Skt. japa, which is the Bengali golpo, 'babble.'] See quotation from Schuyler showing the use in Turkistan. The word is perhaps best known in England through an unamiable account of society in S.
India, published under the name of "Gup," in 1868.

1809-10.—"They (native ladies) sit on their cushions from day to day, with no other . . . amusement than hearing the 'gup-gup,' or gossip of the place."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 357.

1876.—"The first day of mourning goes by the name of gup, i.e. commemorative talk."—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 161.

GUREEBPURWUR, GUREEBNUWAUZ, ss. Ar.—P. Gharibpurwur, Gharibnawaz, used in Hind. as respectfull terms of address, meaning respectively 'Provider of the Poor!' 'Cherisher of the Poor!'

1726.—"Those who are of equal condition bend the body somewhat towards each other, and lay hold of each other by the beard, saying Grab-anemoas, i.e. I wish you the prayers of the poor."—Valentijn, Chr. 109, who copies from Van Twist (1648), p. 55.

1824.—"I was appealed to loudly by both parties, the soldiers calling on me as 'Ghureeb purwur,' the Goomashta, not to be outdone, exclaiming 'Donai, Lord Sahib! Donai! Rajah!'" (Read Dohâi and see DOAI).—Héber, i. 266. See also p. 279.

1887.—"Protector of the Poor!" he cried, prostrating himself at my feet, 'help thy most unworthy and wretched slave! An unblest and evil-minded alligator has this day devoured my little daughter. She went down to the river to fill her earthen jar with water, and the evil one dragged her down, and has devoured her. Alas! she had on her gold bangles. Great is my misfortune!'—W. Cot. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 99.

GURJAUT, n.p. The popular and official name of certain forest tracts at the back of Orissa. The word is a hybrid, being the Hind. garh, 'a fort,' Persianised into a plural garhjâjt, in ignorance of which we have seen, in quasi-official documents, the use of a further English plural, Gurjauts or garhjâjts, which is like 'fortses.' [In the quotation below, the writer seems to think it a name of a class of people.] This manner of denoting such tracts from the isolated occupation by fortified posts seems to be very ancient in that part of India. We have in Ptolemy and the Periplous Dostarêne or Dâsarêne, apparently representing Skt. Dâstrâya, quasi dasân rîna, 'having Ten Forts,' which the lists of the Bhûr Senhûta shew us in this part of India (J.R. As. Soc., N.S., v. 83). The forest tract behind Orissa is called in the grant of an Orissa king, Nava Koti, 'the Nine Forts' (J.A.S.B. xxxiii. 84); and we have, in this region, further in the interior, the province of Chattisgarh, '36 Forts.'

[1820.—"At present nearly one half of this extensive region is under the immediate jurisdiction of the British Government; the other possessed by tributary zemindars called Gurjauts, or hill chiefs. . . ."—Hamilton, Description of Hindostan, ii. 32.]

a. A little fort; Hind. garhā. Also Gurr, i.e. garh, 'a fort.'

1693.—". . . many of his Heathen Nobles, only such as were befriended by strong Gurs, or Fastnesses upon the Mountains. . . ."—Fryer, 165.

1786.—". . . The Zemindars in 4 pargunnahs are so refractory as to have forfeited (read fortified) themselves in their gurries, and to refuse all payments of revenue."—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 59.

[1835.—"A shot was at once fired upon them from a high Ghauree."—Forbes, Ras Mâla, ed. 1875, p. 521.]

GUTTA PERCHA, s. This is the Malay name Gatah Pertija, i.e. 'Sap of the Percha,' Dichopsis Gutta, Bentham: (Isonandra Gutta, Hooker; N.O. Sapotoaceae). Dr. Oxley writes (J. Ind. Archip. i. 22) that percha is properly the name of a tree which produces a spurious article; the real gutta p. is produced by the têbou. [Mr. Maxwell (Ind. Ant. xvii. 358) points out that the proper reading is taban.] The product was first brought to notice in 1843 by Dr. Montgomery. It is collected by first ringing the tree and then felling it, and no doubt by this process the article will speedily become extinct. The history of G. P. is, however, far from well known. Several trees are known to contribute to the exported article; their juices being mixed together. [Mr. Scott (Malay Words, 55 seqq.) writes the word getah percha, or getah perchah, 'gum of percha,' and remarks that it has been otherwise explained as meaning 'gum of Sumatra,' "there being another word percha, a name of Sumatra, as well as a third word percha, 'a rag, a remnant." Mr. Maxwell (loc. cit.) writes: 'It is still uncertain whether there is a gutta-producing tree called Percha by the Malays. My experience is that they give the name of Perchah to that kind of getah taban which hardens into strips in boiling. These are stuck together and made into balls for export.”]

[1847.—“Gutta Percha is a remarkable example of the rapidity with which a really useful invention becomes of importance to the English public. A year ago it was almost unknown, but now its peculiar properties are daily being made more available in some new branch of the useful or ornamental arts.”—Mundy, Journal, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, ii. 342 seq. (quoted by Scott, loc. cit.)]

1868.—“The late Mr. d’Almeida was the first to call the attention of the public to the substance now so well known as gutta-percha. At that time the Isandra Gutta was an abundant tree in the forests of Singapore, and was first known to the Malays, who made use of the juice which they obtained by cutting down the trees. ... Mr. d’Almeida ... acting under the advice of a friend, forwarded some of the substance to the Society of Arts. There it met with no immediate attention, and was put away uncared for. A year or two afterwards Dr. Montgomery sent specimens to England, and bringing it under the notice of competent persons, its value was at once acknowledged. ... The sudden and great demand for it soon resulted in the disappearance of all the gutta-percha trees on Singapore Island.”—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 288-9.

("GUZZY, s. Pers. and Hind. gazī; perhaps from its having been woven of a gaz (see GUDGE) in breadth. A very poor kind of cotton cloth.

1701.—In a price list for Persia we find: “Gesjes Bengals.”—Valentijn, v. 303.

1784.—“It is suggested that the following articles may be proper to compose the first adventure (to Tibet): ... Guzzie, or coarse Cotton Cloths, and Otterskins. ...”—In Seton-Karr, i. 4.

[1866.—“... common unbleached fabrics ... used for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead. ... These fabrics in Bengal pass under the names of Grrkha and Guzee.”—Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 83.]

GWALIOR, n.p. Hind. Gwâliûr. A very famous rock-fortress of Upper India, rising suddenly and picturesquely out of a plain (or shallow valley rather) to a height of 300 feet, 65 m. south of Agra, in lat. 26° 13’. Gwalior may be traced back, in Gen. Cunningham’s opinion, to the 3rd century of our era. It was the seat of several ancient Hindu dynasties, and from the time of the early Mahommedan sovereigns of Delhi down to the reign of Aurangzib it was used as a state-prison. Early in the 18th century it fell into the possession of the Mahratta family of Sindhia, whose residence was established to the south of the fortress, in what was originally a camp, but has long been a city known by the original title of Lashkar (camp). The older city lies below the northern foot of the rock. Gwalior has been three times taken by British arms: (1) escaladed by a force under the command of Major Popham in 1780, a very daring feat; (2) by a regular attack under Gen. White in 1805; (3) most gallantly in June 1858, by a party of the 25th Bombay N. I. under Lieutenants Rose and Waller, in which the former officer fell. After the two first captures the fortress was restored to the Sindhia family. From 1858 it was retained in our hands, but in December 1885 it was formally restored to the Mâhârâjâ Sindhia.

The name of the fortress, according to Gen. Cunningham (Archeol. Survey, ii. 335), is derived from a small Hindû shrine within it dedicated to the hermit Gwdlí or Gwâliû-pâ, after whom the fortress received the name of Gwâliûwar, contracted into Gwâliûr.

c. 1020.—“From Kanauj, in travelling south-east, on the western side of the Ganges, you come to Jajhdhoti, at a distance of 30 parasangs, of which the capital is Kajurda. In that country are the two forts of Gwâliûr and Kâlinjâr. ...”—Ali-Bërîsâ, in Elliot, i. 57-8.

c. 1196.—The royal army marched “towards Gâlewâr, and invested that fort, which is the pearl of the necklace of the castles of Hind, the summit of which the nimble-footed wind from below cannot reach, and on the bastions of which the clouds have never cast their shade. ...”—Hasan Nîzâmî, in Elliot, ii. 227.

c. 1340.—“The castle of Gâliûr, of which we have been speaking, is on the top of a high hill, and appears, so to speak, as if it were itself cut out of the rock. There is no other hill adjoining; it contains reservoirs

* The two companies which escaded were led by Captain Bruce, a brother of the Abyssinian traveller. “It is said that the spot was pointed out to Popham by a cowherd, and that the whole of the attacking party were supplied with grass shoes to prevent them from slipping on the ledges of rock. There is a story also that the cost of these grass-shoes was deducted from Popham’s pay, when he was about to leave India as a major-general, nearly a quarter of a century afterwards,”—Cunningham, Arch. Surv. ii. 340.
of water, and some 20 wells walled round are attached to it: on the walls are mounted mangonels and catapults. The fortress is ascended by a wide road, traversed by elephants and horses. Near the castle-gate is the figure of an elephant carved in stone, and surmounted by a figure of the driver. Seeing it from a distance one has no doubt about its being a real elephant. At the foot of the fortress is a fine city, entirely built of white stone, mosques and houses alike; there is no timber to be seen in it, except that of the gates."—Im Batuta, ii. 193.

1526.—"I entered Guálír by the Hátí-pál gate. ... They call an elephant hátí, and a gate pál. On the outside of this gate is the figure of an elephant, having two elephant drivers on it. ..."—Baber, p. 385.

[c. 1590.—"Guálír is a famous fort, in which there are many stately buildings, and there is a stone elephant over the gate. The air and climate of this place are both esteemed good. It has always been celebrated for fine singers and beautiful women."—Ayn, Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 38; ed. Jarrett, ii. 181.]

1610.—"The 31 to Gwalere, 6 c., a pleasant Citie with a Castle. ... On the West side of the Castle, which is a steep craggy cliffe of 6 c. compass at least (divers say eleven). ... From hence to the top, leads a narrow stone causey, walled on both sides; in the way are three gates to be passed, all exceeding strong, with Courts of guard to each. At the top of all, at the entrance of the last gate, standeth a mightie Elephant of stone very curiously wrought. ..."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 426-7.

1616.—"23. Gwalier, the chief City so called, where the Mogol hath a very rich Treasury of Gold and Silver kept in this City, within an exceeding strong Castle, wherein the King's Prisoners are likewise kept. The Castle is continually guarded by a very strong Company of Armed Souldiers."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 356.

c. 1665.—"For to shut them up in Goualeor, which is a Fortress where the Princes are ordinarily kept close, and which is held impregnable, it being situated upon an inaccessible Rock, and having within itself good water, and provision enough for a Garrison; that was not an easie thing."—Bernier E.T. 5; [ed. Constable, 14].

c. 1670.—"Since the Mahometan Kings became Masters of this Country, this Fortress of Goualeor is the place where those several Princes and great Noblemen, Chaiséan coming to the Empire by foul-play, caus'd all the Princes and Lords whom he mistrusted, to be seiz'd one after another, and sent them to the Fortress of Goualeor; but he suffer'd them all to live and enjoy their estates. Aurenge-zeb his Son acts quite otherwise; for when he sends any great Lord to this place, at the end of nine or ten days he orders him to be poison'd; and this he does that the people may not explain against him for a bloody Prince."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 35; [ed. Bull, i. 63].

GYAUL (properly GAYÁL), [Skt. go, 'an ox'], s. A large animal (Gáváus frontalis, Jerd., Bos f. Blanford, Mam-malta, 487) of the ox tribe, found wild in various forest tracts to the east of India. It is domesticated by the Mishmis of the Assam valley, and other tribes as far south as Chittagong. In Assam it is called Mithan.

[c. 1590.—In Arakan, "cows and buffaloes there are none, but there is an animal which has somewhat of the characteristics of both, piebal and particoloured whose milk the people drink."—Asín, ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1824.—"In the park several uncommon animals are kept. Among them the Ghyal, an animal of which I had not, to my recollection, read any account, though the name was not unknown to me. It is a very noble creature, of the ox or buffalo kind, with immensely large horns. ..."—Haber, i. 34.

1866-67.—"I was awakened by an extraordinary noise, something between a bull's bellow and a railway whistle. What was it? We started to our feet, and Fuzlah and I were looking to our arms when Adupah said, 'It is only the guyal calling; Sahib! Look, the dawn is just breaking, and they are opening the village gates for the beasts to go out to pasture.

"These guyal were beautiful creatures, with broad fronts, sharp wide-spread horns, and mild melancholy eyes. They were the indigenous cattle of the hills domesticated by these equally wild Lushais. ..."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, &c., p. 303.

17 GYE LONG, s. A Buddhist priest in Tibet. Tibet. dGe-sLong, i.e. 'beggar of virtue,' i.e. a bhikshu or mendicant friar (see under BUXXE) but latterly a priest who has received the highest orders. See Jaeschke, p. 86.

1784.—"He was dressed in the festival habit of a gyelong or priest, being covered with a scarlet satin cloak, and a gilded mitre on his head."—Boyle, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

GYM-KHANA, s. This word is quite modern, and was unknown 40 years ago. The first use that we can trace is (on the authority of Major John Trotter) at Rürki in 1861, when a gymkhana was instituted there. It is a factitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon gend-khun ('ball-house'), the name usually given in Hind. to an English racket-court. It is applied to a place of public resort at a station, where the needful facilities for athletics and games of sorts are provided, including (when that was in fashion) a skating-rink, a lawn-tennis ground, and so forth. The gym may have been simply a corruption of gend shaped by gymnastics, [of which the English public school short form gym passed into Anglo-Indian jargon]. The word is also applied to a meeting for such sports; and in this sense it has travelled already as far as Malta, and has since become common among Englishmen abroad. [The suggestion that the word originated in the P. — H. jama‘at-khana, ‘a place of assembling,’ is not probable.]

1877. — "Their proposals are that the Cricket Club should include in their programme the games, &c., proposed by the promoters of a gymkhana Club, so far as not to interfere with cricket, and should join in making a rink and lawn-tennis, and badminton courts, within the cricket-ground enclosure."—Pioneer Mail, Nov. 3.

1879. — "Mr. A—— F—— can always be depended on for epigram, but not for accuracy. In his letters from Burma he talks of the Gymkhana at Rangoon as a sort of establissement [sic] where people have pleasant little dinners. In the 'Oriental Arcadia,' which Mr. F—— tells us is flavoured with naughtiness, people may do strange things, but they do not dine at Gymkhana.'"—Ibid. July 2.

1881.—"R. E. Gymkhana at Malta, for Polo and other Ponies, 20th June, 1881."—Heading in Royal Engineer Journal, Aug. 1, p. 159.

1883.—"I am not speaking of Bombay people with their clubs and gymkhana and other devices for oiling the wheels of existence. . . ."—Tribes on My Frontier, 9.

GYNEE. s. H. gaini. A very diminutive kind of cow bred in Bengal. It is, when well cared for, a beautiful creature, is not more than 3 feet high, and affords excellent meat. It is mentioned by Aelian:

1. 250.—"There are other bullocks in India, which to look at are no bigger than the largest goats; these also are yoked, and run very swiftly."—De Nat. Anim., xv. 24.

2. 1590.—"There is also a species of oxen called gaini, small like gat (see GOONT) horses, but very beautiful."—Atw., i. 149.

[1829.—". . . I found that the said tiger had feasted on a more delicious morsel,—a nice little Ghinee, a small cow."—Mem. of John Skipp, iii. 192.]

1832.—"We have become great farmers, having sown our crop of oats, and are building outhouses to receive some 34 dwarf cows and oxen (gynees) which are to be fed up for the table."—F. Parker, Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 251.

H

HACKERY, s. In the Bengal Presidency this word is now applied only to the common native bullock-cart used in the slow draught of goods and materials. But formerly in Bengal, as still in Western India and Ceylon, the word was applied to lighter carriages (drawn by bullocks) for personal transport. In Broughton's Letters from a Mahratta Camp (p. 156; [ed. 1892, p. 117]) the word is used for what in Upper India is commonly called an ekka (q.v.), or light native pony-carriage; but this is an exceptional application. Though the word is used by Englishmen almost universally in India, it is unknown to natives, or if known is regarded as an English term; and its origin is exceedingly obscure. The word seems to have originated on the west side of India, where we find it in our earliest quotations. It is probably one of those numerous words which were long in use, and undergoing corruption by illiterate soldiers and sailors, before they appeared in any kind of literature. Wilson suggests a probable Portuguese origin, e.g. from acacretar, 'to convey in a cart.' It is possible that the mere Portuguese article and noun 'a carreta' might have produced the Anglo-Indian hackery. Thus in Correa, under 1513, we have a description of the Surat hackeries; "and the carriages (as carretas) in which he and the Portuguese travelled, were elaborately wrought, and furnished with silk hangings, covering them from the sun; and these carriages (as carretas) run so smoothly (the country consisting of level plains) that the people travelling in them sleep as tranquilly as on the ground" (ii. 369).

But it is almost certain that the origin of the word is the H. chakra, 'a two-wheeled cart'; and it may be noted that in old Singhalese chakka, a cart-wheel,' takes the forms haka and saka (see Kuhn, On Oldest Aryan Elements of Singhalese, translated by D. Ferguson in Indian Ant. xii. 64). [But this can have no connection with chhakru, which represents Skt. sakata, 'a waggon.]

1673.—"The Coach wherein I was breaking, we were forced to mount the Indian Hackery, a Two-wheeled Chariot, drawn by swift little Oxen."—Fryer, 83. [For these swift oxen, see note from Forbes below, and from Aelian under GYNEE.]

1690.—"Their Hackeries likewise, which are a kind of Coach, with two Wheels, are all drawn by Oxen."—Ovington, 254.

1711.—"The Streets (at Surat) are wide and commodious; otherwise the Hackerys, which are very common, would be an Inconvenience. These are a sort of Coaches drawn by a Pair of Oxen."—Lockyer, 259.

1742.—"The bridges are much worn, and out of repair, by the number of Hackeries and other carriages which are continually passing over them."—In Wheeler, iii. 202.

1756.—"The 11th of July the Nawab arrived in the city, and with him Bundo Sing, to whose house we were removed that afternoon in a hackery."—Hollell, in Wheeler's Early Records, 249.

c. 1760.—"The hackrees are a conveyance drawn by oxen, which would at first give an idea of slowness that they do not deserve . . . they are open on three sides, covered a-top, and are made to hold two people sitting cross-legged."—Grose, i. 155-156.

1780.—"A hackery is a small covered carriage upon two wheels drawn by bullocks, and used generally for the female part of the family."—Hodges, Travels, 5.

c. 1790.—"Quant aux palankins et hackaries (voitures à deux rous), on les passe sur une double sangarie" (see JANGAR).—Haafner, i. 173.

1793.—"To be sold by Public Auction . . . a new Fashioned Hackery."—Bombay Courier, April 13.

1798.—"At half-past six o'clock we each got into a hackery."—Stavorinus, tr. by Willockes, iii. 295.

1811.—Solvyns draws and describes the Hackery in the modern Bengal sense.

"Il y a cependant quelques en- droits où l'on se sert de charrettes couvertes à deux rous, appelées hickeris, devant lesquelles on attelle à longues, et qui servent à voyager."—Editor of Haafner, Voyages, ii. 8.

1813.—"Travelling in a light hackaree, at the rate of five miles an hour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 376; [2nd ed. i. 352; in i, 150, hackeries, ii. 263, hackarees]. Forbes's engraving represents such an ox-carriage as would be called in Bengal a baulia (see BYLEE).

1829.—"The genuine vehicle of the country is the hackery. This is a sort of wee tent, covered more or less with tinsel and scarlet, and bells and gliding, and placed upon a clumsy two-wheeled carriage with a pole that seems to be also a kind of boot, as it is at least a foot deep. This is drawn by a pair of white bullocks."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 84.

1860.—"Native gentlemen, driving fast trotting oxen in little hackery carts, hasted home from it."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 140.

[HADDY, s. A grade of troops in the Mogul service. According to Prof. Blochmann (Äin, i. 20, note) they corresponded to our "Warranted officers." "Most clerks of the Imperial offices, the painters of the Court, the foremen in Akbars workshops, &c., belonged to this corps. They were called Ahadis, or single men, because they stood under Akbar's immediate orders." And Mr. Irvine writes: "Midway between the nobles or leaders (mansabdârâ) with the horsemen under them (tabînâm) on the one hand, and the Akszam (see EYSHAM), or infantry, artillery, and artificers on the other, stood the Ahdai, or gentleman trooper. The word is literally 'single' or 'alone' (A. ahdâd, one'). It is easy to see why this name was applied to them; they offered their services singly, they did not attach themselves to any chief, thus forming a class apart from the tabînâm; but as they were horsemen, they stood equally apart from the specialised services included under the remaining head of Akszam." (J. R. A. Soc., July 1896, p. 545.)

[c. 1590.—"Some soldiers are placed under the care and guidance of one commander. They are called Ahadis, because they are fit for a harmonious unity."—Äin, ed. Blochmann, i. 231.

1616.—"The Prince's Haddy . . . betrayed me."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 383.

1617.—"A Haddey of horse sent down to see it effected."—Ibid. ii. 450.

[c. 1625.—"The day after, one of the King's Haddys finding the same."—Coryat, in Purchas, i. 600.]

HADGEE, s. Ar. Hâjî, a pilgrim to Mecca; from hajj, the pilgrimage, or visit to a venerated spot. Hence Hâjjî and Hâjî used colloquially in Persian and Turkish. Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "There is current confusion about the word hajî. It is originally the participle of hajj, he went on the hajj. But in modern use hâjî is used as part., and hâjî is the title given to one who has made the pilgrimage. When this is prefixed to a name, the double j cannot be pronounced without inserting a short vowel and the a is shortened; thus you say 'el-Hajji Soleimân,' or the like. The incorrect form Hajji is however used by Turks and Persians.'

[1609.—"Upon your order, if Hoghee Careen so please, I purpose to delve him 25 pigs of lead."—Dawers, Letters, i. 26.]

[c. 1610.—"Those who have been to Arabia... are called Agy."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 165.]

[c. 1665.—"Aureng Zebe once observed perhaps by way of joke, that Sultan Suyah was become at last an Agy or pilgrim."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 113.]

[1673.—"Hodge, a Pilgrimage to Mecca." (See under A MUCK.)]

[1683.—"Hedgee Sopee Caun." See under FIRMAUN.]

1755.—"Hodge acquired this title from his having in his early years made a pilgrimage to Dodge (or the tomb of Mahommed at Mecca)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 59.

[c. 1839.—"The very word in Hebrew KHog, which means 'festival,' originally meant 'pilgrimage,' and corresponds with what the Arabs call hatch. ..."—Travels of Dr. Wolff, ii. 155.]

HÁKIM, s. H. from Ar. hâkim, 'a judge, a ruler, a master,' the authority.' The same Ar. root hakâm, 'bridling, restraining, judging,' supplies a variety of words occurring in this Glossary, viz. Hâkim (as here); Hakim (see HUCKEEEM); Hakâm (see HOOK-UM); Hijâmat (see HICKMAT).

[1611.—"Not standing with his greatness to answer every Haccom, which is as a Governor or petty King."—Dawers, Letters, i. 158. In ibid. i. 175, Hackum is used in the same way.]

1698.—"Hackum, a Governor."—Fryer's Index Explanatory.

c. 1861.—"Then comes a settlement Hakim, to teach me to plough and weed— I sowed the cotton he gave me—but first I boiled the seed. ..."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

HALÁLCORE, s. Lit. Ar.—P. hâlal-khor, 'one who eats what is lawful,' [hâlal being the technical Mahommedan phrase for the slaying of an animal to be used for food according to the proper ritual], applied euphemistically to a person of very low caste, a sweeper or scavenger, implying 'to whom all is lawful food.' Generally used as synonymous with bungy (q.v.). [According to Prof. Blochmann, "Hâlâlkhâr, i.e. one who eats that which the ceremonial law allows, is a euphemism for harâmkhâr, one who eats forbidden things, as pork, &c. The word halâlkhâr is still in use among educated Muhammadans; but it is doubtful whether (as stated in the Ain) it was Akbar's invention." (Ain, i. 139 note.)]

1623.—"Schiah Selim nel principio... si sdegnò tanto, che poco mancou che per dispetto non la desse per forza in matrimonio ad uno della raza che chiamano halâl chor, quasi dica 'mangia leccito, cioè che ha per leccito di mangiare ogni cosa.' (See other quotation under HAREM).—P. della Valle, ii. 592; [Hak. Soc. i. 84.]

1688.—"... s'ont obligez de se purifier depuis la messe j'usqu'aux pieds si quelqu'un de ces gens qu'ils appellent Alchors, leur a touché."—Mandelson, Paris, 1659, 219.

1665.—"Ceux qui ne parlent que Persan dans les Indes, les appellent Halacour, c'est à dire celui qui se donne la liberté de manger de tout ce qu'il lui plait, ou, selon quelques uns, celui qui mange ce qu'il a légitiment gagné. Et ceux qui approuvent cette dernière explication, disent qu'autrefois Hallacours s'appellent Haramcoirs, mangeurs de Viande déboucheurs."—Thevenot, v. 130.

1673.—"That they should be accounted the Offscum of the People, and as base as the Holencores (whom they account so, because they defile themselves by eating anything)."—Fryer, 28; [and see under BOY, b.]

1690.—"The Halachors... are another Sort of Indians at Suratt, the most contemptible, but extremely necessary to be there."—Orrington, 382.

1763.—"And now I must mention the Hallachores, whom I cannot call a Tribe, being rather the refuse of all the Tribes. These are a set of poor unhappy wretches, destined to misery from their birth. ..."—Reflections, &c., by Luke Scrafton, Esq., 7-8. It was probably in this passage by Burns (see below) picked up the word.

1783.—"That no Hollocore, Derah, or Chandala caste, shall upon any consideration come out of their houses after 9 o'clock in the morning, lest they should taint the air, or touch the superior Hindoos in the streets."—Mahattra Proclamation at Baroch, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 232.

1786.—"When all my schoolfellows and youthful compers (those misguided few excepted who joined, to use a Gootee phrase, the hallachores of the human race) were striking out with eager hope and earnest intent, in some one or other of the many paths of a busy life, I was standing idle in the market-place."—Letter of Robert Burns, in A. Cunningham's ed. of Works and Life, vi. 63.
HALÁLLCUR. 410 HANGER.

1788.—The Indian Vocabulary also gives Hallachore.
1810.—" For the meaner offices we have a Hallalcor or Chandola (one of the most wretched Pariahs)."—Maria Graham, 31.

HALÁLLCUR. V. used in the imperative for affirmative, as is common in the Anglo-Indian use of H. verbs, being Ar.—H. halál-kar, 'make lawful,' i.e. put (an animal) to death in the manner prescribed to Mahommmedans, when it is to be used for food.

[1855.—" Before breakfast I bought a moderately sized sheep for a dollar. Shaykh Hamid 'halaled' (butchered) it according to rule..."—Burton, Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, i. 255.]

1883.—"The diving powers of the poor duck are exhausted... I have only to seize my booty, which has just enough of life left to allow Peer Khan to make it halal, by cutting its throat in the name of Allah, and dividing the webs of its feet."—Trihes On My Frontier, 167.

HALF-CASTE, s. A person of mixt European and Indian blood. (See MUSTEES; EURASIAN.)

1789.—"Mulatooes, or as they are called in the East Indies, half-casts."—Munro's Narrative, 51.

1793.—"They (the Mahratta Infantry) are commanded by half-cast Portuguese people of Portuguese and French extraction, who draw off the attention of the spectators from the bad clothing of their men, by the profusion of antiquated lace bestowed on their own."—Diron, Narrative, ii.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half-cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ed. Valencia, i. 329.

1823.—"An invalid sergeant... came, attended by his wife, a very pretty young half-caste."—Heber, i. 298.

1875.—"Othello is black—the very tragedy lies there; the whole force of the contrast, the whole pathos and extenuation of his doubts of Desdemona, depend on this blackness. Fechter makes him a half-caste."—G. H. Lewes, On Actors and the Art of Acting.

HANGER, s. The word in this form is not in Anglo-Indian use, but (with the Scotch whinger, Old Eng. whynnard, Fr. canjier, &c., other forms of the same) may be noted here as a corruption of the Arab. khanjar, 'a dagger or short falchion.' This (vulg. cumjor) is the Indian form. [According to the N.E.D. though 'hanger' has sometimes been employed to translate khanjar (probably with a notion of etymological identity) there is no connection between the words.] The khanjar in India is a large double-edged dagger with a very broad base and a slight curve. [See drawings in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pl. X. Nos. 504, 505, &c.]

1574.—"Patrick Spreull... being persewit be John Boill Chepman... in invadyng of him, and stryking him with an quhinger... through the quhilk the said Johnes neis wes woundit to the effusion of his blude."—Eats, from Records of the Burgh of Glasgow (1876), p. 2.

1601.—"The other day I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship was most peremptory beautiful and gentlemanlike..."—B. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, i. 4.

1781.—"I fancy myself now one of the most formidable men in Europe; a blunderbuss for Joe, a pair of double barrels to stick in my belt, and a cut and thrust hanger with a little pistol in the hilt, to hang by my side."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 96.

", "Lost out of a buggy on the Road between Barnagar and Calcutta, a steel mounted Hanger with a single guard."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, June 30.

1883.—"... by farrashes, the carpet-spreader class, a large canjar, or a curved dagger, with a heavy ivory handle, is carried; less for use than as a badge of office."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.
HANSALERI, s. Table-servant's Hind. for 'horse-radish'; 'A curious corruption, and apparently influenced by saleri, 'celery'; (Mr. M. L. Dames, in Panjab N. and Q. ii. 184).

HANSIL, s. A hawser, from the English (Roebuck).

HANSPEEK, USPUCK, &c., s. Sea Hind. Aspak. A handshake, from the English.

HARAKIRI, s. This, the native name of the Japanese rite of suicide committed as a point of honour or substitute for judicial execution, has long been interpreted as 'happy despatch,' but what the origin of this curious error is we do not know. [The N. E. D. s. v. dispatch, says that it is humorous.] The real meaning is realistic in the extreme, viz., hara, 'belly,' kirii, 'to cut.'

[1698.—'And it is often scene that they rip their own bellies open.'—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 153.
[1615.—'His mother cut her own belly.'—Foster, Letters, iv. 45.]

[1616.—'Here we had news how Galsa Same was to passe this way to morrow to goe to a church near Miaco, called Coye; som say to cut his belly, others say to be shaved a priest and to remane theare the rest of his daies.'—Cocks's Diary, i. 164.

[1617.—'The King demanded 800 tais from Shosque Dono, or else to cut his belly, whoe, not having it to pay, did it.'—Ibid. 337, see also ii. 202.

[1874.—See the elaborate account of the rite in Milford, Tales of Old Japan, 2nd ed. 329 seqq. For a similar custom among the Karens, see M'Tahon, Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 294.]

HARAMZADA, s. A scoundrel; literally 'misbegotten'; a common term of abuse. It is Ar.—P. harâmzâda, 'son of the unlawful.' Harâm is from a root signifying sacer (see under HAREM), and which appears as Hebrew in the sense of 'devoting to destruction,' and of 'a ban.' Thus in Numbers xxii. 3: 'They utterly destroyed them and their cities; and he called the name of the place Hormah.' [See Encycl. Bibl. i. 468; ii. 2110.]

[1857.—'I am no advocate for slaying Shahzadas or any such-like Haramzadas without trial.'—Bosworth Smith, L. of Ed. Lawrence, ii. 251.]

HAREM, s. Ar. haram, harîm, i.e. sacer, applied to the women of the family and their apartment. This word is not now commonly used in India, zenana (q.v.) being the common word for 'the women of the family,' or their apartments.

1298.—'... car maintes homes emo-rurent e mantes dames en furent yeves ... e maintes autres dames ne furent a toz jorz mès en plores et en lernes: ce furent les meres et les araines des homes qu'ho morurent.'—Marco Polo, in Old Text of Soc. de Géographie, 251.

1623.—'Non so come scia Selim ebbé notizia di lei e s'innamorò. Volle condurla nel suo haram o gynaecco, e tenerla quivi appresso di sè come una delle altre concu-bine; ma questa donna (Nurmahal) che era sopra modo astuta ... riuscì.'—P. della Valle, ii. 526; [Hak. Soc. i. 53.]

1630.—'This Duke here and in other seraios (or Harams as the Persians term them) has above 300 concubines.'—Herbert, 139.

1676.—'In the midst of the large Gallery is a Nich in the Wall, into which the King descends out of his Haram by a private pair of Stairs.'—Taillefer, E.T. ii. 49; [ed. Bull, i. 101.

1728.—'On the Ganges also lies a noble fortress, with the Palace of the old Emperor of Hindostan, with his Hharâam or women's apartment. ...'—Valentijn, v. 168.

[1727.—'The King ... took his Wife into his own Harran or Saraglio. ...'—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 171.

1812.—'Adjoining to the Chel Sitoon is the Harem; the term in Persia is applied to the establishments of the great; zenana is confined to those of inferior people.'—Morier, Journey through Persia, &c., 166.]

HARRY, s. This word is quite obsolete. Wilson gives Hâri as Beng. 'A servant of the lowest class, a sweeper.' [The word means 'a collector of bones,' Skt. hadda, 'a bone'; for the caste, see Risley, Tribes of Bengal, i. 314 seqq.] M.-Gen. Keatinge remarks that they are the goldsmiths of Assam; they are village watchmen in Bengal. (See under PYKE.) In two of the quotations below, Harry is applied to a woman, in one case employed to carry water. A female servant of this description is not now known among English families in Bengal.

[1818.—“The Hindoos have also market days (ḥāṭṭās), when the buyers and sellers assemble, sometimes in an open plain, but in general in market places.”—Ward, Hindoos, i. 151.]

s. Hind. Ḥavildār. A sepoy non-commissioned officer, corresponding to a sergeant, and wearing the chevrons of a sergeant. This dating from about the middle of the 18th century is the only modern use of the term in that form. It is a corruption of Pers. Ḥavilādār, or Ḥavildār, ‘one holding an office of trust’; and in this form it had, in other times, a variety of applications to different charges and subordinate officers. Thus among the Mahtrattas the commandant of a fort was so styled; whilst in Eastern Bengal the term was, and perhaps still is, applied to the holder of a havildar, an intermediate tenure between those of zemindar and ryot.

1672.—Regarding the Cowle obtained from the Nabob of Golconda for the Fort and Town of Chinapatanm. 11,000 Pagodas to be paid in full of all demands for the past, and in future Pagodas 1200 per annum rent, "and so to hold the Fort and Town free from any Avidar or Divan's People, or any other imposition for ever."—Fort St. George Cons., April 11, in Notes and Exts., No. i. 25.

1824.—"Curreem Musseeh was, I believe, a havildar in the Company's army, and his sword and sash were still hung up, with a not unpleasing vanity, over the desk where he now presided as catechist."—Heber, i. 149.

HAVILDAR'S GUARD. s. There is a common way of cooking the fry of fresh-water fish (a little larger than whitebait) as a breakfast dish, by frying them in rows of a dozen or so, spitted on a small skewer. On the Bombay side this dish is known by the whimsical name in question.

HAZREE, s. This word is commonly used in Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency for 'breakfast.' It is not clear how it got this meaning. The earlier sense was religious, as below. It is properly bažīrō, 'muster,' from the Ar. bažīr, 'ready or present.' (See CHOTA-HAZRY.)

[1832.—"The Sheeaahs prepare hazree (breakfast) in the name of his holiness Allah Aboo Ulhum-budar, Hosein's step-brother; i.e. they cook palao, rotes, curries, &c., and distribute them."—Heroldes, Qanooin-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. 183.]

HENDRY KENDRY, n.p. Two islands off the coast of the Concan, about 7 m. south of the entrance to Bombay Harbour, and now belonging to Kolaba District. The names, according to Ph. Anderson, are Haneri and Khandiri; in the Admy, chart they are Oonari, and Khundari. They are also variously written (the one) Hendry, Ondera, Hunarey, Henery, and (the other) Kundra, Cundry, Cunarey, Kenery. The real names are given in the Bombay Gazetteer as Underi and Khandari. Both islands were piratically occupied as late as the beginning of the 19th century. Khandari passed to us in 1818 as part of the Peshwa's territory; Underi lapsed in 1840. [Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Records, 83), describing the "Consultations" of 1679, writes: "At page 69, notice of 'Sevagee' fortifying 'Hendry Kendry,' the twin islets, now called Henery (i.e. Vondari, 'Mouse-like,' Kenery (i.e. Khandari), i.e. 'Sacred to Khandaroo.'" The former is thus derived from Skt. undaru, undaru, 'a rat'; the latter from Mahr. Khanderānī, 'Lord of the Sword,' a form of Siva.]

1673.—"These islands are in number seven; viz. Bombayin, Canerin, Trumby, Elephanto, the Patachos, Munshumbany, and Keranjon, with the Rock of Henry Kenry. ..."—Fryer, 61.

1851.—"Although we have formerly wrote you that we will have no war for Hendry Kendry, yet all war is so contrary to our constitution, as well as our interest, that we cannot too often inculcate to you our aversion thereunto."—Court of Directors to Surat, quoted in Anderson's Western India, p. 175.

1727.—"... four Leagues south of Bombay, are two small Islands Undra, and Cundra. The first has a Fortress belonging to the Sede, and the other is fortified by the Sevagee, and is now in the Hands of Connajeo Angria."—A. Hamilton, i. 243; [ed. 1744].

C. 1760.—"At the harbor's mouth lie two small fortified rocks, called Henara and Canara. ... These were formerly in the hands of Angria, and the Siddees, or Moors, which last have long been dispossesed of them."—Grose, i. 58.

HERBED, s. A Parsee priest, not specially engaged in priestly duties. Pers. herbad, from Pahlavi airpal.

1630.—"The Herbood or ordinary Churchman."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

HICKMAT, s. Ar.—H. hikmat; an ingenious device or contrivance. (See under HAKIM.)

1838.—"The house has been roofed in, and my relative has come up from Meerut, to have the slates put on after some peculiar hikmat of his own."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

HIDGELEE, n.p. The tract so called was under native rule a chakla, or district, of Orissa, and under our rule formerly a zilla of Bengal; but now it is a part of the Midnapur Zilla, of which it constitutes the S.E. portion, viz. the low coast lands on the west side of the Hoogly estuary, and below the junction of the Rânpâriyan. The name is properly Hijili; but it has gone through many strange phases in European records.

1558.—"The first of these rivers (from the E. side of the Ghatas) rises from two sources to the east of Chaul, about 15 leagues distant, and in an altitude of 18 to 19 degrees. The river from the most northerly of these sources is called Crusna, and the more southerly Benkora; and it is supposed that they combine and are called Ganga: and this river discharges into the illustrious stream of the Ganges between the two places called Angeli and Ficholda in about 22 degrees."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1586.—"An haven which is called Angeli in the Country of Orliza."—Fitch, in Hâkt. ii. 389.

1686.—"Chanock, on the 15th December (1686) . . . burned and destroyed all the magazines of salt, and granaries of rice, which he found in the way between Hughley and the island of Ingelée."—Orme (reprint), ii. 12.

1726.—"Hingeli."—Valentijn, v. 158.

1727.—". . . inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingelie and Kidgerie (see KEDGE-REE), two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, i. 275; [ed. 1744, ii. 2].

1758.—In apprehension of a French Fleet the Select Committee at Fort William recommend: "That the pagoda at Ingelée should be washed black, the great tree at the place cut down, and the buoys removed."—In Long, 163.

1784.—"Ships laying at Kedgeeree, Ingelle, or any other parts of the great River."—In Seton-Karr, i. 87.

HILSA, s. Hind. hilsâ, Skt. ílîśa, ilîśa; a rich and savoury fish of the shad kind (Clupea ílîša, Day), called in books the 'sable-fish' (a name, from the Port. savel, quite obsolete in India) and on the Indus palla (palla). The large shad which of late has been commonly sold by London fishmongers in the beginning of summer, is very near the hilsa, but not so rich. The hilsa is a sea-fish, ascending the river to spawn, and is taken as high as Delhi on the Jumna, as high as Mandelay on the Irawadi (Day). It is also taken in the Guzerat rivers, though not in the short and shallow streams of the Concan, nor in the Deccan rivers, from which it seems to be excluded by the rocky obstructions. It is the special fish of Sind under the name of palla, and monopolizes the name of fish, just as salmon does on the Scotch rivers (Dr. Macdonald's Actt. of Bombay Fisheries, 1883).
layan Gazetteer, ii. 273 seqq.).] We do not find it in Baber, who gives Siwālak as the Indian name of the mountains (see SīWALIK). The oldest occurrence we know of is in the Āin, which gives in the Geographical Tables, under the Third Climate, Koh-ā-Himalāh (orig. ii. 36); [ed. Jarrett, iii. 69]. This is disguised in Gladwin's version by a wrong reading into Kerlehmah (ed. 1800, ii. 367).* This form (Himmaleah) is used by Major Rennell, but hardly as if it was yet a familiar term. In Elphinston's Letters Himaleh or some other spelling of that form is always used (see below). When we get to Bishop Heber we find Himalaya, the established English form.

1822.—"What pleases me most is the contrast between your present enjoyment, and your former sickness and despondency. Depend upon it England will turn out as well as Hemahleh."—Elphinstone to Major Close, in Life, ii. 139; see also i. 336, where it is written Himaléh.

HINDEE, s. This is the Pers. adjective form from Hind, 'India,' and illustration of its use for a native of India will be found under HINDOO. By Europeans it is most commonly used for those dialects of Hindustani speech which are less modified by P. vocables than the usual Hindustani, and which are spoken by the rural population of the N.W. Provinces and its outskirts. The earliest literary work in Hindi is the great poem of Chand Bardai (c. 1200), which records the deeds of Prithirajya, the last Hindu sovereign of Delhi. [On this literature see Dr. G. A. Grierson, The Modern Vernacular Literature of Hindustân, in J.A.S.B. Part I., 1888.] The term Hinduvi appears to have been formerly used, in the Madras Presidency, for the Marāthī language. (See a note in Sir A. Arbuthnot's ed. of Munro's Minutes, i. 133.)

* Hemāchāl and Hemakhtī also occur in the Āin (see Gladwin, ii. 342, 343; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 30, 31]). Karāchāl is the name used by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century, and by Al-Birūnī 800 years earlier. 17th century writers often call the Himalaya the "Mountains of Nuggur-Cote" (q.v.). [Mr. Tawney writes: "We have in Rig Veda (x. 121) ime himavanto parvatāh, 'these snowy mountains,' spoken of as abiding by the might of Prajāpati. In the Bhagavadgīti, an episode of the Mahābhārata, Krishna says that he is 'the Himālayas among stable things,' and the word Himālaya is found in the Kumāra Sambhava of Kālidāsa, about the date of which opinions differ. Perhaps Imaos is himavat; 'Himaōs, himātri.']

HINDÕI, Hindekī, n.p. This modification of the name is applied to people of Indian descent, but converted to Islam, on the Peshawar frontier, and scattered over other parts of Afghanistan. They do the banking business, and hold a large part of the trade in their hands.

[1842.—"The inhabitants of Peshawar are of Indian origin, but speak Pashtū as well as Hindkī."—Elphinstone, C.C. vi, 74.]

HINDOO, n.p. P. Hindū. A person of Indian religion and race. This is a term derived from the use of the Mahomedan conquerors (see under INDIA). The word in this form is Persian; Hindī is that used in Arabic, e.g.

c. 940.—"An inhabitant of Mansūra in Sind, among the most illustrious and powerful of that city . . . had brought up a young Indian or Sindian slave (Hindī aw Sindī)."—Mas'ādi, vi. 264.

In the following quotation from a writer in Persian observe the distinction made between Hindū and Hindī:

c. 1290.—"Whatever lie Hindī fell into the King's hands was podled into bits under the feet of elephants. The Musalmāns, who were Hindīs (country born), had their lives spared."—Amīr Khosrū, in Elliott, iii. 539.

1563.—". . . moreover if people of Arabia or Persia would ask of the men of this country whether they are Moors or Gentooes, they ask in these words; 'Art thou Mosalam or Hindī?"—Garcia, f. 137b.

Hindū is often used on the Peshawar frontier as synonymous with būnya (see under BANYAN). A soldier (of the tribes) will say: 'I am going to the Hindū,' i.e. to the būnya of the company.

HINDOO KOOSH, n.p. Hindū-Kīsh; a term applied by our geographers to the whole of the Alpine range which separates the basins of the Kabul River and the Helmand from that of the Oxus. It is, as Rennell points out, properly that part of the range immediately north of Kabul, the Caucasus of the historians of Alexander, who crossed and re-crossed it somewhere not far from the longitude of that city. The real origin of the name is not known; [the most plausible explanation is perhaps that it is a corruption of Indicus Caucasus]. It is, as far as we know, first used in literature by Ibn Batuta, and the explanation of the name which he gives, however doubtful, is still popular. The name has been by some later writers modified into Hindu Koh (mountain), but this is fictitious, and throws no light on the origin of the name.

c. 1334.—"Another motive for our stoppage was the fear of snow; for there is midway on the road a mountain called Hindú-Kush, i.e. the Hindu-Killer," because so many of the slaves, male and female, brought from India, die in the passage of this mountain, owing to the severe cold and quantity of snow."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 84.

1504.—"The country of Kábul is very strong, and of difficult access. . . Between Balkh, Kundez, and Badakhshan on the one side, and Kábul on the other, is interposed the mountain of Hindú-kush, the passes over which are seven in number."—Baber, p. 139.

1548.—"From this place marched, and entered the mountains called Hindú-Kush."—Mem. of Emp. Humayun, 89.

"It was therefore determined to invade Badakhshan . . . The Emperor, passing over the heel of the Hindú-Kush, encamped at Shergirán."—Tabakat-i-Akbari, in Elliot, v. 223.

1753.—"Les montagnes qui donnent naissance à l'Indus, et à plusieurs des rivières qu'il reçoit, se nomment Hindou Kesh, et c'est l'histoire de Timur qui m'instruit de cette dénomination. Elle est composée du nom d'Headou ou Hind, qui désigne l'Inde . . . et de kush ou kesh . . . que je remarque être propre à diverses montagnes."—D'Anville, p. 16.

1793.—"The term Hindoo-Kho, or Hindoo-Kush, is not applied to the ridge throughout its full extent; but seems confined to that part of it which forms the N.W. boundary of Cabul; and this is the Indian Caucasus of Alexander."—Rennell, Mem. 3rd ed. 150.

1817.—". . . those Who dwell beyond the everlasting snows Of Hindoo Koosh, in stormy freedom bred."—Mokanna.

HINDOSTAN, n.p. Pers. Hindú-stán, (a) 'The country of the Hindus,' India. In modern native parlance this word indicates distinctively (b) India north of the Nerbudda, and exclusive of Bengal and Behar. The latter provinces are regarded as púrth (see POORUB), and all south of the Nerbudda as Dakhán (see DECCAN). But the word is used in older Mahom-
HINDOSTANEE. 417

HINDOSTANEE, s. Hindústání, properly an adjective, but used substantively in two senses, viz. (a) a native of Hindustán, and (b) (Hindúśtání zabān) 'the language of that country'; but in fact the language of the Mahomedans of Upper India, and eventually of the Mahomedans of the Deccan, developed out of the Hindi dialect of the Doáb chiefly, and of the territory round Agra and Delhi, with a mixture of Persian vocables and phrases, and a readiness to adopt other foreign words. It is also called Oordoo, i.e. the language of the Urdū ('Horde') or Camp. This language was for a long time a kind of Mahomedan lingua franca over all India, and still possesses that character over a large part of the country, and among certain classes. Even in Madras, where it least prevails, it is still recognised in native regiments as the language of intercourse between officers and men. Old-fashioned Anglo-Indians used to call it the Moors (q.v.).

a.— 1653.—(applied to a native.) "Indistanni est ve Mahometan noir des Indes, ce nom est composé de Indo, Indien, et stan, habitation."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouv., ed. 1657, 543.

b.— 1616.—"After this he (Tom Coryate) got a great mastery in the Indostan, or more vulgar language; there was a woman, a landress, belonging to my Lord Embassador's house, who had such a freedom and liberty of speech, that she would sometimes scold, and rail from the sun-rising to the sun-set; one day he undertook her in her own language. And by eight of the clock he so silenced her, that she had not one word more to speak."—Terry, Extracts relating to T. C.

1673.—"The Language at Court is Persian, that commonly spoke is Indostan (for which they have no proper Character, the written Language being called Bangyan), which is a mixture of Persian and Scelavonian, as are all the dialects of India."—Fryer, 201. This intelligent traveller's reference to Scelavonian is remarkable, and shows a notable perspicacity, which would have delighted the late Lord Strangford, had he noticed the passage.

1677.—In Court's letter of 12th Dec. to Ft. St. Geo. they renew the offer of a reward of £20, for proficiency in the Gentoo or Indostan languages, and sanction a reward of £10 each for proficiency in the Persian language, "and that fit persons to teach the said language be entertained."—Notes and Exs., No. i. 22.

1685.—"...so applied myself to a Portuguese mariner who spoke Indostan (ye current language of all these Islands)"—Maldives."—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 191].

1697.—"Questions addressed to Khodja Mounad, Ambassador from Abyssinia.

4.—"What language he, in his audience made use of!

The Hindustani language (Hindostanee toudal), which the late Hon. Paulus de Roo, then Secretary of their Excellencies the High Government of Batavia, interpreted."—Valentijn, iv. 327.

1699.—"He is expert in the Hindostand or Moors Language."—In Yale, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. col xvii.

1726.—"The language here is Hindustans or Moors (so 'tis called there), though he who can't speak any Arabic and Persian passes for an ignoramus."—Valentijn, Chor. i. 87.

1727.—"This Persian ... and I, were discoursing one Day of my Affairs in the Industan Language, which is the established Language spoken in the Mogul's large Dominions."—A. Hamilton, ii. 183; [ed. 1744, ii. 182].

1745.—"Benjamini Schulzii Missionarii Evangelici, grammatica Hindostanica... Editid, et de suscipienda barbararum linguarum cultura præfatus est D. Jo. Henr. Cullenberg, Halae Saxoniae."—Title from Catalogue of M. Garcin de Tassy's Books, 1759. This is the earliest we have heard of.

1768.—"Two of the Council of Pondicherry went to the camp, one of them was well versed in the Indostan and Persic languages, which are the only tongues used in the Courts of the Mahomedan Princes."—Orme, i. 144 (ed. 1803).

1772.—"Manuscripts have indeed been handed about, ill spelt, with a confused mixture of Persian, Indostans, and Bengals."—Preface to Hedges' Grammar; xi. (See under MOORS.)

1777.—"Alphabetum Bramhianicum seu Indostanum."—Romae.

1778.—"Grammatica Indostana—A mais Vulgar—Que se practica no Imperio do Mogul—Offerecida—As muitas Re- verendos—Padres Missionários—Do dito Imperio. Em Roma MDCCCLXXVII—Na Estamperia da Sígrada Congregação—de Propaganda Fide."—(Title transcribed.) There is a reprint of this (apparently) of 1865, in the Catalogue of Garcin de Tassy's books.

c. 1830.—"Cet ignoble patois d'Hindoustani, qui ne servira jamais à rien quand je serai retourné en Europe, est difficile."—V. Jaccouinot, Correspondence, i. 95.

1844.—"Ed. Quarters, Kurraheeh, 12th February, 1844. The Governor unfortunately does not understand Hindeostanne, nor Persian, nor Mahbrita, nor any other eastern dialect. He therefore will feel particularly obliged to Collectors, sub-Collectors, and officers writing the proceedings of Courts-Martial, and all Staff Officers, to indite their various papers in English, larded with as small a portion of the to him unknown tongues as they conveniently can, instead of those he generally receives—namely, papers written in Hindostanee larded with occasional words in English.

"Any Indent made for English Dictionaries shall be duly attended to, if such be in the stores at Kurraheee; if not, gentlemen who have forgotten the vulgar tongue are requested to procure the requisite assistance from England." — GG. OO., by Sir Charles Napier, 85.

1617.—(In answer to a letter from the Court not now extant). "Wee have forbidden the several Factories from wrighting words in this language and refrayned it our selves, though in booke of Coppins wee fears there are many which by wante of tymre for perussal wee cannot rectifie or expresse."—Surat Factors to Court, February 26, 1617. (I.O. Records : O. C., No. 450.)

"... they sound strange
As Hindostanee to an Ind-born man Accustomed many years to English speech."

E. B. Browning, Aurora Leigh.

HING, s. Asafoetida. Skt. hingu, Hind. hing, Dakh. hingu. A repulsively smelling gum-resin which forms a favourite Hindu condiment, and is used also by Europeans in Western and Southern India as an ingredient in certain cakes eaten with curry. (See POPPER-CAKE). This product affords a curious example of the uncertainty which sometimes besets the origin of drugs which are the objects even of a large traffic. Hanbury and Flückiger, whilst describing Falconer's Narthex Asafoetida (Ferula Narthex, Boiss.) and Scorodosma foetidum, Bunge; (F. asafoetida, Boiss.) two umbelliferous plants, both cited as the source of this drug, say that neither has been proved to furnish the asafoetida of commerce. Yet the plant producing it has been described and determined by Kaempfer, who saw the gum-resin collected in the Persian Province of Lārīstān (near the eastern shore of the P. Gulf); and in recent years (1857) Surgeon-Major Bellew has described the collection of the drug near Kandahar. Asafoetida has been identified with the στάφυλον or laserpitium of the ancients. The substance is probably yielded not only by the species mentioned above, but by other allied plants, e.g. Ferula Jaeschkei, Vatke, of Kashmir and Turkistan.

The hing of the Bombay market is the produce of F. alliacea, Boiss. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 328 seq.]

c. 645.—"This kingdom of Tsao-kiu-teha (Tāukūkta?) has about 7000 li of compass,—the compass of the capital called Ho-si-āna (Ghazna) is 30 li. ... The soil is favourable to the plant Yo-kin (Curcuma, or turmeric) and to that called Hing-kiu."—Péterins Bondit., iii. 157.

1583.—"A Portuguese in Bengal had a horse of great value, but which exhibited a deal of flatulency, and on that account the King would not buy it. The Portuguese cured it by giving it this yngu mixt with flour: the King then bought it, finding it thoroughly well, and asked him how he had cured it. When the man said it was with yngu, the King replied: 'Tis nothing then to marvel at, for you have given it to eat the food of the gods' (or, as the poets say, nectar). Whereupon the Portuguese made answer said: 'Et nos vocem in Plerinums; 'Better call it the food of the devils! '"—Garcia, f. 21b. The Germans do worse than this Portuguese, for they call the drug Tenfels druck, i.e. diabolonicibus sed sucrucibus!

1586.—"I went from Agra to Satagam (see CHITTAGONG) in Bengal in the company of one hundred and four score Boates, laden with Salt, Opium, Hing, Lead, Carpets, and divers other commodities down the River Jemena."—R. Fitch, in Hakti. ii. 386.

1611.—"In the Kingdom of Gujarat and Cambay, the natives put in all their food Ingus, which is Assafetida."—Teixeira, Relaciones, 29.

1688.—"Le Hingh, que nos droguistes et apotiques appellent Assa foetida, vient la plus part de Perse, mais celle que la Province d'Vtrad (!) produit dans les Indes est bien meilleur."—Mandelo, 230.

1763.—"In this Country Assa Foetida is gathered at a place called Descon; some deliver it to be the Juice of a Canoe or Reed inspissated; others, of a Tree wounded: It differs much from the stinking Stuff called Hing, it being of the Province of Carmaghaz; this latter is that the Indians perfume themselves with, mixing it in all their Pulse, and make it up in Wafer to correct the Windiness of their Food."—Fryer, 239.

1689.—"The Natives at Suratt are much taken with Assa Foetida, which they call Hing, and mix a little with the Cakes that they eat."—Ovington, 397.

1712.—"... substantiam obtinet ponderosam, instar rapae solidam candidissimamque, plenam sueci pinguis, abissimi, footidissimi, porraccio odore nares horridósferentia; qui ex eá collectus, Persís Indicósque Hingh, Europaeis Asa foetida appellátur."

1726.—"Hing or Assa Foetida, otherwise called Devil's dung (Duivelsdrek)."—Valentijn, iv. 146.

1857.—"Whilst riding in the plain to the N.E. of the city (Candahar) we noticed several assaföetida plants. The assaföetida, called hang or hing by the natives, grows wild in the sandy or gravelly plains that form the western part of Afghanistan. It is never cultivated, but its peculiar gum-resin is collected from the plants on the deserts where they grow. The produce is for the most part exported to Hindustan."

HIRAVA, n.p. Malayál. Iraya. The name of a very low caste in Malabar. [The Iraya form one section of the Cherumar, and are of slightly higher social standing than the Pudayar (see POLEA). "Their name is derived from the fact that they are allowed to come only as far as the coves (ira) of their employers' houses." (Logan, Malabar, i. 148.)]

1510.—"La sexta sorte (de' Gentili) se chiamano Hirava, e questi seminano e raccolgono il riso."—Varthema (ed. 1517, f. 43v).

[HIRRAWEN, s. The Musulman pilgrim dress; a corruption of the Ar. ʿahrám. Burton writes: "Al-ʿahrám, literally meaning 'prohibition' or 'making unlawful,' equivalent to our 'mortification,' is applied to the ceremony of the toilette, and also to the dress itself. The vulgar pronounce the word 'herém,' or 'Fahrém.' It is opposed to ihdél, 'making lawful,' or 'returning to laical life.' The further from Mecca it is assumed, provided that it be during the three months of Hajj, the greater is the religious merit of the pilgrim; consequently some come from India and Egypt in the dangerous attire" (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, ii. 138, note).

1813.—"... the ceremonies and penances mentioned by Pitts, when the hajés, or pilgrims, enter into Hirrawen, a ceremony from which the females are exempted; but the men, taking off all their clothes, cover themselves with two hirrawens or large white wrappers..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 101, 2nd ed.]

HOBSON-JOBSON, s. A native festal excitement; a tamasha (see TUMASHA); but especially the Moharram ceremonies. This phrase may be taken as a typical one of the most highly assimilated class of Anglo-Indian argot, and we have ventured to borrow from it a concise alternative title for this Glossary. It is peculiar to the British soldier and his surroundings, with whom it probably originated, and with whom it is by no means obsolete, as we once supposed. My friend Major John Trotter tells me that he has repeatedly heard it used by British soldiers in the Punjab; and has heard it also from a regimental moonshee. It is in fact an Anglo-Saxon version of the wailings of the Mahomedans as they beat their breasts in the procession of the Moharram—"Ya Hassan! Ya Hosain!" It is to be remembered that these observances are in India by no means confined to Shi'as. Except at Lucknow and Murshidábáb, the great majority of Mahomedans in that country are professed Sunnis. Yet here is a statement of the facts from an unexceptionable authority:

"The commonalty of the Mussalmans, and especially the women, have more regard for the memory of Hasan and Hussein, than for that of Muhammad and his khálifs. The heresy of making Ta'ázias (see TAZÉA) on the anniversary of the two latter imámís, is most common throughout India: so much so that opposition to it is ascribed by the ignorant to blasphemy. This example is followed by many of the Hindus, especially the Mahárratas. The Muhárram is celebrated throughout the Dekhan and Malwa, with greater enthusiasm than in other parts of India. Grand preparations are made in every town on the occasion, an ultimatum of rejoicing, rather than of observing the rites of mourning, as they ought. The observance of this custom has so strong a hold on the mind of the commonalty of the Mussalmans that they believe Muhammadanism to depend merely on keeping the memory of the imámís in the above manner."—Mir Shahámat Ἀ'lı, in J. R. A. S. sciáh, 1893, 359.

We find no literary quotation to exemplify the phrase as it stands. [But see those from the Orient. Sporting Mag. and Nineteenth Century below.] Those which follow show it in the process of evolution:

1618.—"... e particularmente delle donne che, battendosi il petto e facendo gesti di grandissima compassione replicano spesso con gran dolore quegli ultimi versi di certi loro canzoni: Vah Hussein! sciáh Hussein!"—P. della Valle, i. 552.
HOG-DEER.

1832.—"... they kindle fires in these pits every evening during the festival; and the ignorant, old as well as young, amuse themselves in fencing across them with sticks or swords; or only in running and playing round them, calling out, Ya Allâ! Ya Allâ!... Shah Husûn! Shah Husûn!... Shah Hoseïn! Shah Hoseïn!... Doolha! Doolha! (bridegroom!...); Hooe dost! Hooe dost! (alas, friend!...); Ruheeo! Ruheeo! (Stay! Stay!). Every one of these two words are repeated probably a hundred times over as loud as they can bawl out."—Jaffier Shureef, Qassoon-â-Islam, tr. by Herklotz, p. 173.

1883.—"... a long procession... followed and preceded by the volunteer mourners and breast-beaters shouting their cry of Hous-s-e-i-n Hâs-sân House-e-i-n Hâ-s-sân, and a simultaneous blow is struck vigorously by hundreds of heavy hands on the bare breasts at the last syllable of each name."—Wills: Modern Persia, 282.

[1902.—"The Hobson-Jobson." By Miss A. Goodrich-Freer, in The Nineteenth Century and After, April 1902.]

HODGETT, s. This is used among the English in Turkey and Egypt for a title-deed of land. It is Arabic hujjat, ‘evidence.’ Hojat, perhaps a corruption of the same word, is used in Western India for an account current between landlord and tenant. [Molesworth, Mahr. Dict., gives "Hujjat, Ar., a Government acknowledgment or receipt."]

[1871.—"... the Kadée attends, and writes a document (hogget-el-bahr) to attest the fact of the river’s having risen to the height sufficient for the opening of the Canal..."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., 5th ed. ii. 238.]

[HOG-BEAR, s. Another name for the sloth-bear, Melursus ursinus (Blanford, Mammalia, 201). The word does not appear in the N.E.D.

[1895.—"Between the tree-stems he heard a hog-bear digging hard in the moist warm earth."—R. Kipling, The Jungle Book, 171.]

HOG-DEER, s. The Anglo-Indian popular name of the Axis porcinus, Jerd.; [Cervus porcinus (Blanford, Mammalia, 549)], the Pârd of Hindustan. The name is nearly the same as that which Cosmas (c. 545) applies to an animal (Xορύθλαφος) which he draws (see under BABI-ROUSSA), but the two have no other relation. The Hog-deer is abundant in the grassy openings of forests throughout the Gangetic valley and further east. "It runs with its head low, and in a somewhat ungainly..."
The Chinese word is "HONG." The Chinese word is "HONG." The Chinese word is "HONG.

"HONG." The Chinese word is "HONG."

"HONG." The Chinese word is "HONG."
Cohong is, we believe, though speaking with diffidence, an exogamous union between the Latin co- and the Chinese hong. [Mr. G. T. Gardner confirms this explanation, and writes: "The term used in Canton itself is invariable: 'The Thirteen Hong,' or 'The Thirteen Firms'; and as these thirteen firms formed an association that had at one time the monopoly of the foreign trade, and as they were collectively responsible to the Chinese Government for the conduct of the trade, and to the foreign merchants for goods supplied to any one of the firms, some collective expression was required to denote the co-operation of the Thirteen Firms, and the word Cohang, I presume, was found most expressive."

HONG-BOAT, s. A kind of sampan (q.v.) or boat, with a small wooden house in the middle, used by foreigners at Canton. "A public passenger-boat (all over China, I believe) is called Hang-chwen, where chwen is generically 'vessel,' and hang is perhaps used in the sense of 'plying regularly.' Boats built for this purpose, used as private boats by merchants and others, probably gave the English name Hongboat to those used by our countrymen at Canton." (Note by Bp. Moule).

[1878. — "The Koong-Sze Teng, or Hong-Mee-Teng, or hong boats are from thirty to forty feet in length, and are somewhat like the gondolas of Venice. They are in many instances carved and gilded, and the saloon is so spacious as to afford sitting room for eight or ten persons. Abait the saloon there is a cabin for the boatmen. The boats are propelled by a large scull, which works on a pivot made fast in the stern post." — Gray, China, ii. 273.]

HONG KONG, n.p. The name of this flourishing settlement is hiang-kiang, 'fragrant waterway' (Bp. Moule).

HONORE, ONORE, n.p. Honavar, a town and port of Canara, of ancient standing and long of piratical repute. The etymology is unknown to us (see what Barbosa gives as the native name below). [A place of the same name in the Bellary District is said to be Can. Homathuru, konnu, 'gold,' uru, 'village.'] Vincent has supposed it to be the Naupa of the Periplus, "the first part of the pepper-country Δυμυρική,"—for which read Δυμυρική, the Tamil country or Malabar. But this can hardly be accepted, for Honore is less than 5000 stadia from Barygaza, instead of being 7000 as it ought to be by the Periplus, nor is it in the Tamil region. The true Naupa must have been Cannanore, or Pudopatana, a little south of the last. [The Madras Gloss. explains Naupa as the country of the Nairs.] The long defence of Honore by Captain Torriano, of the Bombay Artillery, against the forces of Tipperoo, in 1763-1764, is one of the most noble records of the Indian army. (See an account of it in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109 seqq.; [2nd ed. ii. 455 seqq.]).

c. 1343.—"Next day we arrived at the city of Hinaur, beside a great estuary which big ships enter. . . . The women of Hinaur are beautiful and chaste . . . they all know the Kurun al-'Adm by heart. I saw at Hinaur 13 schools for the instruction of girls and 23 for boys,—such a thing as I have seen nowhere else. The inhabitants of Malabar pay the Sultan . . . a fixed annual sum from fear of his maritime power."— Ibn Battuta, iv. 65-67.

1516.—". . . there is another river on which stands a good town called Honor; the inhabitants use the language of the country, and the Malabars call it Ponouram (or Ponuram, in Romanio): here the Malabars carry on much traffic. . . . In this town of Onor are two Gentoo corsairs patronised by the Lord of the Land, one named Tinoja and the other Raego, each of whom has 5 or 6 very big ships with large and well-armed crews."—Barbosa, Lisbon, ed. 291.

1563.—"This port (Onor) and that of Batica . . . belonged to the King of Binasga, and to this King of Onor his tributary, and these ports, less than 40 years before were the most famous of all that coast, not only for the fertility of the soil and its abundance in provisions . . . but for being the ingress and egress of all merchandise for the kingdom of Binasga, from which the King had a great revenue; and principally of horses from Arabia. . . ."—Barros, I. viii. cap. x. [And see P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 202; Comm. Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 148.]

HOOGLY, HOOGHLEY, n.p. Properly Hāglā, [and said to take its name from Beng. hoGaL, 'the elephant grass' (Typha angustifolia)]: a town on the right bank of the Western Delta Branch of the Ganges, that has long been known from this place as the Hoogly River, and on which Calcutta also stands, on the other bank, and 25 miles nearer the sea. Hoogly was one of the first places occupied by Europeans in the interior of Bengal; first by the Portuguese in the first half of the 16th century. An English factory was established here in 1640; and it was for some time their chief settlement in Bengal. In 1688 a quarrel with the Nawab led to armed action, and the English abandoned Hoogly; but on the arrangement of peace they settled at Chatanatty (Chuttanutty), now Calcutta.

[c. 1590.—"In the Sarkār of Sātgāon, there are two ports at a distance of half a kos from each other; the one is Sātgāon, the other Hūgli: the latter the chief; both are in possession of the Europeans."—Avn, ed. Jarett, i. 125.]

1616. —"After the force of dom Francisco de Menezes arrived at Sundiva as we have related, there came a few days later to the same island 3 sanguicels, right well equipped with arms and soldiers, at the charges of Manuel Viegas, a householder and resident of Ooqol, or Porto Pequeno, where dwelt in Bengal many Portuguese, 80 leagues up the Ganges, in the territory of the Mogul, under his ill faith that every hour threatened their destruction."—Bocarro, Descou, 476.

c. 1632. —"Under the rule of the Bāngalis a party of Frank merchants ... came trading to Sātgānw (see PORTO PEQUENO); one kos above that place they occupied some ground on the bank of the estuary. ... In course of time, through the ignorance and negligence of the rulers of Bengal, these Europeans increased in number, and erected substantial buildings, which they fortified. ... In due course a considerable palla to which was known by the name of the Port of Hūgli. ... These proceedings had come to the notice of the Emperor (Shaikh Jahān), and he resolved to put an end to them," &c.—Abdul Hamid Lahort, in Elliot, viii. 31-32.

1644. —"The other important voyage which was made from Cochim was that to Bengal, when the port and town of Ooqol were still standing, and much more when we had the Porto Grande (q.v.) and the town of Diangā; this used to be made by so many ships that often in one monsoon there came 30 or more from Bengal to Cochim, all laden with rice, sugar, lāc, iron, salt-petre, and many kinds of cloths both of grass and cotton, ghee (manegga), long pepper, a great quantity of wax, besides wheat and many things besides, such as quilts and rich bedding; so that every ship brought a capital of more than 20,000 xerafins. But since these two possessions were lost, and the two ports were closed, there go barely one or two vessels to Orixa."—Bocarro, M.S., i. 315.

1665. —"O Rey de Arraço nos tomou a fortaleza de Sírião em Peq.; o grão Mogor a cidade de Golim em Bengal."—P. Manoel Godinho, Relação, &c.

c. 1666.—"The rest they kept for their service to make Rowers of them; and such Christians as they were themselves, bringing them up to robbing and killing; or else they sold them to the Portuguese of Goa, Ceylan, St. Thomas, and others, and even to those that were remaining in Bengaēl at Ooqol, who were come thither to settle themselves there by favour of Jehan-Gugger, the Grandfather of Aureng-Zebe ..."—Bernier, E.T. 54; [ed. Constable, 1746.]

1727. —"Houghly is a Town of large Extent, but ill built. It reaches about 2 Miles along the River's Side, from the Chinkura before mentioned to the Bandel, a Colony formerly settled by the Portuguese, but the Mogul's Fouzaar governs both at present."—A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744.]

1753. —"Ugli is a forteresse des Maures. ... Ce lieu etant le plus considerable de la contrée, des Européens qui remontent le Gange, lui ont donne le nom de rivière d'Ugli dans sa partie inferieure."—D'Aubert, p. 64.

HOOGLY RIVER, n.p. See preceding. The stream to which we give this name is formed by the combination of the delta branches of the Ganges, viz., the Baugheruttee, Jalanghee, and Matabanga (Bhadirathii, Jalangā, and Mātābhāngyā), known as the Nuddea (Nadiya) Rivers.

HOOKA, s. Hind. from Arab. hūkkah, properly 'a round casket.' The Indian pipe for smoking through water, the elaborated hubble-bubble (q.v.). That which is smoked in the hookah is a curious compound of tobacco, spice, molasses, fruit, &c. [See Baden-Powell, Panjab Products, i. 290.] In 1840 the hookah was still very common at Calcutta dinner-tables, as well as regimental mess-tables, and its hubble-bubble was heard from various quarters before the cloth was removed—as was customary in those days. Going back further some twelve or fifteen years it was not very uncommon to see the use of the hookah kept up by old Indians after their return to Europe; one such at least, in the recollection of the elder of the present writers in his childhood, being a lady who continued its use in Scotland for several years. When the second of the present writers landed first at Madras, in 1860, there were perhaps half-a-dozen Europeans at the Presidency who still used the hookah; there is not one now (c. 1878). A few gentlemen at Hyderabad are said still to keep it up. [Mrs. Mackenzie writing in 1850...

say: "There was a dinner party in the evening (at Agra), mostly civilians, as I quickly discovered by their hugas. I have never seen the huga smoked save at Delhi and Agra, except by a very old general officer at Calcutta." (Life in the Mission, ii. 196). In 1837 Miss Eden says: "(the aides-de-camp and doctor get their newspapers and hookahs in a cluster on their side of the street." (Up the Country, i. 70). The rules for the Calcutta Subscription Dances in 1792 provide: "That hookers be not admitted to the ball room during any part of the night. But hookers might be admitted to the supper rooms, to the card rooms, to the boxes in the theatre, and to each side of the assembly room, between the large pillars and the walls."—Carey, Good Old Days, i. 98.] "In former days it was a dire offence to step over another person's hooka-carpet and hooka-snake. Men who did so intentionally were called out." (M. Gen. Keatinge).

1789.—"This last Season I have been without Company (except that of my Pipe or Hooker), and when employed in the innocent diversion of smoking it, have often thought of you, and Old England."—Mrs. Letter of James Rennell, July 1.

1782.—"When he observes that the gentlemen introduce their hookas and smoke in the company of ladies, why did he not add that the mixture of sweet-scented Persian tobacco, sweet herbs, coarse sugar, spice, &c., which they inhale... comes through clean water, and is so very pleasant, that many ladies take the tube, and draw a little of the smoke into their mouths."—Price's Tracts, vol. i. p. 78.

1783.—"For my part, in thirty years' residence, I never could find out one single luxury of the East, so much talked of here, except sitting in an arm-chair, smoking a hooka, drinking cool water (when I could get it), and wearing clean linen."—(Jos. Price), Some Observations on a late Publication, &c., 79.

1789.—"When the cloth is removed, all the servants except the hookerbedar retire, and make way for the sea breeze to circulate, which is very refreshing to the Company, whilst they drink their wine, and smoke the hooker, a machine not easily described..."—Munro's Narrative, 53.

1828.—"Every one was hushed, but the noise of that wind... and the occasional bubbling of my own hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum."—The Kuzzilbash, i. 2.

1872.—"... in the background the ear-case of a boar with a cluster of villagers sitting by it, passing a hookah of primitive form round, for each to take a pull in turn." —A True Reformer, ch. i.

1874.—"... des hookas d'argent emaillé et ciselé..."—Franz, Souvenir d'une Cosaque, ch. iv.

HOOKA-BURDAR, s. Hind. from Pers. huťka-burdár, 'hooka-bearer'; the servant whose duty it was to attend to his master's hooka, and who considered that duty sufficient to occupy his time. See Williamson, V.M. i. 220.

[1779.—"Mr. and Mrs. Hastings present their compliments to Mr. — and request the favour of his company to a concert and supper on Thursday next. Mr. — is requested to bring no servants except his Houcecaburdar."—In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 71.]

1789. —"Hookerbedar." (See under HOOKA.)

1801.—"The Resident... tells a strange story how his hookah-burdar, after cheating and robbing him, proceeded to England, and set up as the Prince of Sylhet, took in everybody, was waited upon by Pitt, dined with the Duke of York, and was presented to the King."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 34.

HOOKUM, s. An order; Ar.—H. hubem. (See under HAKIM.)

[1873.—"The King's hookim is of as small value as an ordinary Governor's."—In Yule, Hodges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xlv.]

[1886.—"Of course Raja Joe Hookam will preside."—Ali Baba, 106.]

HOOLUCK, s. Beng. hulak? The word is not in the Dicts, [but it is possibly connected with ulak, Skt. utaka, 'an owl,' both bird and animal taking their name from their wailing note]. The black ribbon (Hylobates holook, Jerd.; [Blanford, Mammalia, 5]), not uncommonly tamed on our E. frontier, and from its gentle engaging ways, and plaintive cries, often becoming a great pet. In the forests of the Kasia Hills, when there was neither sound nor sign of a living creature, by calling out hoo! hoo! one sometimes could make a clamour in response from the hoolucks, as if hundreds had suddenly started to life, each shouting hoo! hoo! hoo! at the top of his voice.

c. 1809.—"The Hoolucks live in considerable herds; and although exceedingly noisy, it is difficult to procure a view, their activity in springing from tree to tree being very great; and they are very shy."—Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, ii. 503.
HOOLY. s. Hind. holī (Skt. holotā), [perhaps from the sound made in singing]. The spring festival, held at the approach of the vernal equinox, during the 10 days preceding the full moon of the month Phalgun. It is a sort of carnival in honour of Krishna and the milkmaids. Passers-by are chaffed, and pelted with red powder, or drenched with yellow liquids from squirts. Songs, mostly obscene, are sung in praise of Krishna, and dances performed round fires. In Bengal the feast is called dol jātrā, or 'Swing-cradle festival.' [On the idea underlying the rite, see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 306 seq.]

c. 1590.—'Here is also a place called Cheramutt, where, during the feast of the Hooly, flames issue out of the ground in a most astonishing manner.'—Ghadirin's Ayeen Akbery, ii. 34; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 173].

[1671.—"In Feb. or March they have a feast the Romans call Carnival, the Indians Whooly."—In Yale, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. iii. ccxiv.]

1673.—"...their Hooly, which is at their other Seed-Time."—Fryer, 189.

1727.—"One (Feast) they kept on Sight of a New Moon in February, exceeded the rest in ridiculous Actions and Expense; and this they called the Feast of Wooly, who was...a fierce fellow in a War with some Giants that infested Sind..."—A. Hamilton, i. 128; [ed. 1744, i. 129].

1805.—"I have delivered your message to Mr. H. about April day, but he says he understands the learned to place the Hooly as according with May day, and he believes they have no occasion in India to set apart a particular day in the year for the manufacture. ..."—Letter from Mrs. Halhed to W. Hastings, in Cal. Review, xxvi. 93.

1809.—"... We paid the Mullah Raj (Sindia) the customary visit at the Hoolie. Everything was prepared for playing; but at Captain C.'s particular request, that part of the ceremony was dispensed with. Playing the Hoolie consists in throwing about a quantity of flour, made from a water-nut called singara, and dyed with red sanders; it is called abeer; and the principal sport is to cast it into the eyes, mouth, and nose of the players, and to splash them all over with water tinged of an orange colour with the flowers of the dak (see DAWK) tree."—Broughton's Letters, p. 87; [ed. 1892, p. 65 seq.].

HOON, s. A gold Pagoda (coin), q.v. Hind. hūn, "perhaps from Canar. hounu (gold)"—Wilson. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 801.]

1647.—"A wonderfully large diamond from a mine in the territory of Golconda had fallen into the hands of Kutbu-l-Mulk; whereupon an order was issued, directing him to forward the same to Court; when its estimated value would be taken into account as part of the two lacs of huna which was the stipulated amount of his annual tribute."—Indiat Khān, in Elliot, vii. 84.

1873.—"In Exhibit 320 Ramji engages to pay five honas (=Rs. 20) to Vithoba, besides paying the Government assessment."—Bombay High Court Judgment, Jan. 27, p. 121.

HOONDY, s. Hind. hundī, humdavī; Mahr. and Guj. humāt. A bill of exchange in a native language.

1810.—"'Hoondies (i.e. bankers' drafts) would be of no use whatever to them.'—Williamson, i. M. ii. 530.

HOONIMAUN, s. The great ape; also called Lungoor.

1653.—"'Hermand est vn singe que les Indou tiennent pour Sainct.'—De la Boullye-le-Goux, p. 541.

HOOWA. A peculiar call (hūnā) used by the Singhalese, and thence applied to the distance over which this call can be heard. Compare the Australian coo-ee.

HOPPER, s. A colloquial term in S. India for cakes (usually of rice-flour), somewhat resembling the wheaten chupatties (q.v.) of Upper India. It is the Tamil appam, [from appu, 'to clap with the hand,' In Bombay the form used is ap.]

1582.—"Thus having talked a while, he gave him very good entertainment, and commanded to give him certain cakes, made of the flower of Weathe, which the Malabars do call Apes, and with the same honnie."—Cudahia (by N.L.), f. 38.

1606.—"Great dishes of apas."—Gowree, f. 48c.

1672.—"These cakes are called Apen by the Malabars."—Baldens, Affodere (Dutch ed.), 39.

c. 1690.—"Ex iis (the chestnuts of the Jack fruit) in sole sicatiss farinam, ex eaque placentas, apas dictas, conficiunt."—Rhode, iii.

1707.—"Those who bake oppers without permission will be subject to severe penalty."—Thesavelu (Tamil Laws of Jaffna), 700.

[1826.—"He sat down beside me, and shared between us his coarse brown aps."—Pandurang Hart, ed. 1875, i. 81.]

1860.—"Appas (called hoppers by the English) ... supply their morning repast."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161.

HOPPO, s. The Chinese Superintendent of Customs at Canton. Giles says: "The term is said to be a corruption of Hoo poo, the Board of Revenue, with which a Hoppo, or Collector of duties, is in direct communication." Dr. Williams gives a different account (see below). Neither affords much satisfaction. [The N.E.D. accepts the account given in the quotation from Williams.]

1711.—"The Hoppos, who look on Europe Ships as a great Branch of their Profits, will give you all the fair words imaginable."—Lockyer, 101.

1727.—"I have stayed about a Week, and found no Merchants come near me, which made me suspect, that there were some underhand dealings between the Hoppa and his Chaps, to my Prejudice."—A. Hamilton, ii. 228 ; [ed. 1744, ii. 227]. (See also under HONG.)

1743.—"... just as he (Mr. Anson) was ready to embark, the Hoppo or Chinese Custom-house officer of Macao refused to grant a permit to the boat."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 355.

1750-52.—"The hoppo, happa, or first inspector of customs, ... came to see us to-day."—Oebeck, i. 359.

1782.—"La charge d'Opeou répond à celle d'intendant de province."—Sonnerat, ii. 236.

1797.—"... the Hoppo or mandarine more immediately connected with Europeans."—Sir G. Staunton, i. 239.

1842 (?)—"The term hoppo is confined to Canton, and is a corruption of the term hoï-po-sho, the name of the officer who has control over the boats on the river, strangely applied to the Collector of Customs by foreigners."—Wells Williams, Chinese Commercial Guide, 221.

[1878.—"The second board or tribunal is named hoppo, and to it is entrusted the care and keeping of the imperial revenue."—Gray, China, i. 19.]

1882.—"It may be as well to mention here that the 'Hoppo' (as he was incorrectly styled) filled an office especially created for the foreign trade at Canton.... The Board of Revenue is in Chinese 'Hoo-poo,' and the office was locally misapplied to the officer in question."—The Funkwae at Canton, p. 36.

HORSE-KEEPER, s. An old provincial English term, used in the Madras Presidency and in Ceylon, for 'groom.' The usual corresponding words are, in N. India, syce (q.v.), and in Bombay ghordwld (see GORAWALLAH).

1555.—"There in the reste of the Cophone made for the nones thei bewrie one of the diestlem lemanes, a waityng manne, a Cooke, a Horse-keeper, a Lacjeu, a Butler, and a Horse, whiche thei at first strangle, and thruste in."—W. Watraman, Parable of Factious, N. 1.

1609.—"Waternen, Lackeyes, Horse-keepers."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1673.—"On St. George's Day I was commanded by the Honourable Gerald Aungier ... to embarque on a Bambos Boat ... waited on by two of the Governor's servants ... an Horsekeeper ...."—Fryer, 123.

1698.—"... followed by his boy ... and his horsekeeper."—In Wheeler, i. 300.

1879.—"In my English buggy, with lamps lighted and an English sort of a nag, I might almost have fancied myself in England, but for the black horse-keeper alongside of me."—Mrs. of Cull Mountain, St.

1887.—"Even my horse pretends he is too fine to switch off his own flies with his own long tail, but turns his head round to order the horsekeeper ... to wipe them off for him."—Letters from Madras, 50.

HORSE-RADISH TREE, s. This is a common name, in both N. and S. India, for the tree called in Hind. sa-hajna; Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertn., Hyperanthera Moringa, Vahl. (N. O. Moringaceae), in Skt. sobhdnjava. Sir G. Birdwood says: "A marvellous tree botanically, as no one knows in what order to put it; it has links with so many; and it is evidently a 'head-centre' in the progressive development of forms." The name is given because the scraped root is used in place of horse-radish, which it closely resembles in flavour. In S. India the same plant is called the Drumstick-tree (q.v.), from the shape of the long slender fruit, which is used as a vegetable, or in curry, or made into a native pickle.
“most nauseous to Europeans” (Punjab Plants). It is a native of N.W. India, and also extensively cultivated in India and other tropical countries, and is used also for many purposes in the native pharmacopeia. [See Myrobalan.]

Hosbulhookum, &c. Properly (Ar. used in Hind.) hasb-ul-hukum, literally ‘according to order’; these words forming the initial formula of a document issued by officers of State on royal authority, and thence applied as the title of such a document.

[1678.—“Had it bin another King, as Shahjahan, whose phirman (see Firmaun) and hasbulhookimis were of such great force and binding.”—In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xi.]

1702.—“The Nabob told me that the great God knows that he had ever a hearty respect for the English . . . saying, here is the Hosbulhocom, which the king has sent me to seize Factories and all their effects.”—In Wheeler, iv. 387.

1727.—‘The Phirmaund is presented (by the Goosderdaur (Goorzburdar), or Hosbal-houckain, or, in English, the King’s Messenger) and the Governor of the Province or City makes a short speech.”—A. Hamilton, i. 230; [ed. 1744, i. 283].

1757.—“This Treaty was conceived in the following Terms. I. Whatever Rights and Privileges the King had granted the English Company, in their Phirmaund, and the Housbul-hookums (sic), sent from Delly, shall not be disputed.”—Mem. of the Revolution in Bengal, pp. 21-22.

1759.—‘Housbul-hookum (under the great seal of the Nabob Vizier, Ulmaul Malek, Nizam ul Muluk Bakhadow. Be peace unto the high and renowned Mr. John Spencer . . .” —In Cambridge’s Act of the War, &c. 229.

1761.—“A grant signed by the Mogul is called a Phirmaund (forman). By the Mogul’s Son, a Nushawn (nishan). By the Nabob a Perwanna (parowana). By the Vizier, a Housebul-hookum.”—Ibid. 226.

1769.—“Besides it is obvious, that as great a sum might have been drawn from that Company without affecting property . . . or running into his golden dream of coquetts on the Gangees, or visions of Stamp duties, Perennianns, Duticks, Kistburneas and Housbulhookums.”—Burke, Obsns. on a late

Publication called “The Present State of the Nation.”

Hot-winds, s. This may almost be termed the name of one of the seasons of the year in Upper India, when the hot dry westerly winds prevail, and such aids to coolness as the tatty and thermantidote (q.v.) are brought into use. May is the typical month of such winds.

1804.—“Holkar appears to me to wish to avoid the contest at present; and so does Gen. Lake, possibly from a desire to give his troops some repose, and not to expose the Europeans to the hot winds in Hindustan.” —Wellington, iii. 180.

1873.—“It’s no use thinking of lunch in this roaring hot wind that’s getting up, so we shall be all light and fresh for another shy at the pigs this afternoon.”—The True Reformer, i. p. 8.

Howdah, vulg. Howder, &c., s. Hind. modified from Ar. haudaj, A great chair or framed seat carried by an elephant. The original Arabic word haudaj is applied to litters carried by camels.

c. 1663.—“At other times he rideth on an Elephant in a Mik-dember or Hauze . . . the Mik-dember being a little square House or Turret of Wood, is always painted and gilded; and the Hauze, which is an Oval seat, having a Canopy with Pillars over it, is so likewise.”—Berrier, E.T. 119; [ed. Constable, 370].

c. 1785.—“Colonel Smith . . . reviewed his troops from the houdar of his elephant.” —Caraccioli’s L. of Olive, iii. 133.

A popular rhyme which was applied in India successively to Warren Hastings’ escape from Benares in 1781, and to Col. Monson’s retreat from Malwa in 1804, and which was perhaps much older than either, runs:

“Ghore par haudda, hathī par jīn Jalādī bhāg-gāyā { Warren Hastīn!
Kornail Munsīn!”

which may be rendered with some anachronism in expression:

“Horses with howdahs, and elephants saddled Off heller skelter the Sahibs skedaddled.”

[1805.—“Houza, howda.” See under Ambaree.]

The Bunyan Tree, a Poem.

1863.—"Elephants are also liable to be disabled . . . ulcers arise from neglect and carelessness in fitting on the howdah."— Sat. Revieu, Sept. 6, 312.

HUBBA, s. A grain; a jot or tittle.
Ar. habba.

1786.—"For two years we have not received a hubba on account of our tunkaw, though the ministers have annually charged a lac of rupees, and never paid us anything."—In [1836.—"The habbeh (or grain of barley) is the 48th part of dirhem, or third of a keerat . . . or in commerce fully equal to an English grain."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ii. 926.]

HUBBLE-BUBBLE, s. An ono-matopoeia applied to the hooka in its rudimentary form, as used by the masses in India. Tobacco, or a mixture containing tobacco amongst other things, is placed with embers in a terra-cotta chillum (q.v.), from which a reed carries the smoke into a cooco-ut shell half full of water, and the smoke is drawn through a hole in the side, generally without any kind of mouth-piece, making a bubbling or gurgling sound. An elaborate description is given in Terry's Voyage (see below), and another in Govinda Sa-manta, i. 29 (1872).

1616.—". . . they have little Earthen Pots . . . having a narrow neck and an open round top, out of the belly of which comes a small spout, to the lower part of which spout they fill the Pot with water:
then putting their Tobacco loose in the top, and a burning coal upon it, they having first fastned a very small straw hollow Cane or Reed . . . within that spout . . . the Pot standing on the ground, draw that smoak into their mouths, which first falls upon the Superficies of the water, and much discolors
it. And this way of taking their Tobacco, they believe makes it much more cool and wholsom."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 383.

c. 1630.—"Tobacco is of great account here; not strong (as our men love), but weake and leafie; suckt out of long canes call'd hubbe-bubbles . . ."—Sir. T.
Herbert, 28.

1672.—"Coming back I found my troublesome Comrade very merry, and packing up his Household Stuff, his Bong bowl, and Hubble-bubble, to go along with me."—
Fryer, 127.

1673.—". . . bolstered up with embroidered Cushions, smooking out of a silver Hubble-bubble."—Fryer, 131.

1697.—". . . Yesterday the King's Dewan, and this day the King's Buxee . . . arrived . . . to each of whom sent two bottles of Rose-water, and a glass Hubble-bubble, with a compliment."—In Wheeler,
i. 318.

Archip., ed. 1859, p. 80.

HUBSHEE, n.p. Ar. Habashi, P.
Habi, 'an Abyssinian,' an Ethiopian, a negro. The name is often specifically applied to the chief of Jinjira on the western coast, who is the descendant of an Abyssinian family.

1298.—"There are numerous cities and villages in this province of Abash, and many merchants."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 425.
[c. 1316.—"Habshis." See under COLOMBO.]

1553.—"At this time, among certain Moors, who came to sell provisions to the ships, had come three Abeshis (Abaxies) of the country of the Pester John . . ."
Barros, i. iv. 4.

[1612.—"Sent away the Thomas towards the Habash coast."—Downers, Letters, i. 166;
"The Habesh shore."—Ibid. i. 131.
[c. 1661.—". . . on my way to Gonder, the capital of Habach, or Kingdom of Ethiopia."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 2.]

1673.—"Cows Cawn, an Hobey or Arabian Coffery (Caffer)."—Fryer, 147.

1681.—"Habessiini ... nunc passim ominantur; vocabulo ab Arabibus indito, quibus Habesh coluiviem vel mixturarum gentium denotat."—Ludolphii, Hist. Aethiop.
lib. i. c. i.

1750-60.—"The Moors are also fond of having Abyssinian slaves known in India by the name of Hobhy Coffrees."—Grose,
i. 148.

1789.—"In India Negroes, Habissiannis, Nobis (i.e. Nubians) &c. &c. are promiscuously called Habashies or Habissianns, although the two latter are no negroes; and the Nobis and Habashes differ greatly from one another."—Note to Seir Mutaqherin, iii. 36.

[1813.—". . . the master of a family adopts a slave, frequently a Haffshee Abyssinian, of the darkest hue, for his heir.
—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 473.]

1884.—"One of my Tibetan ponies had short curly brown hair, and was called both by my servants, and by Dr. Campbell, 'a Hubshee.'"
"I understood that the name was specific for that description of pony amongst the traders."—Note by Sir Joseph Hooker.

HUCK. Properly Ar. hakk: A just right; a lawful claim; a perquisite claimable by established usage.

[1866.—"The difference between the bazar price, and the amount price of the article sold, is the buq of the Dullal (Deloll)."—Confessions of an Orderly, 50.]

HUCKEEM. s. Ar.—H. hakim; a physician. (See note under HAKIM.)

1622.—"I, who was thinking little or nothing about myself, was forthwith put by them into the hands of an excellent physician, a native of Shiraz, who then happened to be at Lar, and whose name was Hekim Abul fetah. The word hekim signifies 'wise'; it is a title which it is the custom to give to all those learned in medical matters."—P. della Valle, ii. 318.

1673.—"My Attendance is engaged, and a Million of Promises, could I restore him to his Health, laid down from his Wives, Children, and Relations, who all (with the Citizens, as I could hear going along) pray to God that the Hackin Frungi, the Frank Doctor, might kill him ".—Fryer, 312.

1837.—"I had the native works on Materia Medica collated by competent Hakeems and Moonshoes."—Royle, Hindu Medicine, 25.

HULLIA. s. Canarese Holeya; the same as Polea (pulayan) (q.v.), equivalent to Pariah (q.v.). ["Holeyas field-labourers and agricestic serfs of S. Canara; Pulayan being the Malayalam and Paraiyam the Tamil form of the same word. Brahmanas derive it from hole, 'pollution'; others from hola, 'land' or 'soil,' as being thought to be autochthones" (Sturrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 173). The last derivation is accepted in the Madras Gloss. For an illustration of these people, see Richter, Man. of Coorg, 112.]

1817.—"... a Hullia or Pariar King."—Wilkes, Hist. Sketches, i. 151.

1874.—"At Malkotta, the chief seat of the followers of Ramayana [Ramanuja] Acharya, and at the Brahman temple at Balur, the Holleys or Pareys have the right of entering the temple on three days in the year, specially set apart for them."—M. J. Wa. House, in Ind. Antiq., iii. 191.

HULWA. s. Ar. halvā and halāwa is generic for sweetmeat, and the word is in use from Constantiople to Calcutta. In H. the word represents a particular class, of which the ingredients are milk, sugar, almond paste, and ghee flavoured with cardamom. "The best at Bombay is imported from Muskat." (Birdwood).

1672.—"Ce qui estoit plus le plaisant, c'estoit un homme qui precedoit le corps des confituriers, lequel avoit une chemise qui lay descendoi aux talons, toute couverte d'algue, c'est a dire, de confiture."—Joura, d'Art. Gallaud, i. 118.

1673.—"... the Widow once a Moon (to) go to the Grave with her Acquaintance to repeat the doleful Dirge, after which she bestows Holway, a kind of Sacramental Wafer; and entreats their Prayers for the Soul of the Departed."—Fryer, 94.

1836.—"A curious curry of the seller of a kind of sweetmeat ('halāweh'), composed of treacle fried with some other ingredients, is 'For a nail! O sweetmeat! ...' children and servants often steal implements of iron, &c., from the house ... and give them to him in exchange. ..."—Lace, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1871, ii. 15.

HUMMAUL, s. Ar. hummal, a porter. The use of the word in India is confined to the west, and there now commonly indicates a palankin-bearer. The word still survives in parts of Sicily in the form camallu=It. 'facchino,' a relic of the Saracenic occupation. In Andalusia alhamel now means a man who lets out a baggage horse; and the word is also used in Morocco in the same way (Dozy).

1350.—"Those rustics whom they call camalls (camallos), whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in litters, such as are mentioned in Canticles: 'Ferculum fecit sibi Solomon de lignis Libani,' whereby is meant a portable litter such as I used to be carried in at Zayton, and in India."—John de Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 966.

1554.—"To the Xabandar (see SHA-BUNDER) (at Ormuz) for the vessels employed in discharging stores, and for the amails who serve in the custom-house."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 103.

1691.—"His honour was carried by the Amaals, i.e. the Palankyn bearers 12 in number, sitting in his Palankyn."—Valentijn, v. 266.

1711.—"Hamalage, or Cooley-hire, at 1 co (see GOSEBECK) for every maund Tabreess."—Tartif in Locker, 243.

1750-60.—"The Hamauls or porters, who make a livelihood of carrying goods to and from the warehouses."—Grose, i. 120.

1809.—"The palankeen-bearers are here called hamauls (a word signifying carrier) ... these people come chiefly from the Mahratta country, and are of the coombie or agricultural caste."—Maria Graham, 2.
HUMMING-BIRD. 430

HUZĀRA.

1813.—For Hamauls at Bussora, see Milburn, i. 126.

1840.—"The hamals groaned under the weight of their precious load, the Apostle of the Ganges" (Dr. Duff to wit).—Smith’s Life of Dr. John Wilson, 1878, p. 282.

1877.—"The stately iron gate enclosing the front garden of the Russian Embassy was beset by a motley crowd. . . . Hamals, or street porters, bent double under the burden of heavy trunks and boxes, would come now and then up one or other of the two semicircular avenues."—Letter from Constantinople, in Times, May 7.

HUMMING-BIRD, s. This name is popularly applied in some parts of India to the sun-birds (sub-fam. Nectarininae).

HUMP, s. ‘Calcutta humps’ are the salted humps of Indian oxen exported from that city. (See under BUFFALO.)

HURCARA, HIRCARA, &c., s. Hind, harkat, ‘a messenger, a courier; an emissary, a spy’ (Wilson). The etymology, according to the same authority, is har, ‘every,’ tahr, ‘business.’ The word became very familiar in the Gilchristian spelling Hurkaru, from the existence of a Calcutta newspaper bearing that title (Bengal Hurkaru, generally enunciated by non-Indians as Hur kêroô), for the first 60 years of last century, or thereabouts.

1747.—"Given to the Ircaras for bringing news of the Engagement. (Pag.) 4 3 0."—Fort St. David, Expenses of the Paymaster, under January. MS. Records in India Office.

1748.—"The city of Dacca is in the utmost confusion on account of . . . advice of a large force of Maharrattas coming by way of the Sunderbunds, and that they were advanced as far as Sundra Col, when first despaired of by their Hurcarrahs."—In Long, 4.

1757.—"I beg you to send me a good alcara who understands the Portuguese language."—Letter in Vees, 159.

"Hircars or Spies."—Ibid. 161; [and comp. 67].

1761.—"The head Harcar returned, and told me this as well as several other secrets very useful to me, which I got from him by dint of money and some rum."—Letter of Capt. Martin White, in Long, 299.

[1772.—"Hercarras." (See under DALOYET.)]

1780.—"One day upon the march a Hercarrah came up and delivered him a letter from Colonel Baillie."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1803.—"The hircarras reported the enemy to be at Bokedun."—Letter of A. Wellesley, ibid. 348.

c. 1810.—"We were met at the entrance of Tippoo’s dominions by four hircarras, or soldiers, whom the Sulten sent as a guard to conduct us safely."—Miss Edgeworth, Lame Jereus. Miss Edgeworth has oddly misused the word here.

1813.—"The contrivances of the native halcarrahs and spies to conceal a letter are extremely clever, and the measures they frequently adopt to elude the vigilance of an enemy are equally extraordinary."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 129; [compare 2nd ed. i. 64; ii. 201].

HURTaul, s. Hind from Skt. hari-talaka, hartāl, hariāl, yellow arsenic, orpiment.

c. 1347.—Ibn Batuta seems oddly to confound it with camphor. "The best (camphor) called in the country itself al-ḥardāla, is that which attains the highest degree of cold."—Ibid. iv. 241.

c. 1750.—. . . hartal and Cotch, Earth-Oil and Wood-Oil . . ."—List of Burmese Products, in Dalrymple’s Or. Repr. i. 100.

HUZĀRA, n.p. This name has two quite distinct uses.

(a.) Pers. Hazāra. It is used as a generic name for a number of tribes occupying some of the wildest parts of Afghanistan, chiefly N.W. and S.W. of Kabul. These tribes are in no respect Afghan, but are in fact most or all of them Mongol in features, and some of them also in language. The term at one time appears to have been used more generally for a variety of the wilder clans in the higher hill countries of Afghanistan and the Oxus basin, much as in Scotland of a century and a half ago they spoke of "the clans." It appears to be merely from the Pers. hazār, 1000. The regiments, so to speak, of the Mongol hosts of Chinghiz and his immediate successors were called hazātras, and if we accept the belief that the Hazātras of Afghanistan were predatory bands of those hosts who settled in that region (in favour of which there is a good deal to be said), this name is intelligible. If so, its application to the non-Mongol people of Wakhân, &c., must have been a later transfer. [See the discussion by Bellew, who points out that "amongst themselves this people never use the term Hazdrah as their national appellation, and yet they have no name for their people as a nation.
They are only known amongst themselves by the names of their principal tribes and the clans subordinate to them respectively." (Races of Afghanistan, 114.)

c. 1480.—"The Hazara, Takdari, and all the other tribes having seen this, quietly submitted to his authority."—Tarkhân-Nâma, in Elliot, i. 303. For Takdari we should probably read Nakudari; and see Maro Polo, Bk. i. ch. 18, note on Nigudâris.

c. 1505.—Kabul "on the west has the mountain districts, in which are situated Karnâ and Ghûr. This mountainous tract is at present occupied and inhabited by the Hazâra and Nukdrî tribes."—Baber, p. 136.

1508.—"Mirza Ababeker, the ruler and tyrant of Kâshghar, had seized all the Upper Hazâras of Badakhshan."—Erskine's Baber and Humâyûn, i. 287. "Hazârajât bâldast. The upper districts in Badakhshân were called Hazâras."—Erskine's note. He is using the Termh Râshî. But is not the word Hazâras here, the clans, used elliptically for the highland districts occupied by them?

[c. 1590.—"The Hazârahs are the descendants of the Chaghatay army, sent by Manku Khân to the assistance of Huâkû Khân. ... They possess horses, sheep and goats. They are divided into factions, each covetous of what they can obtain, deceptive in their common intercourse and their conventions of amity savour of the wolf."—Arû, ed. Jarrett, ii. 402.]

(b.) A mountain district in the extreme N.W. of the Punjab, of which Abbottabad, called after its founder, General James Abbott, is the British head-quarter. The name of this region apparently has nothing to do with Hazâras in the tribal sense, but is probably a survival of the ancient name of a territory in this quarter, called in Sanskrit Âbhisêkâra, and figuring in Ptolemy, Arrian and Curtius as the kingdom of King Abisares. [See McCrindle, Invasion of India, 69.]

HUZOO, s. Ar. ہژار, ‘the presence’; used by natives as a respectful way of talking of or to exalted personages, to or of their master, or occasionally of any European gentleman in presence of another European. [The allied words hazrat and hazârî are used in kindred senses as in the examples.]

[1787.—"You will send to the Huzzoor an account particular of the assessment payable by each ryot."—Pawana of Tipoo, in Logan, Malabar, iii, 125.

[1813.—"The Maharatta cavalry are divided into several classes: the Hussérât, or house-
It is a singular thing that in an article on Zanzibar in the J. R. Geog. Soc. vol. xxiii. by the late Col. Sykes, the Sultan is always called the Imaum, [of which other examples will be found below].

1673.—"At night we saw Muschat, whose vast and horrid Mountains no Shade but Heaven does hide. . . . The Prince of this country is called Imaum, who is guardian at Mahomet's Tomb, and on whom is devolved the right of Caliphship according to the Ottoman belief."—Fryer, 220.

[1753.—"These people are Mahommedans of a particular sect . . . they are subject to an Iman, who has absolute authority over them."—Hawway, iii. 67.

1901.—Of the Bombay Kojas, "there were only 12 Imans, the last of the number . . . having disappeared without issue."—Times, April 12.

IMAUMBARRA, s. This is a hybrid word Imamābār, in which the last part is the Hindi bārd, 'an enclosure,' &c. It is applied to a building maintained by Sh'ā communities in India for the express purpose of celebrating the mohurrum ceremonies (see HOBSON-JOBSON). The sepulchre of the Founder and his family is often combined with this object. The Imamābār of the Nawāb Asaf-ud-daula at Lucknow is, or was till the siege of 1858, probably the most magnificent modern Oriental structure in India. It united with the objects already mentioned a mosque, a college, and apartments for the members of the religious establishment. The great hall is "conceived on so grand a scale," says Ferguson, "as to entitle it to rank with the buildings of an earlier age." The central part of it forms a vaulted apartment of 162 feet long by 53½ wide.

[1837.—"In the afternoon we went to see the Emaunberra."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 87.]

IMPALE, v. It is startling to find an injunction to impale criminals given by an English governor (Vansittart, apparently) little more than a century ago. [See CALUETE.]

1764.—"I request that you will give orders to the Naib of Dacca to send some of the Factory Sepoys along with some of his own people, to apprehend the said murderers and to impale them, which will be very sensible to traders."—The Governor of Fort William to the Nawab; in Long, 389.

1768-71—"The punishments inflicted at Batavia are excessively severe, especially such as fall upon the Indians. Impalement is the chief and most terrible."—Savorninus, i. 288. This writer proceeds to give a description of the horrible process, which he witnessed.

INAUM, ENAUM, s. Ar. in′dām, 'a gift' (from a superior), 'a favour,' but especially in India a gift of rent-free land: also land so held. In′ândār, the holder of such lands. A full detail of the different kinds of in′dām, especially among the Maharrattas, will be found in Wilson, s.v. The word is also used in Western India for bucksheesh (q.v.). This use is said to have given rise to a little mistake on the part of an English political traveller some 30 or 40 years ago, when there had been some agitation regarding the in′am lands and the alleged harshness of the Government in dealing with such claims. The traveller reported that the public feeling in the west of India was so strong on this subject that his very palankin-bearers at the end of their stage invariably joined their hands in supplication, shouting, 'In′am! In′am! Sahib!'

INDIA, INDIES, n.p. A book might be written on this name. We can only notice a few points in connection with it.

It is not easy, if it be possible, to find a truly native (i.e. Hindu) name for the whole country which we call India; but the conception certainly existed from an early date. Bhāratavarsha is used apparently in the Purāṇas with something like this conception. Jambudvīpa, a term belonging to the mythical cosmography, is used in the Buddhist books, and sometimes, by the natives of the south, even now. The accuracy of the definitions of India in some of the Greek and Roman authors shows the existence of the same conception of the country that we have now; a conception also obvious in the modes of speech of Hwen T'sang and the other Chinese pilgrims. The Asoka inscriptions, c. B.C. 250, had enumerated Indian kingdoms covering a considerable part of the conception, and in the great inscription at Tanjore, of the 11th century A.D., which incidentally mentions the conquest (real or imaginary) of a great part of India, by the king of Tanjore, Vira-Chola, the same system is followed. In a copperplate of the 11th century, by the Chalukya dynasty of Kalyāna, we find the expression "from the Himalaya to the Bridge" (Ind. Antiq. i. 81), i.e. the Bridge of Rāma, or 'Adam's Bridge,' as our maps have it. And Mahomedan definitions as old, and with the name, will be found below. Under the Hindu kings of Vijayanagara also (from the 14th century) inscriptions indicate all India by like expressions.

The origin of the name is without doubt (Skt.) Sindhu, 'the sea,' and thence the Great River on the West, and the country on its banks, which we still call Sindh.* By a change common in many parts of the world, and in various parts of India itself, this name exchanged the initial sibilant for an aspirate, and became (eventually) in Persiā Hindū, and so passed on to the Greeks and Latins, viz. İrđol for the people, İrdős for the river, İνδική and India for the country on its banks. Given this name for the western tract, and the conception of the country as a whole to which we have alluded, the name in the mouths of foreigners naturally but gradually spread to the whole. Some have imagined that the name of the land of Nod ('wandering'), to which Cain is said to have migrated, and which has the same consonants, is but a form of this; which is worth noting, as this idea may have had to do with the curious statement in some medieval writers (e.g. John Marignolli) that certain eastern races were "the descendants of Cain." In the form Hūdhū [Hindūs, see Encycl. Bibl. ii. 2169] India appears in the great cuneiform inscription on the tomb of Darius Hystaspes near Persepolis, coupled with Gaddrā (i.e. Gandhāra, or the Peshawar country), and no doubt still in some degree restricted in its application. In the Hebrew of Esther i. 1, and viii. 9, the form is Ḥod(d)ā, or perhaps rather Ḥiddā (see also Perīsol below). The first Greek writers to speak of India and the Indians were Hecataeus of Miletus, Herodotus, and Ctesias (b.c. c. 500, c.

* In most of the important Asiatic languages the same word indicates the Sea or a River of the first class; e.g. Sindhu as here; in Western Tibet Gyantso and Samundrāng (corr. of Skt. samunnadra) 'the Sea,' which are applied to the Indus and Sutlej (see J. R. Smith, Soc. xxii. 84-85); Hebrew y'mm, applied both to the sea and to the Nile; Ar. bahr; Pers. daryā; Mongol. dala, &c. Compare the Homeric Ἄκηαv.
The last, though repeating more fables than Herodotus, shows a truer conception of what India was.

Before going further, we ought to point out that India itself is a Latin form, and does not appear in a Greek writer, we believe, before Lucian and Polyenus, both writers of the middle of the 2nd century. The Greek form is Ἰνδία, or else 'The Land of the Indians.'

The name of 'India' spread not only from its original application, as denoting the country on the banks of the Indus, to the whole peninsula between (and including) the valleys of Indus and Ganges; but also in a vaguer way to all the regions beyond. The compromise between the vaguer and the more precise use of the term is seen in Ptolemy, where the boundaries of the true India are defined, on the whole, with surprising exactness, as 'India within the Ganges,' whilst the darker regions beyond appear as 'India beyond the Ganges.' And this double conception of India, as 'India Proper' (as we may call it), and India in the vaguer sense, has descended to our own time.

So vague became the conception in the 'dark ages' that the name is sometimes found to be used as synonymous with Asia, 'Europe, Africa, and India,' forming the three parts of the world. Earlier than this, however, we find a tendency to discriminate different Indians, in a form distinct from Ptolemy's Intra et extra Ganges; and the terms India Major, India Minor can be traced back to the 4th century. As was natural where there was so little knowledge, the application of these terms was various and oscillating, but they continued to hold their ground for 1000 years, and in the later centuries of that period we generally find a third India also, and a tendency (of which the roots go back, as far at least as Virgil's time) to place one of the three in Africa.

It is this conception of a twofold or threefold India that has given us and the other nations of Europe the vernacular expressions in plural form which hold their ground to this day: the Indies, les Indes, (It.) le Indes, &c.

And we may add further, that China is called by Friar Odoric Upper India (India Superior), whilst Marignolli calls it India Magna and Maxima, and calls Malabar India Parva, and India Inferior.

There was yet another, and an Oriental, application of the term India to the country at the mouth of the Tigris and Euphrates, which the people of Basra still call Hind; and which Sir H. Rawlinson connects with the fact that the Talmudic writers confounded Obiullah in that region with the Harvila of Genesis. (See Cuthay, &c., 55, note.)

In the work of the Chinese traveller Hwen Tsang again we find that by him and his co-religionists a plurality of Indias was recognised, i.e. five, viz. North, Central, East, South, and West.

Here we may remark how two names grew out of the original Sindhu. The aspirated and Persianised form Hind, as applied to the great country beyond the Indus, passed to the Arabs. But when they invaded the valley of the Indus and found it called Sindhu, they adopted that name in the form Sind, and thenceforward 'Hind and Sind' were habitually distinguished, though generally coupled, and conceived as two parts of a great whole.

Of the application of India to an Ethiopian region, an application of which indications extend over 1500 years, we have not space to speak here. On this and on the medieval plurality of Indias reference may be made to two notes on Marco Polo, 2nd ed. vol. ii. pp. 419 and 425.

The vague extension of the term India to which we have referred, survives in another form besides that in the use of 'Indies,' India, to each European nation which has possessions in the East, may be said, without much inaccuracy, to mean in colloquial use that part of the East in which their own possessions lie. Thus to the Portuguese, India was, and probably still is, the West Coast only. In their writers of the 16th and 17th century a distinction is made between India, the territory of the Portuguese and their immediate neighbours on the West Coast, and Mogor, the dominions of the Great Mogul. To the Dutchman India means Java and its dependencies. To the Spaniard, if we mistake not, India is Manilla. To the Gaul are not les Indes Pondicherry, Chandernagore, and Réunion?

As regards the West Indies, this expression originates in the misconception of the great Admiral himself, who in his memorable enterprise was seeking, and thought he had found, a new route to the 'Indias' by sailing west instead of east. His discoveries were to Spain the Indies, until it gradually became manifest that they were not identical with the ancient lands of the east, and then they became the West-Indies.

Indian is a name which has been carried still further abroad; from being applied, as a matter of course, to the natives of the islands, supposed of India, discovered by Columbus, it naturally passed to the natives of the adjoining continent, till it came to be the familiar name of all the tribes between (and sometimes even including) the Esquimaux of the North and the Patagonians of the South. This abuse no doubt has led to our hesitation in applying the term to a native of India itself. We use the adjective Indian, but no modern Englishman who has had to do with India ever speaks of a man of that country as 'an Indian.' Forrest, in his \textit{Voyage to Mergui}, uses the inelegant word Indostaner; but in India itself a Hindustani means, as has been indicated under that word, a native of the upper Gangetic valley and adjoining districts. Among the Greeks 'an Indian' ('Ἰδας) acquired a notable specific application, viz. to an elephant driver or mahout (q.v.).

\textbf{c. 590.}—"As for the land of the Hind it is bounded on the East by the Persian Sea (i.e. the Indian Ocean), on the W. and S. by the countries of Islam, and on the N. by the Chinese Empire. . . The length of the land of the Hind from the government of Mokrān, the country of Mānṣūra and Bodha and the rest of Sind, till thou comest to Kannūj and thence passest on to Tobbat (see \textit{Tībēt}), is about 4 months, and its breadth from the Indian Ocean to the country of Kannūj about three months."—\textit{Istakhri's}, pp. 6 and 11.

\textbf{c. 650.}—"The name of \textit{Tien-chan} (India) has gone through various and confused forms. . . Anciently they said \textit{Shē-hūn}; whilst some authors called it \textit{Hien-teou}. Now conforming to the true pronunciation one should say \textit{In-tū}."—\textit{Hwen Tsang}, in \textit{Pěl. Bouddhi}, ii. 57.

\textbf{c. 914.}—"For the nonce let us confine ourselves to summary notices concerning the kings of Sind and Hind. The language of Sind is different from that of Hind. . . ."—\textit{Mauīd}, i. 381.

\textbf{c. 1020.}—"India (Al-Hind) is one of those plains bounded on the south by the Sea of the Indians. Lofty mountains bound it on all the other quarters. Through this plain the waters descending from the mountains are discharged. Moreover, if thou wilt examine this country with thine eyes, if thou wilt regard the rounded and worn stones that are found in the soil, however deep thou mayest dig,—stones which near the mountains, where the rivers roll down violently, are large; but small at a distance from the mountains, where the current slackens; and which become mere sand where the currents are at rest, where the waters sink into the soil, and where the sea is at hand—then thou wilt be tempted to believe that this country was at a former period only a sea which the dubious washed down by the torrents hath filled up. . . ."—\textit{Al-Birānī}, in \textit{Reinhold's Extracts, Journ. As.} ser. 4. 1844.

\textbf{—Hind} is surrounded on the East by Chīn and M āchīn, on the West by Sind and Ḫabūl, and on the South by the Sea."—\textit{Ibid.}, in \textit{Elliot}, i. 45.

\textbf{1205.}—"The whole country of Hind, from Pershaur to the shores of the Ocean, and in the other direction, from Siwistān to the hills of Chīn. . . ."—\textit{Hawān Nīẓāmī}, in \textit{Elliot}, ii. 236. That is, from Peshawar in the north, to the Indian Ocean in the south; from Īshān (on the west bank of the Indus) to the mountains on the east dividing from China.

\textbf{c. 1500.}—"\textit{Hodu quae est Indica extra et intra Gastrum.}—\textit{Minoara Mundī} (in Hebrew), by \textit{Abr. Peretol}, in \textit{Hyde, Syntagma Dissert.,} Oxon, 1767, i. 75.
1553.—"And had Vasco da Gama belonged to a nation so glorious as the Romans he would perchance have added to the style of his family, noble as that is, the surname 'Of India,' since we know that those symbols of honour that a man wins are more glorious than those that he inherits, and that Scipio gloried more in the achievement which gave him the surname of 'Africanus,' than in the name of Cornelius, which was that of his family."—Barros, i. iv. 12.

1572.—Defined, without being named, by Camoens:
"Alem do Indo faz, e aquem do Gange Há terreno muy grande, e assaz famoso, Que pela parte Austral o mar abrange, E para o Norte o Emódio cavernoso."

Lusíadas, vii. 17.

Englished by Burton:
"Outside of Indus, inside Ganges, lies
A wide-spread country, famed enough Of yore;
Northward the peaks of carved Emódus rise,
And southward the ocean doth confine the shore."

1577.—"India is properly called that great Province of Asia, in the whiche great Alexander kept his warres, and was so named of the ryuer Indus."—Iten, Hist. of Tranwayle, f. 3v.

The distinct Indias.
